Restrictions on the use of badges or uniforms as signals of support for certain organisations are intended to have the dual effect of preventing communication—by those means—of the political message associated with the organisation and of tending to minimise the impression that the organisation is supported, thereby denying reassurance to its members, lowering their morale and preventing them from arousing public support. Under s 3 of the PTA 1989, it was an offence to 'wear any item which arouses a reasonable apprehension that a person is a member or supporter of a proscribed organisation'. This provision is reproduced in s 13 TA, which makes it an offence to wear an item of clothing, or wear, carry or display an article 'in such a way or in such circumstances as to arouse reasonable suspicion [that the person in question] is a member or supporter of a proscribed organisation'. Again, it is notable that no element of mens rea is included. The offence can be established on the basis of proof of reasonable suspicion alone and no defence is provided.

An overlapping offence arises under s 1 of the Public Order Act 1936: it is an offence to wear a uniform signifying association with any political organisation or with the promotion of any political object. Section 1 was invoked in *Whelan v DPP*⁵⁵⁶ against leaders of a Provisional Sinn Fein protest march against internment in Northern Ireland, all of whom wore black berets while some wore dark glasses, dark clothing and carried Irish flags. It was found that, first, something must be 'worn' as apparel and secondly, that it must be a uniform. Something might amount to a uniform if worn by a number of persons in order to signify their association with each other or if commonly used by a certain organisation. By this means, the third requirement that the uniform must signal the wearer's association with a particular political organisation could also be satisfied. Alternatively, it might be satisfied by consideration of the occasion on which the uniform was worn without the need to refer to the past history of the organisation. It was found that the items worn could amount to a uniform; this decision therefore greatly diminished the distinction between this offence and that under the PTA. The justification for retention of the PTA provisions is therefore doubtful due to the overlap between the two offences.

555 See Chapter 13.
556 [1975] QB 864.

Clearly, a number of objections of principle arise in respect of the application of the proscription-related offences to a wider range of groups. The key objection is that, by making it possible to proscribe a wide range of groups, the legislation potentially curtails proscription-related activities which previously would not have been conceived of as related to terrorism. Some examples are illustrative. A group which did not itself engage in terrorism but which, for example, expressed support during one of its assemblies for the 'serious disruption' of a computer system could be proscribed as falling within the definition. If, during a march, members of a group opposed to the introduction of GM crops wore badges expressing support for a proscribed environmental activist group, they would commit an offence. They would also attract criminal liability if they carried leaflets which aroused reasonable suspicion that such support was being expressed, although the leaflet was in fact that of a similar but more moderate and non-proscribed group. If a person who opposed the use of violence to further the cause of animal rights organised a meeting to express such views in private with two other people, one of whom was a member of a proscribed animal rights group, who spoke in its favour, she would commit an offence carrying a maximum penalty of 10 years' imprisonment, unless she could disprove the mens rea element.

Inciting terrorism abroad

The new legislation does not only act as the 'trigger' applying the old offences to a wider range of groups; it will also create new offences of inciting terrorism abroad, which apply under ss 59, 60 and 61 of the TA to England and Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland, respectively. In the Consultation Paper, the government expressed concerns as to the effect on free speech: 'the incitement offence could be difficult in practice to prove and...the effect of [its creation] could be to constrain freedom of expression. On the other hand...considerable concern can be caused by...statements...encouraging and glorifying acts of terrorism.'⁵⁵⁷ The government came down on the side of inclusion of the offence. Under s 59(1), 'A person commits an offence if (a) he incites another person to commit an act of terrorism wholly or partly outside the United Kingdom, and (b) the act would, if committed in England and Wales, constitute one of the offences listed in subsection (2)'. Under s 59(2), the offences are the more serious offences against the person: murder, an offence under ss 18, 23, 24, 28 or 29 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 (OAPA) and an offence under s 1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. Under s 59(3), the penalty for conviction under this section will be the penalty 'to which he would be liable on conviction of the offence listed in subsection (2) which corresponds to the act which he incites'. Sections 60 and 61 create equivalent provisions relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland.

557 Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998, Chapter 2, para 4.19.

In defending the introduction of the new offence, Jack Straw, the then Home Secretary, pointed out that existing legislation which has implemented various international covenants means that it is already an offence to incite anyone abroad to hijack an aircraft or to invite someone in Turkey or India to commit murder. Therefore, extending the offence to other countries, such as Japan or Australia, is logical: 'Every terrorist attack represents a violation of our democratic values...our response must be sufficiently robust to challenge and defeat these...activities. I think we have got the balance right.'⁵⁵⁸ This claim is presumably based on the restriction of the offence to incitement to commit the serious offences listed. Nevertheless, it is open to question. It means that a person who encouraged another to assassinate a terrorist dictator would commit an offence punishable with a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment. The offence might also be committed during a demonstration at which words spoken denouncing such a dictator could be construed as amounting to incitement to assassinate him. Section 59 also creates doubtful distinctions between offences. Sometimes very little separates the person who commits grievous bodily harm (s 18 of the OAPA) from the person who commits serious bodily harm (s 20 of the OAPA) and this is more clearly the case where the attack need not in fact have been committed. But the s 20 offence is not listed in s 59(2). Therefore, determination that a person is subject to a penalty of a maximum of life imprisonment or to no penalty at all may rest on a very fine distinction.

Requirements of the Convention under the HRA

The offences discussed tend to strike directly at freedom of political expression, which, as indicated in the Introduction to Part II, is 'one of the essential foundations of a democratic society', so that exceptions to it 'must be narrowly interpreted and the necessity for any restrictions...convincingly established'.⁵⁵⁹ Such offences include those of incitement, of wearing any item that arouses a reasonable apprehension that a person is a member or supporter of a proscribed organisation, of organising a meeting at which a member of a proscribed organisation is speaking, and that of soliciting support for such an organisation. The use of these offences is prima facie an interference with the guarantee under Art 10 since all, including the wearing of an item, involve exercises of expression. In particular, the incitement provisions under ss 59–61 and the provision of s 12 regarding meetings afford very little recognition to the value of peaceful protest and assembly. Strasbourg, as indicated in the Introduction to this chapter, affords that value pre-eminence in a democracy.⁵⁶⁰ Charging a member of an assembly with one of these offences would clearly, therefore, amount to an interference with the Art 10 guarantee. The domestic court would be expected to observe the same or higher standards than Strasbourg in 558 Straw, J in a Guardian article, 14 December 1999.

559 Observer and Guardian v UK A 216, pp 29–30, para 59; Judgment of 26 November 1991.

scrutinising the need for the interference, bearing in mind the narrow margin of appreciation afforded to States in respect of interference with political speech, especially where it concerns criticism directed at the government itself.⁵⁶¹

Obviously, the view taken of the necessity and proportionality of the interference would depend on the particular circumstances behind the charging of the offence in the instance before the court. But to take the example used above of a person meeting privately with two others and hearing a member of a proscribed group: it might be problematic to find that the necessity for the interference with freedom of expression in a democratic society had been convincingly established. This offence is especially pernicious in terms of freedom of expression since the meeting in question might be entirely peaceful: liability would depend solely on the content of the speech of at least one of the speakers. The incitement offence under ss 59, 60 and 61 is unconfined to members of proscribed groups. Taking the example used above of charging the offence in respect of persons at a public meeting denouncing a terrorist dictator, a court which viewed the interference with freedom of expression as, in the circumstances, disproportionate to the aims in view, could take the opportunity of construing the wording of the provisions very strictly. In particular, where there was leeway to do so, on a very strict interpretation of the application of certain of the offences listed in s 59(2), it might be found that incitement merely of lesser, similar, but unlisted offences had occurred.

The most obvious and useful means of challenging the application of the new provisions will be during the criminal process itself under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA. Apart from arguments under Arts 10 and 11, the Art 6 guarantee of a fair and public hearing will provide the means whereby aspects of the criminal liability created under the TA 2000 will have to be examined. In criminal proceedings on the application of the counter-terrorist offences, the courts will have the opportunity of interpreting them, under s 3 of the HRA, compatibly with the Convention rights. They must also discharge their duty under s 6 of the HRA. The approach of the courts towards the new legislation will clearly be crucial.

Traditionally, since terrorism has been viewed as threatening national security, the courts have adopted a deferential stance.⁵⁶² While a far wider range of persons and activities will be designated 'terrorist' under the new Act, it is apparent that the actions of many such persons and groups do not genuinely threaten national security, not least because the scale of their operations is likely to be small. The approach taken by the House of Lords in *Ex p Kebilene*⁵⁶³ to counter-terrorist provisions, particularly the findings of Lord Hope of Craighead, suggests that where national security is in issue, the judges will refuse (overtly) to apply the margin of appreciation doctrine in adjudicating on the new provisions, and yet may adopt a 560 See Ezeline v France (1991) 14 EHRR 362. On political expression generally, see Castells v Spain A 236, p 23, para 43; Judgment of 23 April 1992.

561 See Incal v Turkey (2000) 29 EHRR 449 and see the Introduction to this part, pp 209–10.

562 In CCSU v Minister for the Civil Service [1985] AC 374 the House of Lords accepted the government's claim that national security was at risk, without demanding that evidence should be put forward to support it. In the case of Secretary of State for the Home Department v Rehman [2001] 3 WLR 877, HL; [2000] 3 All ER 778, CA, the House of Lords accepted that it was for the government alone to determine whether a threat to national security, broadly defined, existed. Thus, the judiciary tends to accept government claims that such a threat is self-evident or must be taken on trust.

563 [1999] 4 All ER 801; Divisional Court [1999] 3 WLR 175.

restrained approach. It was said in Ex p Kebilene in the context of the case, which concerned the compatibility of terrorist legislation with Art 6, that a deferential approach could be justified. The approach of the courts is likely to continue to depend on the extent to which national security can be said to be at stake. Under the previous legislation, in the context of Irish terrorism, the courts tended to take an absolutist approach, readily making the assumption that considerations of national security outweighed the individual rights at stake. The courts are less likely to be deferential where national security is not an issue and therefore may show a greater willingness to take a robust approach to the new Act than they would if adjudicating on the activities of IRA terrorists. Under the current legislation, bearing in mind its width and the influence of the HRA, the approach might be more nuanced, and might depend more on the particular circumstances of each case, since the groups or the activities in question may be far more divergent from each other, and many persons who are not part of any such group may fall within the new provisions.

Article 6 provides guarantees that may come into conflict with a number of provisions of the new Act. A number of provisions under the TA 2000 may be regarded as infringing the presumption of innocence at trial. This may be due to the use of presumptions against the defendant, to the need to show reasonable suspicion only, regarding the main or only ingredient of the offence, and/or to the lack of a need to prove mens rea. A number of the special offences contain, as indicated above, a 'reversed' mens rea: the defendant has the burden of disproving knowledge or intent. Strictly, the burden of proof is unchanged but, clearly, where the prosecution has merely to prove a minimal actus reus beyond reasonable doubt, its burden is significantly lowered, while the presumption of innocence is undermined. Under a number of the offences under the TA discussed, including those contained in ss 12 and 13, there is no need for the prosecution to show mens rea and the actus reus of these offences tends to be minimal. For example, under s 13, the actus reus can consist of doing something which gives rise to reasonable suspicion that support is being expressed for a proscribed organisation. Clearly, the interpretation of these provisions in practice will depend on the attitude of title domestic judiciary. A means of narrowing down the use of presumptions was established in *R v Killen*⁵⁶⁴ which held that, under the existing law, although the fact of possession constituted a prima facie case, the guilt of the accused still had to be proved beyond all reasonable doubt.

If it appeared that a certain provision of the Act was incompatible with Art 6, the court would have three main and contrasting courses of action available to it. First, it could seek to water down the Art 6 guarantee in the manner suggested by Lord Hope in *Ex p Kebilene*⁵⁶⁵ by balancing the individual right to a fair trial against the purposes of the terrorist legislation. In so doing, it might be found that the provision of the 2000 Act could be fully or largely applied. Secondly, it could give full weight to the Art 6 guarantee in the manner suggested by the Lord Chief Justice in the Divisional Court in Ex p Kebilene, and could go on to find that applying the statutory provision in question would lead to unfairness at trial, based on the standards of Art 6. It could then declare that to do so would be an abuse of process. Thirdly, a court of sufficient authority could, on appeal, make a declaration of incompatibility.

564 [1974] NI 220.

565 [1999] 4 All ER 801. For discussion, see Chapter 4, pp 186–87.

9 CONCLUSIONS

Before the HRA came into force, the true boundaries of public protest were drawn, not by reference to the constitutional significance in a democracy of rights of political participation or of affording expression, through the medium of forms of protest, to a variety of viewpoints, but often arbitrarily due to the imprecision of the law and the approach frequently taken to it in low level courts or by the police. It is tempting to look forward to the use of Arts 10 and 11 in the post-HRA era in the expectation not only that the boundaries will eventually be re-drawn more precisely, but also that legal discourse in this area will no longer focus simply on disorder, but rather will seek to engage in the ongoing debate, at Strasbourg and in other jurisdictions, as to the values underlying the constitutional significance of protest and the weight they should be afforded. Whether that expectation will be fulfilled depends partly on the readiness of the domestic judiciary to disregard the outcomes of many of the public protest cases that Strasbourg has considered. But this chapter has also suggested that the impact of the HRA on public protest will be principally determined not by the Strasbourg jurisprudence it introduces, but by the prevailing and established judicial attitude to public protest, and the extent to which the judiciary are prepared to move away from it, by giving practical effect to the core values underlying the Convention. Vital, also, will be the way that the judiciary deal with the problematic issue of the margin of appreciation and its role in the jurisprudence they will have to consider.

As we have seen, reliance on the outcomes of cases at Strasbourg will provide no secure grounding for such protection—rather the reverse. The judiciary must therefore be prepared to draw upon the general principles and values underlying the Convention—free expression, pluralism, tolerance and the maintenance of diversity as essential characteristics of a democratic society—if the HRA is to provide more than a cosmetic change in approach to the protection of the right of peaceful protest.⁵⁶⁶

Judges within the ‘activist’ model may find that their decision making can be rooted in the general principles upheld at Strasbourg as underpinning the Convention rather than in its particular application. The justification for affording greater weight to communicative rights than that afforded at Strasbourg in findings under Arts 10 and 11 can be found in the need to ensure the genuine efficacy of the rights, with a view to realising the free expression and assembly objectives referred to above, especially in the case of minority groups or viewpoints. As argued, the Convention jurisprudence clearly recognises the need to protect a plurality of views in a democracy, even in the face of offence caused to the majority.⁵⁶⁷ It would be in accordance with the Convention concept of a democratic society to refuse to place those seeking to exercise communicative rights in the same position as football hooligans and to reject a legal tradition of valuing the general societal interest in public order over the exercise of such rights. In accordance with the values of the Convention, safeguarding the interests of minorities in a democracy is not to circumvent the democratic process, but to uphold it by obviating the danger that those interests will be marginalised.

566 They will also, of course, be free to draw upon the rich US and Canadian jurisprudence on public protest as a basic civil right.

567 Above, pp 440–41.

If the judiciary are prepared to take this stance, the nature and structure of judicial argument in public protest cases, as well as the likely outcomes, will change radically. Although some judges are likely to tend towards approaches which have been termed 'minimalist' or 'traditionalist', the rather tokenistic changes in legal reasoning which would result might still eventually come to influence judicial attitudes. In public order cases such judges will hear, even if they are unreceptive to, arguments from counsel as to the value of this form of political expression. Once the judiciary are placed in the position of considering such value and the need nevertheless to circumscribe protest within a democracy, they may eventually come to view this matter from a broader perspective⁵⁶⁸ and to participate in the debate which has been occurring in other jurisdictions for many years. Ultimately, in this particular area of political expression, the Act may come to have a more profoundly educative effect than in others, not only on the public, but on the judiciary.

568 Comparison may be made here with the manner in which the jurisprudence of the Canadian Supreme Court changed radically following the enactment of the Charter of Fundamental Rights, from orthodox 'black letter' analysis to a far more theorised and philosophical approach: see Leigh and Lustgarten, op cit, fn 541.

PART III

THE PROTECTION OF PRIVACY

INTRODUCTION¹

The right to respect for privacy is now accepted as part of the domestic law of a number of countries² and of international human rights instruments.³ However, the limits of the right are still unclear and a generally accepted definition of privacy has not emerged. As Raymond Wacks has observed, ‘the voluminous [theoretical] literature on the subject has failed to produce a lucid or consistent meaning of [the] concept’.⁴ It may be said, therefore, that privacy has become a complex and perhaps almost unworkably broad concept due to the variety of claims or interests which have been thought to fall within it.⁵ The European Court of Human Rights has accommodated many disparate issues within the concept of privacy arising under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights: they range from the rights of homosexuals⁶ to the right to receive information about oneself⁷ As Feldman has argued, the scope of Art 8 is continuing to widen.⁸

The Convention does not attempt to define privacy,⁹ but various definitions have been put forward which tend to be very broad: it has been termed ‘a circle around every individual human being which no government...ought to be permitted to overstep’ and ‘some space in human existence thus entrenched around and sacred from authoritative intrusion’.¹⁰ Feldman has found that the desire for a private area in life derives its justification from personal autonomy, which is linked to the idea of ‘defensible space’, and from the ‘idea of utility’—the idea that ‘people operate more effectively and happily when they are allowed to make their own

-
- 1 See generally Wacks, The Protection of Privacy, 1980; Westin, AF, Privacy and Freedom, 1970; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 4th edn, 1995, Chapter 8; Wacks, R (ed), Privacy, 1993; Feldman, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales (1993) 1st edn, Part 3; Markesinis, B (ed), Protecting Privacy, 1999; Clayton and Tomlinson, The Law of Human Rights (2000) Chapter 12; Eady, D, ‘A statutory right to privacy’ (1996) 3 EHRLR 243; Winfield, P (1981) 47 LQR 23; Yang, TL (1966) 15 ICLQ 175; Wacks, R, ‘The poverty of privacy’ (1980) 96 LQR 73; Seipp, D, ‘English judicial recognition of the right to privacy’ (1983) 3 OJLS 325; Leigh, I, ‘Horizontal rights, the Human Rights Act and privacy: lessons from the Commonwealth?’ (1999) 48 ICLQ 57; Grosz, S and Braithwaite, N, ‘Privacy and the Human Rights Act’, in Hunt and Singh (eds), A Practitioner’s Guide to the Impact of the Human Rights Act, 1999; Wright, J, ‘How private is my private life?’, in Betten, L (ed), The Human Rights Act 1998: What it Means, 1999. Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties Law: The Human Rights Era (2001) Chapter 6. Chapter 10 is based partly on Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, ‘Breach of confidence as a privacy remedy in the Human Rights Act era’ (2000) 63(5) MLR 660–93.
 - 2 For example, the US Privacy Act 1974 and the tort or torts of invasion of privacy, the Canadian Protection of Privacy Act 1974, Art 1382 of the French Civil Code; German courts can protect privacy under s 823(1) of the Civil Code and a right to privacy arises under the German Basic Law Art 10 (albeit limited to posts and telecommunications).
 - 3 It appears in the European Convention on Human Rights, Art 8 and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Art 17.
 - 4 ‘Introduction’, in Wacks, op cit, fn 1, p xi.
 - 5 See Wacks, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 1, pp 10–21.
 - 6 Dudgeon (1982) 4 EHRR 149.
 - 7 Gaskin (1990) 12 EHRR 36.
 - 8 (1997) 3 EHRLR 264.
 - 9 See further Chapter 2, pp 67–72.
 - 10 Mill, JS, Principles of Political Economy, 1970, p 306.

arrangements about domestic and business matters without interference from the State'.¹¹ Such phrases suggest that some aspects of an individual's life, which can be identified as private aspects, are of particular value and therefore warrant special protection from State intrusion. At an intuitive level, the notion that boundaries can and should be placed around such aspects of an individual's life, preventing such intrusion and thereby protecting personal autonomy, seems to be accepted as the fundamental basis of the idea of privacy¹² and underlies decisions under Art 8.¹³ However, as recognised at Strasbourg, the right goes further than simply requiring that the individual should be let alone—in two respects. As indicated below, the right also encompasses positive obligations on the part of the State authorities. It also places obligations on private bodies, which can include positive obligations. In *X and Y v Netherlands*¹⁴ the Court stated: 'these [Art 8] obligations may require the adoption of measures even in the sphere of relations between individuals.'

The disparate obligations created by this right are reflected in the different concerns of the three chapters in Part III. Chapter 10 deals with the protection of personal information from non-consensual use by public and private bodies. It particularly concentrates on invasion of privacy by the media. Chapter 11 considers State surveillance and searches of property; it covers a variety of intrusions of State agents into private life and considers the safeguards available to the individual. Chapter 12 considers protection for family and sexual life. It will be argued that in each of these contexts the Human Rights Act (HRA), which has imported the Strasbourg conceptions of privacy into domestic law, will be of great significance. The recently introduced statutes which now have a central impact in this context, the Data Protection Act 1998 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, must be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights under s 3 of the HRA. The HRA is also providing the impetus for further protection for privacy under common law and statutory developments, especially the development of the doctrine of confidence.

Theoretical considerations

If it is accepted that the value of personal autonomy underlies differing conceptions of privacy, it is necessary first to draw a distinction between what may be termed 'substantive' and 'informational' autonomy. The former denotes the individual's interest in being able to make certain substantive choices about personal life for him or herself, such as the choice to engage in certain sexual practices, without State coercion.¹⁵ Privacy derives its value partly from its close association with personal autonomy, in the sense that freedom from interference by the authorities will foster the conditions under which autonomy can be exercised. Thus, some authoritative invasions of privacy may be said to lead to interference with individual 11 See Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1st edn, 1993, pp 353–54.

12 See Seipp, ibid, p 333.

13 See, eg, Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433; McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans v United Kingdom (1981) 45 EHRR 71.

14 (1985) 8 EHRR 235.

15 Eg, over matters such as abortion and sexual activity.

autonomy. The exercise of autonomy may not be entirely dependent on establishing a state of privacy, but may at least be fostered thereby. But privacy may also be associated with self-fulfilment in the sense that protection for the private life of the individual may provide the best conditions under which he or she may flourish. In other words, self-fulfilment may be fostered if the individual is able to enjoy the benefits of the private: the dropping of the public mask, the communion of intimates, the expression of the deepest emotions.

The term 'informational autonomy', on the other hand, refers to the individual's interest in controlling the flow of personal information about herself, the interest referred to by the German Supreme Court as 'informational self-determination',¹⁶ or as Beardseely has put it, the right to 'selective disclosure'.¹⁷ In accordance with the views of a number of writers, it is suggested that this interest is one of the primary concerns of the law in this area.¹⁸ The ability to exercise control in this manner also affords some protection to other values, as Feldman¹⁹ has pointed out: 'If people are able to release [private] information with impunity, it might have the effect of illegitimately constraining a person's choices as to his or her private behaviour, interfering in a major way with his or her autonomy'.²⁰ Control over information thus indirectly protects substantive autonomy. Personal dignity, which must be diminished when information relating to intimate aspects of a person's life are widely published, giving rise to feelings of violation, shame, and embarrassment, is also afforded a measure of protection. Informational control also protects what Feldman identifies as the value in forming spheres of social interaction and intimacy—for example, work colleagues, friends, family, lovers—which may be seen as essential to human flourishing.²¹ It is clear that the intimacy that such relationships entail is predicated upon an ability of the individual to ensure that information which may be circulated within one sphere is not, without her knowledge or consent, transferred to another sphere or the outside world. A privacy law would give legal force to that ability.

Since considerations of this nature involve an implied contrast between the public and the private, it may be helpful at this point to consider the division between the

16 BGH, 19 December 1995, BGHZ 131, pp 322–46.

17 'Privacy: autonomy and selective disclosure', in Nomos XIII 54.

18 See Wacks, op cit, fn 1, pp 10–21; Westin, op cit, fn 1, p 7; Miller, A, Assault on Privacy, 1971, p 40. Ruth Gavison's definition of privacy—'a limitation of others' access to an individual'—has three aspects: information; attention; physical access ('Privacy and the limits of law' (1980) 89(3) Yale LJ 421); see also Gross's similar definition: 'The concept of privacy' (1967) 42 NYULR 34, p 36. We consider the issue of physical access to be adequately dealt with by the law of trespass; it will be argued below that the issue of 'attention' can be addressed within an 'informational' paradigm, provided that term is conceived of with sufficient sensitivity and flexibility. Cf Wacks, op cit, fn 1, p 76 (acknowledging the point as from unpublished work by Ruth Gavison. Parent agrees ('A new definition of privacy for the law' (1983) 2 Law and Philosophy 305, p 326).

19 Feldman, D, 'Secrecy, dignity or autonomy? Views of privacy as a civil liberty' (1994) 47(2) CLP 42, p 54.

20 Ibid, p 51. Feldman's view is that privacy protects persons operating in a given sphere from interference within that sphere by those who are outside it. He argues that within each different sphere of existence, privacy operates in four dimensions: 'space (including access to and control over material goods), time; action; and information' (ibid, p 52). Chapter 10 deals mainly with 'information': control over 'space' is dealt with by the law of trespass and property and considered mainly in Chapter 11; the 'action' and 'time' categories clearly raise issues of substantive autonomy, considered in Chapter 12. As regards the attempt to bring both informational and substantive autonomy under one definition: see Parent, op cit, fn 18, pp 309 and 316 and Wacks, op cit, fn 18, esp p 79.

21 Ibid, pp 51–69. As Fried notes, privacy is essential for 'respect, love friendship and trust'—'without it they are simply inconceivable' ('Privacy' (1968) 77 Yale LJ 477, p 483).

two spheres in order to come closer to examining what may be encompassed by the notion of privacy. A variety of referents may be used. The private might be viewed as a sphere which should be almost entirely unregulated by the public (law) although also delineated by it. This division, however, poses problems. It will be argued in Chapter 12 that when aspects of the private sphere—particularly family life—are regulated by law, the benefits they offer may be diminished. Thus, a broader social division between the public and the private may be suggested: arguably, the public includes State activity, aspects of the world of work, the pursuit of public interests, while the private includes the home, the family, the expression of sexuality and of the deepest feelings and emotions. Postulating such a division need not obscure the fact that these spheres are not entirely distinct, but must interact. The pursuit of the public interest will often affect and even determine some aspects of the private life of the family and the individual in terms, for example, of housing and welfare policy, while at the same time, the need to afford respect to the private will help to shape such policies.

The strength of claims that respect for individual autonomy has not been accorded may be affected, as the following chapters explain, by the nature of the obligation sought to be imposed on public authorities or private bodies, and by their potential effect on competing interests. ‘Control over personal life’ will be treated as covering areas as disparate as allowing a homosexual to choose to express his or her sexuality free from State interference, and enabling an individual to enjoy his or her property free from the attentions of reporters. On the one hand, the individual’s privacy is invaded through the criminalisation of certain activities, while on the other he is complaining that the law does not prevent an invasion of privacy. In the former case, if the homosexual were to be prevented from expressing his sexual orientation, the government would be using its coercive powers to give effect to the moral conviction that the homosexual’s way of life is contemptible. Thus, it would clearly be failing in its duty to treat its citizens with equal respect; to prevent this, under the liberal analysis of rights, the homosexual should be given a ‘strong’ right to sexual autonomy which would overcome any competing claims of society.

By contrast, the State, in failing to control the activities of the reporter, is not thereby giving expression to feelings of contempt for the individual’s way of life; rather, it is arguably erring on the side of free expression as it collides with the interest of the individual in securing her privacy. Thus, in this case, the individual’s claim is weaker in itself and, further, has to compete with a strong claim to free expression which the interest in moral autonomy does not face. Moreover, in the case of public figures claiming privacy rights against the press, the argument that views free speech as essential in order to ensure meaningful participation in a democracy has particular strength. In practical terms, this would lead one to suggest that in the case of public figures, the claims of free expression should override privacy unless it was clear that the information gained was in no way related to their fitness to carry out their public functions. In the case of a purely private figure, or of private facts unrelated to the public function of public figures, freedom of expression would still compete with the claim of privacy. However, two of the important justifications for free speech—the arguments from truth and from political participation—would be largely irrelevant so that the strength of the free expression claim would be appreciably diminished.

It may be concluded that privacy is in a weak position in so far as its ability to overcome other individual rights is concerned—where the values underpinning that other right are genuinely at stake. In contrast, where preservation of privacy may lead to upholding an individual’s moral autonomy, it is more clearly evident that it should be treated as a strong individual right able to overcome various public interests.

Domestic protection for privacy

Traditionally, UK law recognised no general right to respect for privacy, although there was some evidence, as will be seen, that the judges considered this to be an evil which required a remedy. It has been argued that various areas of tort or equity such as trespass, breach of confidence, copyright and defamation are instances of a general right to privacy,²² but it is reasonably clear from judicial pronouncements that these areas and others were treated as covering specific and distinct interests which only incidentally offered protection to privacy²³—despite the fact that the term ‘privacy’ was used in a number of rulings.²⁴ In such instances, it can usually be found that a recognised interest such as property actually formed the basis of the ruling. Thus, prior to the inception of the HRA, UK law offered only a piecemeal protection to privacy and therefore a number of privacy interests were largely unprotected. In so far as the protection for privacy broadened in the years immediately prior to the inception of the HRA, the initiative largely came not from the courts or the government but from Europe—either from European Community directives²⁵ or from decisions under the European Convention on Human Rights.²⁶

When Art 8 of the Convention was received into domestic law under the HRA 1998, UK citizens acquired, for the first time, a guarantee of respect for their privacy. Under ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the HRA the right will be directly enforceable against public authorities, such as the police or the BBC, but not against private bodies, including the press. But, citizens can sue private bodies relying on existing causes of action, assuming that a cause of action covers the situation in question, and looking to the court itself as a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, and to its obligations under s 12, to develop the action by reference to Art 8. In other words, as Chapter 4 argued, the Convention rights can have indirect horizontal effect.²⁷ The precise nature of this effect is a complex and still unsettled matter, which is explored in Chapter 10.

22 See Warren and Brandeis, ‘The right to privacy’ (1890) 4 Harv L Rev 193.

23 See, eg, the comments of Glidewell LJ in Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62, CA: It is well known that in English law there is no right to privacy...in the absence of such a right the plaintiff’s advisers have sought to base their claim on other well-established rights of action.’

24 Eg, Prince Albert v Strange (1848) 2 De Gex & Sm 652; Clowser v Chaplin (1981) 72 Cr App R 342.

25 See the section on Data Protection below.

26 For decisions against the UK, see below.

27 See pp 161–64.

PROTECTION FOR PERSONAL INFORMATION

1 INTRODUCTION¹

It may hardly be doubted that the lack of a tort of invasion of privacy aimed at the protection of personal information is one of the most serious lacunae in English law. Described by the Law Commission as 'a glaring inadequacy',² and condemned by the Court of Appeal,³ dicta in a recent decision of the House of Lords⁴ remarked upon '...the continuing, widespread concern at the apparent failure of the law' in this area.⁵ A number of persons or bodies may acquire, store, disclose or publish personal information without the consent of the subject of it. The acquisition and use of personal information by State agents, with the purpose of preventing or detecting crime or protecting national security, is considered in Chapter 11. But the use of personal information by a range of private and public bodies for other purposes is considered here. The press is one of the worst offenders, in terms of acquiring and publishing personal information non-consensually, and therefore the use of various legal provisions against the press forms a central theme in this chapter. But it should also be pointed out that the internet represents in one sense a far greater threat to privacy, since by its nature it may render developments in the law otiose.⁶ Even assuming that the developments discussed below lead eventually to a respect for personal privacy not evident at present in the publishing of a number of media bodies, especially the tabloid press, this threat may lead to a further re-evaluation of the legal approach to the protection of privacy.⁷

Warren and Brandeis' verdict in the 19th century, 'The Press is overstepping in every direction the obvious bounds of propriety and decency...[inflicting] through

1 Reading that will be referred to in this chapter: Wacks, R, Personal Information, Privacy and the Law, 1993; Wacks, R, Privacy and Press Freedom, 1996; Markesinis, B (ed), Protecting Privacy (a collection of essays reviewing the concept of privacy and the law relating to it, especially in the context of personal information, in a number of jurisdictions), 1999; Younger Committee, Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972 (criticised: McCormick, DM, 'A note on privacy' (1973) 84 LQR 23); Report of the Committee on Privacy and Related Matters, Chairman David Calcutt QC (Calcutt Report), Cmnd 1102, 1990; Calcutt, Review of Press Self-regulation, Cm 2135, 1993; National Heritage Select Committee, 'Privacy and media intrusion', Fourth Report, HC 291, 1993; Lord Chancellor's Green Paper, Infringement of Privacy, 30 July 1993, CHAN J060915NJ.7/93; Privacy and Media Intrusion, White Paper (1995) Cm 2918; Eady, D, 'A statutory right to privacy' (1996) 3 EHRLR 243; Markesinis, B, 'The right to be let alone versus freedom of speech' [1986] PL 67; Wilson, W, 'Privacy, confidence and press freedom' (1990) 53 MLR 43; Markesinis, B, 'Privacy, freedom of expression, and the horizontal effect of the Human Rights Bill: lessons from Germany' (1999) 115 LQR 47; Leigh, I, 'Horizontal rights, the Human Rights Act and privacy: lessons from the Commonwealth?' (1999) 48ICLQ 57; Singh, 'Privacy and the media after the Human Rights Act' (1998) EHRLR 712; Grosz, S and Braithwaite, N, 'Privacy and the Human Rights Act', in Hunt, M and Singh, R (eds), A Practitioner's Guide to the Impact of the Human Rights Act, 1999; Wright, J, 'How private is my private life?', in Betten, L (ed), The Human Rights Act 1998: What it Means, 1999; Elliott, M, 'Privacy, confidentiality, horizontality: the care of the celebrity wedding photographs' [2001] CLJ 231.

2 Law Commission Report No 110, Breach of Confidence, para 5.5. The Commission was referring specifically to the fact that 'the confidentiality of information improperly obtained...may be unprotected'.

3 Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62, CA.

4 Khan [1997] AC 558.

5 Ibid, per Lord Nicholls.

6 See below, p 587.

7 See further Chapter 6, pp 306–07.

invasions of privacy...mental pain and distress far greater than could be inflicted by mere bodily injury',⁸ is alarmingly true today, over 100 years later. Anyone familiar with the output of our print media will be wearily aware of its penchant for publishing what one journalist has described as 'toe-curlingly intimate details' about the sex lives not only of celebrities, but of 'quite obscure people'.⁹ Intrusive prurience is not the only complaint: Victim Support has detailed a large number of case histories in which ordinary victims of crime and their families had had their suffering markedly exacerbated by intrusive and insensitive publications in local and national newspapers describing their plight in quite needless detail, causing in some cases diagnosable psychiatric harm, making others feel forced to move from the area where the crime had been committed; causing all intense emotional distress.¹⁰ In contrast to the position in the US, and virtually every other Western democracy, such injuries have no remedy in a privacy law in this country: a toothless Press Complaints Commission could only request the offending newspaper to print its adjudication on the matter.¹¹ It is frequently remarked of countries which have a privacy law, such as France and Germany, that their media does not exhibit the 'gutter' quality associated with the UK tabloid press.¹² In our cut-throat media market, the tendency of debased and lurid 'news' coverage in one newspaper to drive down the standards in another is very marked. Within this pervasive 'gutter' culture, which will influence the choices of readers, a newspaper which is unwilling to debase its standards may not survive, detracting from the diversity of opinion one would expect of a free press.

While the notion of respect for individual privacy could be said to be a clear underlying common law value,¹³ it failed to find full expression, perhaps because intermittent governmental interest in the latter half of the 20th century in statutory protection for privacy distracted the courts with the chimera of possible legislative action.¹⁴ Quite clearly, however, no government in the past grasped this nettle, out of a fear of press hostility.¹⁵

8 'The right to privacy' (1890) IV(5) Harvard L Rev 193, p 196.

9 Marr, A, The Independent, 25 April 1996. In a recent conference speech, the editor of The Guardian, Alan Rusbridger, listed a string or recent examples in which newspapers had published intimate details about the personal lives of celebrities, in some cases surreptitiously obtained, with either no or the flimsiest of 'public interest' justifications (Human Rights, Privacy and the Media, organised by the Constitution Unit, and the Centre for Communication and Information Law, UCL, 8 January 1999).

10 See Fourth Report of the National Heritage Select Committee on Privacy and Media Intrusion Minutes of Evidence, Appendix 24 HC 294–11 (1993).

11 See below, pp 551–56 for discussion of the role of the Commission.

12 As Markesinis remarks, '...the possible extra-marital affairs of German politicians and businessmen hold little or no appeal for most readers of German newspapers.' (Markesinis, op cit, fn.)

13 See dicta of Laws J in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 807; Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers [1984] 1 WLR 892, in which the Court of Appeal recognised (in effect) a right to privacy in telephone conversations; Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449; dicta of Lord Keith in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 255, 'The right to personal privacy is clearly one which the law [of confidence] should seek to protect'. In the recent decision in Dept of Health ex p Source Informatics Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 953; (2000) The Times, 21 January, Simon Brown LJ stated clearly that in cases involving personal information, 'The concern of the law [of confidence] is to protect the confider's personal privacy'. In R v Khan [1997] AC 558, Lords Browne-Wilkinson, Slynn and Nicholls left open the question whether English law already recognised a right to privacy.

In October 2000, however, the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA) introduced Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights into UK law, providing for a right to respect for private life.¹⁶ While the general view is that Art 8 will not be directly justiciable against the press or other private bodies,¹⁷ it will be argued that its reception into UK law nevertheless provides an impetus for the notion of respect for privacy as an underlying legal value finally to find expression through the common law. The Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA) represents a further legislative development of immense significance for the protection of personal information. The Act will have a very significant impact on all bodies that process personal data, including the press, and undoubtedly the interaction between the DPA and the HRA will be complex and intriguing. Inevitably, tension will be generated by the incursion of the HRA and DPA into an area which previously was largely unregulated, being governed partly by media codes of practice partly by relatively narrow (albeit expanding) common law doctrines.

This chapter will examine the impact of the HRA on the currently available measures protecting personal information and aspects of privacy more generally, especially the doctrine of confidence. The implications of the development of protection for privacy for freedom of expression will be considered, as will jurisprudence from other jurisdictions, in particular the jurisprudence generated by the American ‘private facts’ tort.¹⁸

14 The Younger Committee (Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972, Calcutt Committee on Privacy and Related Matters, hereafter The Calcutt Report (Cmnd 1102, 1990), Review of Press Self Regulation (Cm 2135), Fourth Report of the National Heritage Select Committee in 1993, op cit, fn 10, all proposed the introduction of statutory measures to protect privacy, as did the Lord Chancellor’s Green Paper of the same year (CHAN J060915N].7/93).

15 Such fear was clearly evident during the passage of the HRA itself. In response to the press outcry over the possibility that the Act would create a right to privacy, the Government introduced a specific amendment in favour of press freedom (HRA, s 12, discussed below), and repeatedly and explicitly sought to reassure the press during the Bill’s debate. As Lord Ackner put it, the Lord Chancellor devoted ‘a very large part of his [second reading] speech...to trying to pour oil on ruffled waters.’ (HL Deb Col 473, 18 November 1997). In fact, bearing in mind the effect of s 12(4)(b), discussed below, the government may have deceived the press as to the impact that s 12 was actually likely to have. For an example of blanket hostility from the press’ representative body—the Newspaper Society—to the possible development of any privacy law in the UK, see Rasaiah, ‘Current legislation, privacy and the media in the UK’ (1998) 3(5) Communications Law 183.

16 As Chapter 2 explained, pp 67–72, Art 8 of the Convention provides a person with a right to respect for four different rights: his private and family life, his home and his correspondence’. Paragraph 2 then specifies a number of grounds permitting interference by ‘a public authority’ with this right.

17 See below, fn 52.

18 See below, esp p 613 for a discussion of the tort. Emphasis is placed on the American tort since, in comparison with other common law jurisdictions, the case law is particularly rich, having been generated over a considerable period of time; further, the American tort had its genesis in the Warren and Brandeis reading of a number of English decisions, including some breach of confidence cases (in particular, Prince Albert v Strange (1848) 2 De Gex & Sm 652; Duke of Argyll v Duchess of Argyll [1967] 1 Ch 302; Pollard v Photographic Company (1888) Ch 345), and therefore is particularly relevant to the development of a cause of action growing from the same roots.

2 POTENTIAL PROTECTION FOR PERSONAL INFORMATION UNDER THE HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Strasbourg jurisprudence on protection for personal information

Article 8(1) provides a 'right to respect for private and family life, the home and correspondence'; para (2) states: 'There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right' (emphasis added). There is a substantial jurisprudence on the data protection obligations of public authorities. It is clear that the actions of such bodies in the gathering, storing and use of information relating to private or family life, including photographs,¹⁹ engages Art 8.²⁰ Certain categories of material, such as those relating to health²¹ or sexual orientation or activity²² are regarded as 'particularly sensitive or intimate',²³ requiring especially compelling grounds to justify interference. As Chapter 11 will indicate, surreptitious methods of obtaining information, such as telephone tapping, are seen as particularly serious breaches of Art 8.²⁴ The collection of personal information by the private bodies, including, in particular, the press, sometimes using surreptitious means, and its publication, is in reality only one, often highly objectionable manifestation of data collection and processing. One cannot, of course, infer the simple transposition of Convention obligations upon public authorities onto private agents. However, the Court has found²⁵ that Art 8 obligations may require the adoption of measures even in the sphere of relations between individuals. In other words, 'interference by a public authority' can mean 'unjustified failure by that authority to prevent interference by others'. Thus, the State may be under a positive obligation to provide legal protection for the individual, even when public authorities are not themselves responsible for an interference with the Art 8 right.

However, Strasbourg has approached the notion of an obligation to intervene between private parties with caution. It has found that, in deciding whether there is even a prima facie engagement of Art 8 in such a context, 'regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual'.²⁶ Thus, the gathering and subsequent publication of personal information by a private bodies, including the press, would not automatically engage Art 8, as such actions would if carried out by a public body. Nevertheless, the strength of the jurisprudence on interferences with personal information by public bodies indicates that the interest in being free from such intrusion is one which, in general terms, falls within the ambit of Art 8. As a leading text in the area puts it: 'the obligation of the State to respect private life by controlling the activities of its agents [in collecting personal information] ought to 19 Murray and Others v United Kingdom (1994) 19 EHRR 193 (photographing of a person at a police station without her consent was found to be a prima facie violation of Art 8).

20 See, eg, Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433; McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans v United Kingdom (1981) 45 EHRR 71.

21 Z v Finland (1998) 25 EHRR 371.

22 Lustig-Prean v United Kingdom (1999) 29 EHRR 548; 7 BHRC 65.

23 Feldman, 'Information and privacy'; conference paper, Cambridge Centre for Public Law, Freedom of Expression and Freedom of Information, 19–20 February 2000.

24 Kopp v Switzerland [1998] HRCD 6 (356), para 72.

25 X and Y v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235.

26 Cossey v UK A 184, para 37 (1990).

extend also to similar operations by private persons such as...newspaper reporters'.²⁷

When one turns to the case law directly on the question of the obligations of private parties to protect private information, a brief survey reveals both that it is very meagre and that there are no directly relevant successful applications. However, in order to understand quite why the Court has taken such a cautious stance, it is necessary to appreciate the significance which the margin of appreciation doctrine has had in this context. The essence of the doctrine²⁸ is that in assessing compliance with the Convention, the Court will afford States a certain latitude, principally in deciding what kinds of interferences with Convention rights are necessary. The margin can widen or narrow depending on the circumstances of the case, resulting in a variation of the intensity of the Court's review of the States' actions. Three principal factors influence Strasbourg in conceding a particularly wide margin of appreciation: first, where a complainant seeks to lay a positive obligation on the State; second, where the harm complained of flows from the action of a private party, rather than the State itself, so that the so called 'horizontal effect' of the Convention is in issue; third, where there is a potential conflict with another Convention right. Clearly, these factors may arise independently of each other. Or they may, as in the context under discussion, arise contiguously, thereby demanding that an especially wide margin should be allowed. In a number of the key decisions to be discussed, all three were present,²⁹ which may explain the somewhat unsatisfactory and misleading nature of some of the judgments given.

In Barclay v United Kingdom,³⁰ the Court accepted that a lack of a remedy in respect of the filming of a private home by reporters could in principle constitute a breach of Art 8, although on the facts no invasion of private life had occurred.³¹ There is, thus, no bar in principle to the application of the Court's general approach to interferences with personal information to the actions of private bodies. *Winer v UK*³² is often seen as indicating the contrary. The applicant complained that various aspects of his private life had been publicised in a book; he had settled a defamation case in respect of some of the statements made, but argued that he had no remedy under national law in respect of those which were truthful. His application was declared inadmissible, the Commission stating briefly that it viewed the available remedies, in particular that of defamation,³³ as satisfactory and that no positive obligation to provide further remedies in respect of the truthful statements should be imposed, bearing in mind the wide margin of appreciation to be afforded in this area, the limitation of the Convention right to freedom of expression which such 27 Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 310.

28 For discussion, see Chapter 2, pp 34–37 and Fenwick, H, 'The right to protest, the Human Rights Act and the margin of appreciation' (1999) 62(4) MLR 491, pp 497–500.

29 All three were present in: Winer v UK (1986) 48 DR 154; Spencer (Earl) v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105 and N v Portugal Appl No 20683/92, 20 February 1995; however, the third was influential only in Winer.

30 (1999) Appl No 35712/97 (admissibility only).

31 The property filmed was the island of Brecqhou, owned by the Barclay brothers. They had no home there, and were not present when the filming occurred.

32 (1986) 48 DR 154.

33 The remedy represented by the doctrine of confidence was not explicitly adverted to, presumably because at the time of the application it was still viewed as having only marginal application to privacy.

remedies would entail and the availability of a remedy in defamation. The applicant's privacy 'was not wholly unprotected'. However, the possibility was clearly left open of imposing a positive obligation on the State in an instance in which no national remedy was available. The obvious example, impliedly envisaged, would be an instance in which truthful, personal facts about an individual were published without consent and it was apparent that a defamation action had no or virtually no hope of success. In such circumstances, then, an individual might be viewed as holding a privacy right, which the State would come under a positive obligation to respect, a finding which receives some indirect support from the decision in N v Portugal.³⁴

The most important decision for our purposes is *Spencer (Earl) v United Kingdom*³⁵ The Commission dismissed as inadmissible Earl Spencer's claim that the UK Government had failed to protect him from invasions of privacy by the press³⁶ on the basis that he had failed to exhaust domestic remedies, namely breach of confidence. This judgment accepted that an interference with the right to respect for privacy had arguably occurred, and required a remedy, but that the doctrine of confidence would have provided one and should have been used. Had the Commission considered that the pleaded facts disclosed no arguable breach of Art 8, it would simply have so held—as the Court did in Barclay—and would not have instead decided the case on non-exhaustion of domestic remedies. It appears, therefore, to follow that Spencer, far from suggesting that Art 8 does not require the UK to develop a privacy law, was decided on the assumption that it already has one, albeit at a relatively early stage of development. As Harris et al put it in relation to the efficacy of domestic remedies for exhaustion purposes, the key issue in Spencer: 'in a common law system it [is] incumbent on an aggrieved individual to allow the domestic courts the opportunity to develop existing rights by way of interpretation'.³⁷ Thus, since the Commission in both Winer and Spencer could identify a remedy which, applying a wide margin of appreciation, it could view as sufficient, it found against the applicant. Had no remedy been identifiable, there are therefore grounds for assuming that the applications would have been declared admissible.

Individual decisions are not the only matters of relevance here, however. As the House of Lords recently stressed in Ex p Kebilene: 'in the national courts also the Convention should be seen as an expression of fundamental principles rather than as a set of mere rules...'.³⁸ Strasbourg has found that the purpose of the Convention is to 'promote the ideals and values of a democratic society',³⁹ and to provide 'rights 34 N v Portugal, App1 No 20683/92, 20 February 1995. A magazine publisher's application complaining of a breach of Art 10 after being convicted of defamation and invasion of privacy in respect of the publication of photographs of a well known businessman engaged in sexual activities was rejected as manifestly ill-founded. The Commission considered that the sanction was proportionate and necessary for the protection of the rights of others, one of which was clearly the right to protection from invasion of privacy through publication of true facts by other private individuals.

35 (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105.

36 The applicants complained of publication in the press of various (truthful) stories relating to the bulimia and mental health problems of Countess Spencer, including photographs taken of her walking in the grounds of a health clinic.

37 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op cit, fn 27, p 611.

38 R v DPP ex p Kebilene [1999] 3 WLR 972.

39 Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711, p 731; Socialist Party v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 51.

that are practical and effective' rather than 'rights that are theoretical or illusory'.⁴⁰ The Convention must be given an 'evolutionary' interpretation⁴¹ which takes account of current standards in European countries,⁴² in which legal protection for privacy is the norm.⁴³ In the context of Art 8 it has been said: 'The Court has not perceived the rights in Article 8 in wholly negative terms—the right to be left alone. Instead it has acknowledged that States must ensure...the effective enjoyment of liberty'.⁴⁴ As suggested earlier, effective enjoyment of liberty cannot occur when persons who are constantly afraid of betraying information to the media are forced to order their choices in life as a consequence,⁴⁵ and it would appear to be a hallmark of a democratic society that it seeks to protect a person from any such curtailment of liberty.

Such principles have perhaps not received enough attention in this context; moreover, Barclay is a very recent case and the significance of the Spencer decision has only recently achieved widespread recognition,⁴⁶ perhaps due to a failure on the part of some commentators to appreciate the considerations outlined above, coupled with a tendency to concentrate on the apparently disappointing outcomes of the individual applications. Thus, a number of commentators, writing before the HRA had come fully into force, concluded that the current Art 8 jurisprudence cannot be said to require the courts to develop the common law so as to provide a remedy for non-consensual use of true but personal information. Thus, one commentator bluntly concludes: '... Strasbourg case law...does not require a specific remedy between private individuals'.⁴⁷ Another comments: 'The still unanswered question is whether Article 8 also requires a Member State to provide a right of action against intrusions into private life by private persons...'.⁴⁸ It is contended that this question is not unanswered: the cases discussed above quite strongly imply that it should be answered in the affirmative.

40 Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305, p 314.

41 Johnstone v Ireland A 112, para 53 (1986).

42 See Chapter 2, p 36; Tyler v UK A 26 (1978), para 31. There are also numerous resolutions of the Council of Europe on effective protection for personal information (Nos 73(22) and 74(29)).

43 For discussion of the law in Germany, see Markesenis, B and Nolte, N, 'Some comparative reflections on the right of privacy of public figures in public places', in Birks, P (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997; in relation to Germany, France and Italy see Chapters 2–5 of Markesenis, B (ed), Protecting Privacy, 1999; The Calcutt Report, op cit, fn 1, paras 5.22–5.28) also discusses privacy protection in Denmark and the Netherlands.

44 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op cit, fn 27, p 303.

45 See above, p 536.

46 One of the leading works on the Convention has no discussion at all of the issue of intrusion by the press into private life: Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1998, pp 489–504; similarly the discussion of Art 8 in a recent textbook on media law makes no mention of the decision (Carey, P, Media Law, 1999, pp 79–81); Leigh in an article dealing with horizontality, the HRA and privacy, cites Winer, but not Spencer (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105, p 86 (op cit, fn 1). The decision receives some attention from Grosz and Braithwaite (op cit, fn 1), Singh (op cit, fn 1) and Wright (op cit, fn 1).

47 Leigh, op cit, fn 1.

48 Nicol, D, 'Media freedom after the Human Rights Act 1998', conference paper, fn 9 above; see also Naismith, 'Photographs, privacy and freedom of expression' (1996) 2 EHLR 150, p 156.

The 'horizontal effect' of Art 8 under the HRA

Most public authorities and a number of private bodies engage in the processing of personal information. They will therefore be subject to the provisions of the DPA 1998⁴⁹ and any other relevant statute, such as the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, and such statutes must be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights under s 3 of the HRA, whether or not both parties concerned are private bodies.⁵⁰ In rendering such statutes compatible with the Convention, it is clear that Art 8 will be of particular relevance.

Where a body processing personal information (which includes its publication) is a public authority it could be sued directly under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA in respect of breaches of Art 8. But, it now seems fairly clear that there is no possibility under the HRA of suing private bodies for breach of Art 8 of the Convention under s 7(1)(a), principally because, as Chapter 4 explained, s 6 of the Act makes the Convention rights binding only upon 'public authorities'. However, since the courts, as 'public authorities'⁵¹ themselves will have a duty not to act incompatibly with the Convention rights, this will create some role for the rights even in litigation between private parties, thus giving rise to indirect 'horizontal effect'. It now seems clear that this will not require the courts to create new causes of action in such litigation;⁵² rather, the s 6(1) duty to act compatibly with the Convention rights will bite upon their adjudication of existing common law actions.

What precisely s 6(1) will require of the courts in private common law adjudication is a vexed and much discussed issue.⁵³ Space precludes full rehearsal of the numerous and complex arguments here; while one commentator has argued that the courts will have an absolute duty to render all private common law compatible with the Convention rights,⁵⁴ others have perceived a much more limited duty.⁵⁵ This chapter will adopt the position, as indicated in Chapter 4,⁵⁶ that the courts will not be placed under the absolute duty just mentioned, a conclusion arrived at on the basis of a number of factors: the apparent failure to incorporate the Convention rights themselves means that in the private sphere they are arguably not rights to enforce but only legal values;⁵⁷ the fact that such a duty could require courts to overturn 49 Unless they are excluded from its ambit: see pp 604–05.

50 Due to the effect of HRA, s 3(1) which, in covering all statutes, also covers those which create a number of rights binding private bodies.

51 Section 6(3)(a).

52 See Chapter 4, p 162. There are clear Pepper v Hart statements in Parliament to this effect: see HL Deb Vol 583 Col 784, 24 November 1997 and op cit, Vol 585 Col 841, 5 February 1998; HC Deb Vol 314 Col 406, 17 June 1998. There is also virtually unanimous agreement amongst the commentators on the point: Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, "horizontal effect" and the common law' (1999) 62 MLR 824, pp 826–28; Hunt, M, 'The horizontal effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423, p 442; Buxton LJ, 'The Human Rights Act and private law' [2000] 116 LQR 48; Markesinis, op cit, fn 1, pp 72–73; Leigh, op cit, fn 1, pp 84–85; Singh, op cit, fn 1; cf Wade, W (Sir), 'The United Kingdom's Bill of Rights', in Forsyth, C and Hare, I (eds), The Golden Metwand and the Crooked Cord: Essays in Honour of Sir William Wade QC, 1998, pp 62–63. See also Douglas and Others v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992, discussed at pp 581–84.

53 See fn 52 above and Chapter 4, p 162.

54 Hunt, op cit, fn 52, pp 439–43.

55 See, eg, Leigh, I: the HRA 'does not formally change the approach to Convention questions in the [private] common law' (op cit, fn 1, pp 82–83). See also Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act 1998 and constitutional principles' (1999) 19 LS 165, p 201.

56 See pp 162–63.

57 Phillipson, op cit, fn 52, pp 834–37. It now appears that this is not, however, the case so far as HRA, s 3 is concerned: see Wilson v First County Trust [2001] 3 All ER 229, discussed in Chapter 4, p 149.

58 Phillipson, op cit, fn 52, pp 838–40.

settled common law rules and principles;⁵⁸ that it could ‘indirectly impose a very significant degree of liability on private bodies...contrary to the general scheme of the Act and the clear intention of its sponsors.’⁵⁹ Rather, it is suggested that the courts will be obliged, when engaged in common law adjudication, to develop and apply the law by reference to relevant Convention rights, treating them as legal principles having a variable weight, depending on the context.⁶⁰

It is suggested, however, that in the area of privacy with which this chapter is concerned, the distinction between having regard to the Convention rights and having an absolute duty to act compatibly with them when applying existing common law, may well turn out to be of little practical significance. This is because the difference between the two models would be of most practical importance when a clear imperative from the Convention clashed with a well defined pre-existing common law rule or principle. A judge accepting an absolute duty would be bound to override the common law, whereas under the weaker model, the Convention would provide only a reason for changing it. However, such a direct clash is most unlikely to occur in this area. The indeterminacy and paucity of Strasbourg jurisprudence on this aspect of Art 8 means, as explored above, that English courts will glean from it general principles and guidance, rather than clear-cut rules, which might have conflicted with the common law. While the common law doctrine of trespass currently lacks flexibility, the currently very fluid and flexible boundaries of the doctrine of confidence, discussed below, will make it unnecessary to override clear pre-existing rules of the action in order to achieve Convention-compliance. Moreover, there are strong arguments of principle which may persuade a judge treating the Convention rights only as relevant principles to afford them an especially high weight when dealing with invasions of privacy by the media,⁶¹ or other powerful conglomerates, thus minimising the difference between the stronger and weaker models. The power of such bodies to invade privacy is arguably equal to that of the State, rendering the drawing of a sharp, formalistic distinction between the State and the private agent, whereby rights are upheld against the one but not the other, unjustified at the level of principle. Moreover, in contrast with certain instances in the private sphere in which a plaintiff might have freely agreed to a diminution of his rights by another,⁶² the invasion of individual rights by certain private bodies, particularly the press, may be as involuntary as if perpetrated by the State.

59 Phillipson, op cit, fn 52, p 848; see also p 840.

60 Phillipson, op cit, fn 52, pp 843–44. Buxton LJ (op cit, fn 52) argues that the HRA will have no impact at all on private common law: the rights could not even figure as principles or values in such a context, he argues, since they ‘remain, stubbornly, values whose content lives in public law’ (ibid, p 59). This argument, it is suggested, cannot be reconciled with the findings of the Commission in Spencer, and the Court in Barclay (discussed above) that the actions of private agents can engage Art 8, requiring domestic courts, through the common law, to offer redress; nor with the approach of the House of Lords in the recent decision in Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609 where, in the context of a private defamation action, their Lordships regarded the Convention as of great importance; (see esp ibid, pp 621–22, per Lord Nicholls; ibid, pp 628, 635, per Lord Steyn). Lord Nicholls specifically stated that, following the coming into force of the HRA 1998, ‘the common law is to be developed in a manner consistent with Art 10’ (ibid, p 622); Lord Steyn observed that, with the coming into force of the HRA 1998, ‘The constitutional dimension of freedom of expression is reinforced’ (ibid, p 628). Neither of their Lordships appeared to consider the private nature of the proceedings of significance in this respect.

61 For the full argument on this point, see Phillipson, op cit, fn 52, pp 846–47.

62 Eg, where a schoolteacher accepted a job at a Catholic school and signed a contract which provided that s/he would not publicly deny any of the fundamental doctrines of the Catholic church. Strasbourg has quite readily accepted restrictions on Convention rights where these are said to have been voluntarily accepted by the applicant as a result of their employment: see, eg, Ahmed v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 125; Stedman v UK (1997) 23 EHRR CD 168; Rommelgainger v Germany (1980) 62 D&R 151 (no violation of Art 10 when employee of Catholic hospital dismissed for expressing pro-abortion views).

Judicial responses to Strasbourg jurisprudence

Under the HRA, then, Art 8 should figure as a relevant, weighty principle in considering privacy complaints raised within the common law. A key factor, however, will be the response of the courts to the Strasbourg jurisprudence on that article examined above, since it is that case law, rather than Art 8 itself, which articulates the need for protection for personal information intrusion. When considering any issue under the Convention, s 2(1) of the HRA requires the domestic judiciary to take any relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence into account.⁶³ Since they are not bound by the case law, the courts could depart from it when so minded.

If the courts merely attempt to reach the same decisions as Strasbourg would have done, they would in effect be applying the international law doctrine of the margin of appreciation in a domestic setting. As Chapter 4 pointed out, commentators have agreed,⁶⁴ and the House of Lords⁶⁵ has stressed, that this would be wholly inappropriate. But a further and more difficult step is required: in applying Strasbourg jurisprudence under s 2 of the HRA, judges should attempt to disregard those aspects of the judgment which were attributable to the doctrine, difficult though this task will be.⁶⁶ Judges of a conservative bent, who wish to adopt a minimalist approach to the domestic application of the Convention,⁶⁷ might not take this further step or it might be merely overlooked: thus, while pronouncing the margin of appreciation doctrine inapplicable, judges could in fact rely fully on the outcomes of decisions at Strasbourg, without advertent to the influence of the doctrine on those outcomes. This indeed was the approach arguably adopted in the recent House of Lords decision in Ex p Kebilene,⁶⁸ and the earlier case of Khan.⁶⁹ This approach would be wholly mistaken, in considering the application of Winer and Spencer to domestic law: it might well lead to the assumption that the failure of both applications reflected the lack of a requirement under Art 8 to provide a remedy for non-consensual disclosures of true but personal information. As indicated below, the courts have not so far adopted a minimalist approach in this context.⁷⁰

63 See Chapter 4, pp 146–48.

64 See Laws LJ, speaking extra-judicially ('The limitations of human rights' (1999) PL 254, p 258): 'The margin of appreciation...will necessarily be inapt to the administration of the Convention in the domestic courts'; Feldman, op cit, fn 23, p 192: 'The doctrine will have no application in national law'; see further Chapter 4, p 186–87; Phillipson, op cit, fn 52, pp 844–46.

65 In DPP ex p Kebilene and Others [1999] 3 WLR 972, p 1043, Lord Hope of Craighead said: 'This technique [the doctrine] is not available to the national courts when they are considering Convention issues arising in their own countries.'

66 See Phillipson, op cit, fn 52, pp 845–46.

67 Eg, Buxton LJ, who believes that it has no place in private common law proceedings (see fn 52 above).

68 [1999] 3 WLR 972. The decisions concerned included H v UK Appl No 15023/89 and Bates v UK Appl No 26280/95; see further Chapter 4 pp 186–7.

69 [1997] AC 558, HL; the Strasbourg decision in question was Schenk v Switzerland A 140 (1988).

70 See pp 581–91.

Moreover, in this area, there is no justification for replacement of the margin of appreciation doctrine with a domestic version, whereby the courts take a restrictive approach to the protection of Convention rights, in deference to the 'area of judgment' or 'discretion' of another body,⁷¹ in this case, to Parliament's presumed intent in not enacting a law of privacy. It is quite clear that the sponsors of the HRA explicitly contemplated the creative development of the common law to protect privacy. During the debate on the Bill, Lord Irvine said: 'it must be emphasised that the judiciary are free to develop the common law in their own independent judicial sphere,' remarked that the judges were 'pen-poised' to develop a right to privacy through the common law, and contended that 'it will be a better law if [they] developed it after incorporation because they will have regard to Articles 8 and 10 [of the Convention]'.⁷² The introduction of s 12 of the Act, strengthening press freedom, was clearly premised on the understanding that the Act might well drive forward the development of common law causes of action protecting privacy against the press.

Since there are, therefore, no grounds for deference to the judgment of another body in this context, and given the clear need to strip away its margin of appreciation aspects from the Strasbourg jurisprudence, an 'activist' approach to the application of such jurisprudence,⁷³ leading to positive development of the law in this area, would seem to be justified. The next sections consider the current state of the law in this area, examining its efficacy in protecting privacy, and looking at the effect the HRA has so far had on it.

3 REPORTING RESTRICTIONS, BROADCASTING REGULATION AND PRESS SELF-REGULATION

Introduction

Successive governments have considered that the press should regulate itself as regards protection of privacy rather than using civil or criminal sanctions. Self-discipline has been preferred to court regulation in order to preserve press freedom. In contrast, as Chapter 6 indicated, broadcasting regulation has a statutory basis and overlaps with the control exercised by the Independent Television Commission and the Radio Authority.⁷⁴ Nevertheless, the model used for broadcasting is in some respects similar to the press self-regulatory scheme.

71 See further Chapter 4 pp 144–5 for recent post-HRA decisions on the subject; it was pointed out that Lord Hope in Ex p Kebilene [1999] 3 WLR 972 said: 'In some circumstances it will be appropriate for the courts to recognise that there is an area of judgment within which the judiciary will defer, on democratic grounds, to the considered opinion of [the democratic body or person] whose act or decision is said to be incompatible with the Convention.' See also Lord Hoffman, 'The Human Rights Act and the House of Lords' (1999) 62(2) MLR 159, esp p 161; Laws LJ, 'Wednesbury', in Forsyth and Hare (eds), The Golden Metwand and the Crooked Cord: Essays in Honour of Sir William Wade QC, 1998, p 201; Pannick, D, 'Principles of interpretation of Convention rights under the Human Rights Act and the discretionary area of judgment' [1998] PL 545, pp 549–51.

72 HL Deb Col 784, 24 November 1997.

73 For further discussion of this term, see Chapter 4, p 189–92.

74 See Chapter 6, pp 299–300.

Certain especially sensitive information is not dealt with under these regulatory models, but is the subject of specific reporting restrictions. In some instances, these were adopted once it was clear that self-regulation could not be trusted to ensure that some newspapers would behave responsibly.⁷⁵ The media are also subject to the DPA 1998 in respect of their processing of personal information, although, as explained below, the Act does not provide a full protection against intrusion on privacy by the media.

There is an obvious tension between press self-regulation, broadcasting regulation and Art 8 of the Convention, introduced into UK law by the HRA. As discussed below, the Press Complaints Commission (PCC) and the Broadcasting Standards Commission (BSC) have powers to adjudicate upon violation of their respective privacy codes. Their adjudications will be published by offending newspapers or broadcasters and this arguably constitutes some 'respect' for private life.⁷⁶ However, when the European Commission on Human Rights considered the PCC in Spencer (Earl) v UK,⁷⁷ it made no suggestion that its activities could satisfy the requirement of respect for private life. Rather, it pointedly remarked: 'the PCC has no legal power to prevent publication of material, to enforce its rulings or to grant any legal remedy against the newspaper in favour of the victim.' Thus, it is reasonably clear that reliance on the PCC alone is inconsistent with the Convention principle that rights should be 'practical and effective', not 'theoretical or illusory'.⁷⁸

As far as broadcasting is concerned, the impact of the Independent Television Commission (ITC), which has powerful sanctions at its command, as explained in Chapter 6,⁷⁹ might be viewed as providing an effective remedy for breaches of Art 8, although this is open to question since they only operate post-broadcast. Moreover, the requirement to broadcast BSC adjudications is statutory. But the press is subject to no similar constraints. Thus, it is apparent that self-regulation of the press is no longer sufficient to protect privacy. Judicial recognition of the need to provide further protection for privacy, reflecting the demands of the HRA, is already becoming apparent.⁸⁰ The self-regulatory regime described below, therefore, is likely to become increasingly marginalised by actions relying on common law liability under the impetus of the HRA,⁸¹ as explained in the next section. The broadcasting regime is likely to be influenced by the HRA, but less radically.

75 The law regarding the anonymity of rape complaints was prompted by public outrage in 1986 after the Sun published without her consent a picture of a rape victim in the 'Ealing vicarage' rape case taken as she was leaving church. The Press Council adjudication one year later censured the Sun for its unwarranted invasion of privacy: Press Council, The Press and the People 1987, p 241.

76 See Phillipson, op cit, fn 52 and Wright, op cit, fn 1, pp 137–38.

77 (1998)25EHRR CD 105.

78 Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305, p 314.

79 See p 304.

80 See Douglas and Others v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992, pp 581 et seq below.

81 An example of such marginalisation occurred in the case of Holden (Amanda) v The Star unreported; see The Guardian, 2 July 2001; (2001) The Observer, 15 July and fn 124 below and associated text.

Specific reporting restrictions⁸²*Wardship proceedings, the inherent jurisdiction of the court, and the doctrine of confidence*

A number of specific restrictions prevent the reporting of information relating to children. For example, under s 12(1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960, the press cannot report any aspect of wardship proceedings,⁸³ although a conviction will not be obtained where a newspaper editor publishes material relating to wardship proceedings without being aware of the connection.⁸⁴ The privacy of children also receives some protection from the courts' inherent jurisdiction to protect the privacy of minors. This was confirmed in Central Independent Television.⁸⁵ A programme was made depicting the work of the police, which included an investigation into a man subsequently convicted of offences of indecency. The plaintiff recognised him as her husband in a trailer shown of the programme. She did not wish her daughter, aged five, who knew nothing of his convictions, to know what had occurred and therefore sought to have the programme altered so that it would not be possible to recognise her husband. The Court of Appeal refused the injunction despite accepting that it had an inherent jurisdiction to protect the privacy of minors. It found that the protection for the privacy of children would not extend to covering publication of facts relating to those who were not carers of the child in question and which occurred before the child was born.

Exceptionally, an injunction granted to protect the anonymity of a child may be extended, on grounds of the doctrine of confidence, once the child reaches 18. This was found in Venables, Thompson v News Group Newspapers Ltd, Associated Newspapers Ltd, MGM Ltd.⁸⁶ Jon Venables and Robert Johnson were claimants in proceedings for injunctions. In 1993 they had murdered a boy of two, James Bulger, when they were 10 years old. The murder was particularly shocking and distressing and the facts were widely publicised in the media. They were sentenced to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure under s 53(1) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (CYPA 1933), and they were placed in separate secure units. At the conclusion of their trial, the judge granted comprehensive injunctions restricting publication of further information about the two boys, with no limit of time, based both under s 39 of the CYPA 1933 (which is discussed below) and the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court to deal with children. The claimants reached 18 and wanted the injunctions to continue. The injunctions were principally designed to protect their new identities when they were released into the community.

The court had to decide whether there was jurisdiction to grant an injunction against the whole of the media in respect of an adult to protect his identity and other relevant information. That issue raised the question of the effect of the implementation 82 See also Chapter 5, pp 241–45. For further discussion see Barendt, E and Hitchens, L, Media Law: Cases and Materials, 2000, Chapter 7.

83 See Re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Injunction) [1984] 1WLR 1422 (the Mary Bell case).

84 Re F [1977] Fam 58.

85 [1994] Fam 192.

86 [2001] 1 All ER 908, Fam Div (High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division).

of the HRA 1998 and, in particular, the applicability of the Convention, since the proceedings were private ones. A number of newspapers made representations to the court. They pointed out that the speech of Lord Steyn in *Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms*⁸⁷ supported the presumption in favour of freedom of expression. The speech of Lord Templeman in AG v Guardian Newspapers,⁸⁸ the judgment of Hoffman LJ in *Central Independent Television*⁸⁹ and the judgment of Munby J in *Kelly v BBC*⁹⁰ also provided support. It was not, it was argued, a question of a balancing exercise by the court, since freedom of expression had presumptive priority. The newspapers further argued that, if either of the claimants was discovered by a journalist, it should be left to the judgment of the editor whether or not to publish the information. Instances could be found, it was pointed out, where the press was asked by the court not to publish and did not do so.⁹¹

It was further pointed out that if injunctions were granted, they would become a precedent for the future. One example would arise if Myra Hindley were ever released. It was pointed out that the Court of Appeal in *Chief Constable of the North Wales Police*⁹² had refused to grant injunctions to prevent the Chief Constable from revealing to the owner of a caravan site the past convictions of two paedophiles living on the site. The positive obligation on a public authority, in this instance, the court, to ensure proper protection of rights under the Convention, including the right to freedom of expression, was also relied on.

The key issue in the case for the injunctions concerned the grave danger to the claimants if their new identities and whereabouts became known, since threats against them had frequently been made, including threats to their lives. They were also likely to suffer serious and relentless invasions of privacy. The court found that in the light of the judgments in the Douglas case⁹³ regarding the effect of s 12(4) of the HRA it was clear that Art 10 had to be applied directly. The injunctions had been granted originally on the basis of the inherent jurisdiction of the Family Division of the High Court to protect minors, and on the statutory provisions in s 39 of the CYPA 1933. That basis no longer existed, but the court considered that the injunction could be based upon the law of confidence, taking into account the implementation of the HRA 1998. The court therefore proceeded to grant the injunctions 'against the world'. The findings as to confidence are considered below.⁹⁴ This was a very significant ruling since it provided for the anonymity of adults. However, the question whether the injunction would have been issued on grounds of the threat of a very serious invasion of privacy alone was left open. It may be noted that the injunction was varied in July 2001 to absolve internet service providers (ISPs) from liability if matter identifying Venables or Thompson were to be posted on a website accessed through ISPs without their knowledge, if they had no knowledge that the material was on the site and had taken all reasonable steps to

87 [1999] 3 WLR 328, p 337.

88 [1987] 1 WLR 1248, p 1297.

89 [1994] Fam 192, p 203E, 204C

90 [2000] 3 FCR 509, p 525.

91 See Broadmoor Hospital Authority and Another v R [2000] 2 All ER 727.

92 [1999] QB 396.

93 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

94 See pp 584–87.

prevent publication of the banned material.⁹⁵ However, the varied injunction did not specify the steps that ISPs would be expected to take. This episode highlighted the inefficacy of the use of injunctions in the internet era.

Juveniles involved in criminal proceedings

Under s 39 of the CYPA 1933, a court (apart from a Youth Court) could direct that details relating to a child, who was a witness or defendant, including his or her name, shall not be reported and that no picture of the child should be broadcast or published. The media could make representations to the judge, arguing that the demands of media freedom outweigh the possibility of harm to the child.

Section 49 of the Act as amended,⁹⁶ which relates to Youth Courts, now provides for an automatic ban on publishing certain identifying details relating to a juvenile offender, including his or her name and address, although the court can waive the ban. Under the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997, the court can lift reporting restrictions where it considers that a ban would be against the public interest.

The s 39 restrictions were extended under s 44 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, which now covers children involved in adult proceedings. The 1933 Act did not cover the period before proceedings begin. The 1999 Act prohibits the publication once a criminal investigation has begun, of any matter relating to a person involved in an offence while he is under 18 which is likely to identify him. Thus, juveniles who are witnesses are also covered. Under s 44(4), the court can dispense with the restrictions if it is satisfied that it is in the public interest to do so. Thus, s 44 brings the restrictions relating to juveniles in adult proceedings into line with those under s 49 relating to youth proceedings, placing the onus on the court to find a good reason for lifting the restriction rather than having to find a good reason for imposing it. The discretion of the court is therefore more narrowly confined.⁹⁷ This is clearly an instance in which, as between the demands of press freedom and the interest in the protection of the privacy and reputation of juveniles, the latter interest has prevailed.

Victims of sexual offences

A number of special restrictions also apply to the victims of certain sexual offences. Under s 4(1)(a) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976, once an allegation of rape was made it was an offence to publish or broadcast the name, address or photograph of the woman who was the alleged victim. Once a person was accused of rape, nothing could be published by the media which could identify the woman. These restrictions were extended under s 1(1) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1992 as amended by s 48 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 and Sched 2. Section 1(1) covers a number of sexual offences as well as rape, and provides: 'where an allegation has been made that an offence to which the Act applies has been committed against a person,⁹⁸ no matter relating to that person shall during that person's lifetime be included in any publication.'

95 See The Guardian, 11 July 2001, p 2. See further guardian.co.uk/bulger.

96 As amended by Sched 2 to the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999.

97 See the discussion in Lee [1993] 1 WLR 103, pp 109–110.

98 Male victims are also covered under the CJPOA 1994, s 142.

This restriction, unlike those considered above, is not subject to any exception. Therefore, in that respect, it affords less recognition to freedom of speech, although it does not prevent the reporting of the case or discussion of it once it is over, so long as details likely to identify the victim are not revealed.

Impact of the HRA

The most important concern arising from the use of these reporting restrictions is the fear that they may create unacceptable curbs on the freedom of the press and broadcasters. The main safeguard for media freedom is the possibility that the restrictions—apart from that of anonymity in relation to certain sexual offences—may be dispensed with in the public interest. In the HRA era, Art 10 jurisprudence is likely to become an increasingly important influence upon development of the public interest test, so that it becomes the principal mechanism for a balanced resolution of rights to privacy (and, on occasion, to life) and to freedom of expression. It is apparent from Convention jurisprudence that, where two Convention rights come into conflict, some kind of balancing act between the two needs to be undertaken.⁹⁹ Although jurisprudence in this area is very limited, it appears that the margin of appreciation becomes particularly significant here, so that States have a fairly wide discretion in resolving the conflict.¹⁰⁰ Domestic courts will therefore have an appreciable degree of latitude in determining where to strike the balance between the two interests. Section 12 of the HRA, which enjoins the court to have ‘particular regard’ to Art 10 when making any order which might infringe it, would be relevant when civil matters, including wardship proceedings, or the doctrine of confidence, were in question. Since throughout this chapter the effect of s 12 and of public interest tests in relation to Art 8 rights is a central theme, the question of seeking to resolve the conflict between Arts 8 and 10 is considered fully in one section, below.¹⁰¹

Press self-regulation

The Press Council

The Press Council was created in 1953 with a view to allowing the press to regulate itself. It issued guidelines on privacy and adjudicated on complaints. It could censure a newspaper and require its adjudication to be published. In practice, however, a number of deficiencies became apparent: the Council did not issue clear enough guidelines, its decisions were seen as inconsistent and in any event ineffective: it had no power to fine or to award an injunction.¹⁰² Moreover, it was seen as too

99 Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 55. The two Convention rights in conflict there were free speech itself and—so the court found—the right to religious freedom, protected by Art 9.

100 Ibid. The restriction on Art 10 entailed by the seizure of an allegedly blasphemous film was justified by reference to the Art 9 right to freedom of religious belief. The Court applied a wide margin of appreciation, and simply said that ‘the content of the film cannot be viewed as incapable of grounding’ the conclusion of the national authorities that seizure was justified (para 56). Thus, the test applied was reminiscent of the narrow Wednesbury standard of unreasonableness. See also Wingrove v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 1. Both decisions are discussed in Chapter 6 pp 317–20.

101 See pp 617–30.

102 See further Levy, The Press Council, 1967.

lenient; it would not interfere if the disclosure in question could be said to be in the public interest, and what was meant by the public interest was uncertain. Its inefficacy led the Younger Committee, convened in 1972, to recommend a number of proposals offering greater protection from intrusion by the press.¹⁰³ These proposals were not implemented but, by 1989, a perception had again begun to arise, partly influenced by Kaye v Robertson,¹⁰⁴ (discussed below) that further measures might be needed to control the press, although at the same time there was concern that they should not prevent legitimate investigative journalism. This perceived need led eventually to the formation of the Committee on Privacy and Related Matters chaired by Sir David Calcutt (hereafter 'Calcutt 1') in 1990¹⁰⁵ which considered a number of measures, some relevant to actual publication and some to the means of gathering information. The Committee decided that improved self-regulation should be given one final chance and recommended the creation of the Press Complaints Commission, which was set up in 1991 to police a Code of Practice for the press.

The Press Complaints Commission

After self-regulation by the Press Complaints Commission in accordance with the new Code of Practice had been in place for a year, Sir David Calcutt (hereafter 'Calcutt 2') reviewed its success¹⁰⁶ and determined that the Press Complaints Commission 'does not hold the balance fairly between the press and the individual (it is in essence a body set up by the industry (dominated by the industry'. He therefore proposed the introduction of a statutory tribunal which would draw up a revised code of practice for the press and would rule on alleged breaches of the code; its sanctions would include those already possessed by the Press Complaints Commission and in addition the imposition of fines and the award of compensation. When the matter was considered by the National Heritage Select Committee¹⁰⁷ in 1993, it rejected the proposal of a statutory tribunal in favour of the creation of another self-regulatory body to be known as the Press Commission, which would monitor a Press Code and which would have powers to fine and to award compensation. It also decided that a regulatory level beyond the commission was needed and recommended the setting up of a statutory Press Ombudsman.

However, the then Conservative Government did not respond to these proposals, making no move to appoint a new self-regulatory body or to give the Press Complaints Commission new powers. It responded to the National Heritage Select Committee in 1995,¹⁰⁸ stating that the system of voluntary self-regulation was to be preferred to statutory measures. It also noted various improvements in that system. The Commission itself had decided in January 1994 to appoint a Privacy Commissioner with the power to recommend that newspaper editors should be 103 The Committee considered the need for legal curbs on the press; it recommended the introduction of a tort of disclosure of information unlawfully acquired and a tort and crime of unlawful surveillance by means of a technical device. See Younger Committee, Cmnd 5012, 1972; criticised: MacCormick, op cit, fn 1.

104 [1991] FSR 62.

105 Report of the Committee on Privacy and Related Matters, Cm 1102, 1990 (Calcutt Report); for comment see Munro, C, 'Press freedom—how the beast was tamed' (1991) 54 MLR 104.

106 Review of Press Self-regulation, Cm 2135.

107 Fourth Report of the Committee 294–91, Privacy and Media Intrusion, Fourth Report, HC 291–1 (1993).

108 Privacy and Media Intrusion, Cm 2918, 1995.

disciplined for breaching the Press Code. In January 1995, Lord Wakeham was appointed Chairman of the Commission; he was strongly in favour of continued self-regulation and pointed to a number of improvements made in the system, including the fact that the Commission by that point had a strengthened lay majority. The government did, however, make some suggestions for improvement in the system, including the establishment of a press hotline whereby the PCC could warn editors, thought likely to publish a story in breach of the Code, of the consequences of so doing. It also proposed that a fund should be set up in order to compensate members of the public whose privacy has been invaded. Neither proposal has been implemented.

Policing the Code of Practice

The Press Complaints Commission agreed a Code of Practice in 1990, which the newspapers accepted. In 1997, the Code was made more restrictive.¹⁰⁹ The Commission can receive and pronounce on complaints of violation of the Code and can demand an apology for inaccuracy, or that there should be an opportunity for reply. However, almost all the clauses of the Code that relate to intrusion into private life are subject to exceptions in the public interest; this is defined non-exhaustively as including 'detecting or exposing seriously anti-social conduct, protecting public health or safety or preventing the public being misled by some statement or action of an individual or organisation'.

Code provisions

Clause 3(i) incorporates part of the wording of Art 8(1) into the Code; it provides: 'Everyone is entitled to respect for his or her private or family life, home, health and correspondence,' and that publications intruding into private life without consent must be justified. The Code makes special mention of hospitals and similar institutions in cl 9 and requires that the press must identify themselves and obtain permission before entering non-public areas. Intrusion into grief and shock must be done with sympathy and discretion under cl 5. Children receive special protection under cl 6: they must not be interviewed or photographed on subjects involving the welfare of the child or any other child in the absence of or without the consent of a parent or other adult who is responsible for the children. Children must not be approached or photographed at school without the permission of the school authorities. In 1999, Tony Blair complained to the PCC regarding a news story about Kathryn, his daughter.¹¹⁰ The complaint was upheld. It was in fact the first complaint to be made under cl 6 regarding the privacy of the children of public figures at school. The PCC said: 'if every story about the PM's children which relates to their education is to be justified on the basis that he has made statements about education, then the Code provides no protection for his children or others in a similar position.' But the PCC also said that the press should be free to report on matters relating to children of public figures if such stories revealed hypocrisy or had an impact on policy. The child should only be identified if that child alone had to be the centre of the story.

109 The latest version of the Code was ratified by the PCC on 26 November 1997.
110 Press Complaints Report (1999). Complaint upheld: 17 July 1999.

Under cl 10, the press must avoid identifying relatives and friends of persons convicted or accused of crime without their consent. Clause 3(ii) provides that the ‘use of long lens photography to take pictures of people in private places without their consent is unacceptable’. Private places are stated to be public or private property ‘where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy’. The taking of photographs in private places, persistent phoning, questioning, photographing or pursuit of individuals after being asked to desist, or failing to leave private property after being asked to do so (cl 4(ii)), harassment (cl 4(i)), and the use of listening devices (cl 8), are also all proscribed. However, although all these rules, except that under cl 5, are subject to the public interest defence, it is notable that editors are enjoined in cl 4—the harassment clause—not only to ensure that those working for them comply with the cl 4 requirements, but also not to publish material from other sources which do not meet those requirements. The requirement as regards other sources—usually freelance journalists—is not expressly included in the other privacy clauses, most notably cl 3.

Further provisions of the Code reflect certain of the reporting restrictions mentioned above, but go further than they do. Under cl 7, ‘the press must not, even where the law does not prohibit it, identify children under 16 who are involved in cases concerning sexual offences, whether as victims or witnesses’. Equally, cl 12 provides that the press must not identify victims of sexual assault unless they are free to do so by law and there is ‘adequate justification’.

Interpretation

The PCC’s interpretation of the very significant privacy clause, cl 3, suggests that the non-consensual publication of specific identifying personal information, including addresses, is not necessarily a breach of the Code unless the person in question may be thereby put at risk from stalkers¹¹¹ or the person involved may be ‘potentially vulnerable’.¹¹² If this is the case, it is suggested that it is not in accord with the principle of informational autonomy.

The interpretation of ‘a reasonable expectation of privacy’ is clearly a significant matter. Since the Press Complaints Commission, which monitors the Code and its interpretation, is a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, it is suggested that it should now adopt the Strasbourg interpretation of a reasonable expectation of privacy, thus extending it well beyond obviously private places. Strasbourg has been prepared to extend the notion of private space beyond obvious places such as the home; as Harris, O’Boyle and Warbrick put it: ‘it is not enough just for the individual to be himself: he must be able to a substantial degree to keep to himself what he is and what he does...the idea of private space need not be confined to those areas where the person has some exclusive rights of occupancy’.¹¹³ In this respect, the Strasbourg approach may be developing in a direction which will take it away from the current UK statutory approach: ‘the expanding understanding of private life set out in the Niemetz case indicates that a formal public/private 111 Complaint by a well known entertainer, complaint dated 16 July 2000.

112 Complaint of Mrs Renate John, adjudication, 2000.

113 Harris, O’Boyle and Warbrick, op cit, fn 27, p 309.

distinction about the nature of the location will not always be decisive'.¹¹⁴ *Niemetz v ERG*¹¹⁵ concerned office premises, making it clear that rights to respect for privacy are not dependent on an interest in property.

This identifiable general trend suggests that this is another instance in which the emphasis should be on the evolutive nature of the Convention¹¹⁶ rather than on the outcome of particular applications to the Commission, such as that in *X v United Kingdom*¹¹⁷ The Commission found that the actions of the police in taking and filing photographs without consent of a woman arrested for taking part in a political demonstration disclosed no prima facie breach of Art 8. The reasoning was unclear, but a central factor appeared to be the public and voluntary nature of her activities. The decision has been viewed as out of line with the trend of Art 8 jurisprudence: 'In the opinion of some scholars, the...decision may well be an outdated aberration in the case law of the Strasbourg organs'.¹¹⁸

The approach in other jurisdictions may indicate the direction in which the Strasbourg jurisprudence is likely to develop. In *Broadcasting Standards Commission ex p BBC*¹¹⁹ it was found that privacy can be retained even in a place to which the public have access, such as a shop. The German Supreme Court¹²⁰ refused to follow the approach of the Appeal Court that privacy 'stopped at the doorstep' and that therefore no action lay for invasion of privacy in respect of events which had taken place outside the home or other clearly private spaces. The approach indicated was that one may still be entitled to respect for privacy in semi-public places if, as the court put it, it is clear by reference to 'objective criteria' that one wishes to left alone' so that one can, 'relying on the fact of seclusion, act in a way that [one] would not have done...in public'. In other words, the interest in privacy was clearly distinguished from property interests. The Canadian Criminal Code also reflects such a stance.¹²¹ Thus, it may be argued that public/private distinctions based on location are too simplistic and that a test of a reasonable expectation of privacy or, more broadly still, of control of private information would be more satisfactory.¹²² On the basis of such a test, if, for example, one person engages in a whispered exchange with another in an almost empty street, and this exchange is recorded by 114 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op cit, fn 27, p 309. Niemetz v FRG A 251-B (1992) concerned office premises, making it clear that rights to respect for privacy are not dependent on an interest in property.

115 A 251-B (1992).

116 The Convention must be given an 'evolutive' interpretation (Johnstone v Ireland A 112 para 53 (1986)), which takes account of current standards in European society (Tyrer v UK A 26 para 31 (1978)). These would be expected to include the presence of privacy laws across Europe.

117 Appl 5877/72; (1973) 16 YBCHE, 328.

118 Bygrave, LA, 'Data protection pursuant to the right to privacy in human rights treaties' [1999] 6(3) IJLIT 247, p 265. Bygrave notes: '...there are good grounds for holding that it ought to be accorded little weight in present and future interpretation of Article 8'. In spite of these comments, however, Bygrave concedes that in the later decision of Friedl v Austria (1995) A 305B (not treated by the Court on the merits due to friendly settlement), 'the Commission laid weight upon the same...kind of factors as those mentioned in X v United Kingdom' (ibid, p 266). See also Stewart-Brady v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 284, in which a claim of an interference with Art 8 rights due to the taking of a photograph was declared inadmissible (although these findings were made in the context of positive State obligations and there was a conflict with Art 10).

119 [2000] 3 WLR 1327.

120 BGH, 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, pp 322-46.

121 Section 487.01(4).

122 The Press Complaints Commission's Code of Practice defines 'private places [as] public or private property where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy'. Such a test was recommended by the Irish Law Reform Commission: Privacy, Surveillance and Interception (1996), Consultation Paper.

means of a listening device, it is contended that an invasion of privacy has occurred which may fall within Art 8.

The interpretation of the public interest is also of crucial significance. In making a determination, the PCC takes into account the extent to which the material is already in the public domain, and the specific issues of public interest that are raised.¹²³ At present, despite the requirements of s 6 of the HRA, it is not apparent that it takes Art 8 or 10 jurisprudence into account in making its determinations.

Sanctions

The Commission does not require the complainant to waive any legal right of action as the Press Council was criticised for doing. However, it has the same limited sanctions as the Press Council: it has no coercive powers at all; it can do only what newspaper proprietors have agreed to allow it to do. At present, this is limited to adjudicating upon complaints received, making a public finding as to whether the Code was violated, and requesting newspapers to publish its adjudication—a request invariably complied with, to date. The Code preamble states that any publication criticised by the PCC must publish the adjudication ‘in full and with due prominence’. Editors and publishers are required by the preamble to ensure that the Code is observed. The terms of the Code are incorporated into the conditions of employment of many members of the staff of newspapers, although not all. It still has no power to award fines, damages or prevent publication of offending items. It has not established a hotline, which—if editors were prepared to accept the PCC’s implicit recommendation or advice not to publish—might have an effect similar to that of obtaining an ex parte injunction to prevent publication. No fund has been set up in order to compensate members of the public whose privacy has been invaded.

Conclusions

It is suggested that various fundamental problems are still apparent. Arguably, the PCC’s own policing of the Code still errs on the side of generosity towards the newspapers. Employees of newspapers can on occasion simply ignore the Code. Or newspapers may publish material obtained by freelance journalists or others in breach of the Code. In particular, they continue to publish pictures of individuals in obviously private places (such as holiday villas), often taken with a long-range lens, without consent, even when it is virtually impossible to argue that a public interest in publication exists. An example of such flouting of the Code occurred in the case of Holden (Amanda) v The Star.¹²⁴ Holden, the star of a sitcom, was holidaying in a private villa in Italy when, without her consent, agency reporters took photographs of her sunbathing topless. One of the photographs was published in the Star. She obtained an ex parte injunction on grounds of breach of confidence, as interpreted in *Douglas and Others v Hello!*¹²⁵ preventing further publication of the 123 See PCC Report No 43 (1998), paras 3.0–3.2.

124 Unreported; see The Guardian, 2 July 2001; (2001) The Observer, 15 July.

125 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

photographs. Although the case was clearly covered by cl 3(ii) of the PCC's Code of Practice, she did not make a complaint, preferring—for obvious reasons—to go straight to the courts to obtain the injunction. She is claiming damages in respect of the publication which did occur.¹²⁶

The PCC cannot prevent publication of material obtained even in gross breach of the Code and, ultimately, the PCC cannot enforce its adjudications. Absent radical changes to its powers, which would have to be agreed by the industry, it is contended that it cannot be regarded as providing an effective remedy for violations of privacy. This does not mean that it will have no role now that more effective remedies are being developed under the impetus of the HRA. It will continue to provide an alternative to using the law for those who cannot or do not wish to incur legal costs. It will continue, in conjunction with the National Union of Journalist's Code, to set benchmarking ethical standards for the profession. It also provides a means of appeasing and satisfying complainants, which may be less stressful and more speedy than court action.

Regulation of broadcasting

Introduction

Under s 142 of the Broadcasting Act 1990, the Broadcasting Complaints Commission (BCC) had a role similar to that of the PCC in adjudicating on complaints of infringement of privacy 'in or in connection with the obtaining of materials included in BBC or independent licensed television or sound broadcasts'. The term 'privacy' could receive quite a wide interpretation according to the ruling in Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada Television Limited.¹²⁷ Granada Television challenged a finding of the BCC that matters already in the public domain could, if republished, constitute an invasion of privacy. In judicial review proceedings, it was found that privacy differed from confidentiality and went well beyond it because it was not confined to secrets; the significant issue was not whether material was or was not in the public domain but whether, by being published, it caused hurt and anguish. There were grounds on which it could be considered that publication of the matters in question had caused distress, and therefore the BCC had not acted unreasonably in the Wednesbury sense in taking the view that an infringement of privacy had occurred. However, the alleged infringement of privacy could be found to have occurred only when the broadcast was over, and not earlier.¹²⁸ A broad view of privacy was also taken in Broadcasting Standards Commission ex p BBC,¹²⁹ it was found that a company—in this instance, Dixons—can complain of an invasion of privacy in respect of secret filming in one of its shops. The 'public' nature of the shop and the fact that the goods which were being filmed, with a view to showing that they were second-hand, were clearly on public display, did not affect this finding.

126 See The Observer, 15 July 2001.

127 (1993) The Times, 31 May; affirmed [1995] EMLR 163; (1994) The Times, 16 December, CA.

128 Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Barclay and Another (1997) 9 Admin LR 265; (1996) The Times, 11 October.

129 [2000] 3 WLR 1327.

The Broadcasting Standards Commission

The Broadcasting Complaints Commission was replaced by the Broadcasting Standards Commission (BSC) which was set up under s 106 of the Broadcasting Act 1996. The BSC is in a somewhat different position from that of the PCC since it is set up under statute and has certain statutory powers. This also means that such powers must all be interpreted compatibly with the Convention under s 3 of the HRA. The BSC was charged with the duty of drawing up a Code in respect of programme standards under s 107, which is based on s 152 of the 1990 Act, but for the first time the Code also had to cover matters of fairness and privacy.

Certain statutory limitations have been created. Under s 114, the BSC shall not entertain a fairness complaint (which includes a complaint regarding invasion of privacy) if the complainant already has another remedy. Under s 111, the complaint must be made by the person affected, which means that that person must have a direct interest in the subject matter of the treatment in question. The BSC adjudicates upon complaints received, makes finding as to whether the Code has been violated, and requests broadcasters to publish its adjudication. In this respect, s 119 of the 1996 Act affords the BSC a significant power, since it places the requirement to publish the BSC findings and a summary of the complaint on a statutory basis.

The Broadcasting Standards Commission's Privacy Code

This Code is similar to that of the PCC, but in certain respects, it is more extensive and offers greater guidance on the operation of the overriding public interest test. Under this test, an infringement of privacy can be justified on a number of grounds. They include revealing or detecting crime or disreputable behaviour, protecting public health or safety, exposing misleading claims made by individuals or organisations or disclosing significant incompetence in public office (cl 14).

Clause 18 provides that the use of hidden microphones must be justified by an overriding public interest. Under cl 19, if someone is inadvertently filmed, their identity should normally be obscured. Clause 25 provides that people who are currently in the news cannot object to interviewing in public places, but persistent questioning of individuals after being asked to desist can constitute an unwarranted infringement of privacy. Children receive special protection under cl 32. If under 16 they must not be interviewed without the consent of a parent or other adult who is responsible for them. If consent is refused a decision to go ahead must be justified by an overriding public interest and the child's appearance must be absolutely necessary. Persons suffering grief and shock must be approached with sensitivity and discretion under cl 28, and they should not be put under pressure to provide interviews. The Code makes special mention of agency operations in cl 33 (such as police investigations) and requires that the broadcasters must identify themselves and should leave private property if asked to do so unless there is an overriding public interest.

The role of the Independent Television Commission

The role of the Independent Television Commission (ITC) was considered in Chapter 6 and it was made clear that it has a number of significant sanctions to use against broadcasters who fail to adhere to the ITC Programme Code.¹³⁰ Although, as that chapter indicated, its role is likely to be taken over by a super-regulator, OFCOM, in 2003 or 2004, the model used for broadcasting regulation is unlikely to undergo radical change. The ITC's Programme Code has a section on privacy, also covering the gathering of information, which overlaps with the BSC Code on privacy. Clause 2.1 provides that the public interest may need to be balanced against individual privacy and states that the public interest includes detecting or exposing crime or a serious misdemeanour; protecting public health or safety; preventing the public from being misled by some statement or action of the individual or organisation concerned; exposing significant incompetence in public office. The Code echoes Art 8 in also providing that any act relying on the defence of public interest must be in proportion to the interest served.

Certain clauses are more specific and appear to be somewhat less generous to broadcasters than similar clauses in the BSC Code. For example, cl 2.7 of the ITC Code, dealing with children, goes into greater detail regarding what can be shown than does cl 32, the equivalent clause under the BSC Code. Clause 2.2(i) covers filming in institutions, such as hospitals, and requires that the broadcasters must obtain consent to transmit material when persons are shown in sensitive situations, such as in psychiatric hospitals, unless exceptions can be made in the public interest. Clause 2.2(ii) covers the filming of police operations or the investigations of similar bodies. It requires that the broadcasters must identify themselves and should normally leave private property if asked to do. Since a trespass may occur in such an instance, the licensee's most senior programme executive must be consulted before transmission and must be convinced that showing the material serves the public interest.

Clause 2.4 provides that the use of hidden microphones must not only be justified by an overriding public interest, they may only be used when it is clear that the material so acquired is essential to establish the credibility and authority of a story. Children receive special protection under cll 2.6 and 6.4. Clause 6.4 reminds broadcasters of regulations covering performances by children. Under cl 2.6, they must not be interviewed regarding private, family matters. This requirement is not subject to the public interest test. Clauses 5.8 and 2.7 remind broadcasters of the statutory reporting restrictions relating to reports on young offenders and to the reporting of sexual offences against children. The ITC Code, like the PCC Code, goes beyond what the law demands in disallowing broadcasting of the identity of children involved in a sexual offences. The privacy of persons suffering grief or distress must in particular be respected, under cl 2.5, and insensitive questioning should be avoided.

The impact of the HRA

It is suggested that the effect of the HRA on media bodies, and on the regulatory schemes in general, is already becoming apparent and is likely to be most significant as far as the PCC is concerned since, as indicated above, the problem of invasion of privacy by the press, not the broadcast media, is more pressing and the PCC has no statutory basis or powers. The most significant effect is likely to be that the PCC will be marginalised in respect of its role in relation to privacy, since persons, particularly celebrities, whose privacy has been or is about to be invaded by the press will tend to seek ex parte injunctions and/or damages on grounds of breach of confidence, as discussed below, rather than complaining to the PCC, which has no such remedy at its command (and might be viewed, if it had, as reluctant to use it). If such a trend does become apparent, the PCC itself is likely to review its powers since otherwise, the self-regulation system is likely to become a dead letter. It may have to adopt some of the proposals it has at present rejected, such as the hotline system and the award of compensation to complainants.

Clearly, an ex parte injunction could also be obtained restraining the showing of a broadcast, on grounds of breach of confidence or, in the case of media bodies that are also public authorities, on grounds of invasion of privacy under Art 8, using s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. But it is suggested that marginalisation of the ITC and BSC as bodies charged, inter alia, with protecting privacy, is less likely to occur or likely to occur to a lesser extent, since the problem posed by invasion of privacy by the broadcast media does not seem to have reached the same proportions, and the sanctions available to the ITC, and to the lesser extent to the BSC, create greater confidence in the ability of those bodies to address it.

The BSC and ETC are subject to judicial review,¹³¹ and this is also probably the case in respect of the PCC.¹³² Therefore, as Chapter 4 indicated, it is almost certain that the BSC and ITC are functional public authorities, and this is probably also true of the PCC.¹³³ The BBC and possibly Channel 4, as bodies with a public service remit, will probably be public authorities.¹³⁴ Therefore, under s 6 of the HRA, these bodies are bound to comply with the Convention rights in exercising their functions. The duties of the ITC under s 6 of the HRA can be viewed as additional and complementary to those it has under s 6 of the Broadcasting Act 1990, while the BSC's duties under s 6 of the HRA are additional to those imposed under s 107 of the Broadcasting Act 1996. If these bodies fail to uphold complaints relating to invasion of privacy, proceedings could be brought against them under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. In any such proceedings, a court would now have to satisfy s 12(4)(b) of the HRA, which would mean that the privacy Codes of these bodies would be admissible in evidence and would be considered. By this means, the PCC Code has acquired, it is suggested, a quasi-legal status. The ITC and BSC Codes already had such a status since they were set up under statute, but their status may now be viewed as enhanced, although the BSC Code was taken into account in any event in the pre-HRA ruling in Broadcasting Standards Commission ex p BBC.¹³⁵

131 The bodies they replaced were so subject and this has already been found to be the case in respect of the BSC: see R v BCC ex p Owen [1985] QB 1153; R v BSC ex p BBC [2000] 3 WLR 1327; R v IBA ex p Whitehouse (1985) The Times, 4 April.

132 See PCC ex p Stewart-Brady (1997) 9 Admin LR 274.

133 See pp 157–59. See also fn 137 below.

134 There is a possible difficulty with this proposition which will have to be addressed by the courts. Arguably, the BBC (and Channel 4) may also, exceptionally, be viewed as both public authorities and victims for HRA purposes. They appear to satisfy the test for victims at Strasbourg, which is encapsulated under HRA 1998, s 7(7), since, although in a sense they are emanations of the State, they are editorially independent from it. It would of course be bizarre if they could not be viewed as victims since that would run contrary to the scrutinising role over the State that one would expect these bodies, especially the BBC, to exercise.

135 [2000] 3 WLR 1327.

In debate on the Human Rights Bill, a great deal of concern was voiced in Parliament about the possibility, as regards the PCC, that it would be a public authority for the purposes of the HRA. It was thought that it would be subject to judicial review for violation of the Convention in its rulings and therefore in some way in a position to threaten press freedom.¹³⁶ Although in theory this appears to be the case, it is unlikely in practice that this route will frequently be explored: it would be likely to provide, it is suggested, a merely paper remedy. Those expressing that concern appeared to overlook the fact that the PCC has no coercive powers. As far as both the PCC and BSC are concerned, it is also hard to see what impact a finding of breach of the Convention could have on the bodies they are regulating. If a finding was made that either body had violated the Convention rights, for example by finding that someone's privacy had not been invaded when, in the court's view, Art 8 required a contrary conclusion,¹³⁷ the very most that the court could do would be to quash the finding of that body by a quashing order (formerly certiorari) and require it to reconsider the case by a mandatory order (formerly mandamus). Damages could conceivably be awarded against it also. But this would not affect the newspapers or broadcasters themselves, in the sense that none of this would change the fact that the only 'remedies' they would be subject to would be those available at present: the publication of the BSC's adjudications and—although they could not be forced to do this—those of the PCC. However, an action brought directly against the ITC under s 7(1) (a) on grounds of failing to use sanctions in respect of an invasion of privacy in breach of its Privacy Code could lead to a mandatory order requiring the ITC to use the sanctions it has available, including, ultimately, withdrawal of its licence, against the broadcaster concerned. This possibility could have some impact, although it would apply post-broadcast; it would not prevent the broadcast of the material.

The only way in which the PCC could acquire greater powers than it has at present (for example, to levy fines against newspapers adjudged to have breached the Code) would be if the newspaper industry collectively agreed that it should have the power to demand fines and even then, it is hard to see what the sanction for non-payment would be, other than adverse publicity. It is possible that if actions are successfully brought against it, the PCC may seek agreement from the industry that breach of the PCC Code should lead to disciplinary action, including dismissal. But again, it could not enforce such action. Or it could ask newspapers to indemnify it against possible actions under the HRA. It goes without saying that the PCC, not having any statutory basis or powers, could not be given by the industry more than the power to request a newspaper not to publish a given article; it could never require non-publication. In short, therefore, the effect of the HRA on the PCC may be in the short term that a layer of judicial supervision will be added onto what will remain a mere self-regulatory body, with powers to do only that which the industry agrees voluntarily to submit to. In the longer term, the HRA may play a crucial part in the dismantling of the whole self-regulatory system—at least as far as privacy complaints are concerned.

136 See Hansard, HL Col 784, 24 November 1997.

137 Anna Ford, a BBC journalist, applied to the High Court for judicial review of the PCC's decision to reject her claim that the Daily Mail breached her right to privacy by publishing pictures of her on holiday with her partner (The Observer, 15 July 2001). The PCC's decision was vindicated.

4 LIABILITY FOR DISCLOSING PERSONAL INFORMATION

Introduction

This section will consider liability for publishing personal information outside reliance on s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. Its focus will be on the doctrine of confidence as by far the most apt cause of action for the protection of personal information from disclosure in the existing law. It will be argued that when the general principles and underlying values of the Convention—rather than the outcomes of particular applications—are examined, it can be discerned that the Convention does suggest that domestic law should provide a more effective remedy against invasions of privacy by publications, a view which is beginning to find judicial acceptance.¹³⁸

The general thesis of this section is that the doctrine of confidence will be able to afford far more protection in this area than commonly thought, and that some recognition of its potential is already apparent,¹³⁹ but that an enormous amount of judicial labour will be required to flesh out and give definition to the current action which lacks at present a clear legal profile. It will be argued that any law protecting a person from unwanted publication of personal information must inevitably become ‘a legal porcupine, which bristles with difficulties’,¹⁴⁰ but that workable and principled solutions to the problems associated with the legal right to respect for privacy under Art 8 can be developed. In particular, it will be strongly contended that the perception of conflict between speech and privacy is often exaggerated and simplistic, and indeed that an examination of the values underlying each reveals them to be in many respects mutually supportive, rather than invariably antagonistic. In conclusion, it will be contended that the goals in view in developing a privacy law—the protection of human dignity and autonomy, the movement away from the demeaning and debasing pursuit of certain figures and the destruction of their privacy in order to sell newspapers, the consequent enhancement of the speech of the press and enrichment of our cultural life—should be sufficient to encourage the judiciary to grasp at the possibilities which the HRA offers to develop a privacy law in all but name.

Defamation and malicious falsehood

The law of defamation may offer some protection to an individual who has suffered from the unauthorised disclosure of private matters, but the interest protected by defamation—the interest of the individual in preserving his or her reputation—is far from coterminous with the interest in preserving privacy. A reputation may not suffer, but the fact that personal information is spread abroad may nevertheless be hurtful in itself for the individual affected. Thus, no remedy was available in Corelli *v Wall*¹⁴¹ which arose from publication by the defendants, without the plaintiff's permission, of postcards depicting imaginary events in her life. Such publication was not found to be libellous, and no remedy lay in copyright as the copyright was in the creator of the cards.

138 See p 581–83, below.

139 See the comments of Laws J in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 805 and the findings of the European Commission on Human Rights in Spencer (Earl) v United Kingdom (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105, discussed below. See also Douglas and Others v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992 and associated text.

140 The phrase is borrowed from dicta in an administrative law case: Inner London Education Authority ex p Westminster CC [1986] 1 WLR 28.

The ruling in *Kaye v Robertson and Another*¹⁴² may be said to have made clear the inadequacy of defamation as a remedy for invasions of privacy. Mr Kaye, a well known actor, was involved in a car accident and suffered severe head injuries. While he was lying in hospital two journalists from the Sunday Sport, acting on Mr Robertson's orders, got into his room, photographed him and interviewed him. Owing to his injuries, he did not object to their presence and shortly after the incident had no recollection of it. The resultant article gave the impression that Mr Kaye had consented to the interview. His advisers sought and obtained an injunction restraining the defendants from publishing the photographs and the interview. On appeal by the defendants the Court of Appeal ruled that the plaintiff's claim could not be based on a right to privacy as such a right is unknown to English law. His true grievance lay in the 'monstrous invasion of privacy' which he had suffered but he would have to look to other rights of action in order to obtain a remedy, namely libel and malicious falsehood. The basis of the defamation claim was that the article's implication that Mr Kaye had consented to a first 'exclusive' interview for a 'lurid and sensational' newspaper such as the Sunday Sport would lower him in the esteem of right thinking people. The Court of Appeal held that this claim might well succeed, but that as such a conclusion was not inevitable it could not warrant grant of an interim injunction, basing this ruling on Herbage v Times Newspapers and Others.¹⁴³

The court then considered malicious falsehood. First, it had to be shown that the defendant had published about the plaintiff words which were false. Their Lordships considered that any reasonable jury would find that the implication contained in the words of the article was false. As the case was, on that basis, clear cut, an interim injunction could in principle be granted. Secondly, it had to be shown that the words were published maliciously. Malice would be inferred if it was proved that the words were calculated to produce damage and that the defendant knew them to be false. The reporters clearly realised that Mr Kaye was unable to give them any informed consent. Any subsequent publication of the falsehood would therefore be malicious. Thirdly, damage must have followed as a direct result of the publication of the falsehood. The words had produced damage in that they had diminished the value of Mr Kaye's right to sell the story of his accident at some later date. That ground of action was therefore made out. Therefore, an injunction restraining the defendants until trial from publishing anything which suggested that the plaintiff had given an informed consent to the interview or the taking of the photographs was substituted for the original order. However, this was a limited injunction which allowed publication of the story with certain of the photographs, provided that it was not claimed that the plaintiff had given consent. Thus, it seemed that no effective remedy was available for the plaintiff. Legatt LJ concluded his ruling by saying:

141 (1906) 22 TLR 532 (Ch).

142 [1991] FSR 62; (1991) The Times, 21 March; for comment, see Prescott, P, 'Kaye v Robertson: a reply' (1991) 54 MLR 451; Bedingfield, D, 'Privacy or publicity: the enduring confusion surrounding the american tort of invasion of privacy' (1992) 55 MLR 111; Markesinis, BS, 'The Calcutt Report must not be forgotten' (1992) 55 MLR 118.

143 (1981) The Times, 1 May.

'We do not need a First Amendment to preserve the freedom of the Press, but the abuse of that freedom can be ensured only by the enforcement of a right to privacy.'¹⁴⁴

Trespass

It has been suggested¹⁴⁵ that there are sufficient remedies in the common law of trespass to cover at least the kind of situation which arose in Kaye v Robertson.¹⁴⁶ The physical intrusion into the hospital involved trespass on to property (because the reporters, given their purpose, could have no implied licence to be there). Kaye obviously could not have brought an action on his own account as his property had not been trespassed upon, but the solution would have been to join the hospital as co-plaintiff in the action. Once trespass had been established, the court could exercise its equitable jurisdiction to grant an injunction to prevent the defendants from profiting from their own wrong by publishing the material obtained by the trespass for gain. The case of *Chappell and Co Limited v Columbia Gramophone Co*¹⁴⁷ was cited as support for this course of action. In that case, the defendants had wrongfully used the plaintiff's sheet music to make gramophone records. Although the making of the records themselves was not a violation of the plaintiff's legal rights, the court ordered their destruction on the grounds that the defendants should not be allowed to 'reap all the proceeds of their wrongdoing'. However, it is clear that there is no guarantee that possible co-plaintiffs (such as hotel owners) would agree to join in such actions.

Thus, the remedy available even in a case of physical intrusion onto private land would not be certain. Further, an action in trespass would be of limited application in relation to the interviewing of disaster or accident victims and their relatives generally: a person might be interviewed at or near the scene of a disaster in a public place or in a semi-private place, such as a shopping mall, which reporters could be viewed as having an implied licence to enter. Where, in such instances, victims of a disaster did not consent to be interviewed, it would not appear that interviewing them could found a cause of action in trespass. Further, it should be noted that if detailed information regarding Mr Kaye's condition had been obtained without physically entering the hospital—by photographing him with a long range lens or perhaps by interviewing him over the telephone—an action in trespass, as the cause of action is currently conceived, would not be possible. Specific remedies for invasion of privacy would be more appropriate, subject to a broad public interest defence.

However, although it is suggested that in the HRA era, the doctrine of confidence has developed into a privacy remedy, and that therefore there is less of a pressing need to look to trespass to provide such a remedy, it is possible that trespass will also show some development, under the impetus of the HRA. The findings in Douglas and Others v Hello!,¹⁴⁸ considered below, as to the effect of the Act on the common law, would be equally applicable to trespass. Arguably, a judge has a duty, 144 [1991] FSR 621, p 104.

145 Prescott, op cit, fn 142.

146 [1991] FSR 62.

147 [1914] 2 Ch 745, pp 752, 754, 756, CA.

148 Douglas and Others v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992.

under s 6 of the HRA and—where freedom of expression is in issue—s 12, to ensure that the common law reflects the Convention rights. In a case similar to that of Kaye, freedom of expression would be in issue and therefore, if a judge was faced with a plaintiff who was seeking to bring an action in trespass rather than in confidence, it is arguable that she should adapt the doctrine of trespass in order to provide a remedy for the invasion of privacy.

It is also possible, and perhaps more probable, that trespass will be developed under the HRA, not to provide a remedy in relation to the processing and publication of information, but in respect of the invasion of privacy which occurs due to an intrusion which is not a physical intrusion on property—for example, watching the home, using a long range lens to take photographs of persons on private property, etc. This is a matter which is considered in Chapter 12.

Causing harassment, alarm or distress, and anti-social behaviour

The Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (PHA) might offer a remedy in respect of some forms of repeated intrusions on privacy, although it was not aimed at persons such as reporters or photographers, but at ‘stalkers’. Sections 1 and 2 make it an offence to pursue a course of conduct that amounts to harassment of another where the harasser knows or ought to know that this will be its effect. Apart from creating criminal liability for stalking, the Act also provides a civil remedy in s 3 in the form of damages or a restraining order. ‘Conduct’ includes speech (s 7(4)). The harassment must occur on more than one occasion (s 7(3)) and a defence of reasonableness is available (s 1(1)(c)).¹⁴⁹

Since the remedies provided by the Act are statutory, s 3 of the HRA applies. The possibility that the Act could be used in respect of the invasion of privacy that occurs when a person—often a journalist—is seeking to obtain information about an individual by, for example, watching the home, interviewing neighbours, or planting bugging devices is considered in Chapter 12. But, it may be argued that s 3 of the PHA could also be used in respect of the publication of information. Bearing in mind the obligation of a court to interpret the PHA compatibly with Art 8 under the HRA, it could be argued that if on more than one occasion an article was published in a newspaper which caused profound distress to its subject due to its publication of private facts and to the indirect possibility of harassment or injury from members of the public who had read it, an injunction or damages could be obtained under s 3. An argument similar to this one was used successfully against the Sun newspaper in 2001. The Sun had published an article and, on a further occasion, readers’ letters, attacking a black woman who was a civilian employee in a London police station. She had reported a racist incident relating to an asylum seeker, with the result that two police officers were disciplined. The Sun, in an article attacking ‘political correctness gone mad’ and omitting a number of key facts (including the fact that a white police officer had also reported the racist incident), identified her and the police station where she worked and invited readers to express their views as to her conduct. A number did so, in very hostile terms. She received hate mail and was also very distressed by the items; since she worked on the front desk she felt very vulnerable to attack from members of the public. She left her job as a consequence. Damages were awarded against the Sun under s 3 of the 1997 Act and the decision was affirmed on appeal.¹⁵⁰

149 See further Chapter 9, pp 510–12.

This was an interesting and entirely novel use of s 3 of the 1997 Act; it suggests that the judiciary are determined to find a remedy for the plaintiff who has suffered a gross breach of the right to respect for privacy under Art 8 even where no obvious remedy for the particular breach in question is available and despite the effect of s 12 of the HRA. However, had there been one item of publication only—in which identifying as well as distressing details were given—it is doubtful whether the 1997 Act could have been used, unless a particular article could be viewed as, say, being in two parts. This decision emphasises the need for specific remedies for invasion of privacy by the publication of identifying and distressing details. A similar example would arise where a tabloid newspaper published a story in sensationalist terms about a person who had been acquitted of a serious offence, or about a person bringing an action for race discrimination, identifying the individual involved and/or their place of work. He or she might suffer distress due to the articles themselves and also severe harassment from neighbours and others, which might make it impossible to avoid abandoning their home. It is arguable that a remedy should be available in such a situation, although it would have to be balanced against the right to freedom of expression of the newspaper, since s 12 of the HRA would be applicable and Art 10 would in any event be relevant, due to the effect of s 3 HRA. The defence of reasonableness could be used as the mechanism for recognising the value of freedom of expression.

Similar arguments could also be used in respect of the offences created under the 1997 Act and of the similar offences created under the Public Order Act 1986,¹⁵¹ s 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and s 41 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, all of which were discussed in Chapter 9,¹⁵² although, of course, the police would have to take the initiative. All, except s 41 of the 2001 Act, contain similar defences which would allow for recognition to be given to freedom of expression under s 3 of the HRA, although s 12 of the HRA would not be applicable since the proceedings would be criminal. Methods of balancing expression and privacy rights are considered below.

Breach of confidence¹⁵³

The common law doctrine of breach of confidence will protect some confidential communications and its breadth has for some time supported the view that it could 150 Thomas (Esther) v News Group Newspapers (2001) WL 753464; judgment of 18 July 2001.

151 See the use of the 1986 Act, s 5, in Vigon v DPP [1998] Crim LR 298; (1998) 162 JP 115. (The defendant had positioned a video camera in the changing room attached to his market stall, in which women were changing into swimming costumes. He was charged with the offence under s 5 since it was found that the switching on and use of the camera had caused the women harassment, alarm and distress, and his behaviour was insulting to them.) However, the requirement of immediacy which has been found to apply to s 4 of the 1986 Act and which therefore probably also applies to ss 5 and 4A may preclude the use of these provisions in the circumstances envisaged (see R v Horseferry Road Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate ex p Siadatan [1991] 1 All ER 324). See further Chapter 9, pp 506–10.

152 See pp 505–12.

153 See generally Dworkin, G, Confidence in the Law, 1971; Gurry, F, Breach of Confidence, 1991; Jones, G (1970) 86 LQR 463.

provide a general means of protecting personal information, although this area of law developed largely as a means of protecting commercial secrets. The Younger Committee, which was convened to report on privacy,¹⁵⁴ considered that confidence was the area of the law which offered the most effective protection for the privacy of personal information. However, less emphasis was placed on the ability of the doctrine to protect privacy in the discussions of both privacy and confidence which occurred following the Kaye case.¹⁵⁵ It can provide, it is suggested, protection from the invasion of privacy that occurs when personal information is published, causing distress, and probably from the invasion that can indirectly occur when the disclosure of information is likely to lead others to invade privacy. It cannot directly protect persons from invasions of privacy—such as persistent telephoning or the planting of bugs—created by information-seekers.

Elements of confidence

The House of Lords in *AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2)*¹⁵⁶ found that the ruling in *Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Limited*¹⁵⁷ conveniently summarised the three traditionally accepted key elements of the law of confidence: 'First the information itself...must have the necessary quality of confidence about it. Secondly, that information must have been imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence. Thirdly, there must be an unauthorised use of that information to the detriment of the party communicating it.' Even if these elements are made out, publication of the information may still be possible if the defence of public interest applies.

To satisfy the requirements of the first element, information must, it seems, not be in the public domain and must not be trivial.¹⁵⁸ The third element, unauthorised use of information, is fairly self-explanatory; as to detriment, it appears from the cases either that unwanted revelation of private facts per se may constitute detriment for the purposes of the law of confidence,¹⁵⁹ or, alternatively, that detriment might not always be necessary.¹⁶⁰ However, it is in the second element—the circumstances in which the courts will find an obligation of confidence to have been imposed—that the most radical development has occurred. Under the traditional model of confidence, one of two ingredients had to be satisfied for such an obligation to arise. The first was that, at least in cases involving personal, as opposed to commercial information, there had to be some identifiable pre-existing intimate or necessarily confidential relationship between confider and confidant, such as a 154 See Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972.

155 See the Calcutt Committee on Privacy and Related Matters (Cmnd 1102, 1990, para 32) and Wacks, op cit, fn 1, p 56; compare the earlier view of the Younger Committee (Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972, p 26).

156 [1990] 1 AC 109.

157 [1969] RPC 41, p 47.

158 Another change of note is that the courts now take a flexible approach to the form of the information; see Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Confidence and privacy: a re-examination' (1996) 55 CLJ 447, pp 449–50. See further below.

159 AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 265, per Lord Keith.

160 Ibid. Lord Goff explicitly left the point open (ibid, pp 281–82), while Lord Griffiths (ibid, p 270) thought that it was required. The remainder of the House did not address the point. In X v Y ([1988] 2 All ER 650, pp 651 and 657) it was held per curiam that actual or possible detriment to the plaintiff was 'not a necessary precondition to injunctive relief' ([1988] 2 All ER 650, pp 651 and 657). In the recent Source Informatics case [2000] 2 WLR 953, the Court of Appeal did not attempt to resolve the matter, but appeared to favour Lord Keith's view.

professional relationship of trust,¹⁶¹ or marriage,¹⁶² from which the obligation of confidence could be inferred, in the absence of an express agreement on the matter.

*Development of the doctrine*¹⁶³

(1) The quality of confidentiality

Clearly, information is not confidential if it is already in the public domain. However, making a determination on this matter is often problematic. In AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2),¹⁶⁴ Lord Keith indicated that whether information is in the public domain will often be a matter of degree and therefore prior disclosure to a limited group of people might not rob the information of its confidentiality. His Lordship was referring to the possibility of publication abroad, but the principle behind his comments—that the true test is whether further and more serious damage will flow from the fresh disclosure contemplated¹⁶⁵—could apply in a case in which the relevant information had been previously disclosed in this country but in such a manner or at such a distance in the past that the information could not fairly be characterised as being currently in the public domain. Probably, it has also been the case that confidence would not cover instances where the information was initially obtained through observation in a public place. However, the decision in *HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Newspapers Limited and Others*¹⁶⁶ casts some doubt on this contention, since the information in question was obtained in a gymnasium attended by other club members and therefore, clearly, it had been disseminated to an extent, albeit in a manner limited enough to prevent it from being viewed as in the public domain. An interim injunction to protect the information was nevertheless granted. Thus, information obtained by means of observation in similar semi-public places, such as restaurants, might now be found to retain the necessary quality of confidence. Where information conveys a particular message which is itself already in the public domain, the level of detail which accompanies it, which is not in the public domain, may allow the information to be termed confidential.¹⁶⁷ Public domain' has apparently become a rather more flexible—and imprecise—concept.

It is also apparent, it is suggested, that a contrary development is apparent in relation to government assertions of a breach of confidence. As Chapter 7 indicated, AG v Times, the Tomlinson case,¹⁶⁸ suggested that a tendency to find that information is already in the public domain even where it has been disseminated only to a small group of persons is apparent.¹⁶⁹ If it can eventually be said that the interpretation of public domain differs depending on whether the plaintiff is the 161 See, eg, W v Egdell [1990] Ch 359 (doctor-patient); X v Y (ibid); AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109 (both employer-employee).

162 As in Duchess of Argyll v Duke of Argyll [1967] 1 Ch 302.

163 This section is partly drawn from Fenwick and Phillipson, op cit, fn 158.

164 [1990] 1 AC 109, p 260.

165 Note the similar findings in the privacy context on this point in Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada TV Ltd (1993) The Times, 31 May; affirmed [1995] EMLR 163; (1994) The Times, 16 December, CA.

166 Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters limited, 8 November 1993. Discussed below.

167 See Barrymore v NGN Ltd [1997] FSR 600.

168 See Chapter 7, p 361.

169 See pp 361–62.

government or a private individual, this would accord with the requirements of Strasbourg jurisprudence as recognised under s 2 of the HRA since in the former instance, the strong individual right under Art 8 is not also at stake. Section 12(4)(a)(i) of the HRA requires a court to ‘have particular regard’ to ‘the extent to which the material has, or is about to become available to the public’ when considering the grant of relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Art 10 right (s 12(1)). If the development indicated becomes a settled one, this would mean that the courts had accepted that differing approaches should be taken to the interpretation of s 12(4)(a)(i) of the HRA, depending on whether Art 8 was or was not at stake. Moreover, the requirement to take into account the extent to which the material is about to become available (emphasis added) would have the effect of widening the public domain test in a manner reconcilable with the spirit of AG v Times (Tomlinson case), but arguably not with HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Newspapers Limited and Others.¹⁷⁰

What is ‘information’ for the purposes of the law of confidence? It is suggested that both substance and form will be in question. The traditional view was that equity would not intervene to protect trivial information. However, there are signs that the categories of information capable of being accounted sufficiently substantial are widening: information concerning an individual’s sexual orientation (Stephens v Avery)¹⁷¹ and physical appearance (HRH Princess of Wales) has been found to merit protection.

A number of decisions suggest that the courts will also adopt a flexible approach to the form of the information. In HRH Princess of Wales, Drake J had no hesitation in granting interim injunctions to prevent the Daily Mirror and others from publishing photographs of the Princess exercising in a gymnasium, taken by the gymnasium owner without her knowledge or consent. The plaintiff’s case was based both on breach of contract and on confidence, but Drake J appeared to take the view that although the contractual claim was more clearly made out, either limb of the claim would have justified the injunction.¹⁷² Similarly, in *Shelley Films Limited v Rex Features Limited*¹⁷³ the defendant was restrained by injunction from publishing photographs, which had been taken without permission on the set of the film Frankenstein. The possibility that the taking of photographs can amount to the acquiring of confidential information was also expressly accepted by Laws J in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire.¹⁷⁴ These three decisions go much further, it is suggested, than simply affirming that photographs can carry information for the purposes of the law of confidence.¹⁷⁵ A photograph is merely a record and as such may be treated as any other means of recording information. However, in these instances, the ‘information’ had not been captured and contained in any particular form until the defendant brought that about. It would seem to follow that had the gymnasium owner in the HRH Princess of Wales case merely observed Princess Diana’s appearance in the gymnasium without recording it, he would have been in 170 Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Limited, 8 November 1993.

171 [1988] Ch 449.

172 Ibid., pp 4–5.

173 [1994] EMLR 134.

174 [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 807.

175 As earlier indicated by Pollard v Photographic Company (1888) Ch 345.

possession of ‘information’, and an interim injunction to restrain publication of the observations would have been available. Thus it appears, it is submitted, that a record of any matter of substance not already in the public domain may amount to confidential information for the purposes of the doctrine of confidence.

But it can be concluded that since most of the case law concerns commercial information,¹⁷⁶ the courts have not yet evolved any workable tests to decide what kinds of personal information should be protected, save for the requirement that the information must not be ‘in the public domain’—a negative requirement considered below—and that it must not be mere trivial tittle-tattle. It appears from *Stephens v Avenp*¹⁷⁷ and *Michael Barrymore*¹⁷⁸ that information relating to an individual’s sexual life may merit protection,¹⁷⁹ a decision clearly in harmony with the approach of Strasbourg¹⁸⁰ and the DPA 1998.¹⁸¹ The US ‘private facts’ tort requires that ‘the matter made public must be one which would be offensive and objectionable to a reasonable man of ordinary sensibilities’.¹⁸² However, if, as has been argued, protection for informational autonomy provides the theoretical undeipinning of the action to protect privacy, objective notions of offensiveness should not be the essential issue, since it is a person’s ability to apply their own standards of openness which should—within limits—be protected.¹⁸³

A further potential problem concerns the possibly inadequate scope of the confidence action in this area. Confidence requires unauthorised use of personal ‘information’,¹⁸⁴ like many privacy torts which take as the root of the complaint the publication of ‘private facts’.¹⁸⁵ On its face, therefore, it would not appear to encompass situations where there has clearly been some invasion of privacy, assessed intuitively, but where it is difficult to conceptualise what has occurred as concerning ‘information’. An example would be a broadcast showing mourners at a funeral in acute emotional anguish.¹⁸⁶ The root of the complaint in such situations, it is suggested, is not that the ‘fact’ that a person is weeping, or that details of their 176 In such cases, the issue of whether the information is ‘confidential’ may be readily resolved by reference to its potential or actual commercial value.

177 [1988] Ch 449.

178 [1997] FSR 600.

179 The decision in HRH Princess of Wales Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Limited, 8 November 1993 (which concerned photographs taken of the Princess exercising while wearing a leotard) gives some weak prima facie evidence that information regarding physical appearance may attract protection in some circumstances.

180 See Lustig-Prean v UK (1999) 29 EHRR 548; discussed in Chapter 16, pp 1056–57.

181 As indicated below, p 604, such information is classified as ‘sensitive personal data’ along with matters such as a person’s religious and political opinions, and his physical and mental health (s 2). The processing of ‘sensitive personal data’ attracts a higher level of safeguards than normal data under Data Protection Principle 1(b) (Sched 1) as elucidated by Sched 3.

182 Prosser, D, ‘Privacy’ (1960) 48 Calif L Rev 383, p 396. The tort grew out of the Warren and Brandeis article (op cit, fn 8). The Restatement (Second) of the Law of Torts, 625D defines the tort as follows: ‘One who gives publicity to a matter concerning the private life of another is subject to liability to the other for invasion of his privacy, if the matter publicised is of a kind that (a) would be highly offensive to a reasonable person and (b) is not of legitimate concern to the public.’

183 See above, pp 530–32.

184 See the definition in Coco [1969] RPC 41, fn 157 and associated text).

185 Privacy torts in the United States and New Zealand require the disclosure of identifiable private facts. A number of Canadian cases have also stressed this requirement, although it is not required by the strict words of the relevant section of the Canadian Charter: see Paton-Simpson, E, ‘Private circles and public squares: invasion of privacy by the publication of “private facts”’ (1998) 61 MLR 318.

186 Ibid, p 337.

appearance in mourning have been disclosed, but rather of mass intrusion through unwanted attention into a highly personal situation.¹⁸⁷ Moreover, a requirement of identifiable 'information' may find it difficult to accommodate the importance of anonymity and context. For example, some people may be happy to appear on a public beach nude or topless when surrounded by others doing likewise, because in this situation their nudity becomes unremarkable and therefore un-remarked upon. If, however, a photograph is taken and given mass publicity through the pages of a newspaper, feelings of intrusion and violation justifiably arise.¹⁸⁸ The difficulty is that it might seem problematic to define such situations as involving protected information: the mere 'fact' that a person is weeping at a funeral seems too innocuous to count as 'personal information', while the normally private nature of the appearance of someone's unclothed body might appear to be lost by the voluntary public exposure of it on a beach.

Such an approach would be, we suggest, simplistic. Wacks has made the important point that 'any definition of 'personal information' must...refer both to the quality of the information and to the reasonable expectation of the individual concerning its use'.¹⁸⁹ In other words, one cannot assess whether information is 'personal' or not, without looking at the use which the defendant has made or proposes to make of it. Can confidence accommodate such delicate assessments? It should be recalled that the doctrine protects against unauthorised use of information and so is capable of singling out particular actions of defendants as giving rise to liability. Moreover, there is no reason why the 'reasonable man' test it now employs to decide whether an obligation of confidentiality should be imposed could not be pressed into service to determine what is to count as protected information in the first place. A reasonable man might be expected to understand that the activities of mourners at a funeral, or nude sunbathers on a beach, can be seen as personal in so far as such people reasonably expected that their behaviour would not be subject to unwanted mass attention. Thus, contrary to the doubts expressed on this point,¹⁹⁰ it is suggested that a duty of confidentiality could attach in respect of particular uses of information, such as mass publicity.

Such an approach would also resolve a further objection to the use of confidence in privacy cases, namely the fear that precisely because the action—unlike the American privacy torts¹⁹¹—does not require wide publicity, but only 'unauthorised use' of information, it could in principle catch mere gossip between friends and neighbours. It has been argued that the intervention of the blunt tool of the law into the delicate area of social life and friendship which this would entail would both create intolerable legal uncertainty and also wrongly introduce the possibility 187 For the argument that such matters should be included within the definition of privacy, see Gavison, R, 'Privacy and the limits of law' (1980) 89(3) Yale LJ 421; Paton-Simpson, ibid., pp 337–38; Reinman, J, 'Driving to the Panopticon: a philosophical exploration of the risks to privacy posed by the highway technology of the future' (1995) 11 Computer & High Tech LJ 27, p 30. For a contrary view, see Parent, pp 306–07.

188 This example is used because of the propensity of tabloid photographers to take photographs of celebrities in such situations.

189 Wacks, Personal Information: Privacy and the Law, 1980, p 24.

190 Wacks, op cit, fn 1, p 56.

191 This applies to the US 'false light' and 'private facts' torts. See Wacks, ibid., pp 56–59, for an extended comparison of confidence with the American torts.

of legal sanctions into an area which depends upon the unenforceable trust of one who confides for its moral integrity.¹⁹² The solution to this problem would be, we suggest, to adapt the rule from defamation for cases of personal, as opposed to commercial information and, as suggested by Warren and Brandeis,¹⁹³ to develop a rule that no cause of action would lie in respect of oral publication by private individuals in the absence of actual financial loss to the plaintiff.¹⁹⁴ Such a limitation is justifiable in principle, on the approach just indicated: our reasonable expectations as to the uses made of personal information probably encompass the possibility of a certain amount of social gossip, as part of the price of living within a relatively free society. On a more pragmatic level, such a limitation would be necessary in the interests of legal certainty. As Zimmerman points out: ‘...most courts limit the private facts tort’s scope by requiring mass or widespread communication as an element of the cause of action. American judges either tacitly or expressly recognise that they would create an impossible legal tangle if they subjected back-fence and front-parlour gossip to liability.’¹⁹⁵

(2) The obligation of confidentiality

Since Stephens v Avery,¹⁹⁶ the basic principle on which the doctrine of confidence has been based appears to be that confidentiality will be enforced if the information was received ‘on the basis that it is confidential’.¹⁹⁷ This will depend on all the circumstances of the case, and the imposition of confidence is not limited (as had previously been thought) to instances in which there was a pre-existing relationship between the parties: ‘The basis of equitable intervention to protect confidentiality is that it is unconscionable for a person who has received information on the basis that it is confidential, subsequently to reveal that information... The relationship between the parties is not the determining factor.’¹⁹⁸ It is suggested that this explanation of the basis of the doctrine weakens the requirement to identify the public interest, such as the interest in preserving the stability of the family,¹⁹⁹ which would be served by protecting the information in question.

The fact that the information is given in confidence may be expressly communicated to the defendant (as in Stephens v Avery), but can be implied from the circumstances surrounding the communication. In *Fairnie (Dec’d) and Others v Reed and Another*²⁰⁰ the confidential information (the format of a board game which the plaintiff wished to market) was mentioned by him incidentally during 192 Wilson, op cit, fn 1, p 56.

193 Op cit, fn 8, p 217.

194 Eg, where a friend or acquaintance disclosed the secret of a person’s homosexuality to an employer where it was foreseen that this would probably damage the plaintiff’s career. Publication by radio or television would not be counted as ‘oral’, for obvious reasons.

195 Zimmerman, D, ‘Requiem for a heavyweight: a farewell to Warren and Brandeis’s privacy tort’ (1983) 68 Cornell L Rev 291, p 337; at note 246 she cites the decision in La fontaine v Family Drug Stores, Inc, 33 Conn Supp 66, p 73; 360 A 2d 899, p 902 (Conn CP 1976) where the court commented that the abandonment of the mass publicity requirement ‘would expand the concept of invasion of privacy beyond manageable limits’.

196 [1988] Ch 449.

197 Ibid, p 482.

198 Ibid.

199 As in Duchess of Argyll v Duke of Argyll [1967] 1 Ch 302.

200 20 May 1994, CA, transcript from LEXIS.

conversation with a virtual stranger about another matter; it was therefore transmitted only in passing, and the recipient was not told that it was given in confidence. The Court of Appeal found that there was an arguable case that the information had been transmitted in confidence, relying primarily on the fact that the information was of clear commercial value.²⁰¹

It appears that an obligation of confidence may be imposed even where the information was not intentionally communicated to the defendant by the plaintiff. In *AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2)*²⁰² Lord Goff suggested obiter that the nature of the information and the fact that it was not intended that the defendant should acquire it²⁰³ could in itself impose the duty, using the example of ‘...an obviously confidential document...dropped in a public place and then picked up by a passer-by...’. He said, p 281: ‘I start with the broad principle (which I do not in any way intend to be definitive) that a duty of confidence arises when confidential information comes to the knowledge of a person (the confidant) in circumstances where he has notice, or is held to have agreed, that the information is confidential, with the effect that it would be just in all the circumstances that he should be precluded from disclosing the information to others...in the vast majority of cases...the duty of confidence will arise from a transaction or relationship between the parties...but it is well settled that a duty of confidence may arise in equity independently of such cases...’ Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers,²⁰⁴ in which the information was obtained by means of a telephone tap, suggests that a duty of confidence may arise on the basis of such factors,²⁰⁵ as does Shelley Films Limited v Rex Features Limited.²⁰⁶

These findings further confirm that the duty can still be imposed (or perhaps imposed a fortiori) where the defendant sets out deliberately to acquire the information without the plaintiff’s knowledge, as opposed to stumbling across it

201 ‘[Plaintiff’s counsel] submits that in the context [the plaintiff] disclosed to [the defendant] a confidential idea which he believed could be commercially successful, particularly with his endorsement. In my judgment, that is an arguable inference... It all depends precisely on the language used, and the circumstances in which the conversation took place...[defendant’s counsel] points out that...if the plaintiff simply blurted out or casually referred to the number one game...then the defendant could not be taken as understanding that he was being given that information in confidence. That may be so, but in my judgment it is not possible to say...precisely what inference should be drawn by the reasonable man who was the bystander and observer of the conversation’, per Stuart Smith LJ, pp 7–8. The hearing was an appeal upon an application to strike out, so the court did not have to decide whether an obligation of confidence was in fact imposed.

202 [1990] 1 AC 109, p 281.

203 Fairmie, 20 May 1994, CA, transcript from LEXIS, suggests that it will not always be essential to show that this element is present.

204 [1984] 1 WLR 892.

205 Cf the obiter remarks in Malone v Comr of Police of the Metropolis (No 2) [1979] Ch 344, p 376, to the effect that those who spoke of confidential matters in situations in which it was foreseeable that they could be overheard (eg, on the telephone) could not claim that any eavesdroppers were bound by a duty of confidentiality. However, in Malone v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 14, the European Court of Human Rights reaffirmed (p 38) the place of telephone conversations within Art 8 and therefore must be taken to have rejected the notion that citizens assume a lack of confidentiality in communication by telephone.

206 [1994] EMLR 134, per Mr Mann QC (sitting as a deputy judge): ‘...[the photographer] was not an invitee and assuming that he saw the signs [forbidding photography]...(I am not convinced that it would be fatal to Shelley’s case if he did not)...it is impossible...not to conclude that what he saw and understood from his location might not have fully and sufficiently fixed him with knowledge [that the plaintiff wished to keep the appearance of ‘the Creature’ and its costume secret] according to any of the relevant standards...’ The Australian case of Franklin v Giddins [1978] 1 QdR 72 was relied upon as persuasive authority.

inadvertently.²⁰⁷ Presumably, this would also be the case where the defendant acquired the information with the awareness, but without the consent of the plaintiff and where, as in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire,²⁰⁸ the defendant was acting under a legal power in acquiring the information for one specific purpose but wished to use it for another.²⁰⁹ The decisions in Rex Features, HRH Princess of Wales and Hellewell also indicate that there need be nothing recognisable as a 'communication' from the plaintiff to any other person for the duty to arise,²¹⁰ although presumably the information concerned must in some sense emanate from the plaintiff. Thus, the obligation of confidence can now be imposed unilaterally; it is not founded on the express or implied agreement of the parties that the communication would be confidential.²¹¹ In *Maudsley v Palumbo and Others*²¹² Knox J said (obiter) that while the absence of actual belief on the part of the defendants that they were being given confidential information was 'quite capable of being significant', he '[did] not accept that... a person who forms no belief on the question is thereby absolved from being found to have received information in confidence'.

It used to be thought that confidence was of limited value in protecting privacy, since it only covered those specific instances in which information was communicated in confidence. Thus, for example, it was not thought to cover situations where reporters took unauthorised photographs by means of telephoto lenses or surreptitiously recorded conversations with a view to publication. However, the developments described above significantly widen the circumstances in which the duty of confidence will be imposed, with the result, it is suggested, that many of the activities of reporters engaged in uncovering private facts may now be caught by the law of confidence. As Laws J remarked obiter in Hellewell:

If someone with a telephoto lens were to take... a photograph of another engaged in some private act, his subsequent disclosure of the photograph would in my judgment... amount to a breach of confidence... In such a case the law would protect what might reasonably be called a right of privacy, although the name accorded to the cause of action would be breach of confidence.²¹³

Care must be taken in extrapolating general principles from some of the decisions discussed here, since a number of them concerned interim injunctions only²¹⁴ and therefore it was only necessary for the plaintiff to make out an arguable case. Others concerned appeals from applications to strike out²¹⁵ in which, as Stuart Smith LJ 207 For the contrary view that a duty will only be imposed where there is unlawful action by the taker of information, see Wei, G, 'Surreptitious takings of confidential information' (1992) LS 302. For critical discussion of Wei's view, see the articles cited by him, p 309.

208 The case concerned the taking of photographs under Code of Practice D (para 4) made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 of a suspect in police custody. The police wished to allow a 'shop watch' scheme to use the photographs. An injunction was refused on the basis that the public interest was clearly served by the disclosure in question.

209 See also Marcell and Others v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1992] Ch 224, esp pp 236–37.

210 See Thompson, Confidentiality and the Law, 1990, p 73.

211 An approach indicated earlier in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41, p 48.

212 (1995) The Times, 19 December, transcript from LEXIS; the case concerned an application for an injunction to restrain the defendants from making use of an idea for a dance club disclosed to them by the plaintiff.

213 [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 807.

214 Rex Features; HRH Princess of Wales, fn 166; Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd.

emphasised in Fairnie, the plaintiff must succeed unless his case is ‘unarguable’.²¹⁶ Nevertheless, it is suggested that in the pre-HRA era, the courts were inclining towards a position regarding imposition of the duty to maintain confidence which may be indicated as follows. It is not necessary to establish a pre-existing relationship, an express imposition of the duty, an agreement between the parties or anything resembling a communication of the information by the plaintiff to the defendant or anyone else.²¹⁷ This ingredient can now be established in a number of ways. Since Stephens v Avery,²¹⁸ it appears that the existence of a formal relationship is ‘not [now] the determining factor’.²¹⁹ Instead, confidentiality will be enforced simply on the basis that the information was received ‘on the basis that it is confidential’,²²⁰ since to allow such a recipient to reveal the information would be ‘unconscionable’, an approach confirmed in a number of cases, including Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers,²²¹ Shelley Films,²²² Creation Records,²²³ and Hellewell,²²⁴ where no prior relationship was present.

Where there was no formal relationship, the alternative ingredient traditionally required for a duty of confidence to arise was an express or implied agreement between the parties, or promise by the defendant, that the information received would be treated as confidential.²²⁵ The notion of ‘implied agreement’ denoted an agreement which, although unspoken, was in fact mutually assumed between the parties. Owing to this requirement, it was thought that the action caught only those specific instances in which information was (voluntarily) communicated in confidence. Thus, it was not thought to cover the paradigm example of an invasion of privacy where reporters surreptitiously took photographs by means of telephoto lenses or recorded private conversation, with a view to publication, because in such cases there is no possibility of agreement between the parties or a promise (express or implied) of confidentiality: it would be absurd to say that the defendant journalist had ‘agree[d] to treat the information as confidential’²²⁶ when his whole purpose was to publish it, while the plaintiff ‘confider’ was blissfully unaware that any communication of information was taking place at all. However, as a result of

215 Fairnie, 20 May 1994, CA, transcript from LEXIS, above; Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449.

216 Ibid., p 1.

217 Following AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL, the defendant need not be the person to whom the information was originally ‘communicated’.

218 [1988] Ch 449: the plaintiff brought an action against a friend to whom she had confided that she had had a lesbian affair; the friend sold the story to a newspaper.

219 [1988] Ch 449, p 482, per Browne-Wilkinson VC.

220 Ibid.

221 [1984] 1 WLR 892. The information concerned (that the plaintiff, a well known jockey, had breached various rules of racing) was obtained by means of tapping the plaintiff’s telephone; the tapes so made were sold to the press.

222 Shelley Films v Rex Features Limited [1994] EMLR 134. An injunction was granted to prevent the use of a photograph taken surreptitiously on the film set of Frankenstein.

223 Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444; an injunction was granted against a newspaper to prevent it from publishing a photograph of a new album cover designed for the group Oasis which had been taken surreptitiously on the set where the album cover was being shot.

224 Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire ([1995] 1 WLR 804). The ‘information’ here was a ‘mug’-shot of the plaintiff taken by the police which was later passed by them to local shopkeepers to aid the prevention of shoplifting.

225 See the Law Commission report, op cit, fn 2, para 6.11: for an obligation to be imposed, ‘any confidant must agree to treat the information as confidential’.

226 The requirement which the Law Commission thought necessary (op cit, fn 2).

the successful actions in Shelley Films,²²⁷ *Creation Records*²²⁸ and *HRH Princess of Wales*²²⁹ (all involving surreptitiously taken photographs), Francome,²³⁰ (where information was obtained by a newspaper using a telephone tap) and *Lam v Koo and Chiu*²³¹ (involving the surreptitious obtaining of a document), any requirement for a communication between plaintiff and defendant seems to have disappeared, a development also supported by dicta of Lord Goff in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2).²³² This has been possible because the requirement of an ‘implied agreement’ of confidentiality has been radically re-interpreted: the new approach of the courts is to imply the agreement of confidentiality into the dealings between the parties, not on the basis of any mutual agreement on the matter, but instead on the basis that the reasonable man in the position of the defendant would have assumed such an obligation.²³³

The test appears to be wholly objective.²³⁴ What factors would lead a reasonable person to realise that the information is confidential? The authorities suggest that they would include the following: where it has clear commercial value, as in Fairnie and Rex Features, and where it is obvious that the plaintiff did not wish the information to be obtained (as in HRH Princess of Wales and Rex Features). Conversely, where the plaintiff deliberately refrains from mentioning confidentiality to the defendant, this may prevent the imposition of the duty, as in Palumbo.

This bold development, a clear departure from the view of the Law Commission on the matter,²³⁵ has radically increased the potential scope of the confidence action: it may now cover cases where personal information is surreptitiously obtained by the media and then published without consent,²³⁶ since in many such instances, it would be open to the court to say that the reasonable man would have assumed an obligation of confidence. This possibility has—as indicated above—recently received 227 [1994] EMLR 134. The case was discussed extensively in the Spencer decision (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105.

228 Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444.

229 HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Newspapers Limited and Others (1993) Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Ltd, 8 November 1993. Photographs of the plaintiff exercising in a private gymnasium taken by a hidden camera were sold to and published by a tabloid newspaper.

230 [1984] 1 WLR 892.

231 [1992] Civil Transcript No 116, CA (a Hong Kong case): a medical researcher accidentally or surreptitiously obtained a confidential research document produced by the plaintiff.

232 AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL. Lord Goff considered obiter that confidentiality would be imposed in instances where, eg, ‘...an obviously confidential document is wafted by an electric fan out of the window into a crowded street, or when an obviously confidential document...is dropped in a public place and is then picked up by a passer-by...’ (ibid., p 281).

233 Thus, in Creation Records ([1997] EMLR 444), Lloyd J reasoned: ‘...the circumstances were such that any reasonable man in the shoes of [the photographer] would have realised on reasonable grounds that he was obtaining the information, that is to say the view of the scene, in confidence...’.

234 In Li Yau-wai v Genesis Films Limited [1987] HKLR 711, a Hong Kong decision, an ‘officious bystander’ test was used to impose the duty of confidence (per Rhind J, p 719). An objective test was also employed in Lam v Koo and Chiu (1992) Civil Transcript No 116, see esp p 30 (Hong Kong Court of Appeal). See Wacks, Privacy and Press Freedom, op cit, fn 1, pp 62–63; Loh, E, ‘Intellectual property: breach of confidence?’ (1995) 17 EIPR 405–07.

235 It would in our view, extend the idea of breach of confidence too far to cover situations where the potential defendant has not expressly or by inference accepted an obligation of confidence in respect of information which has come into his possession’ (op cit, fn 2, para 6.11).

236 Provided that the information ‘has the necessary quality of confidence about it’ (Coco [1969] RPC 41). See discussion below.

further clear recognition from the European Commission in *Spencer*²³⁷ and in the now well known Hellewell case,²³⁸ per Laws J: 'If someone with a telephoto lens were to take... a photograph of another engaged in some private act, his subsequent disclosure... of the photograph would in my judgment... amount to a breach of confidence'.

When used in this way, the central interest served by protecting confidences ceases to be enforcing promise keeping, or preserving certain kinds of relationships; rather, it becomes simply that of preventing private or personal information entering the public domain without the plaintiff's consent. The action, therefore, while still termed 'breach of confidence',²³⁹ becomes almost indistinguishable from a 'pure' privacy tort.²⁴⁰ The Law Commission on breach of confidence explained the difference between confidentiality and privacy by saying that the former 'arises from the nature of the information itself: it would be based on the principle that certain kinds of information are categorised as private and for that reason alone ought not to be disclosed'.²⁴¹ The 'new' model of confidence outlined above allows a duty of confidentiality to be imposed solely on the basis of matters relating to the information: as noted above, it must be of substance and not already in the public domain; it must be such that the reasonable person standing in the defendant's shoes would have realised that it should be kept confidential. When the doctrine is dealing with personal information, this realisation can come purely from the nature of the information itself, coupled sometimes with the manner in which it was acquired: the fact that the defendant has had to intrude on the plaintiff in some way in order to gather the information is evidence to the defendant that the plaintiff regards what he is doing as private.²⁴²

One final aspect of the utility of confidence in this area should be mentioned: in many cases, newspapers obtain private information about the plaintiff from his or her friends and acquaintances, as in *Stephens v Avery*²⁴³ and Michael Barrymore v News Group Newspapers Ltd.²⁴⁴ In such a case, an obligation of confidence can be imposed upon the newspaper on the orthodox basis that they knew or ought to 237 (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105. There is some recognition amongst the commentators as well; see, eg, Singh, Grosz and Braithwaite, Wright (all op cit, fn 1).

238 [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 807.

239 As Laws J remarked in Hellewell: 'In such a case the law would protect what might reasonably be called a right of privacy, although the name accorded to the cause of action would be breach of confidence' (ibid).

240 Confidence does, however have one limitation in such a guise: it cannot directly cover cases where there is intrusion but no information is gained or where information is gathered but never used (the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 might apply in cases of persistent intrusion). However, a reporter could be prevented by the terms of an injunction from passing any information gained on to anyone else in a newspaper, and presumably from processing and storing the information in the newspaper's archives (activities which might also engage the Data Protection Act 1998 (see below, pp 603–11). Moreover, the availability of a remedy in confidence against the publication of private information obtained by, eg, a bugging device, might give rise to a perception that such use was pointless if lawful publication of the material gained was not possible; it might thus come to have a 'chilling effect' upon this form of intrusion.

241 Law Commission Report No 110, op cit, fn 2, para 2.3 (emphasis added).

242 In AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, Lord Goff stated that the courts should take account of 'all the circumstances, including the manner in which the information was acquired' (at P 283).

243 [1988] Ch 449.

244 [1997] FSR 600. A man with whom Mr Barrymore had allegedly had a homosexual affair passed the details to The Sun newspaper.

have known that they had received the fruits of a broken confidence;²⁴⁵ alternatively, under the ‘new’ model of the doctrine, the obligation could be imposed upon the newspapers directly, on the basis that the reasonable man would have realised that the information received should be kept confidential, due its clearly private character.²⁴⁶

(3) Detriment arising from unauthorised use of the information

The third element identified as essential in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd appears to require two ingredients—unauthorised use of the information and detriment arising from such use. This point was addressed by the House of Lords in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2), but the Law Lords were divided as to the need to show detriment where a private individual was claiming a breach of confidence. Lord Griffiths considered that detriment had to be shown even in such a case;²⁴⁷ Lords Brightman and Jauncey were silent as to the issue, while Lord Goff considered that the question should be left open.²⁴⁸ Lord Keith, however, was of the view that in this respect a private individual should not be treated in the same way as a State body:

The right to personal privacy is clearly one which the law should in this field seek to protect... I would think it is sufficient detriment to the confider that information given in confidence is to be disclosed to persons who he would prefer not to know of it even though the disclosure would not be harmful to him in any positive way.²⁴⁹

Obiter dicta in Shelley Films Limited v Rex Features Limited appear to favour the position taken by Lord Goff,²⁵⁰ while Lord Keith’s view receives some support from the finding in *HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Limited and Others*²⁵¹ which suggests that in relation to private individuals, the courts may be prepared to assume the presence of detriment. The point remains unclear.

The public interest defence

Perhaps the most important concern relating to the development of confidence as remedy for invasion of privacy is the fear that the action will pose an unacceptable risk to media freedom. The main insurance against this possibility rests with the public interest defence, whereby disclosure of admittedly private or confidential

245 See AG v Guardian Newspapers [1987] 1 WLR 1248, esp p 1265, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson, and the Law Commission report: ‘The third party is liable to be restrained from disclosing or using information which he knows or it would seem, he ought to know, was subject to an obligation of confidence’ (op cit, fn 2, para 4.11).

246 The successful use of either route would refute the view of the Law Commission (ibid, para 5.9) that cases such as Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 QB 349 mean that the doctrine can give no remedy to the ‘owner’ of personal information where the promise of confidentiality is given to another, as where a newspaper promises a journalist that information he obtains on a celebrity will not be published in her lifetime, and then breaches that promise, leaving, so the Commission thought, the celebrity with no remedy. See also the doubts of Wacks on this point (Privacy and Press Freedom, 1996, p 56).

247 [1990] 1 AC 109, pp 269–70.

248 Ibid, pp 281–82.

249 Ibid, pp 255–63.

250 10 December 1993, transcript from LEXIS, p 16.

251 Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Limited, 8 November 1993.

information is permitted if this would serve the public interest.²⁵² None of the cases in which it has been discussed at length have concerned the paradigmatic privacy claim, and Art 10 of the Convention had little influence upon it prior to the inception of the HRA.²⁵³

Traditionally, confidential information will not be protected if the public interest served by disclosing the information in question outweighs the interest in preserving confidentiality. This aspect of the doctrine is often termed the ‘public interest’ defence. In Woodward v Hutchins,²⁵⁴ intimate facts about Tom Jones and another pop star were revealed to the Daily Mirror by a former agent who had been their confidante. The plaintiffs sought an injunction on the ground of breach of confidence. There had been a confidential relationship and they claimed that the agent should not be able to take unfair advantage of that confidentiality. The Court of Appeal failed to uphold the claim on the basis that the plaintiffs had sought to publicise themselves in order to present a certain ‘image’ and therefore could not complain if the truth were later revealed. This decision has been criticised on the basis that a need to reveal the truth about the plaintiffs was irrelevant to the breach of confidence on the part of the agent,²⁵⁵ but it has not been overruled. The public interest in knowing the truth about the plaintiffs seemed to rest on a refusal to use the law to protect their attempt to mislead the public.

It is sometimes said that there is no confidence in iniquity: the plaintiff cannot use the law of confidence to cover up his or her own wrong-doing and therefore the public interest in disclosure will prevail. However, it appears that the ‘public interest defence’ was not limited to cases of iniquity. The House of Lords found obiter in *British Steel Corporation v Granada Television*²⁵⁶ that publication of confidential information could legitimately be undertaken only where there was misconduct,²⁵⁷ but in *Lion Laboratories v Evans*²⁵⁸ Stephenson LJ said that he would reject the ‘no iniquity, no public interest rule’ agreeing with Lord Denning’s statement in *Fraser v Evans*²⁵⁹ to the effect that ‘some things are required to be disclosed in the public interest in which case no confidence can be prayed in aid to keep them secret and [iniquity] is merely an instance of just cause and excuse for breaking confidence’. These rulings concerned confidential information held by private companies and 252 While originally only allowing disclosure if it would reveal wrongdoing on the part of the plaintiff (Gartside v Outram (1856) 26 LJ Ch 113, p 114 and in relation to copyright, Glyn v Weston Feature Film Co [1916] 1 Ch 261) the strength of the public interest in question rather than the individual wrongdoing of the plaintiff is now the determining factor: see Fraser v Evans, ([1969] 1 QB 349), Schering Chemicals v Falkman [1981] 2 WLR 848, esp p 869, X v Y ([1988] 2 All ER 648) and AG v Jonathan Cape [1976] 1 QB 752; Lion Laboratories v Evans and Express Newspapers [1984] 1 QB 530, W v Egdell ([1990] Ch 359) and Hellewell [1995] 1 WLR 804; AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 282, per Lord Goff, and p 268, per Lord Griffiths. Note that where disclosure has been said to be in the public interest because it exposes particular criminal or anti-social behaviour or reveals some specific risk to public health, it has been held this will not always justify disclosing the matter in the press: see Francome ([1984] 1 WLR 892); Initial Services Ltd v Putterill [1968] 1 QB 396, pp 405–06, per Lord Denning; AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 269, per Lord Griffiths; ibid, p 282, per Lord Goff; ibid, p 177, per Sir John Donaldson in the Court of Appeal.

253 Remarkably, Jacob J’s quite recent pre-HRA judgment in Michael Barrymore [1997] FSR 600—a case relating to the unauthorised disclosure of personal information and thus clearly raising both privacy and speech issues—does not once advert to the Convention.

254 [1977] 1 WLR 760, CA.

255 Wacks, R, The Protection of Privacy, 1980, p 85.

256 [1981] AC 1096; [1981] 1 All ER 417, HL.

257 See Cripps (1984) 4 OJLS 184 on the public interest defence.

258 [1985] QB 526, p 537.

259 [1969] 1QB 349, p 362.

seemed to leave open the possibility of the existence of a broad public interest defence which, it seemed from Woodward, might also sometimes apply in the case of public figures.

Where personal information relating to a private individual was in issue, the ruling in *X v Y*²⁶⁰ suggested that the public interest defence was confined to cases of iniquity. On the other hand, Lion Laboratories v Evans and Express Newspapers,²⁶¹ *W v Egdell*²⁶² and Hellewell suggested that the defence had broadened its focus of concern with the result that the strength of the public interest in question rather than the individual wrongdoing of the plaintiff might tend to be the determining factor. In W v Egdell, no such wrongdoing was relied upon in finding that the medical report relating to the plaintiff's condition should be placed before the appropriate authorities where it was in the public interest to do so. It should be noted that this decision placed some limitations on the ability of the public interest defence to afford protection to press freedom: it might sometimes be appropriate to pass information to a particular body rather than disclosing it to the public at large. On the other hand, where the public itself had previously been misled by the plaintiff, it appeared that wide disclosure might be warranted.

The above discussion should not be taken as assuming that the public interest always required disclosure of information and would therefore invariably be in competition with the interest of the plaintiff in suppressing it. Clearly, there was a general public interest in allowing the transmission of information from one person to another without interference, and in certain circumstances such as those which arose in *X v Y*²⁶³ there might be a further specific public interest in maintaining confidentiality. A newspaper wished to publish information deriving from confidential hospital records which showed that certain practising doctors were suffering from the AIDS virus. In granting an injunction preventing publication, Rose J took into account the public interest in disclosure, but weighed it against the private interest in confidentiality and the public interest in encouraging AIDS patients to seek help from hospitals, which would not be served if it was thought that confidentiality might not be maintained.

Where public bodies are in possession of personal information, their obligations in relation to disclosure may differ from those applicable in private law. In Chief Constable of the North Wales Police ex p Thorpe,²⁶⁴ the police had confidential information to the effect that the occupants of a caravan on a particular site were paedophiles, with a number of convictions for sexual offences. They sought judicial review of the decision of the police to disclose their convictions to the owner of the caravan site. It was found by the Court of Appeal that the duty of the police in such a circumstance differs from that under private law. The police as a public authority were not free to publish the information despite the fact that it could be viewed as being in the public domain, but that the information could be used if that was what was required to protect the public, as in the instant case. Both Art 8 and English

260 [1988] 2 All ER 648.

261 [1985] QB 526; [1984] 2 All ER 417, CA.

262 [1990] Ch 359; see also X v Y [1988] 2 All ER 658 and dicta of Lord Goff in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2), p 659.

263 [1988] 2 All ER 648.

264 [1999] QB 396.

administrative law would accept that the police were entitled to use the information in such an instance.

The approach of domestic courts in the pre-HRA era was becoming very similar to that of the House of Lords in the important decision on defamation in Reynolds v Times Newspapers,²⁶⁵ which concerned the proper balance to be struck between the individual right to reputation on the one hand and the freedom of the press on the other. The issue for determination was whether qualified privilege²⁶⁶ should attach to good-faith political speech in the media. Their Lordships, while recognising for the first time that it could, showed a marked preference for the retention of a very broad and flexible test which asked simply whether, in all the circumstances, the public interest required publication of the material in question.²⁶⁷ While Lord Nicholls showed some recognition of the possible 'chilling effect' which could arise if the imprecision of the test left the media uncertain as to the boundaries of permissible speech, he thought some uncertainty unavoidable and regarded its likely extent as relatively small in any case.²⁶⁸ It thus seemed plausible to assume that a similar approach was likely to prevail in relation to the breach of confidence action,²⁶⁹ as recommended by the Law Commission.²⁷⁰

It may be concluded that there were two key developments in the defence in the pre-HRA era. First, while originally only allowing disclosure if it would reveal wrongdoing on the part of the plaintiff,²⁷¹ the strength of the public interest in question rather than the individual wrongdoing of the plaintiff is now the determining factor.²⁷² Secondly, where disclosure has been said to be in the public interest because it exposes particular criminal or anti-social behaviour or reveals some specific risk to public health, it is now clear that this will not always justify disclosing the matter in the press.²⁷³

The public interest defence provided a means of reconciling the demands of speech and privacy. Under the impetus of the HRA, this balancing exercise is becoming, as indicated below, more sophisticated since it will largely be undertaken under s 12 of the HRA, and will therefore draw in Arts 10 and 8, with their associated jurisprudence and the PCC Privacy Code. The Strasbourg principles of necessity and proportionality will determine the balance between the conflicting demands

265 [1999] 3 WLR 1010; [1999] 4 All ER 609.

266 If the defendant can establish the privilege, then even though he cannot prove the truth of the defamatory allegations, the plaintiff can succeed only if he can show that the defendant had known the allegations to be false or was indifferent to their veracity.

267 This approach was thought to be in harmony with Strasbourg jurisprudence on Art 10: see fn 60 above, p 610 (the head note) and p 625 (per Lord Nicholls), an issue discussed below.

268 Ibid, pp 623–24.

269 The defence will always involve somewhat different considerations: in privacy cases, matters concerning the defendant's attempts to verify the allegations and give a balanced account will be inapplicable.

270 The Commission considered that the courts should retain a 'broad power' to decide whether 'in the particular case' the public interest required disclosure (op cit, fn 2, para 6.77).

271 Gartside v Outram (1856) 26 LJ Ch 113, p 114 and in relation to copyright, Glyn v Weston Feature Film Co [1916] 1 Ch 261.

272 See Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 QB 349; Schering Chemicals v Falkman [1981] 2 WLR 848, esp p 869; X v Y [1988] 2 All ER 648 and AG v Jonathan Cape [1976] 1 QB 752; Lion Laboratories v Evans and Express Newspapers [1984] 1 QB 530, W v Egdell [1990] Ch 359; and Hellewell [1995] 1 WLR 804; AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 282, per Lord Goff, and p 268, per Lord Griffiths.

273 See Francome [1984] 1 WLR 892; Initial Services Ltd v Putterill [1968] 1 QB 396, pp 405–06, per Lord Denning; AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 269, per Lord Griffiths; ibid, p 282, per Lord Goff; ibid, p 177, per Sir John Donaldson in the Court of Appeal.

of speech and privacy, as indicated below, but it is likely that these domestic decisions will nevertheless be drawn upon since they provide some useful guidance in making determinations as to the resolution of that conflict.

The effect of Art 8 and the HRA

What, then, is the role of Art 8 in the development of confidence, given that the judges already apparently had to hand a serviceable tool with which to tackle invasions of privacy? It is suggested that it performs two, linked functions. First, it provides the normative impetus for the consolidation of the radical developments outlined above. Secondly, given the somewhat inchoate nature of the new model of confidence, Art 8, together with s 12 of the HRA, provides an organising principle around which the uncertainties inherent in the action, particularly the conflict between the demands of privacy and press freedom, may be resolved, a matter addressed below. It is suggested that Art 8, together with s 12 of the HRA, performed the first of these functions and also gave indications as to the means of resolving that conflict in the important post-HRA decision of the Court of Appeal in *Douglas and Others v Hello! Ltd.*²⁷⁴

The magazine OK! secured an agreement with two celebrities, Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta-Jones, eight days before their wedding under which it agreed to pay a very large sum of money to them in respect of rights to publish exclusive photographs of the wedding and an article about it. The couple trusted OK! to project only the images they wanted projected to the public. They also retained rights of approval in relation to anything that was to be published. Mr Douglas and Ms Zeta-Jones undertook to use their best efforts to ensure that: 'no other media (including but not limited to photographers, television crews or journalists) shall be permitted access to the wedding, and that no guests or anyone else present at it (including staff at the venues) shall be allowed to take photographs.' The rival magazine Hello! had tendered for the rights but had failed. Hello! clearly knew that exclusive rights were to be granted for coverage of the wedding, and that it had not secured them. However, the security operation at the wedding failed to prevent some unauthorised photos from being taken and Hello! obtained them. The couple were informed after the wedding that copies of Hello! were already in the UK with a photo of the wedding on the front cover and that they would be distributed very shortly. They rapidly obtained an ex parte injunction restraining publication.

The Court of Appeal had to decide whether an injunction restraining the publication should be continued in force until trial, thereby effectively 'killing' that issue of Hello!. The key issues were (a) the applicability of the law of confidence; (b) the relevance of the HRA 1998; (c) whether the injunction should be continued until the trial of the action or whether the claimants should be left to seek to obtain damages at the trial. The Court noted that the doctrine of confidence originally arose from the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction to restrain freedom of speech in circumstances in which it would be unconscionable to publish private material. It said that it was clearly established that where information was accepted on the basis that it would be kept secret, the recipient's conscience would be bound by that confidence, and it would be unconscionable for him to break his duty of confidence by publishing the information to others.²⁷⁵

274 [2001] 2 WLR 992. See for discussion Moreham, N [2001] 64(5) MLR 767-74; Elliott, M [2001] CLJ 231-33.

Sedley LJ found that the law of confidence has developed to the point at which it can provide a right to privacy, in so far as a privacy right may be viewed as covering matters which are distinct from those which confidence has come to be viewed as capable of covering. He accepted that it might have reached that point even independently of the HRA. In particular, he found that it is arguable that confidence does not cover surreptitious takings of personal information by someone whose conscience cannot be said to be bound to maintain confidence—a ‘stranger’—and that such takings are more readily covered by a right to privacy, albeit originating from confidence. His point appeared to be that although such takings could be covered by confidence, as indicated above,²⁷⁶ the notion of an implied obligation to maintain confidence might be viewed as artificial, depending on the circumstances. In this instance the photographs might have been taken by a guest (who would come under an obligation of confidence since his or her conscience would be bound, in which case it would be immaterial whether the cause of action was called confidence or privacy). A cause of action would be available.

However, if the photos in the instant case had been taken by a ‘stranger’, the cause of action in his view could arguably be termed a right to privacy, and the HRA aided that conclusion since it provided a clear impetus to develop the law on the lines indicated obiter by Laws LJ in Hellewell.²⁷⁷ Thus, the HRA gave a force to the above argument—that confidence has developed in such a way as to provide a right to privacy—which it might not otherwise have had. Sedley LJ made this clear: ‘we have reached a point at which it can be said with confidence that the law recognises and will appropriately protect a right of personal privacy.’ He based this finding in part on the coming into force of the HRA since it requires the courts of this country—as public authorities under s 6 of the HRA- to give effect to the right to respect for private and family life set out in Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights. He said that the jurisprudence of the Court and the common law ‘now run in a single channel because, by virtue of s 2 and s 6 of the Act, the courts of this country must not only take into account jurisprudence of both the Commission and the European Court of Human Rights which points to a positive institutional obligation to respect privacy; they must themselves act compatibly with that and the other Convention rights. This, for reasons I now turn to, arguably gives the final impetus to the recognition of a right of privacy in English law.’

275 Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449, p 456. The court noted that in Argyll v Argyll [1967] Ch 302, 329f-330b it was said: ‘It...seems to me that the policy of the law, so far from indicating that communication between husband and wife should be excluded from protection against breaches of confidence given by the court in accordance with Prince Albert v Strange ((1848) 2 De Gex & Sm 652; on appeal 1 Mac & G 25), strongly favours its inclusion...’. The court also relied on Michael Barry more v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] FSR 600; Jacob J had followed those principles in a case in which a newspaper sought to publish information concerning an intimate homosexual relationship.

276 See Francome v MGM [1984] 1 WLR 892 and dicta fnAG v Guardian Newspaper (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 281, discussed above.

277 In Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 1 WLR 804 Laws LJ said: ‘I entertain no doubt that disclosure of a photograph may, in some circumstances, be actionable as a breach of confidence. If someone with a telephoto lens were to take from a distance and with no authority a picture of another engaged in some private act, his subsequent disclosure of the photograph would, in my judgment, as surely amount to a breach of confidence as if he had found or stolen a letter or diary in which the act was recounted and proceeded to publish it. In such a case the law would protect what might reasonably be called a right of privacy, although the name accorded to the cause of action would be breach of confidence.’

His key point in relation to a possible difference between confidence and privacy was: 'a concept of privacy does...accord recognition to the fact that the law has to protect not only those people whose trust has been abused, but those who simply find themselves subjected to an unwanted intrusion into their personal lives. The law no longer needs to construct an artificial relationship of confidentiality between intruder and victim: it can recognise privacy itself as a legal principle drawn from the fundamental value of personal autonomy.' He pointed out that Art 8(1) of the Convention creates a right to respect for private and family life, although Art 8(2), and ss 6, 7 and 8 of the HRA, make it clear that these rights are enforceable only against public authorities. However, he noted that, as indicated above, the European Court of Human Rights has relied on the positive duty imposed on the Member States by Art 1 of the Convention,²⁷⁸ and therefore found that Art 8 does recognise the applicability of its guarantee as between private parties.

Clearly, in an action between private parties—as in the instant case—it could not be said that the defendant is bound by the Convention since it is not a public authority under s 6 of the HRA. Sedley LJ found that the court, as itself a public authority under s 6, is obliged to give some effect to Art 8, among other provisions of the Convention. Its duty appears to allow it to 'take the step from confidentiality to privacy'.²⁷⁹ Significantly, he found that in so far as there is doubt as to the scope of the duty of the court under s 6, s 12(4) makes the matter crystal clear where interference with the right to freedom of expression is in issue. Section 12(4) requires the court to have particular regard to the right to freedom of expression under Art 10. Therefore, it is clear that Art 10 is applicable as between one private party to litigation and another; in other words, it has indirect horizontal effect. However, Art 10(2) is qualified in respect of the reputation and rights of others and the protection of information received in confidence. Therefore, in having particular regard to Art 10, it is also necessary to have such regard to the other Convention rights including Art 8. Section 12(4) does not, therefore, merely give freedom of expression priority over the other rights. In weighing up the competing claims, the court also had to take the Code policed by the Press Complaints Commission into account under s 12(4)(b); it did not appear that the photographer had complied with the provision of cl 3 (which, as indicated above, provides, in part, that, 'A publication will be expected to justify intrusions into any individual's private life without consent... The use of long lens photography to take pictures of people in private places without their consent is unacceptable.'). This clause is qualified by the exceptions where a public interest can be demonstrated to apply. That was not the case in this instance, since knowing of the details of the wedding could not serve a legitimate public interest. The court concluded that the claimants had an arguable case that they had suffered a breach of their privacy; this claim was based on the law of confidence, interpreted compatibly with Art 8, due to the requirements of s 12(4). Although the court was unanimous in reaching this conclusion, Sedley LJ differed from the other two judges in differentiating between confidence and privacy in respect of surreptitious takings of information.

The court then considered whether the injunction against Hello! should be continued. Section 12(3) provides that prior restraint on expression should not be granted except where the court considers that the claimant is 'likely' to establish at trial that publication should not be allowed. Under s 3 of the HRA the court has a duty to construe all legislation, which must include the HRA itself, compatibly with the Convention rights 'so far as it is possible to do so'. Therefore, clearly, both subsections must be read in such a way as to ensure that all the rights are given full weight; s 12(3) must not accord more weight to Art 10 than to the other rights. The outcome, in any particular instance, would be determined, it found, principally by considerations of proportionality. Sedley LJ said that the court has to look ahead to the ultimate stage and to be satisfied that the scales are likely to come down in the applicant's favour. That does not conflict with the Convention, since it is merely requiring the court to apply its mind to how one right is to be balanced, on the merits against another right, without building in additional weight on one side.' Taking into account the fact that the claimants had in a sense already 'sold' their privacy, Sedley LJ found that their rights to privacy were outweighed by the right of publication and considered that they should be left to a claim for damages at the trial of the action.

278 See the judgment of the court in A v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 611.

279 He noted that this argument is supported by Hunt, in op cit, fn 52.

But the court also had to consider the effects of leaving the claimants to a damages claim. In *American Cyanamid Company v Ethicon Ltd*²⁸⁰ it was found that a judge must weigh the respective risks that injustice may result from his deciding one way or the other at the interim stage. If an injunction is refused, but the claimant does succeed in establishing his legal right at the trial which he sought to protect by means of the injunction, he might in the meantime suffer harm which could not adequately be compensated for by an award of money. On the other hand, there was the risk that if the injunction was granted, but the claimant failed at the trial, the defendant in the meantime might have suffered harm which was also irrecompensable. This weighing up is sometimes termed 'the balance of convenience'. Brooke LJ found that the balance of convenience appeared to favour leaving OK! to assert its legal rights at the trial of what he said was 'essentially a commercial dispute between two magazine enterprises'. Therefore, although the court found that the claim might succeed at trial and result in an award of compensation, it also found that the injunction should be discharged. Thus, Hello! could publish the issue which contained the wedding photographs.

The ultimate outcome of what was essentially a commercial case is of little interest in terms of future privacy claims; the case is of interest since it affords confirmation to the development of confidence, as discussed above, into a privacy remedy, a development which was accepted and relied upon in Venables, Thompson v News Group Newspapers Ltd, Associated Newspapers Ltd, MGM.²⁸¹ As indicated above, a number of newspapers made representations to the court, arguing that on grounds of press freedom, an injunction should not be granted to protect the claimants' identities. Dame Butler-Sloss P in the High Court found that the newspapers could not be said to be public authorities under s 6 of the HRA and therefore, the Convention rights were not directly applicable to them. But she said that the tort of breach of confidence is an established cause of action. She found,²⁸² taking into account the effect of the Convention on domestic law, that the law of confidence could extend to cover the injunctions sought in the instant case. She said that 'the common law continues to evolve, as it has done for centuries, and it is being given considerable impetus to do so by the implementation of the Convention into our domestic law'. Her view was that the duty of confidence could arise in equity independently of a transaction or relationship between the parties. She said that the duty of confidence placed upon the media arises when confidential information comes to their knowledge in circumstances in which the media have notice of its confidentiality. She further said that it is also recognised that it is just in all the circumstances that information known to be confidential should not be disclosed to others, in this case by publication in the press.²⁸³ The issue in question was whether the information leading to disclosure of the claimants' identity and location comes within the confidentiality brackets. In answering that crucial question, she found that she could rely upon the European case law and the duty on the court, where necessary, to take appropriate steps to safeguard the physical safety of the claimants, including the adoption of measures even in the sphere of relations of individuals and/or private organisations between themselves. She said:

280 [1975] AC 396.

281 [2001] 1 All ER 908 Fam Div (High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division); discussed above, pp 547–48.

282 Ibid., pp 1064–65, paras 80–81.

Under the umbrella of confidentiality there will be information which may require a special quality of protection. In the present case the reason for advancing that special quality is that, if the information was published, the publication would be likely to lead to grave and possibly fatal consequences.

Therefore, since a case based on confidence might be made out, the court had to look at s 12. As indicated above, the court would then have to consider Art 10 and also the other Convention rights by virtue of the protection of the rights of others under Art 10(2). The court found, relying particularly on the findings in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2),²⁸⁴ discussed above, that the lack of a pre-existing relationship or agreement between the parties did not preclude the finding that the newspapers came under an obligation of confidence. But the public interest in preserving confidence could be outweighed by some other countervailing public interest favouring disclosure. Therefore, the court had to carry out a balancing operation, weighing the public interest in maintaining confidence against the interest in disclosure. However, s 12 of the HRA and Art 10(1) of the Convention give an enhanced importance to freedom of expression and so to the right of the press to publish. Therefore, under the HRA, a balancing exercise would no longer be appropriate.

The court went on to find that the freedom of the media to publish could only be restricted if the need for those restrictions could be shown to fall within the exceptions set out in Art 10(2). In considering the limits to the law of confidence, and whether a remedy is available to the claimants within those limits, it was found that the exceptions must be narrowly interpreted. The claimants' right under Art 2 (right to life), Art 3 (right to freedom from torture and inhuman and degrading treatment) and Art 8 (right to respect for private life) were in issue. The rights under Arts 2 and 3 are not capable of derogation. In Osman v United Kingdom,²⁸⁵ the European Court held that the provisions of Art 2 enjoined a positive obligation upon Contracting States to take measures to secure the right to life. The case, discussed in Chapter 2,²⁸⁶

283 She relied on Lord Goff in AG v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109.

284 (1998) 29 EHRR 245.

285 [1999] 1 FLR 193.

286 See p 39.

concerned the failure of the police to act to protect a family from criminal acts, including murder. The European Court said, paras 115–16:

The court notes that the first sentence of Art 2(1) enjoins the State not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction...it must be established that the authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to life of an identified individual or individuals from the criminal acts of a third party and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk.

Since in the instant case the court found that there was a real possibility that the claimants might be the objects of vigilante or revenge attacks, the potential breaches of Arts 2, 3 and 8 had to be scrupulously evaluated. Further, since a restriction on freedom of expression was in issue, all the criteria in Art 10(2), narrowly interpreted, had to be met. The court was satisfied that confidence could extend to cover the injunctions sought and that therefore, the restrictions proposed were in accordance with the law. It was found that the common law continues to evolve and was given 'considerable impetus' to do so by the implementation of the Convention into domestic law by the HRA. Also, it was a strong probability that on the release of the claimants there would be great efforts to find them and some of those seeking to do so would be determined upon revenge. The requirement in the Convention that there can be no derogation from the rights under Arts 2 and 3 provided strong support for the very pressing social need that their confidentiality should be protected. The provision of injunctions to achieve the object sought also had to be proportionate to the legitimate aims they pursued. The aim was to protect the claimants from serious and possibly irreparable harm. Dame Butler-Sloss noted that Lord Woolf said in Lord Saville of Newdigate ex p A:²⁸⁷

...when a fundamental right such as the right to life is involved, the options open to the reasonable decision-maker are curtailed. They are curtailed because it is unreasonable to reach a decision which contravenes or could contravene human rights unless there are sufficiently significant countervailing considerations. In other words it is not open to the decision-maker to risk interfering with fundamental rights in the absence of compelling justification...

Bearing that finding in mind, Dame Butler-Sloss found that the appropriate measures to be taken were to grant the injunctions since they would substantially reduce the risk to each of the claimants. It was not thought that this extension of the law of confidence would lead to the granting of general restrictions on the media in cases where anonymity would be desirable since, under the strict application of Art 10(2), it would only be appropriate to grant injunctions to restrain the media where it could be convincingly demonstrated, within those exceptions, that it was strictly necessary. The court left open the question whether it would be appropriate to grant injunctions to restrict the press in this case if only Art 8, as opposed to Arts 2 and 3, had been likely to be breached. Although the breach of the claimants' right to respect for family life and privacy would have been likely to be serious, it might not have been sufficient to meet the importance of the preservation of the freedom of expression in Art 10(1).

In any event, the court was satisfied that there was a real and serious risk to the rights of the claimants under Arts 2 and 3 and it was found that, in principle, jurisdiction to grant the injunctions to protect the claimants was present. The court went on to assess the strength of the evidence relating to those risks; finding that a real risk existed and that the protection represented by the injunctions was proportionate to the need for confidentiality, the injunctions were granted. The injunctions are intended to last for their whole lives, although, as noted above, the existence of the internet makes their efficacy in practice doubtful.²⁸⁸

287 [2000] 1WLR 1885, p 1857.

The decisions in Douglas and Venables were followed in *Mills (Heather) v News Group Newspapers Ltd.*²⁸⁹ Mills was a well known and successful model who had, since 1999, been publicly associated with Sir Paul McCartney. She contracted to buy a property in Hove. In view of a number of very disturbing e-mails she received, and in the light of the circumstances surrounding the death of John Lennon, and the attack on George Harrison, she was anxious to ensure that details of her address were not given public circulation, since she feared that she might be subject to physical threats or even injury. She bought the property under an alias. However, the Sun was informed by a person, who had obtained the information from a friend who lived nearby, that she had information that Mills was buying a house. The editor of the Sun decided, owing to the good relationship of the newspaper with Sir Paul McCartney, not to run the story. He was asked for confirmation that the paper would not publish the address and/or a photograph and/or a description of the property in breach of the Code of Practice of the Press Complaints Commission (PCC). He would not confirm this in writing because he thought that other newspapers would run the story, and that were others to publish, he could not guarantee that the Sun would not publish it by way of 'secondary publication'. He said, however, that he could run it within the PCC Code but had decided not to. In view of this response there seemed to be a risk of publication; Mills then sought and obtained an ex parte injunction against the publishers of the Sun newspaper to restrain publication of material which might identify her new address.

The High Court had to consider whether to grant an interim injunction. It said that the starting point was s 12 of the HRA since it applies 'if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression' (s 12(1)) and, in particular, provides that 'no such relief is to be granted so as to restrain publication before a trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed' (s 12(3)). The court also noted the provision of s 12(4):

The court must have particular regard to the importance of the Convention right to freedom of expression and, where the proceedings relate to material which the respondent claims, or which appears to the court, to be journalistic, literary or artistic material (or to conduct connected with such material), to

- (a) the extent to which-
 - (i) the material has, or is about to, become available to the public; or
 - (ii) it is, or would be, in the public interest for the material to be published;
- (b) any relevant privacy code.

288 See above, pp 548–49.

289 [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322. See also A v B and C (2001) WL 1251798.

The court went on to refer briefly to ‘frequent and authoritative expressions of the importance of a free press and freedom of speech’. It noted that in *Reynolds v Times Newspapers Ltd*²⁹⁰ the House of Lords stressed that there is a basic and fundamental right to freedom of expression, that freedom of expression would be buttressed by s 12 of the HRA, and that when the Act was fully in force the common law would have to be developed and applied in a manner consistent with Art 10. The court said that to be justified, ‘any curtailment of freedom of expression must be convincingly established by a compelling countervailing consideration, and the means employed must be proportionate to the end sought to be achieved; and the interest of a democratic society in ensuring a free press weighs heavily in the balance in deciding whether any curtailment of this freedom bears a reasonable relationship to the purpose of the curtailment’.²⁹¹ Thus, it found that freedom of expression ‘is the rule and regulation of speech is the exception requiring justification. The existence and width of any exception can only be justified if it is underpinned by a pressing social need.’²⁹² It relied on the findings of Hoffmann LJ in Central Independent Television plc:²⁹³

Newspapers are sometimes irresponsible and their motives in a market economy cannot be expected to be unalloyed by considerations of commercial advantage. Publication may cause needless pain, distress and damage to individuals or harm to other aspects of the public interest. But a freedom which is restricted to what judges think to be responsible or in the public interest is no freedom. Freedom means the right to publish things which government and judges, however well motivated, think should not be published. It means the right to say things which ‘right-thinking people’ regard as dangerous or irresponsible. This freedom is subject only to clearly defined exceptions laid down by common law or statute...

The court found that the combination of Art 10 and s 12 had a number of consequences. It was clear, relying on *Douglas v Hello! Ltd*²⁹⁴ per Sedley LJ, that Art 10 is directly applicable as between the parties to private litigation. Further, it found that an injunction should not be granted to restrain publication before trial unless the court was satisfied that the applicant was likely to establish that publication should not be allowed. It said that s 12(3) makes it clear that the applicant must show more than the American Cyanamid threshold of a serious issue to be tried. It noted that in Douglas v Hello! Ltd Sedley LJ said, in applying the test set out in s 12(3), and taking s 3 of the HRA into account, that by virtue of s 12(1), (4) the qualifications set out in Art 10(2) are as relevant as the right set out in Art 10(1).²⁹⁵ Therefore, the rights of others, including their Convention rights, are, it found, as material as the defendant’s right of free expression and so is the prohibition on the use of one party’s Convention rights to injure the Convention rights of others. He also found that the term ‘likely’ in s 12(3) should not be read as requiring simply an evaluation of the relative strengths of the parties’ evidence. He said that a wholly unjustifiable invasion of privacy is entitled to no less regard, by virtue of Art 10(2), than is accorded to the right to publish 291 Referring to Lord Nicholls, p 1023.

290 [1999] 3 WLR 1010.

292 Referring to Lord Steyn, pp 1029–39. The court also noted the findings in McCartan Turkington and Breen v Times Newspapers Ltd [2000] 3 WLR 1670, p 1686 (HL), where Lord Steyn said that the European Convention fulfilled the function of a Bill of Rights, and considered Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115, p 126.

293 [1994] Fam 192, pp 202–04.

294 [2001] 2 WLR 992, p 1027, para 133.

295 Ibid, p 1028, para 136.

by Art 10(1): ‘neither element is a trump card. They will be articulated by the principles of legality and proportionality which, as always, constitute the mechanism by which the court reaches its conclusion on countervailing or qualified rights.’ The court also noted the findings of Keene LJ in the same case. He said that s 12(3) deals with the interlocutory stage of proceedings and requires the court to look at the merits of the case and not merely to apply the American Cyanamid test.²⁹⁶ This meant that the court had to look ahead to the ultimate stage and be satisfied that the scales were likely to come down in the applicant’s favour.

The court noted that the case for an injunction was on the ground of breach of confidence since, in general, the rights in the Convention, as incorporated by the 1998 Act, and in particular Art 8, do not justify the creation of new causes of action to give effect to them where the common law or statute law is deficient.²⁹⁷ It said that the English courts have not, unlike the American courts which applied and developed the views expressed by Warren and Brandeis in their famous article in the Harvard Law Review in 1890,²⁹⁸ developed a separate right of privacy prohibiting unreasonable and offensive intrusion on the interest of a person in solitude or seclusion, or objectionable publicity of private information about a person. However, it thought that this deficiency was being remedied, as was made clear by Sedley LJ in Douglas v Hello! Ltd.²⁹⁹

The Court pointed out that information which has entered the public domain is not subject to confidentiality; in other words, that there may be circumstances in which the information is so generally accessible that, in the circumstances, it cannot be regarded as confidential. Therefore, the fact that information may be known to a limited number of members of the public does not of itself prevent it having and retaining the character of confidentiality.³⁰⁰ It also said that even if it has previously been very widely available, the restraint of further dissemination of the confidential material may be justified to prevent harm.³⁰¹

Assuming that the information in question—Ms Mills’ address, or information that would reveal it—was therefore confidential information, the question was whether it should be protected by an injunction. The court found that there was no evidence that the newspaper had learned of it from or through some person who learned of it through some confidential relationship or transaction. But, it said that it is no longer a necessary element of the cause of action that the information arises from a confidential relationship. In so finding it relied on the findings of Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P in *Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd*³⁰² to the effect that the court had jurisdiction to restrain the publication of material about Venables and Thompson, to protect information about their identities and whereabouts, because the disclosure of the information would have disastrous consequences for them.

296 [1975] AC 396, p 1032, para 150.

297 In so finding it relied on Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 1038, pp 1048–49, 1075, paras 24–25, 111, and disagreed with Douglas v Hello! Ltd, p 1026, para 129, per Sedley LJ.

298 Vol 4, p 193.

299 [2001] 2 WLR 992, p 1025, paras 125–26. Sedley LJ said: the ‘two first-named clients have a right of privacy which English law will today recognise and, where appropriate, protect. To say this is in my belief to say little, save by way of a label, that our courts have not said already over the years...’. Cf Brooke LJ, para 95; Keene LJ, paras 165–67. See further Jack J in A v B and C (2001) unreported, 30 April.

300 It referred to Stephens v Avery, p 454; R v Broadcasting Complaints Commission exp Granada Television Ltd [1995] EMLR 163, p 168; Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444, p 456.

301 AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2), p 260, per Lord Keith of Kinkel.

302 [2001] 2 WLR 1038.

Thus, the court found that there is jurisdiction to restrain a newspaper from publishing the address of a person in certain circumstances. However, it said that the mere publication of an address may not be a breach of confidence, or an unwarranted invasion of privacy. It said that, as the Venables case shows, one of the necessary additional elements may be the risk of injury or death to the person involved. In so finding, the court noted the practice of the PCC in applying the privacy provision of its Code of Practice (cl 3) which it said indicated that the rationale for prohibiting newspapers from publishing the address of the home of a celebrity (or material which might enable people to find its whereabouts) is not simply that the address is protected information, but that a risk to the safety of the person might thereby be created.

It went on to note that cl 3 is plainly based on Art 8 of the Convention and that although Art 8 is not directly applicable in England in the sense of creating new causes of action, the English court (a) must, in determining a question which has arisen in connection with a Convention right, take into account, inter alia, the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (under s 2(1) of the HRA) and (b) because the court is a public authority (s 6(3)(a) of the HRA), must not act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. The court went on to consider the exception under Art 10(2) in respect of 'the protection of the reputation or rights of others', which it said must include Convention rights such as Art 8 when being given effect by such means as the law of confidentiality; and also the exception 'for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence'.

In applying the Convention jurisprudence under s 12(3) of the HRA, and bearing in mind that the qualifications in Art 10(2) are as relevant as the basic right of freedom of expression in Art 10(1), the court noted that the European Court of Human Rights has emphasised that the national court has to strike a fair and proportionate balance between the respective Convention rights, depending on such factors as the nature and seriousness of the interests at stake and the gravity of the interference. Further, one of the matters which the court has to take into account in deciding whether prior restraint is justified is 'any relevant privacy code', and the PCC Code of Practice is clearly such a code.³⁰³ It noted that the rules on privacy under cl 3 are 'disarmingly simple' and found that the existence of the statutory provisions, coupled with the current wording of the relevant privacy code, meant that in any case where the court was concerned with issues of freedom of expression in a journalistic, literary or artistic context, it was bound to pay particular regard to any breach of the rules set out in cl 3 of the Code, especially where none of the public interest claims set out in the preamble to the Code was asserted.

It found that a newspaper which flouts cl 3 of the Code is likely in those circumstances to have its claim to an entitlement to freedom of expression trumped by Art 10(2) considerations of privacy, and it said that unlike the court in Kaye v Robertson,³⁰⁴ Parliament had recognised that it had to acknowledge the importance of the Art 8(1) respect for private life, and it was able to do so untrammelled by any concerns that the law of confidence might not stretch to protect every aspect of private life. Therefore, in making a determination in the instant case, the court found that it was not necessary to go beyond s 12(3) of the 1998 Act and cl 3 of the Press Complaints Commission's Code to find the ground rules by which to weigh the competing considerations of freedom of expression on the one hand and privacy on the other.

303 It noted that in Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 992, Brooke LJ said (p 1018, paras 92–94): '...the Code of Practice ratified by the Press Complaints Commission in November 1997 states that all members of the press have a duty to maintain the highest professional and ethical standards, and that the code sets the benchmarks for those standards: it both protects the rights of the individual and upholds the public's right to know.'

However, the court had to be satisfied, if it was to restrain publication before trial, that the claimant was likely to establish that publication should not be allowed. In deciding not to grant the injunction, the court took into account the fact that the risk to personal safety which arose was only slight, and the fact that the Sun had repeatedly said that it would not publish the address and that it would abide by the PCC Code. It also found that whether or not the information appeared in the press, it would, at least to a limited extent, become available to the public, simply as a result of Ms Mills living in a busy and populous town. The court said that that was not in itself a reason for denying her a remedy, but that it was relevant both in assessing the degree to which publication should be restrained, and the impact of publication on her privacy and security. The court did not take account of the fact that Ms Mills had for several years courted publicity, and had herself stimulated public interest in her lifestyle, sex life, and her homes.

The Court noted that in *Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd*³⁰⁵ the President had held that the court has jurisdiction to grant an injunction against the world in order to protect individuals from the criminal acts of others. That jurisdiction, it said, has a wider and more direct effect than the decision in *AG v Times Newspapers Ltd*³⁰⁶ that newspapers which know of an injunction against another newspaper would, if they were to publish the information, be guilty of contempt. The rationale of that decision was that publication of the material by other newspapers would nullify the purpose of the proceedings against the defendant by putting into the public domain material which the applicant claimed should remain confidential, and they would be in contempt by impeding or interfering with the administration of justice. In the instant case, the court found that it would not be right to grant an injunction against the world on the Venables basis because the balancing exercise would not support so doing, especially in view of the absence of evidence of the apprehended harm and the other relevant matters.

After these three decisions it can be said, with a certainty that was not previously appropriate, that the law recognises and protects a right of personal privacy. That right finds its roots in an existing cause of action, the doctrine of confidence. The HRA has, as commentators predicted, given the courts the impetus to develop confidence to this point. But it is important to be clear about the method of reaching this stage. The Douglas decision did not rely on the creation of so-called direct horizontal effect in the sense of the creation of a new free-standing cause of action: the HRA precludes an action directly against newspapers based on Art 8, since newspapers are not public authorities within the meaning of s 6 of the HRA. But, once the plaintiffs were in court presenting an arguable case for an injunction on grounds of confidence, the court had a duty, under s 12(4) of the HRA (if not under s

304 [1991] FSR 62.

305 [2001] 2 WLR 1038, p 1071, para 100.

306 [1992] 1 AC 191; see Chapter 5, p 249.

6 as a public authority) to develop that action by reference to Art 10, which meant also giving full weight to Art 8 as a right recognised under Art 10(2). In taking Art 8 into account, the domestic courts have also now accepted that, as interpreted at Strasbourg, its guarantees clearly affect the relations between private parties. The most important aspect of the findings in Douglas relates to the possibility of a surreptitious taking of the photographs since that is the instance in which the doctrine of confidence as traditionally conceived gives way to privacy. In other words, where surreptitious takings of information are in question, privacy values can determine the issue, although both Mills and Venables consider that these values are reflected in an extension of the doctrine of confidence, not in a common law doctrine of privacy. As indicated above, this development was already occurring, but the reliance on privacy values gives it a grounding in case law and in principle which it previously lacked.

Where prior restraint is in question, s 12(3) requires consideration of the merits of the privacy right and of expression in the particular circumstances. Also, as the Venables case made clear, such prior restraint must be justified by a strict application of the tests under Art 10(2), in particular those of necessity and proportionality. The so called 'public interest defence' under the doctrine of confidence can no longer lead to a balancing of such interest against maintaining confidentiality: the tests under Art 10(2) have taken its place.

These three decisions provide a consolidation of the developments in the law of confidence described above, which was clearly needed. While, prior to the inception of the HRA, confidence had the potential to be applied in the archetypal privacy cases, the developments outlined above had a relatively slight grounding in authority: there were comparatively few cases involving personal, as opposed to commercial information; moreover, in those which dealt with such information, there was only one decision, at the interlocutory stage,³⁰⁷ where the obligation of confidence was imposed without there being an express or implied promise that the information would be kept secret³⁰⁸ or where there had not at least been a pre-existing relationship between confider and confidant.³⁰⁹ All but one of the cases³¹⁰ involving surreptitious takings of information (where there was no pre-existing relationship or agreement of confidentiality) occurred in the commercial or professional context. It had been argued that in such cases, the courts were protecting the plaintiffs' rights to the fruits of their labour,³¹¹ conversely, it was said that the basis of intervention in personal information cases had historically been to protect the integrity of certain kinds of relationship. Thus, where personal information was revealed in circumstances where there was no such prior relationship, it was argued that there was no clear social need to protect confidentiality³¹² and in the 307 Francome [1984] 1WLR 892.

308 As there was in Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449 and HRH Princess of Wales (1993) Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Ltd, 8 November 1993.

309 In Duchess of Argyll v Duke of Argyll[1967] 1 Ch 302, there was a prior relationship of husband and wife, in HRH Princess of Wales (1993) Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Ltd, 8 November 1993, a commercial relationship, and in Michael Barrymore ([1997] FSR 600), a close friendship and a sexual relationship (there was also a written agreement of confidentiality).

310 Francome [1984] 1 WLR 892 is the exception.

311 Wilson, op cit, fn, p 49.

312 This view ignored the argument, notably advanced by Feldman, that the right to privacy does serve a strong social function in protecting the integrity of the different spheres of business, social and personal life within which we operate as individuals ('Secrecy, dignity or autonomy: views of privacy as a civil liberty' (1994) 47(2) CLP 42, pp 51-53).

absence of such a need, the judges should not use the law to enforce 'free-standing' moral convictions,³¹³ such as a belief that private information should not be disclosed without consent. Moreover, Lord Bingham said of the claim that confidence could have been used to remedy the violation of privacy which occurred in Kaye v Robertson,³¹⁴ that such use would have done 'impermissible violence to the principles upon which that cause of action is founded'.³¹⁵

Thus, had it not been for the advent of the HRA, a conservative appellate court, determined to restore the action to the founding principles which Lord Bingham invoked, could well have found that the use of confidence to protect privacy was weakly supported by authority, an illegitimate distortion of the law and lacking any underpinning in clear legal principle.³¹⁶ But, as Douglas demonstrates, now that the HRA is in force, the right to respect for privacy declared by Art 8 has become, as discussed above, an important legal value or principle, which may properly inform the direction of the common law. The Strasbourg jurisprudence examined above indicates that unremedied invasions of privacy by the media are in principle a violation of Art 8. Thus, the consolidation of the developments described above, far from being regarded as an illegitimate exercise in judicial activism, has now been underpinned by legal principle, and justified by the need identified at Strasbourg to answer to the requirements of Art 8 in this area through the common law.

Somewhat ironically, s 12 of the HRA, introduced after intense media lobbying to provide greater protection for the press to counterbalance the possible effect of Art 8, has in fact encouraged the courts to provide remedies against the worst excesses of intrusive journalism. In particular, it has afforded further status, as these three decisions emphasise, to the PCC Code, which is, as indicated above, quite extensively concerned with privacy.

Proposals for civil and criminal liability for invasion of privacy

Introduction

At present, aside from the development just discussed, no tort of invasion of privacy exists in the UK, as in the US,³¹⁷ to control the activity of the media or others in intruding on the privacy of individuals, obtaining information regarding an individual's private life and then publishing the details, perhaps in exaggerated, lurid terms. In the early 1990s, comprehensive legal controls were proposed, intended to be used against the media and others when private information was published. These controls were to affect both the publication of the information and the methods used to obtain it. When information such as a photograph is obtained, there may often be some kind of intrusion on property, albeit of a nebulous 313 Wilson, op cit, fn 1, pp 54–55.

314 [1991] FSR 62. The argument is put in Fenwick and Phillipson, op cit, fn 158.

315 Bingham LJ, 'Should there be a law to protect rights of personal privacy?' (1996) 5 EHRLR 450, p 457.

316 See, however, the very recent Court of Appeal judgment in Dept of Health ex p Source Informatics Ltd [2000] 2 WLR 953.

317 US Restatement 2d Torts (1977) No 652A.

kind, such as long range surveillance. Proposals regarding legal controls relevant to the publication of information will be considered first, followed by the legal control of intrusions.

Proposals

Proposals for the enactment of a tort of invasion of privacy in the UK centred around the protection of personal information. As indicated above, the HRA, as interpreted in Douglas and Others v Hello!,³¹⁸ has brought about development of the existing doctrine of breach of confidence, with the result that greatly increased protection for control of personal information has been created. However, such development is not yet certain and in any event, there is still an argument for providing further protection for privacy by means of a statutory tort balanced by wide ranging and carefully drawn specific public interest defences. Such a tort could provide a more comprehensive protection for privacy, including protection from intrusions.

Support for a statutory tort has, however, been far from unanimous in the relevant committees which have considered the issue. Thus, while the Younger Committee in 1972³¹⁹ recommended the introduction of a tort of disclosure of information unlawfully acquired, Calcutt 1³²⁰ decided against recommending a new statutory tort of invasion of privacy relating to publication of personal information, although the Committee considered that it would be possible to define such a tort with sufficient precision. Calcutt 2³²¹ recommended only that the government should give further consideration to the introduction of such a tort, but the National Heritage Select Committee³²² recommended its introduction, as did the later Lord Chancellor's Consultation Paper, the Green Paper.³²³ As indicated above, these proposals were abandoned in July 1995,³²⁴ although they found some expression in the DPA 1998.³²⁵ It may be noted that the Lord Chancellor's Paper did not propose an extension of legal aid to those seeking redress under the proposed new civil privacy liability. If, in future, a new tort is created without the provision of legal aid, it might merely be used—as arguably defamation has been—by powerful figures to protect their activities from scrutiny while the ordinary citizen might be unable in practice to obtain redress for invasions of privacy.

The possible definition of the proposed tort put forward by Calcutt 1 was designed to relate only to personal information which was published without authorisation. Such information was defined as those aspects of an individual's personal life which a reasonable person would assume should remain private. The main concern of the Committee was that true information which would not cause lasting harm, was already known to some, and was obtained reputedly might be caught by its provisions. The Lord Chancellor's proposals were wider: there should be a new cause of action

318 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

319 Op cit, fn 1.

320 Op cit, fn 1.

321 Op cit, fn 1.

322 Op cit, fn 1.

323 The paper was released on 30 July 1993—CHAN J060915NJ.7/93. See 143 NLJ 1182 for discussion of these proposals.

324 The White Paper, Privacy and Media Intrusion: the Government's Response, Cmnd 2918, July 1995, found against creation of a statutory tort.

325 See below, pp 603–10.

for ‘infringement of privacy causing substantial distress’ (para 5.22). No definition of privacy was offered, although it was stated to include matters relating to health, personal relationships and communications, and freedom from harassment.

Legatt LJ asserted confidently in Kaye that a right to privacy exists in the US which will be enforced and suggested that such a right should be imported into UK law, but this proposition has come under attack,³²⁶ on the basis that the scope of US privacy rights is limited by a general defence of ‘newsworthiness’³²⁷ which allows many stories disclosing embarrassing and painful personal facts to be published. This perhaps suggests that there is little value in looking to the US for a model if a UK right to privacy is to have any efficacy. The Calcutt Committee did not consider that liability should be subject to a general defence of public interest on US lines, although it did favour a tightly drawn defence of justified disclosure. Under Calcutt 2 (para 12.23) it was proposed that it would be a defence to show that the defendant had reasonable grounds for believing that publication of the personal information would contribute to preventing, detecting or exposing the commission of a crime or other seriously anti-social conduct; or to preventing the public from being misled by some public statement or action of the individual concerned; or that the defendant had reasonable grounds for believing that publication would be necessary for the protection of public health or safety. The Green Paper invited comments on these defences and in particular on the question whether the public interest defence should be defined in general terms or whether it should be more specific (para 5.62–5.67). The Green Paper proposed (para 5.45) that there should be a defence that the defendant had acted under any lawful authority. Prima facie, these defences seem to range widely enough to prevent public figures from being able to use the tort to stifle legitimate investigative journalism. The defence of seeking to prevent the public from being misled by some public statement or action of the individual concerned is, it is submitted, essential to draw a clear distinction between the private citizen and the public figure, and to ensure the accountability of the latter.

Further proposals for reform aimed at methods of obtaining information were also put forward. The Younger Committee proposed the introduction of a tort and crime of unlawful surveillance by means of a technical device, and both Calcutt Committees³²⁸ recommended the creation of a specific criminal offence providing more extensive protection—a recommendation which was backed by the National Heritage Select Committee when it considered the matter.

The clause creating the offence under Calcutt 2 also offered the individual whose privacy has been invaded the possibility of obtaining injunctions in the High Court to prevent publication of material gained in contravention of the clause provisions; damages would also be available to hold newspapers to account for any profits gained through publication of such material. Criminal liability under the clause would be made out if the defendant did any of the following with intent to obtain personal information or photographs, in either case with a view to their publication: entering or remaining on private property without the consent of the lawful occupant; placing a surveillance device on private property without such consent; using a surveillance device whether on private property or elsewhere in relation to an individual who is on private property without his or her consent; taking a photograph or recording the voice of an individual who is on private property without his or her consent and with intent that the individual should be identifiable. This clause seemed to specify the forbidden acts fairly clearly and to be aimed at preventing what would generally be accepted to be on the face of it undesirable invasions of privacy; it is worth noting that France, Germany, Denmark and the Netherlands all have similar offences on the statute books. (It should be noted that the offence would not cover persistent telephoning;³²⁹ or photographing, interviewing or recording the voice of a vulnerable individual such as a disaster victim or a bereaved relative in a public place).

326 Bedingfield, op cit, fn 142.

327 Bedingfield cites the example of Kelley v Post Publishing Co Mass [1951] 98 NE 2d 286. A father was unable to restrain publication of a picture of the severely injured body of his daughter due to the finding that the accident was newsworthy.

328 See above, p 535, fn 1.

Calcutt 1 and the Green Paper³³⁰ proposed defences to the proposed criminal offences which were wider than the defences suggested in relation to a tort of invasion of privacy. Calcutt 1 proposed (para 6.35) that it would be a defence to any of the actions above to show that the act was done:

- (a) for the purpose of preventing, detecting or exposing the commission of a crime or other seriously anti-social conduct; or
- (b) for the purpose of preventing the public from being misled by some public statement or action of the individual concerned; or
- (c) for the purpose of informing the public about matters directly affecting the discharge of any public function of the individual concerned; or
- (d) for the protection of public health or safety; or
- (e) under any lawful authority.

Calcutt 1, 2 and the Green Paper were silent as to the mental element required with respect to the defences. There appear to be three possibilities here which, for the purposes of exposition, will be examined using the example of a claim of defence (a). First, the defence would succeed only if it was shown that the forbidden act actually could have led to the exposure of crime, so that if it turned out that in fact no criminal activity had been present—though perhaps a reasonable person would have thought that it was—the defence would fail. Secondly, the defence would succeed if the defendant could show that she honestly and reasonably believed that she was acting with the purpose of exposing crime. Thirdly, it would succeed if the defendant could show that she honestly believed that she was acting with this purpose. It is submitted that the first possibility would be undesirable for three reasons: first, it could lead to serious injustice where a reporter had a reasonable suspicion which turned out later to be untrue; secondly, it would offend against the principle of criminal law formulated in *DPP v Morgan*³³¹ that the defendant should be judged on the facts as she believed them to be, and thirdly, it could act as a serious deterrent to investigative journalism. The second possibility is an improvement, but it again falls foul of the Morgan principle; moreover, there would be a risk that judges might demand quite a high standard of reasonable belief so that journalists would have to produce substantial evidence justifying their suspensions in order to make out the defence—a burden which would again exercise a deterrent effect.

329 The Protection from Harassment Act 1997 might offer some protection in this area (see above, pp 564–65).

330 See above, p 535, fn 1.

331 [1976] AC 182.

It is suggested that the third possibility is to be preferred; a journalist who honestly believes that she is acting in the public interest (within the terms of one of the defences) should not be criminalised. It may be feared that such a fully subjective test would always provide an escape from liability and thus render the offence useless. However, a journalist who merely asserted that she thought she was acting within the terms of one of the specific public interests, but was unable to adduce any grounds at all for her belief, would probably not be believed by the court. The other advantage of adopting this third possibility would be that it could come into play while the journalistic investigation was still at an inchoate stage so long as some evidence could be adduced supporting the necessary belief. On this basis, the proposed offence would provide a remedy against some unjustifiable invasions of privacy, but would be unlikely to deter serious journalism. However, the Lord Chancellor's consultation paper favoured narrowing the defences by omitting the words 'seriously anti-social conduct' from defence (a) and curtailing defences (b) and (c). If this occurred, the public lives of public figures such as ministers would be protected from scrutiny, an instance of curtailment of freedom of speech which would clearly prevent the full participation of the citizen in the democratic process.

Conclusions

As indicated above, these proposals were eventually abandoned. Obviously, there is now less need to create a new tort, since the doctrine of confidence has partially taken over the role such a tort would have had. Nevertheless, the development of the doctrine to cover the requirements of Art 8 of the Convention under the HRA 1998 may eventually prompt Parliament to introduce a new tort. It is possible that the uncertainties of using the doctrine of confidence as affected by s 12 of the HRA and Art 8 might lead the media to view the enactment of a tort of invasion of privacy along the lines of that proposed by Calcutt 2 as preferable (although it would presumably co-exist with the new-style confidence action and would also be affected by ss 3 and 12 of the HRA). It may also be desirable to enact certain very specific and narrowly defined areas of liability, relating to particularly intrusive invasions of privacy, including harassment.³³²

5 THE DATA PROTECTION ACT 1998

Introduction

Until 1998, there was no statute in the UK equivalent to the US Privacy Act 1974 which enables persons to obtain access to information held on them in government files. In the UK, certain categories of information covered by the Official Secrets Act 332 The Protection from Harassment Act 1997, ss 1 and 2 make it an offence to pursue a course of conduct which amounts to harassment of another where the harasser knows or ought to know that this will be its effect. This offence is not aimed at reporters or photographers and is not dependent on acquiring or attempting to acquire information, but it might be applicable where individual reporters had pursued a particular individual on a number of occasions.

1989 could not be disclosed, but if personal information fell outside those categories there was still no general right of access to it. Central government and public authorities in general hold a vast amount of personal information in manual and computerised files. The police, for example, use a national system which stores an immense amount of personal information, as does the Inland Revenue. But private bodies, including the media, also process personal information. Until relatively recently, the citizen had no means of knowing what information was held on him or her by private or public bodies, and no control over the nature or use of such information. However, an inroad into the principle of secrecy was made in 1984 by the Data Protection Act 1984,³³³ which was adopted in response to the Council of Europe Convention of 1980.³³⁴ Once access to certain computerised files became possible, access rights to some manual files began to follow, although no general statutory rights of access to personal information or control over the processing of such information were created until the Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA) was passed, and therefore much personal information still remained inaccessible and its processing was uncontrolled. Such a right was proposed in the 1993 White Paper on freedom of information and open government,³³⁵ but was not implemented. Prior to the passing of the 1998 Act, the access to information measures discussed below merely provided exceptions to the general denial of access. Therefore, the 1998 Act is of immense significance in terms of protecting the privacy of personal information by seeking to ensure that processing is conducted in accordance with the Data Principles.

The Data Protection Act 1984

*Information held electronically*³³⁶

In response to the steady computerisation of information, the government decided in 1975 that those who use computers to handle personal information cannot remain the sole judges of the extent to which their own systems adequately safeguard privacy. The Committee on Data Protection was therefore set up, but the final impetus came from the Council of Europe, which promulgated the Convention on Data Protection in 1980.³³⁷ In response, the DPA 1984, applying to personal information in both the public and private sectors, was passed.³³⁸ It was seen as a measure to protect privacy and a first step towards freedom of information. However, it must be questioned whether it was clear that there was a pressing need to allow access to electronically held information as opposed to a need for access to all personal information. As 333 The provisions of the 1984 Act were extended by the Data Protection (Subject Access Modifications) Health Order 1987, SI 1987/1903.

334 Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to the Automatic Processing of Personal Data, 17 September 1980.

335 Cm 2290. For further discussion of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which was introduced in 1994 as promised in the White Paper, see Chapter 7, pp 372–78, above. The Code and the Freedom of Information Act 2000, which will take over its role, are not designed to protect personal information, except in the sense that it is exempted from the access.

336 General reading; see Lloyd, I, Information Technology and the Law, 3rd edn, 2000; Reed (ed), Computer Law, 1990, Chapter 9; Sieghart, P, Privacy and Computers, 1977; Tapper, C, Computer Law, 1989; Hewitt, P (ed), Computers, Records and the Right to Privacy, 1979; Wacks, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 6.

337 Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to the Automatic Processing of Personal Data, 17 September 1980.

338 For commentary see 'Confidential: computers, records and the right to privacy' (NCCL); Savage, N and Edwards, C, A Guide to the Data Protection Act, 1985.

indicated below, the DPA 1998 recognised that most of the argument regarding the electronic storage of information could also be applied to manual files.

It may be argued that the electronic storage of information presents a particular threat to privacy because computers exacerbate problems which also exist with respect to manual files. For example, an error may creep into information held on manual files, but where information is collated from a large number of sources, as may be more likely in respect of computerised files, an error may be more likely to occur. Moreover, once it does occur, the speed with which information can be retrieved and disseminated means that an error can reach far more persons and may do more damage than a record on a manual file. It is possible to transmit data from one data bank to another much more easily than can be done using manual files. Personal information gathered for a purpose acceptable to its subject may be transferred to another data bank without the subject's knowledge or consent. It may also be linked up with other information, thus creating what may be a distorted picture.

There is a danger that the confidentiality of information may be placed at risk. Information may be given to an employer by an employee on the understanding that because there is a confidential relationship between the parties it will go no further. If it is then stored in a data bank, there is a danger that the confidentiality will be lost. An action for breach of confidence could lie, but the individual affected would have to be aware of the breach. The retention of data may also create disadvantages. Although a person's circumstances or behaviour may change, old data may not be updated, but may follow him or her around with the result that (for example) he or she is refused credit. Manually held information is less likely to follow an individual so effectively.

The regime created by the DPA 1984

It may therefore be said that no difference in principle between problems associated with the storage of manually held and computerised information can be discerned, but that there is a difference of degree. The 1984 Act attempted to address these problems by placing certain obligations on persons storing personal data. Below, the key features of the regime created by the DPA 1984 are indicated; they will be compared with those of the regime created under the 1998 Act.

Any person using a computerised system in order to store data relating to people was designated the 'data user', while the person who was the subject of the data was the 'data subject'. Any data relating to a living person was termed 'personal data'.³³⁹ The data user had to register with the Data Protection Registrar. Section 5 provided that the data user must not use the data for any purpose other than the one it was collected for and under Sched 1, it had to be kept up to date. Also, it had to be adequately protected; appropriate security measures were to be taken. Under ss 10 and 11, if the Data Registrar was satisfied that the data user was not complying with the Act, she could serve an enforcement notice, and if this measure was not adequate, she could serve a deregistration notice. It was a criminal offence for an unregistered person or body to store personal data.

Section 21 provided that if the data user was asked by the data subject whether personal data was held on her or him, that information had to be given and the data subject had to be allowed access to such data. Schedule 1 also provided that if the data was found to be inaccurate, the data subject could have it corrected or erased. If the data user did not comply, the subject could apply to court under s 24 for an order erasing or rectifying the data. Under s 22, compensation could be awarded if loss or damage had resulted from inaccurate data. However, compensation was available only if the data user compiled the inaccurate information, not if the data user compiled inaccurate material supplied by a malicious or careless third party. No compensation was available for circulating the inaccurate data; nor could the data subject know the third party's name.

339 These definitions are found in ss 4 and 5 of the Act.

Certain aspects of the 1984 Act attracted criticism, especially the wide subject access exemptions which included information relating to crime, national security, and a person's physical or mental health. A broad interpretation tended to be given to these exemptions; thus, the results of the lack of protection for privacy were unchecked in those categories. Moreover, there was still the possibility of transferring data to manual files and as provisions relating to manual files were narrow in scope, especially those under the Access to Personal Files Act 1987, it could well be the case that the manual file would not fall within any of the provisions affording access. The transfer of data from a registered data user such as the Department of Employment to an unregistered user, such as the Security Services, remained secret, and national security was exempt from the principle that data users could not allow data to be used for a purpose other than the original one.

Further, the budgetary restraint on the Data Protection Registry made it impossible to keep a check on all data users. In any event, it was considered relatively straightforward to devise an information retrieval system which only provided an incomplete copy of an individual's record. In such an instance, it appeared probable that no action for breach of the Act was likely to follow due to the inability of the Data Registrar Officer to check up on what had occurred. It would take a specialist a long time to work out what had happened, and, given the constraints on the Data Registrar, that time was unlikely to be available. Thus, it may be said that the Act was certainly a step in the direction of control over personal information, but it contained many loop-holes.

The Computer Misuse Act 1990

Unauthorised access to information electronically held falls within the Computer Misuse Act 1990³⁴⁰ which criminalises such conduct whether or not the 'hacker' has a sinister purpose. It may be wondered why it should be an offence to access files held on an office computer, but not files held in the filing cabinet. One answer is that hacking presents a more widespread and pernicious danger: it is possible to access the files from a different part of the country—there is no need for the would-be hacker to break into the office, as in the case of the unauthorised seeker of information in manual files. Thus, the possibility that persons may gain unauthorised access to personal information may now be diminished, although use of the 1990 Act in practice has proved problematic.³⁴¹ Together, the 1984 and 340 For comment, see 'The Computer Misuse Act 1990' (1990) 140 NLJ 1117.

341 See Charlesworth, A, 'Between flesh and sand: rethinking the Computer Misuse Act 1990' (1995) 9 International Yearbook of Law, Computers and Technology 33.

1990 Acts formed a code which until the inception of the 1998 Act provided a relatively comprehensive protection for privacy in relation to computerised files when compared with that available in respect of manually held files.

Protection for manually held files prior to the inception of the DPA 1998

In the wake of the DPA 1984, access rights to manual files were gradually extended under the influence of the Campaign for Freedom of Information, although without government support. The Access to Personal Files Bill was put forward as a Private Members' Bill and would have allowed access to a wide range of personal information. However, the government forced its proponents to accept an eviscerated Bill covering only housing and social security files. Thus, the Bill was restricted to local government because central government was resistant to any measure allowing individuals access to personal files. The Bill became the Access to Personal Files Act 1987. It allowed access to 'accessible information' and therefore provided for the rectification of errors. However, it was acknowledged in the passage of the Bill that there was nothing to prevent the keeping of a secret file behind the accessible file. Moreover, the Act does not have retrospective effect; thus, it does not apply to information collected before it came into effect.

The findings of the European Court of Human Rights in the Gaskin case³⁴² illustrated the inadequacy of the available measures. Graham Gaskin wanted to gain access to the personal files on his childhood in care kept by Liverpool City Council because he wanted to sue the council in negligence. He sought to invoke Art 8 and also Art 10. However, the files did not fall under the DPA 1984 since they were manually held; nor did they fall within the Access to Personal Files Act 1987 because they were collected before it came into force. The first question to be determined under Art 8 was whether it could apply to such a situation since it was considered that the essential object of Art 8 is to protect the individual from arbitrary interference by the authorities. However, the court found that there could also be a positive obligation on the authorities to act in certain situations. Here, the information consisted of the only coherent record of the whole of Gaskin's early childhood. It was therefore found that prima facie an obligation to protect privacy arose, because individuals should not be obstructed by the authorities from obtaining information so closely bound up with their identity as human beings. Thus, a positive obligation could arise although it was thought that Art 8 would not normally import such an obligation.

The Court then considered whether the exception under Art 8(2) in respect of the rights of others could apply. On the one hand, there was the need to demonstrate respect for Gaskin's privacy; on the other, the contributors of the information wanted it kept confidential. It was found that the two interests should be weighed against each other by invoking the principle of proportionality. However, the local authority had not put in place any means of independently weighing the two values; thus the preference would automatically be given to the interest in maintaining confidence. Therefore, the principle of proportionality was offended and a breach of Art 8 was found. Gaskin was awarded damages on the basis of the distress he had suffered. No breach of Art 10 was found. It was determined that the right to receive information protected by Art 10 meant that the government should not interfere if a willing speaker wished to impart information, but that there was no positive obligation on the government to impart it.

342 Gaskin v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 36.

The government complied with this ruling by introducing the Access to Personal Files (Social Services) Regulations 1989, as amended,³⁴³ which provides that social services departments must give personal information to individuals unless the contributor of the information can be identified and he or she does not consent to the access. Certain personal health information is also exempted. Thus, local authorities now have to weigh against each other the two values considered by the Court of Human Rights. One further possible result of the Gaskin case may be that test cases will be encouraged in relation to central government files where they are not covered by the DPA 1998 (see below).

A method of obtaining access to medical information relating to oneself arises under the Medical Reports Act 1988³⁴⁴ which also started life as a Private Members' Bill. It provides for limited circumstances in which a person can obtain access to personal medical information: if an insurance company or prospective insurer asks for a medical report for employment purposes, the individual in question can see it beforehand to read it and check it for errors. An example was given in parliamentary debate on the Bill of a woman who had had mistakenly included in her medical record a sheet from another record indicating that she was dying of cancer. She was refused insurance and would never have been able to obtain insurance since she had no chance of putting the mistake right. Similarly a misdiagnosis might remain on a medical record and never be corrected. These possibilities are of particular significance because a medical record contains information on a person's sexual habits and family circumstances; it does not merely contain purely medical information.

The Act, however, creates only a limited right of access; it does not mean that a person has a general right of access to all his or her medical files. There is a view in the medical profession that patients who do not have medical knowledge will not be able to place medical notes in their context, and moreover that knowing of certain conditions may exacerbate their illness since they may worry and therefore come under greater stress. Concerns may also be raised that a general right of access might increase the likelihood of a negligence action; clearly such an action might fail, but they do not welcome the waste of time and energy which fighting an action, even successfully, would entail. The darker side to this argument is, of course, that lack of access rights might preclude a legitimate negligence action: in some instances a patient might never realise that a mistake had been made.

The Access to Health Records Act 1990, which came into force on 1 November 1991, took the principle of access in this area much further.³⁴⁵ Since the introduction of the DPA 1984, patients had been entitled to have access to their computerised health records, but the 1990 Act was intended to provide an equivalent right of access to information recorded in manually held health records. The access to health records allows people to examine exactly what has been recorded about them—thus satisfying personal curiosity—but, more importantly, it will allow for mistakes to be noted and rectified. The emphasis of the Act is on an individual's control of personal and private information. However, several exceptions curb the actual scope of the access. First, as in the Access to Personal Files Act, no pre-commencement material must be shown, unless it is necessary for a full understanding of something which has been shown. It is clear that no right of access to pre-commencement material arises at common law.³⁴⁶ Secondly, if the holder of the information—the doctor—considers that disclosure of information would result in serious physical or mental harm to the patient, access can be denied. Thirdly, patients need not be told when information is being withheld. Although the 1990 Act is a move in the direction of enabling individuals to enjoy a degree of control over personal medical information and should ensure higher standards of accuracy and objectivity on the part of doctors and other record holders, it remains the case that patients whose documents are held as computerised records enjoy greater legal protection.

343 SI 1989/206, as amended by SI 1991/1587.

344 See also the Access to Health Records (Control of Access) Regulations 1993, SI 1993/746.

345 See 'Access to health records' (1990) 140 NLJ 1382.

In general, the anomalous situation whereby an individual has greater access to and control over his or her personal information held in computerised as opposed to manual files will change once the DPA 1998 is fully in force.³⁴⁷

The Data Protection Act 1998³⁴⁸

The DPA 1998 was passed in response to the European Data Protection Directive on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and the free movement of such data.³⁴⁹ The aim of the Directive is to ensure that the same level of data protection is established in all Member States in order to facilitate the transfer of personal data across national boundaries within the European Union. Once the DPA 1998 is fully in force in the UK,³⁵⁰ it will create a far more comprehensive protection for personal information than has ever previously been available. The 1998 Act is based on the 1984 Act but it is far more extensive; in particular, unlike its predecessor, it covers both manual and computerised files. This follows from s 1(1), which defines data as information processed by equipment operating automatically or recorded with the intention that it should be processed by means of such equipment or recorded as part of a relevant filing system or which forms part of an accessible record. The most significant part of this definition refers to data recorded as part of 'a relevant filing system'. Such a system is defined in s 1(1) as any set of information relating to individuals that is structured by reference to individuals or by reference to criteria relating to individuals 'in such a way that specific information relating to individuals is readily accessible'. This definition is 346 Mid-Glamorgan Family Health Services and Another ex p Martin (1993) The Times, 2 June.

347 See below, fn 350.

348 For a basic guide, see Carey, P, The Data Protection Act 1998, 1998; for discussion of the impact of the Act on the media see Tugendhat, M, 'The Data Protection Act 1998 and the Media' [2000] YBMCL 115; Rasiah and Newell, 'Data protection and press freedom' [1997-98] YBMEL 209.

349 Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 October 1995 (1995) OJ L281/31, mainly Art 6.

350 Certain sections came into force on the date of the passing of the statute—16 June 1998. Most of the provisions came into force in 1999. As indicated below, certain provisions came into force after the first transitional period, ending on 24 October 2001; further provisions will come into force after the end of the second transitional period, ending on 24 October 2007. Transitional provisions under Sched 14 provide for the transition from the regime of the 1984 Act to that of the 1998 Act while transitional relief from the full rigour of the new Act is provided in Sched 8. Schedule 16 will repeal the whole of the 1984 Act.

clearly imprecise, but it seems that most, if not all, structured filing systems relating to paper-based materials containing personal information will be covered.

The following discussion is not intended as a comprehensive guide to the 1998 Act, something that would be out of place in a book of this nature. Instead, it will focus on certain specific privacy issues, and especially on their relationship with freedom of expression.

The Data Principles

The Data Principles, contained in Schedule 1 of the Act, form its central core. The rest of the Act elaborates on the system for ensuring that these principles are adhered to. The Principles set out a number of fundamental privacy rights which encapsulate the value of informational autonomy. They accept that personal information must be stored and used by others, but surround such use by safeguards intended to preserve informational autonomy so far as possible, consistent with such acceptance.

Data Principle 1 states that personal data must be processed fairly and shall only be processed if at least one of the conditions in Sched 2 is met. The conditions include the requirement that the data subject has given consent to the processing, or it is necessary for the administration of justice or for the exercise of statutory functions, of functions of a minister or government department or for the exercise of other functions of a public nature exercised in the public interest, or for the purposes of legitimate interests pursued by the controller or a third party, except where the processing is unwarranted by reason of prejudice to the legitimate rights or freedoms of the subject.

Especially intimate private information is classified as 'sensitive personal data'; this covers a person's sexual life, along with matters such as a person's religious and political opinions, and his or her physical and mental health (s 2). The processing of 'sensitive personal data' attracts a higher level of safeguards than normal data under Data Principle 1 (b) (Sched 1), as elucidated by Sched 3. Sensitive personal data must be processed fairly and must only be processed if at least one of the conditions in Sched 3 is met. The conditions include the requirement that the data subject has given her explicit consent to the processing, or the information has deliberately been made public by the subject, or it is necessary for medical purposes, or for the administration of justice, or for the exercise of statutory functions, of functions of a minister or government department, or for the purposes of legitimate interests pursued by certain non-profit-making bodies.

Data Principle 2 provides that the data may be obtained only for one or more specified purposes and shall not be processed in any manner incompatible with that purpose. Under Data Principles 4 and 5, data must be accurate and, where necessary, kept up to date; when it is kept for a specific purpose, it must not be kept for longer than is necessary for that purpose. Also, data must be processed in accordance with the rights of data subjects under Data Principle 6, and under Data Principle 7 it must be adequately protected; appropriate security measures must be taken.

A number of subject exemptions, however, allow certain activities to be exempted from a number of the new provisions. The Data Principles and most of the key provisions of the Act do not apply where the exemption is required for the purpose of safeguarding national security. Thus, the security and intelligence services will be exempt. Data related to the prevention and detection of crime are exempt from the first Data Principle and the subject access provisions in s 7. As indicated below, there is a special exemption for journalistic purposes; where the media exemption operates, the media will be exempt from a number of the provisions, including all the Data Principles, except the seventh.

Obligations of data controllers

Any person using a computerised system in order to store data relating to people is now designated the 'data controller' (s 1(1)), while the person who is the subject of the data remains the 'data subject'. However, the processing of personal data no longer requires the performance of operations by reference to a data subject (s 1(1)). Any data relating to a living person is still termed 'personal data'.³⁵¹ Personal data covers expressions of opinions about an individual, but now also covers indications of intentions in relation to that individual. This would include, for example, the intentions of a personnel manager regarding the promotion or demotion of an employee. Under s 17, the data controller must register with the Data Protection Registrar, now renamed the Data Protection Commissioner. The data controller must notify the holding of data to the Commissioner under s 17(1), who will then make an entry in the register maintained under s 19 unless, under s 17(3), processing is unlikely to prejudice the rights or freedoms of data subjects or unless, under s 23(1), the data controller has an approved in-house supervision scheme. However, the Act requires compliance with the Data Principles and therefore such compliance is not dependent on the registration of the data holder.

Section 7 provides that if the data controller is asked by the data subject in writing whether personal data is being processed by or on behalf of the data controller, that information must be given within 40 days. If such data is being processed, the data subject is entitled to a description of the data, of the purposes for which it is being processed and of the recipients to whom it may be disclosed. Also, the data subject is entitled to have the data communicated to her and any information available to the controller as to the source of the data, in a form which is capable of being understood. Under Sched 1, Part II in relation to the fourth principle it is provided that if the data is found to be inaccurate, the data subject can notify the controller of the fact, which should then be indicated in the data. If it is so indicated, the fourth principle is not contravened. If a court is satisfied on the application of a data subject that personal data of which the applicant is the subject is inaccurate the court under s 14 can make an order erasing, blocking, destroying or rectifying the data.

Under s 10, the data subject has a new right, enforceable by court order, to prevent the processing of data likely to cause substantial damage or distress, if that damage or distress is or would be unwarranted.

Enforcement

The enforcement mechanisms allow for the enforcement of privacy rights against a range of bodies including private ones, thus affording greater respect for Art 8 rights than is afforded under the HRA, since under it only public authorities are directly bound. The Act creates a number of offences in relation to data processing and the Act's requirements. In particular, it is a criminal offence for an unregistered person or body to store personal data under s 21(1).

351 The definition of personal data is found in s 1(1) of the Act.

Under s 13, compensation can be awarded if damage has resulted from the contravention by a data controller of any of the requirements of the Act, including the requirement to rectify, destroy, block or erase inaccurate data. However, it is a defence for the controller to prove that he had taken such care as is reasonable in the circumstances to comply with the requirement.

The rights granted under the Act are largely enforceable by the Data Protection Commissioner. Importantly, the Commissioner has security of tenure, being dismissible only by the Crown following an address by both Houses of Parliament. Under s 47, a failure to comply with a ruling of the Commissioner is a criminal offence. But the Commissioner can only make such a ruling after serving an enforcement notice under s 40 and such a notice may only be served if one or more of the Data Principles has been breached. The enforcement mechanism under the 1998 Act is based on the serving of notices on data controllers. If a person thinks that data of which she is the subject is being processed in contravention of the Act she can apply to the Commissioner for an assessment as to whether this is the case (s 42). The Commissioner can serve an information notice under s 43 on a data controller requiring the controller to furnish information to her within certain time limits.

Where the Commissioner is satisfied that a controller is contravening the Act, she may ultimately force the controller to act by serving upon it an enforcement notice, which (under s 40(1)) requires the controller to take, within such time as may be specified in the notice, such steps as may be specified for complying with the requirements of the Act. The notice may either ask the controller to rectify, block, erase or destroy any inaccurate data or data containing an expression of opinion or take steps to check the accuracy of the data. If a controller fails to comply with an enforcement or information notice, it will commit a criminal offence.

Under s 48, an appeal lies from decisions of the Commissioner to the Tribunal which is made up of experienced lawyers and 'persons to represent the interests' of data subjects under (s 6(6)). This power of appeal is exercisable upon the broadest possible grounds. The Act provides that any person may appeal to the tribunal against an enforcement or information notice (s 48) either on the basis that the notice is not in accordance with the law, or that the Commissioner ought to have exercised her discretion (if any) differently' (s 49). The tribunal is also empowered to substitute such other notice as could have been served by the Commissioner. There is a further appeal from the tribunal to the High Court, but on a 'point of law' only (s 49(6)). In practice, this will probably be interpreted so as to allow review of the tribunal's decisions, not just for error of law, but also on the other accepted heads of judicial review.

Thus, the Commissioner's decisions can, in the final analysis, be enforced, just as can orders of the court. These powers are buttressed by powers of entry, search and seizure to gain evidence of a failure by the authority to carry out its obligations under the Act or of the commission of a criminal offence under the Act (detailed in Sched 9).

Impact on the media

The media will be regarded as data controllers under the DPA 1998 and this is a very significant matter, since personal information stored manually may now be covered. The Act, however, gives the media quite generous conditional exemptions from many of its provisions and protection from the possibility of interim injunctions to restrain publication. Where data is processed for the 'special purpose' of journalism³⁵² under s 32(1) and (2), the key protective provisions (including Data Principles 1 and 2 and s 10) do not apply at all if the processing is undertaken with a view to publication, the data controller reasonably believes that, having regard to the special importance of the public interest in freedom of expression, publication is in the public interest, and compliance with the protective principles is incompatible with journalistic activity.³⁵³ In considering the belief of the data controller that publication is in the public interest, regard may be had under s 32(3) to his compliance with any relevant code of practice that has been designated by the Secretary of State for the purposes of the sub-section. Journalists are not exempt from Data Principle 7, which in essence requires that care must be taken of the personal data, but this provision alone does not provide a significant protection for privacy. Even if a journalist was found to have breached the Act due to a failure to take such care, no interim injunction could be granted—the most valuable remedy for the purpose of protecting privacy—under s 32.

Although the Act gives an individual the right to apply to the court for an order that a journalist, as a data controller, cease processing information about him which is causing or is likely to cause substantial, unwarranted distress (s 10), the mere claim that the processing is for the purposes of journalism with a view to publication stays the proceedings and the case is referred to the Data Commissioner for a determination on the point (s 32(4)). Thus, interim injunctions to prevent unfair processing by the press—a critical remedy in privacy cases—will not be available. Where the exemption applies, it may be said then that the DPA 1998 will probably have only a marginal impact on non-consensual media use of personal information.

The right under s 10 to demand that the data controller ceases processing and the right if they do not to seek a remedy in court is unlikely, in any event, to bite against the media since the data subject must first notify the data controller to require that she cease processing, and the controller has 21 days to reply stating the action she intends to take. In the case of the media it seems probable that if publication of the personal data was intended, the media body in question would publish it, if possible, within the 21 day period.

However, these protections for the media do have limits. If data is being processed for the special purposes without a view to publication—which could be the case if it has already been published—the exemption does not apply. Equally, it does not apply to unpublished personal information if no reasonable belief could be demonstrated that publication of the information would be in the public interest. Clearly, there would also be cases where it was uncertain whether that belief could be demonstrated. Thus, journalists would be subject to the requirements of the Act in certain circumstances. A key question in relation to the First Data Protection Principle is, as indicated above, that of consent, since data cannot be processed unless one of the conditions in Sched 2, in relation to personal data, or Sched 3, in relation to sensitive personal data, is met. The obvious condition which would apply in relation to journalism would be that consent had been obtained, since in most circumstances it is unlikely that one of the other conditions could be met. Schedule 3 refers to explicit consent. Thus, in relation to non-sensitive personal data, implied consent is sufficient. In relation to sensitive data, it is sufficient if the information has deliberately been made public by the subject. The Act does not explain what is meant by consent.

352 Sections 3.
353 For further discussion, see Carey, op cit, fn 348, pp 196–98.

It could be claimed—as it has been successfully both under the UK doctrine of confidence and under the American private facts tort—that the plaintiff has sought publicity in the past and therefore in some way has consented, or should be deemed to have consented, to a current publication of data to which he or she now objects.³⁵⁴ English judges in breach of confidence cases have in the past shown some receptivity to this claim, although there has often been a tendency to conflate it with the different claim that the plaintiff's private life has per se lost its quality of confidentiality. For example, in Woodward v Hutchins,³⁵⁵ the Court of Appeal denied the plaintiffs (pop singers) an injunction against a former employee in respect of a series of newspaper articles giving detailed accounts of the singers' private lives. Bridge LJ reasoned that: 'those who seek and welcome publicity of every kind bearing upon their private lives so long as it shows them in a favourable light are in no position to complain of an invasion of their privacy by publicity which shows them in an unfavourable light'.³⁵⁶ A similar approach was taken in *Lennon v News Group Newspapers*³⁵⁷ in which one party to a marriage was denied relief in respect of personal information concerning the relationship on the grounds that both had sought publicity about it on previous occasions. In a similar vein, Elwood argues in the American context that celebrities³⁵⁸ may be seen to have waived their right to privacy so that a defence of implied consent may be used against any privacy actions they may bring.

However, in relation to specific disclosures of personal data, it would often be absurd for a newspaper to claim that the data subject would have given actual consent if asked. This might equally be said of the argument that a celebrity had deliberately revealed sensitive personal data, relating, say, to his sexuality and that therefore numerous details regarding his sexual partners or practices can now be published. This is particularly obvious where the information has been obtained 354 Reported remarks of Lord Wakeham, Chair of the Press Complaints Commission, to the effect that the former Princess of Wales had made herself 'fair game' for public analysis of her private life by discussing it herself on television, exemplify this attitude (The Times, 2 May 1996). A similar argument was also put forward in Mills v News Group Newspapers [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322 by the Sun.

355 [1977] WLR 760.

356 Ibid., p 765. The decision is not clearly reasoned; Lord Denning also found (p 763): 'There is no doubt whatever that this pop group sought publicity...[relating to] their private lives also.' But this finding may also have been directed towards the idea that, having sought publicity themselves, they had effectively placed their private lives in the public domain; the decision also seems to have motivated by the idea that it was in the public interest to correct the false favourable impression that early publicity had given (ibid., p 764).

357 [1978] FSR 573.

358 'Outing, privacy and the First Amendment' [1992] Yale LJ 747.

surreptitiously, as is often the case. It may be noted that this principle is encapsulated in the BSC Privacy Code which provides that ‘even when personal matters become the proper subject of enquiry people in the public eye ‘do not forfeit their right to privacy’ (para 17). Moreover the claim that prior, voluntary revelations constitute some kind of generalised, all-purpose consent to future invasions of privacy is simply implausible: no-one can realistically suppose that when a certain celebrity gives, for example, an interview to a newspaper about particular problems in a past or current marriage, she thereby gives carte blanche to the media to publish any information relating to her personal life which they can obtain in future. Thus, as the quotation from *Woodward*³⁵⁹ indicates, the consent terminology can be in reality merely a cloak for a purely normative argument: since in the past the plaintiff has sought publicity for personal information, she should not be allowed to complain about this publication.

This argument, although superficially more attractive, is also difficult to justify: it is wholly incompatible with the core privacy value—the individual’s right to control over the release of personal information. All of us exercise this right to selective disclosure in our social lives. For example, a friend who is shown a highly personal letter on one occasion, does not assume that he has thereby acquired the right to read, un-invited, all other such letters. But when such selectivity is exercised in the context of disclosures to the media, it is unjustifiably viewed in an entirely different light. In contrast, if selectivity in disclosure had resulted in a public deception on a matter of importance, there would be a genuine public interest in correcting it by revealing the truth. However, while the presence of such an interest is an essential pre-condition for the exemption of journalists from the Data Principles, there is nothing in the Act to suggest that it could be a determining factor in finding that consent could be viewed as impliedly given, in an instance in which a journalist was not exempt.

The better approach, it is suggested, to the question of consent in such cases therefore would be simply to inquire whether the plaintiff has in fact robbed the information disclosed of its private quality through prior, voluntary publicity about matters of a similar kind.³⁶⁰ It will be important to apply this test with some discernment.³⁶¹ The US courts have not always done so, on occasions drawing no distinction between voluntary and involuntary attainment of notoriety³⁶² or finding that once someone has achieved notoriety in one area, whole other areas of their lives are opened up to close scrutiny as a result.³⁶³ As Wacks has remarked: It is in principle unacceptable that merely because an individual seeks favourable

359 The Times, 2 May 1996.

360 This point leaves aside the quite separate issue as to whether the publication should be allowed on expression grounds, for which see discussion below.

361 Prosser suggests at least that consent is only impliedly given ‘if the plaintiff has industriously sought publicity of the same kind’ (op cit, fn 182, pp 420–21).

362 Thus in Metter v Los Angeles Examiner (1939) 35 Cal App 2d 304, a person committed suicide by jumping from a high building and the court found that the victim had made herself a public figure ‘for a brief period’ through her own actions. However, the same result—denial of any right to privacy—was reached in Kelly v Post Publishing Co (1951) 327 Mass 275, where there was no element of voluntariness at all, the victim having died in a car accident.

363 See, eg, the decision in Ann-Margaret v High Society Magazine Inc (1980) 498 F Supp 401 in which a well known actress was denied relief in respect of the publication of a nude photograph of her.

publicity...his entire private life might be laid bare with impunity'.³⁶⁴ The notion of 'consent', then, should be used only where there is an arguable claim of actual consent to the publication in question, express in respect of sensitive personal data³⁶⁵ or implied in respect of personal data.³⁶⁶ An acceptance that implied consent could be given is clearly necessary since, in relation to personal data, it appears clear that implied consent is sufficient.

It is concluded, therefore, that the 1998 Act may have an impact on the media³⁶⁷ since, except in a narrow range of instances, they are not exempt from the requirement to obtain consent where one or more of the conditions set out in s 32 do not apply. Although, from the point of view of protecting privacy, it may be argued that this is a welcome development, it may be suggested that the Act does not properly hold the balance between Arts 10 and 8. If so, since s 3 of the HRA applies, the courts will have to consider the scope within the Act for creating a fairer balance in accordance with the demands of both those articles. For example, s 10 speaks of unwarranted disclosures, a terminology which would appear to create leeway for arguments based on Art 10. Although publication or processing in the public interest is not a general defence under the Act there is, as indicated, scope for interpreting what is meant by the public interest in s 32 in order to create such a balance, a matter that is considered further below.³⁶⁸

Impact of the HRA

The DPA 1998 is precisely aimed, inter alia, at the preservation of informational autonomy in a very broad sense, going far beyond the obligations created by the HRA, under Art 8, which is directly applicable only to public authorities. The provisions of the 1998 Act will of course have to be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights, including those under Arts 8 and 10, under s 3 of the HRA. But as Chapter 4 explained, s 3 is only an interpretative obligation, not a means of binding persons to abide by the rights. Thus, the 1998 Act is of immense significance as a privacy measure which reaches fully into the private sphere. In so far as they are reflected in the 1998 Act, the rights under Art 8 will bind private bodies.

If remedies are granted that might affect freedom of expression, s 12 of the HRA will also be relevant, whether the body against which relief is sought is a private body or a public authority under the HRA.³⁶⁹ The 1998 Act has very significant 364 Wacks, op cit, fn 190, p 24.

365 Under the US tort, the test for actual consent is whether the complained of publicity differed 'materially...in kind or extent' from the informational material in relation to which consent was actually given (Prosser, op cit, fn 182, p 420).

366 A realistic doctrine of implied consent is clearly necessary, so that, eg, there would be no question of photographs of the Queen appearing on the balcony of Buckingham Palace engaging liability since consent, although unspoken, would clearly be present. See the comments of the Major Government in Privacy and Media Intrusion: The Government's Response, Cm 2918, para 3.14 and the rejoinder by Bingham LJ (writing extra-judicially), (1996) 5 EHRLR 450.

367 See, for further discussion of the impact of the Act on the media, Tugendhat, 'The Data Protection Act 1998 and the media' [2000] YBMCL 115.

368 See pp 618 et seq.

369 Since, as pointed out above, s 12 is not limited in its application to public authorities; see p 583.

370 See further Tugendhat, op cit, fn 348; Rasiah and Newell, op cit, fn 348.

implications for the media³⁷⁰ and, in certain respects, it is suggested that, it has—in effect—favoured the protection of Art 8 over Art 10 rights. Therefore, some tension between the DPA 1998 and the HRA may arise.

A number of the bodies processing data are public authorities and therefore will be bound to observe the Convention rights in relation to such processing, under s 6 of the HRA. The bodies charged with the enforcement of the 1998 Act are also public authorities, and therefore must abide by the Convention rights in relation to any adjudications. Since the 1998 Act implements an EU Directive, the obligation to take the Convention into account in relation to processing of data, and adjudications relating to such processing, stems not only from s 3 but from the reliance on the Convention as a source of principles informing EU legislation.³⁷¹ This could be a matter of significance, since articles of the Convention, in particular Art 13, that have not been received into domestic law under the HRA Sched 1, should be considered. Further, EU law can override domestic law and it has a greater impact than the HRA due to the possibility of bringing a Francovich action.³⁷² The Directive could override incompatible primary legislation; if it has been inadequately implemented, an action could be brought directly against the State, thereby extending the impact of the privacy rights it encompasses, which should reflect Art 8 principles. The 1998 Act therefore reflects an acceptance of the value and significance of privacy interests which was not previously present in domestic law. It also arguably affords those interests priority—in certain respects—over free expression interests—a priority which is further reinforced by the complex relationship between the HRA and other domestic provisions and between the HRA and EU law.

The Data Protection Commissioner and Tribunal operating under s 6 of the DPA 1998 are public authorities and therefore they are directly bound, under s 6 of the HRA, by the Convention rights. Both bodies would therefore be subject to judicial review for violation of the Convention in their rulings. Since under s 47 a failure to comply with a ruling of the Commissioner is a criminal offence, a significant possibility of enforcing Art 8 rights might appear to arise.

The exemptions under the Act are broad; where they apply to bodies that are public authorities under s 6 of the HRA, Art 8 could be relied upon to seek to prevent the unfair processing of data where an infringement of its guarantee had occurred or appeared likely to occur. This is a matter that is considered further in Chapter 11, but it may be noted here that Art 8 clearly views the processing of personal data as prima facie falling within para 1.³⁷³

371 See Chapter 3, pp 115–17.

372 Francovich v Italy [1993] 2 CMLR 66 (circumstances in which national governments have a duty to compensate individuals for loss caused by failure to implement Directives and for other breaches of EC law). See also Chapter 3, pp 115–16.

373 In MS v Sweden (1997) 3 BHRC 348, the applicant complained that disclosure of her medical records in respect of a compensation claim infringed Art 8. The Court found that disclosure was an interference with private life but justified—economic well being of State information relating to an individual's sexual life may merit protection, a decision clearly in harmony with the approach of Strasbourg.

6 ISSUES ARISING FROM THE IMPACT OF THE HRA

Introduction

Almost all the measures discussed above allow for a balancing of expression and privacy rights by means of some form of public interest or 'reasonableness' test. This is true, albeit to quite a limited extent, of the DPA 1998; it is true of the common law doctrine of confidence and of the Privacy Codes affecting broadcasting and the press, and it may be noted that the PCC code in particular has now been given added status since it (and the two broadcasting codes discussed above) are recognised in s 12(4)(b) of the HRA and in s 32(3) of the DPA.³⁷⁴ Thus, the methods of resolving the conflict, relying on the Convention jurisprudence and, if necessary, jurisprudence from other jurisdictions, is crucial. Such methods are considered below.

In determining whether information is to count as private, Art 8 must now be viewed as a source of interpretation under s 3 of the HRA. This is made explicit in the PCC Code, cl 3, and is clearly the case in respect of all statutory provisions which mention personal information, including the DPA 1998. By virtue of ss 2 and 6 of the HRA, it is also the case in relation to the common law. But, in order to engage Art 8 at all, information must be viewed as private and either must not be fully or at all in the public domain, or must be capable of causing further harm by being re-publicised.³⁷⁵ The balancing exercise between Arts 10 and 8 cannot occur until these matters are resolved and s 12(4)(a)(i) of the HRA makes it clear that the public domain issue is relevant in undertaking it. Therefore, the discussion below will begin by considering what constitutes personal information, and when it can be said to be in the public domain, two separate but linked issues.

Personal information

It is suggested that to introduce an element of objectivity into the test for personal information, the present requirement that the information should not be trivial could be developed into a requirement of reasonable foreseeability that publication of truthful matter relating to her private rather than public life would cause substantial distress to the individual concerned. This test would draw on WA Parent's proposed definition: '[personal] information about a person which most individuals in a given time do not want widely known' and 'facts which though not generally considered personal a particular person feels acutely sensitive about'. This test encapsulates the crucial distinction between breach of privacy and defamation, since the latter action is concerned with untruthful matter. The word 'private' is used in order to seek to make a distinction between information which a person wishes to keep secret because it is personal or intimate to her, and information (such as the fact that she had lied to Parliament) which raises no privacy issues, but which she wishes to conceal because it would hurt her reputation. Admittedly, there will be borderline cases in which it will not be possible to determine whether information can be said to relate to a person's private or public life. In that case, the information could be viewed as private and the question of its public nature would be relevant in determining the public interest in disclosure—in other words, at the stage of balancing speech and privacy rights. This test would provide more satisfactory protection than is provided by the US private facts tort in covering those cases where the matter disclosed, although not ordinarily considered 'offensive', is of great import to the individual concerned. In the well known case of *Sidis v F-R Publishing Corporation*³⁷⁶ the New York Times revealed the identify and history of a former mathematical genius, who had given up his research and retired into obscurity. The article had a devastating effect on Sidis, but despite the court's finding that the article was 'merciless in its dissection of intimate details of the subject's personal life',³⁷⁷ his action for breach of privacy failed on the basis that nothing was revealed which would have been offensive to the reasonable man.

³⁷⁴ If the Secretary of State designates the Code by order for the purposes of the sub-section, under s 32(3)(b).
³⁷⁵ See Mills v News Group Newspapers (2001) WL 720, p 322, above p 589 on this point.

If this is accepted, problems may still arise relating to the requirement that a matter should be personal and that it should be sufficiently weighty to be regarded as information with which the law should be concerned. In respect of the first question, a particular problem arises where information, alleged to be personal, relates to a matter occurring within a public or semi-public environment and it is consequently argued that it cannot be seen as 'personal information'. Two basic approaches to this problem and other variants of it may be discerned concerning the borderline of the public/private divide.³⁷⁸ The first is the straightforward approach adopted by the US courts, which hold, with apparent logic, that what takes place in 'public' cannot by definition be 'private'. As Prosser puts it: 'the decisions indicate that anything visible in a public place may be recorded and given circulation by means of a photograph [or]...written description, since this amounts to no more than giving publicity to what is already public and what any one present would be free to see'.³⁷⁹ The advantages of this approach in terms of legal certainty and predictability are apparent. However, it misses the point that privacy need not be an absolute state of affairs³⁸⁰ to be valuable and that everyday lives are in fact a constant trade-off between human interaction and the formation of relationships on the one hand, and the maintenance of a reasonable degree—not an absolute state—of privacy on the other. The alternative approach is therefore more nuanced and recognises that a degree of privacy may be retained in a semi-public environment, such as a restaurant,³⁸¹ or gymnasium.³⁸²

English courts will find that Strasbourg jurisprudence provides little specific guidance on this particular matter, though it probably does not require the narrow 376 113 F 2d 806 (2d Cir 1940).

377 Ibid., p 807.

378 See below, p 615.

379 Prosser, op cit., fn 182, pp 394–95.

380 Gavison suggests that an individual 'enjoys perfect privacy when he is completely inaccessible to others' (op cit., fn 187, p 428) without suggesting that this is anything other than an unrealistic and undesirable scenario.

381 See the decision of the German Federal Court: BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, 322–46, discussed below.

382 The location where surreptitious photographs were taken of the former Princess of Wales in HRH Princess of Wales.

approach characterised by the US jurisprudence.³⁸³ However, if judges are prepared to look further afield, they will find that a recent decision of the German Supreme Court³⁸⁴ provides a useful contrast to the US approach. Princess Caroline of Monaco complained of photographs taken by the press of her having an intimate dinner with her boyfriend in a garden restaurant in France. The Supreme Court refused to follow the approach of the Appeal Court that privacy ‘stopped at the doorstep’: they found that the Princess had clearly ‘retreated to a place of seclusion where [she wished] to be left alone’ and that she was entitled to respect for that wish. The approach indicated was that one may still be entitled to respect for privacy in semi-public places, recognising, as the court put it, that people may ‘transfer their private sphere of life to a place outside their home’. While the presumption will be that events taking place in such places do not attract privacy protection, this may be rebutted if, as the court put it, it is clear by reference to ‘objective criteria’ that one wishes to be ‘left alone’ so that one can, ‘relying on the seclusion of the place, behave in a manner which [one] would not have done if...in full view of the public’.³⁸⁵ Thus, identifying such places of seclusion is not to be done simplistically by reference solely to locality,³⁸⁶ an approach implicitly approved in a recent decision of the Canadian Supreme Court involving the publication, without consent, of a photograph of the plaintiff taken in public.³⁸⁷

This flexible attitude to privacy is indeed suggested by the Press Complaints Commission’s Code of Practice drawn up by the press itself, to which, as noted above, the courts have to have regard under s 12(4) of the HRA. As indicated above, the Code defines ‘private places [as] public or private property where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy’. The fact that an event takes place in a semi-public environment may, however, be a factor which can reasonably be used in assessing the ‘weight’ of the privacy claim, when and if it is placed in the balance against any public interest in disclosure, including the interest in media freedom, a matter discussed below. This flexible attitude to personal information is also reflected in the case law on the doctrine of confidence; as indicated above, the courts have been prepared to protect information already—in essence—in the public domain, such as the physical appearance of Princess Diana³⁸⁸ or of Catherine Zeta-Jones.³⁸⁹ In those instances, protection for the details of an individual’s personal appearance on a specific occasion was available. It is also clear that the courts are prepared to view information already partly in the public domain as worthy of protection on the 383 The Commission found in X v United Kingdom ((1973) Appl 5877/72 16 YBCHE, p 328) that the actions of the police in taking and then filing photographs taken without consent of a woman arrested for taking part in a political demonstration disclosed no prima facie breach of Art 8, partly it seems because of what was described as the ‘public and voluntary’ nature of her activities (emphasis added). This decision has however, been described as ‘an outdated aberration’ in the case law of the Commission: Bygrave, ‘Data protection pursuant to the right to privacy in human rights treaties’ (1999) 6(3) IJLIT 247, 265; see also Niemetz v Germany (1992) 16 EHRR 97.

384 BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131. See the discussion of this decision in Markesinis, B and Nolte, N, ‘Some comparative reflections on the right of privacy of public figures in public places’, in Birks, P (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997, pp 118 et seq.

385 Ibid.

386 Feldman expresses strong support for this view: op cit, fn 23, pp 59–62.

387 Les Editions Vice Versa Inc v Aubry [1999] 5 BHRC 437 (appeal from decision of Quebec courts under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which protects the right to privacy (s 5)). The photograph did not show the plaintiff engaged in any private act, or partially unclothed, but it was held that the right to privacy included the right to control over one’s image.

388 See p 568.

389 See pp 581–82.

grounds that it can still be viewed as private.³⁹⁰ In so doing it is arguable that they have shown some recognition for the underlying values of dignity and autonomy at stake.

It should be pointed out that the question whether information is personal can either pre-date the 'public domain' inquiry, considered below, or can be indistinguishable from it. Thus, one might have to consider whether information could be viewed as personal at all where it relates to an event occurring in a semi-public environment. If it is determined that it can be viewed as personal, a court would go on to consider whether nevertheless it had been disseminated to such an extent that it had lost the personal quality that it otherwise would have had. A different situation would arise where information clearly has a personal quality, such as information relating to a person's sexual life, but it has received such wide publicity that it has arguably lost that quality. This is a difficult issue since, depending on the circumstances, it is a point at which the difference between confidence and privacy emerges. Bearing in mind that confidence is now a key mechanism to be used to prevent non-consensual disclosures of personal information, a tension between privacy values and confidence ones is likely to become apparent, suggesting that Sedley LJ's approach in *Douglas*³⁹¹ may be more satisfactory than that of Dame Butler-Sloss in *Venables*³⁹². Where the claimant has deliberately placed her sexual life in the public domain and has profited from it (for, example, where it is part of a certain image that she wishes to project) it is suggested that in terms of privacy it has lost its personal quality and in terms of confidence it is no longer secret. This approach is, as noted above, consonant with that under the DPA since it is one of the conditions for processing sensitive personal data. But where others have placed her sexual life in the public domain it is suggested that in terms of privacy the information retains its personal quality in the sense that each re-revelation causes her distress, whereas in terms of confidence it is no longer secret despite her lack of acquiescence in the disclosures.³⁹³

Public domain issues

Under the law of confidence and under the American private facts tort, once it can be determined that information is in the public domain, through, for example, previous media attention or other participation in a public process, such as a trial, an individual is no longer able to protect it through legal action. This is confirmed by s 12(4)(a)(i) of the HRA under which courts must have regard to the extent to which the material has, or is about to, become available to the public. The BSC Privacy Code also impliedly adopts a nuanced approach, speaking of determining whether when filming events in public places it is clear that information is sufficiently in the public domain to make it justifiable to broadcast it without consent (para 16). The public domain issue is addressed only in a very limited fashion by the DPA, in Sched 3, para 5, which provides that one of the conditions for the 390 See Mills v News Group Newspapers (2001) WL 720322, above p 589 on this point.

391 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

392 [2001] 1 All ER 908, Fam Div (High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division).

393 The difference between the two was encapsulated in Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada Television [1995] EMLR 163.

processing of sensitive personal data is that the data subject has deliberately placed the information in the public domain.

The public domain issue is especially problematic where the information now disclosed had previously been recorded in a public record or given some earlier publicity. Once again, the US courts have opted for an absolutist stance in such situations: the Second Restatement of Torts states: 'there can be no [privacy] liability for giving publicity to facts about the plaintiff's life which are matters of public record.'³⁹⁴ Prior publicity also generally negatives liability.³⁹⁵ In contrast, the English doctrine of confidence and s 12(4)(a)(i) of the HRA have adopted a more nuanced approach, whereby the existence of prior publicity is a relevant but not conclusive factor. Thus, in the leading decision, AG v Guardian Newspapers Limited (No 2),³⁹⁶ Lord Keith argued that whether information is in the public domain will often be a matter of degree and therefore prior disclosure to a limited group of people might not rob the information of its confidentiality, an approach which received general support in the case.³⁹⁷ The Law Commission, in its final report on the doctrine of confidence,³⁹⁸ decided not to follow its own earlier suggestion³⁹⁹ that information should automatically be classified as in the public domain if it is on a register or other record required by law to be open to the public. This, it is suggested, reflects a realistic recognition of the fact that there is a world of difference between, as Ingber puts it, 'the disclosure of a personal fact in a dusty public record hidden somewhere in the bowels of a county courthouse and a similar disclosure disseminated through the mass technology of the modern press'.⁴⁰⁰ This approach has been followed in recent cases involving disclosure of past criminal convictions, despite the fact that such convictions are arrived at and announced in open court.⁴⁰¹ While such approaches have been attacked,⁴⁰² it is notable that under the DPA 1998, information relating to a person's criminal record forms one of the seven categories of 'sensitive personal data',⁴⁰³ the processing of which attracts a higher level of safeguards than normal data.⁴⁰⁴ It should also be borne in mind that the public interest would often require disclosure in such cases, as it did in the two cases just cited.

394 Restatement, 625D.

395 See, eg, Sidis 113 F 2d 806 (2d Cir 1940) and Forsher v Bugliosi 26 Cal 3d 792, 608 P 2d 716, 163 Cal Rptr 628 (1980); cf the earlier decision in Melvin v Reid 112 Cal App 283 (1931).

396 [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL.

397 Ibid, p 260. His Lordship was referring specifically to the possibility of publication abroad—Spycatcher had been published in the United States—but the principle is of general application. Sir John Donaldson in the Court of Appeal took the same approach, remarking that 'it is a matter of degree' (ibid, p 177), as did Scott J (ibid, p 149). See also AG v Guardian Newspapers [1987] 1 WLR 1248 (the first Spycatcher case).

398 Op cit, fn 2, para 6.74; see also para 6.68.

399 Set out in their Working Paper No 58, para 103.

400 Ingber, S, 'Rethinking intangible injuries: a focus on remedy' (1985) Cal L Rev 772, pp 848–49, cited in Paton-Simpson, E, 'Private circles and public squares: invasion of privacy by the publication of "private facts"' (1998) 61 MLR 318 p 327; see also pp 326–29.

401 R v Chief Constable of North Wales Police ex p AB [1997] 3 WLR 724, CA; in Hellewell, the applicant complained that his 'mug shot', lawfully taken by the police, had been passed on to local retailers as part of their own anti-crime efforts, thus revealing the fact of his arrest. Laws treated the fact that the complainant had been involved with the police as 'not...a public fact' but 'prima facie at least...a piece of confidential information' ([1995] 1 WLR 804, p 810).

402 See Thompson [1995] Conv 404, pp 406–07.

403 Along with matters such as a person's sexual life, religious and political opinions, and his physical and mental health (s 2).

404 Markesenis points out that the German courts have also afforded privacy protection to ex-criminals whose records are revealed, hampering their rehabilitation (op cit, fn 1, p 123).

Similarly, the Law Commission has found that prior publicity some time ago in local newspapers should not preclude later legal protection for such information. Instead, their recommendation was simply that information could be said to be in the public domain only if 'having regard to its nature and the circumstances of its disclosure, it is generally available to the public'.⁴⁰⁵ They considered that information was not in the public domain if 'it is only accessible to the public after a significant contribution of labour, skill or money'.⁴⁰⁶ Such a flexible definition would allow courts to draw distinctions both between readily accessible public records and those buried in obscurity,⁴⁰⁷ and between matters reported some years previously in a local newspaper and the contemporary mass reporting of the same matter.⁴⁰⁸

It is suggested that such approaches are to be preferred to the more absolutist stance. While the latter has the advantage of making it relatively easy to predict in advance what can be disclosed with impunity, it relies, as Paton-Simpson has persuasively argued, on a simplistic and misleading attitude whereby privacy is treated as an all or nothing concept, rather than as a matter of degree.⁴⁰⁹ Nevertheless, in rejecting this approach, it is stressed that s 12 of the HRA and Art 10 of the Convention require the judiciary to have regard to the possible impact on press freedom in developing remedies against privacy: this must be considered in terms of the certainty or otherwise of definitions of private facts, as well as the substance of those definitions. The courts must therefore seek to strike a balance between a definition which is sufficiently sophisticated not to do manifest injustice to the underlying values they are seeking to protect, but which yet allows editors and journalists to foresee to a reasonable extent whether given actions will result in liability. As Zimmerman notes, 'The [US Supreme] Court has stated repeatedly that vague proscriptions against speech may chill the willingness of individuals and the media to take part in those communicative activities that are clearly protected by the First Amendment'.⁴¹⁰

Balancing privacy and speech rights

Introduction

As indicated throughout this chapter, the notion of the public interest has been the key domestic mechanism allowing for the balancing of speech and privacy rights.

405 Op cit, fn 2, para 6.74(i).

406 Ibid, para 6.74(ii). They gave the example of a reporter who combs through the back copies of a local newspaper in order to find out information about a now famous person; she would be gathering information not in the public domain, as she is expending considerable labour in the task (para 6.67).

407 It is clear that if the controller of the record is under a statutory duty not to disclose it to others, for example under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 or the Data Protection Act 1998, then the information should be regarded as prima facie confidential at common law also.

408 A similar approach was followed in the New Zealand case, TW3 Network Services Ltd v Broadcasting Standards Authority [1995] 2 NZLR (HC) 720, p 731: 'Although information has been made known to others, a degree of privacy, entitled to protection, may remain. In determining whether information has lost its private character it would be appropriate to look realistically at the nature, scale and timing of previous publications.'

409 See Paton-Simpson, op cit, fn 400.

410 Zimmerman, op cit, fn 195.

Under the HRA, as *Venables*⁴¹¹ and *Mills*⁴¹² indicated, such balancing will occur in confidence actions under s 12 of the HRA which draws in Art 10 and therefore Art 8, and takes account of any relevant privacy codes. Common law speech jurisprudence is also taken into account. Where an action for breach of Art 8 is brought directly against a media body which is a public authority, the same mechanisms apply, albeit by a slightly different route. The public authority will be bound by Arts 8 and 10 under s 6 of the HRA. Therefore, Art 8 need not be drawn in via s 12 and Art 10(2). This may be of some significance in terms of the structure of the argument seeking to create the speech-privacy balance, which is considered below. In this instance, Arts 10 and 8 on the face of it compete more clearly on equal terms. Section 12 will be relevant as a means of creating a balance between the two rights, again taking into account any privacy code. Where a statute is in question, particularly the DPA 1998, ss 3 and 12 will be the significant provisions, unless the data controller is a public authority, in which case it will be directly bound by the Convention rights under s 6. Under s 3, leeway in the DPA can be explored, allowing consideration to be paid to Art 10, in particular the question of the public interest in s 32 and the notion of an 'unwarranted' invasion of privacy in s 10. If, having considered the application of the DPA, it seems that freedom of expression might be affected, s 12 will become the main balancing mechanism allowing for the resolution of conflict between Arts 10 and 8. The obligation to consider the privacy code will flow from both the DPA and the HRA. But s 12(3) will not be applicable since, as indicated above, the DPA does not appear in most circumstances to allow for the use of injunctions against the media.

In all those instances, then, the statutory scheme of the HRA, the Convention rights and the relevant privacy codes provide the ground rules for determining when material should be published despite the invasion of privacy which will occur. This scheme is affected by the importation of the Strasbourg concepts of necessity and proportionality as applied under the HRA, Arts 10 and 8. In making determinations as to the application of those concepts in a particular instance, a form of public interest test is drawn into the equation under s 12(4)(b) since the relevant privacy codes, in particular that of the PCC, are heavily influenced by the test. Therefore, when persons seek to protect privacy interests, this scheme provides the principal mechanism which seeks to create a balanced resolution of the two rights of privacy and speech.

If such a defence is to produce consistent, principled and reasonably foreseeable resolutions of the conflicting interests at stake, rather than amounting merely to an ad hoc exercise of judicial "common sense", it is, it is suggested, essential that it be approached with an awareness of the values underlying both freedom of the press and privacy itself. In this section, therefore, principles are discussed which may be derived from an examination of the main free speech theories in the context of possible conflicts with privacy rights.

411 [2001] 1 All ER 908, Fam Div (High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division).
412 (2001) WL 720322.

Free speech theories and privacy

The theory that freedom of speech is necessary for the discovery of truth, discussed in the Introduction to Part II,⁴¹³ has been a strong influence in US jurisprudence⁴¹⁴ but not historically at Strasbourg⁴¹⁵ or in the UK courts.⁴¹⁶ It has been persuasively argued that this rationale has little application to the paradigm privacy case, in which intimate facts about an individual are revealed. Barendt has contended that ‘Mill’s argument...applies more strongly to assertions of opinion...than to...propositions of fact’⁴¹⁷ The argument is that since privacy actions attempt to prevent the publication of private facts only, and not general expressions of opinion, they will pose little threat to that free and unhindered public debate about matters of importance which Mill’s argument seeks to protect. Moreover, as Schauer has argued,⁴¹⁸ on finding out a new fact, it may not replace a previously false belief, but merely add to what was previously ‘epistemologically empty space’. Much intrusive journalism merely communicates a set of probably trivial facts about a given figure and it is very hard to maintain plausibly that the simple acquisition of such factual information has any inherent truth value. However, this is not the case in relation to some investigative journalism. For example, the revelation of the paedophile tendencies of a right wing evangelist leading a campaign against homosexual rights would contribute to various strands of public debate. Anonymity orders covering relatives of children involved in criminal proceedings may also indirectly stifle debate.

Similarly, the justification for speech which may be referred to as the argument from autonomy⁴¹⁹ arguably has minimal application in this area, and indeed the values it espouses actually point to a reasonable degree of privacy protection. The basic thesis is that matters of substantive moral choice must be left to the individual as an autonomous, rational agent (subject, of course, to his duty to respect the basic rights of others); therefore, the State offends against human dignity, or treats certain citizens with contempt, if the coercive powers of the law are used to enforce the moral convictions of some upon others by, say, banning certain kinds of pornography or extreme political discourse.⁴²⁰ It is immediately apparent that much privacy-invading speech, by both directly assaulting informational autonomy and indirectly threatening the individual’s freedom of choice over substantive issues,⁴²¹ far from being bolstered by the autonomy 413 See pp 202–03. The most famous exposition of the ‘truth’ argument is to be found in Mill’s On Liberty, in Cowling (ed), Selected Writings of John Stuart Mill, 1968, p 121.

414 See the famous dicta of Judge Learned Hand in United States v Associated Press (1943) 52 F Supp 362, p 372; and of Holmes J, dissenting but with the concurrence of Brandeis J, in Abrams v United States (1919) 250 US 616, p 630.

415 The repeated reference by the ECtHR to freedom of expression being one of the ‘basic conditions for [society’s] progress’ (see, eg, Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 49) could be seen as a reference to the justification.

416 But see, recently, R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, p 408, per Lord Steyn.

417 Freedom of Speech, 1985, p 191.

418 Schauer, F, ‘Reflections on the value of truth’ (1991) 41 Case Western Reserve L Rev 699, p 708. His other categories are: ‘one’s belief may be unjustified [though possibly true]; [and] one’s belief can be false.’

419 The argument has been most recently and influentially put by writers in the revived tradition of deontological liberalism. See Chapter 1, p 6.

420 The particular concern of Thomas Scanlon’s influential approach set out in ‘A theory of freedom of expression’ (1972) 1 Phil & Pub Aff 216.

421 See pp 530–33, above.

rationale, is in direct conflict with it. The State, in restricting what one citizen may be told about the private life of another, is not acting out of a paternalistic desire to impose a set of moral values thereby, but rather to assure an equal freedom to all to live by their own values.

The argument from self development—that the freedom to engage in the free expression and reception of ideas and opinions in various media is essential to human development⁴²²—has received some recognition at Strasbourg⁴²³ and recently in the House of Lords.⁴²⁴ As with the argument from autonomy, it is immediately apparent that this justification, since it seeks to facilitate human flourishing, far from inevitably opposing the right to privacy, must support it to some extent since, as argued above,⁴²⁵ a reasonable degree of privacy is a requirement, not a threat to individual self-development, particularly the human capacity to form intimate relationships, without which the capacity for individual growth would be severely curtailed.

Moreover, as Barendt has argued,⁴²⁶ it is implausible to view most newspaper reporters as freely serving their own human need for self-development. The focus must therefore be on the readers of such material. Joseph Raz has proposed a theory of freedom of expression which he argues provides a reader-based justification for expression and is concerned not with 'serious' public debate, but with the type of speech which is 'often overlooked' or seen as 'trivial'.⁴²⁷ He points out that much public expression in the media portrays and expresses aspects of forms of different lifestyles⁴²⁸ which, he argues, 'Validate the styles of life portrayed'. Conversely, censorship is not only an 'insult' to the persons leading the lifestyle censored—a point which sounds very like Dworkin's argument for freedom of expression based on equal respect for citizens⁴²⁹—but it also, in a more instrumental vein, denies those living the lifestyle the opportunity for reassurance, the sense that they are not alone in their lifestyles and its problems, and also the chance for the public to learn about the widest possible range of lifestyles, thus maximising their freedom of choice.⁴³⁰

Raz considers that his argument does not in general justify revelations about particular individuals, but may do so in relation to 'individuals who have become symbols of certain cultures, or ideologies, or...styles of life'.⁴³¹ It is clear, 422 See the Introduction to Part II, pp 204–05. Emerson, C, for example, argues that the right to free expression is justified as the right of the individual to realise his character and potentialities through forming his own beliefs and opinions: 'Towards a general theory of the First Amendment' (1963) 72 Yale LJ 877, pp 879–80; see also Redish, M, Freedom of Expression, 1984, pp 20–30.

423 One of the stock phrases of the European Court of Human Rights in relation to the value of freedom of expression asserts that it is one of the 'essential foundations for the development of everyone' (eg, Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 49).

424 Per Lord Steyn in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115, p 498.

425 See pp 530–31.

426 Barendt and Hitchens, op cit, fn 417, p 68; he concedes that such arguments may have some applicability to the writers of 'fringe or underground journals'.

427 Raz, J, Free expression and personal identification' (1991) 11(3) OJLS 303, p 310.

428 Ibid: 'Views and opinions, activities, emotions etc, expressed or portrayed are an aspect of a wider net of opinions, sensibilities, habits of action or dressing, attitudes etc which taken together form a distinctive style of form of life.'

429 Dworkin, A Matter of Principle 1985, esp pp 272–74.

430 Raz, op cit, fn 427, p 312.

431 Ibid, p 316.

however, that if speech which invades the privacy of such individuals is restricted, the ‘message’ sent by the State thereby, far from suggesting condemnation or contempt for the lifestyle revealed, in fact displays respect for the ability of the individual to decide for himself whether he wishes to share his life-decisions with the public at large. Moreover, the reassuring knowledge that control of such information rests with the individual will surely further the core aim of the self-fulfilment justification—the ability of persons to make free choices to experience and experiment with the widest possible range of lifestyles and activities. Conversely, the inability of the individual to exercise such control would, as argued above, amount to a significant ‘chilling effect’ upon the willingness of individuals to make controversial choices about their personal lives. On both deontological and consequentialist arguments, then, this justification tends to support a reasonable degree of protection for informational autonomy.

As the Introduction to Part II explained, the ‘self-governance’ or argument from democracy is viewed as ‘the most influential theory in the development of 20th century free speech law’,⁴³² an assertion supported by examination of the approach of UK and Strasbourg judges, discussed in the Introduction to Part II. Its basic thesis is that citizens cannot participate fully in a democracy unless they have a reasonable understanding of political issues; therefore, open debate on such matters is necessary to ensure the proper working of a democracy;⁴³³ as Lord Steyn has put it, ‘freedom of speech is the lifeblood of democracy’.⁴³⁴ In so far as democracy rests upon ideas both of participation and accountability, the argument from democracy may be seen to encompass also the function which a free press performs in exposing abuses of power,⁴³⁵ thereby allowing for their remedy and also providing a deterrent effect for those contemplating such wrongdoing.⁴³⁶

As has been indicated previously, it is a marked feature of the Strasbourg jurisprudence that clearly political speech receives a much more robust degree of protection than other types of expression.⁴³⁷ Thus, the ‘political’ speech cases discussed in this book⁴³⁸ all resulted in findings that Art 10 had been violated and all were marked by an intensive review of the restriction in question. In contrast, in cases involving artistic speech, supported by the values of autonomy and self-development rather than self-government, an exactly converse pattern emerges: applicants have tended to be unsuccessful and a deferential approach to the judgments of the national authorities as to its obscene or blasphemous nature has

432 See pp 203–04.

433 See Meiklejohn, A, ‘The First Amendment is an absolute’ (1961) Sup Ct Rev 245 and Political Freedom, 1960, esp pp 115–24.

434 R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115, p 408.

435 See Blasi, V, ‘The checking value in First Amendment theory’ (1977) Am B Found Res J 521.

436 See Greenwalt, K, ‘Free speech justifications’ (1989) 89 Columb L Rev 119, p 143.

437 See Chapter 4, pp 209–10 above.

438 See, eg, Jersild v Denmark (1994) 19 EHRR 1; Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 103, discussed above, p 209.

been adopted.⁴³⁹ AS indicated in Part II a similar pattern may be discerned in the domestic jurisprudence: the most lofty rhetorical assertions of the importance of free speech and the strongest determination to protect it have been evident in cases where journalistic material raises political issues, broadly defined.⁴⁴⁰ In such cases, the courts have either overtly adopted the Strasbourg principles described above⁴⁴¹ or have strongly emphasised the high status freedom of speech holds in the common law, as 'a constitutional right'.⁴⁴² Media freedom in relation to political expression has clearly been recognised as having a particularly high value in UK law and Convention jurisprudence. In contrast, when speech supported by the arguments from self-development or autonomy rather than self-government is in question, decisions have tended to be far more cautious.⁴⁴³

Two points emerge from this discussion. Where speech is supported mainly by arguments from autonomy, truth and self-development, there will in general be little or no justification at the level of principle for allowing it to override privacy; indeed, the discussion above reveals the truth of Emerson's remark that, far from being invariably in conflict, the twin rights to freedom of speech and to privacy 'are mutually supportive, in that both are vital features of the basic system of individual rights'.⁴⁴⁴ In more practical terms, the type of speech which, as we have seen, receives the highest level of protection, namely political speech, is by its nature most unlikely to conflict with the right to privacy. In many cases it will not raise privacy issues, as where it consists of the discussion of political ideas, institutions, and policies. Where political speech does concern individuals, as where it reveals abuse of State power, the conflict is more likely to be with reputation than privacy.⁴⁴⁵ Conversely, the paradigm cases of journalistic invasions of privacy which, by definition, involve the personal, not the public-political affairs of its subject, usually involve celebrities rather than public servants, and are driven by purely commercial considerations. Such publications simply do not engage core Art 10 values such as

-
- 439 See Chapter 6, pp 277–81, at which the following cases are discussed: Müller v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212; Gibson v UK, App No 17634 (declared inadmissible by Commission); Handyside v UK, A 24 (1976) (not a case involving artistic speech but where the issue was obscenity); Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34; Gay News v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 123. In Wingrove v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 1, the Court remarked: 'Whereas there is little scope under Article 10(2) of the Convention for restrictions on political speech or on debate of questions of public...a wider margin of appreciation is generally available to the Contracting States when regulating freedom of expression in relation to matters liable to offend intimate personal convictions within the sphere of morals or, especially, religion' (para 58). See Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op cit, fn 27, pp 397 and 414.
- 440 Reynolds v Times Newspapers; Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534; R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115. However, deference to widely drafted primary legislation (Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696) or governmental arguments from national security (AG v Guardian Newspapers [1987] 1 WLR 1248) has resulted in the ready upholding of restrictions on directly political speech.
- 441 See the approach of the Court of Appeal in Derbyshire (ibid) and in Ex p Leech [1994] QB 198, of the House of Lords in Reynolds, pp 621–22, per Lord Nicholls, pp 628 and esp 635, per Lord Steyn, p 643, per Lord Cooke and Ex p Simms, p 407 per Lord Steyn and pp 419–20 per Lord Hobhouse.
- 442 Reynolds v Times Newspapers, pp 628–29 (Lord Steyn). In Ex p Simms (p 11), Lord Steyn described the right as 'fundamental', as did Lord Hoffman (ibid, p 412).
- 443 Gibson [1990] 2 QB 619; Knulier v DPP [1973] AC 435; Lemon [1979] AC 617.
- 444 Emerson, 'The right of privacy and the freedom of the press' (1979) 14(2) Harvard Civil Rights—Civil Liberties L Rev 329, p 331.
- 445 As in the recent case of Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534, in which the former Irish Taoiseach sued newspapers which published reports accusing him of lying to the Irish Dail; see also, eg, Lingens (1986) 8 EHRR 103 and Thorgeirson (1992) 14 EHRR 843.

the furtherance of a democratic society. Thus, it will only be in a fairly narrow category of cases that any real conflict will arise—those where the publication in question relates to the personal life of a particular figure,⁴⁴⁶ but there is a serious argument that it serves a valuable purpose in revealing a matter relevant to that person's fitness for office, or in furthering public knowledge or debate about matters of serious public concern. The remainder of this section will consider approaches to the resolution of such hard cases.

Approaches to the speech-privacy balance: structure

It is apparent from Convention jurisprudence that, where two Convention rights come into conflict, some kind of balancing act between the two needs to be undertaken.⁴⁴⁷ Although jurisprudence in this area is very limited, it appears that the margin of appreciation becomes particularly significant here, so that States have a fairly wide discretion in resolving the conflict.⁴⁴⁸ Domestic courts therefore have an appreciable degree of latitude in determining where to strike the balance between the two interests. Section 12 of the HRA, which enjoins the court to have 'particular regard' to Art 10 when making any order which might infringe it, appears on its face to suggest a higher weighting for speech interests. Such imbalance is also prima facie suggested by the strength of the 'speech' jurisprudence at both the Strasbourg and domestic levels discussed above. In Ex p Simms,⁴⁴⁹ Lord Steyn referred to free speech as 'the primary right...in a democracy' and some commentators take the view that Art 10 attracts an especially high level of protection at Strasbourg.⁴⁵⁰ The contrast with the meagre case law on privacy at the European level with its cautious approach to intervention between private individuals, and the historic failure of English judges to recognise such a right in the common law, might suggest that the twin rights to speech and privacy do not currently occupy an equal footing. It might therefore be feared—or hoped—that English law will come to replicate the position in the US where, as Wacks puts it, 'It is widely acknowledged that the... "newsworthiness" defence has effectively demolished the private-facts tort'.⁴⁵¹

Such fears would be, it is suggested, misplaced. Save for admitting the distinction between those rights stated in absolute terms, such as Arts 3, 4 and 7 and those subject to generalised exceptions (8–11), Strasbourg has never sought to establish a hierarchy of Convention rights. Rather, where rights collide, it has advocated a careful examination of the competing claims of each in the light of all the circumstances of the case.⁴⁵² There is no indication that Parliament, in passing 446 See the conclusions of the Calcutt Report on this point (op cit, fn 1, at paras 12.24–12.29).

447 Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 55. The two Convention rights in conflict there were free speech itself and—so the court found—the right to religious freedom, protected by Art 9.

448 Ibid. As Chapter 6 explained, the restriction on Art 10 entailed by the seizure of an allegedly blasphemous film was justified by reference to the Art 9 right to freedom of religious belief. The Court applied a wide margin of appreciation, and simply said that 'the content of the film cannot be viewed as incapable of grounding' the conclusion of the national authorities that seizure was justified (para 56). Thus the test applied was reminiscent of the narrow Wednesbury standard of unreasonableness.

449 [2000] 2 AC 115, p 407.

450 Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies, and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58 CLJ 509, p 524 and note 79.

451 Wacks, op cit, fn 1, p 113.

452 See the views of Lord Steyn and Lord Cooke in Reynolds [1999] 4 All ER 609, pp 631 and 643.

the HRA, intended to alter this position and create a serious imbalance between the two rights;⁴⁵³ rather, it is evident that the sponsors of the amendment which became s 12 saw it merely as a domestic reflection of the Strasbourg approach.⁴⁵⁴ Moreover, the unbalanced American approach is out of line with other jurisdictions and flows from factors peculiar to that jurisdiction, namely the absolute nature of the First Amendment, and the fact that it is not balanced by any constitutional right to informational privacy.⁴⁵⁵ Where privacy has such a status, as in Germany and Canada, courts have rejected any notion of establishing an a priori ranking of rights.⁴⁵⁶

The issue of balance arises in another, more subtle form: how should the courts structure the competing claims of speech and privacy? At present, speech considerations arise as a defence in common law and in statutory provisions protecting aspects of privacy—apart from the DPA, which contains no general defence, although the public interest is an important factor in the media exemption under s 32. In Reynolds, however, a libel case, where expression interests also function as a defence, the House of Lords took a different approach. “The starting point,” Lord Steyn stated,⁴⁵⁷ ‘is now the right of freedom of expression, a right based on a constitutional or higher legal order foundation. Exceptions...must be justified as being necessary in a democracy. In other words, freedom of expression is the rule, and regulation of speech is the exception requiring justification’.⁴⁵⁸ These findings were echoed in the Mills case.⁴⁵⁹ They are in line with the general Strasbourg approach which finds that in cases in which other interests potentially threaten free speech, the concern is not with ‘a choice between two conflicting principles but with a principle of freedom of expression that is subject to a number of exceptions which must be narrowly interpreted’.⁴⁶⁰ If this approach is applied in domestic privacy cases, as seems possible,⁴⁶¹ the result will be that privacy will lose its Convention status as a fully fledged right, becoming instead merely a narrowly interpreted exception to the right of freedom of expression.

This, however, would introduce a striking asymmetry: the protection of the right to privacy would have to be justified as necessary in a democratic society, while the claims of free speech would be simply assumed. This could not be right. While the 453 An amendment providing that a court should ‘normally’ give precedence to Art 10 over Art 8 was rejected (HC Deb Vol 315 Cols 542–13,2 July 1998).

454 See, eg, the speech of Jack Straw on new cl 12: HC Deb Vol 315 Cols 535–39,2 July 1998.

455 The US Supreme Court has fashioned a constitutional right to what it has termed ‘privacy’, but by this it signifies choice over substantive matters, such as sexual activity and abortion: see, eg, Griswold v Connecticut (1965) 381 US 479 and Roe v Wade (1979) 410 US 113.

456 The German Supreme Court has remarked that the protection of personality [including privacy] and of free expression are both ‘essential aspects of the liberal democratic order...with the result that neither can claim precedence in principle over the other’ (BVerfGE 35, 200)—we are indebted to Markesenis’s translation (op cit, fn 1, p 123)). For an example of the Canadian approach, see Hill v Church of Scientology [1995] 2 SCR 1130, p 1179 and the recent decision in Les Editions Vice Versa Inc v Aubry [1999] 5 BHRC 437, which involved a careful balancing of the rights to privacy and speech.

457 An approach echoed by Lord Nicholls: ‘My starting point is freedom of expression’ (Reynolds [1999] 4 All ER 609, p 621).

458 Ibid, p 629.

459 See fn 289 above and associated text.

460 Sunday Times v UK A 30 (1979), para 65.

461 There were signs of this approach in Mills v NGN [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322.

European Court has not addressed the matter explicitly,⁴⁶² it must be the case that where a restriction on a Convention right is justified not as serving one of the societal interests the Convention enumerates,⁴⁶³ such as economic well being or protection of morals, but as ensuring the protection of another Convention guarantee, a different approach must be followed. In cases where Convention rights have clashed, Strasbourg has still formally followed the standard approach, treating one right as primary, so that restrictions upon it by a competing right have to be justified as necessary in a democratic society. However, this is because when Strasbourg hears cases brought by individuals alleging a violation of a Convention right, other, competing rights, figure only as possible means of justification for the respondent State. By contrast, the position of a domestic court is fundamentally different: except in instances in which the media body is a public authority, both sides before it will be private bodies or individuals; both will claim that their rights are equally in issue. Even where a body, such as the BBC, is a public authority, it is suggested that, as argued above, it can exercise Convention rights.⁴⁶⁴ It would therefore be quite perverse for such a domestic court, by a prior ordering, to assign one right (speech) a position as the primary norm, and the other (privacy) that of a mere exception to it.

The better approach, it is suggested, would be for the court to consider the issue from two perspectives. It might first be asked whether Art 10 was engaged, and, if so, s 12 of the HRA would apply. The standard Convention test would then be followed, asking whether the interference with the Art 10 guarantee proposed by the plaintiff would be necessary in a democratic society and proportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting private life. But since, under s 12, Art 10(2) is drawn into play, affording an equal status, according to the findings in *Douglas*⁴⁶⁵ and Mills,⁴⁶⁶ to Art 8 as one of the 'rights of others', the court should then consider the issue from the opposing perspective, with the rights reversed in position, so that the speech interest was treated as an exception to the primary right to respect for privacy under Art 8. The same inquiries as to necessity and proportionality could then be made from this opposing perspective. This is even more clearly the case where Art 8 must be considered due to the demands of ss 6 or 3 of the HRA. In this way, useful insights could be gleaned by asking, for example, both whether the publication in question was more intrusive than was necessary to its legitimate aim of provoking discussion on matters of public interest or revealing a lack of fitness for public office, and, conversely, whether the remedy sought by the plaintiff went further than was necessary in order to protect the legitimate privacy interest. In a manner reminiscent of the approach of the German⁴⁶⁷ and Canadian courts,⁴⁶⁸ the claims of both parties would thus be subject to a searching, but balanced examination.

462 There are relatively few cases where the issue has arisen. One of the most important is Otto-Preminger: see discussion in Chapter 6, pp 317–19.

463 See the second paragraph of Arts 8–11.

464 See fn 134, above.

465 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

466 [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322.

467 See Markesinis and Nolte, op cit, fn 43, pp 122–24.

468 See fn 456, above.

Resolving the conflict: content and outcomes

In order to resolve a given case under this approach, a court would clearly have to make some assessment of the weight of the competing interests engaged, always a requirement when proportionality is in issue.⁴⁶⁹ In assessing the gravity of the invasion of privacy involved, many of the considerations explored above would be of relevance. Thus, it could be asked: how intimate were the facts revealed; had they received some previous publicity; had the events reported happened in a very intimate setting (for example, the plaintiff's home) or in a more 'public' environment, such as a restaurant, a beach, or even the street; had particularly intrusive means, such as telephone tapping, been used to obtain the information; did the publication affect, or was it likely to affect, substantive privacy interests?⁴⁷⁰

In determining the strength of the opposing speech claim, the court could, as suggested, start by asking how far the expression in question was bolstered by any of the free speech justifications examined above, or indeed how far it opposed them. Thus, for example, mere reportage of a celebrity's sexual life would be likely to have little or no truth value, be actively opposed by autonomy and developmental considerations, and contribute little or nothing to debate on matters of substantive public interest. Conversely, a serious story concerning, say, the homosexual affairs of a well known politician who publicly advocated very conservative 'family values' would contribute to political discussion, influence the standing of the political party in question, and reveal a public deception, engaging the self-government and—to a lesser extent—the 'truth' justifications quite strongly.

In such 'fitness for office' cases, the status of the individual concerned would obviously be of some importance. In this respect, English courts could build on the US approach, which strives, as Prosser puts it, for a 'rough proportion[ality]', between the importance of the office or position the person holds and the amount and range of ordinarily protected information that may be revealed'.⁴⁷¹ Not only does the public have a greater need to know about more powerful figures, such individuals must have foreseen the close scrutiny that their lives would come under through accepting the basic duty of democratic accountability when taking up office, a factor regarded as relevant both in domestic law⁴⁷² and at Strasbourg.⁴⁷³ Thus, where the plaintiff held elected position or was employed by the State to make 469 See Craig, P, Administrative Law, 1999, p 591.

470 Dignity, substantive autonomy and the ability of the plaintiff to form intimate relationships with others (see pp 530–32 above).

471 Prosser, op cit, fn 182, p 417.

472 As the Court of Appeal put it in the Reynolds case ([1998] 3 WLR 862, p 910): '...those who engage in public life must expect and accept that their public conduct will be the subject of close scrutiny and robust criticism...' Note that having regard to such a matter is not the same as the 'implied consent' argument earlier criticised. The foresight of risk of the person concerned becomes not a means of stripping away any prima facie claim to privacy that they may have, but rather as a means of adding weight to a speech argument in competition with an admitted privacy claim.

473 Thus, eg, in Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 103, para 42, the Court remarked that: '...a politician...unlike [a private individual] inevitably and knowingly lays himself open to close scrutiny of his every word and deed by both journalists and the public at large, and he must consequently display a greater degree of tolerance.'

decisions directly affecting the basic interests of the citizenry,⁴⁷⁴ there would in general be a stronger argument for the press under the self-governance justification. However, the courts should be astute to recognise that certain persons, who are celebrities or well known in some field, although formally mere private citizens, may nevertheless wield what Lord Cooke recently described as ‘great practical power over the lives of people or great influence in the formation of public opinion... [which] may indeed exceed that of most politicians’.⁴⁷⁵ The distinction between the two should, nevertheless, still be recognised: the public, even if informed about distasteful aspects of a celebrity’s private life, has no control by means of the democratic process over those with only de facto public power,⁴⁷⁶ and thus, arguably, less need to know about them.

Some evaluation must also be made of the importance of the subject matter of the publication, a more difficult issue. Where it is claimed that it revealed matters relevant to an assessment of an individual’s fitness for office, an immediate problem arises: who is to decide whether a given piece of conduct is relevant to such an assessment? Suppose, for example, that an article revealed the extra-marital affair of a government minister and the justification urged by the newspaper is the belief, held by some, that ‘If the minister will lie to his wife about an affair, he will lie to the public about political matters’.⁴⁷⁷ If the court decided that this belief was nonsense, and that the affair was not relevant to the minister’s fitness for office, the judge would in effect be dictating to the public what it should and should not take into account in exercising its collective right to self-determination.⁴⁷⁸ The exercise of this right surely involves the public not only in judging a politician’s fitness for office, but also in being able to decide for itself what criteria to employ in making that assessment.

Real as this objection is, we suggest that it can be overcome. It is evident that the alternative would mean that judges would be forced to allow publicity about virtually any aspects of a public figure’s life on the basis that it was not for her to say that such revelations could not be relevant to the views of some member of the public. Privacy for such figures would therefore be wholly destroyed, an outcome which must be wrong in principle under a system which, in accordance with the 474 Eg, the Chairman of the Bank of England and other powerful central banks (eg, the Federal Reserve in America and the European Central Bank), persons such as Chief Constables of police, chairs of powerful quangos, etc.

475 Reynolds [1998] 3 WLR 862, p 640. In this respect it is, as Ivan Hare remarks, ‘revealing that the US Supreme Court in the years after Sullivan (1964) 376 US 254 expanded the scope of the “actual malice” rule [in defamation] from public officials to public figures’ (‘Is the privileged position of political expression justified?’, op cit, fn 9).

476 Thus, revelations about the private lives of various Conservative MPs in the early 1990s and about the former Welsh Secretary, Ron Davies, in 1998, led directly to their falls from political life through the direct or indirect effect of public opinion. By contrast, even if the extensive and often adverse publicity given to the break-up of the marriage of Rupert Murdoch in 1998 changed public opinion about him, no direct consequences could flow from this.

477 Somewhat different issues would arise if the revelation revealed an active, public deceit, such as where one who has held himself out as a conservative moraliser is revealed as an adulterer. The principle of correcting a publicly created false impression appears as one of the defences to press intrusion in the various privacy measures suggested by the Calcutt Report (op cit, fn 1, para 12.23); it appears in the Code of the PCC (see pp 552–53 above); see also Woodward v Hutchins [1977] 1 WLR 760, p 764. The factor is also seen as relevant in the German courts: see BGH 5 May 1964, BGHZ NJW 1964.

478 This problem, adverted to in Gertz (1974) 418 US 323, p 346, has led US courts to allow press interests to prevail over privacy as a general rule.

Convention, is committed to a sensitive balancing of the two rights.⁴⁷⁹ In Lingens,⁴⁸⁰ the Court remarked that the protection for reputation under Art 10(2) 'extends to politicians too, even when they are not acting in their private capacity'. As indicated above, this stance is accepted under the PCC Code, cl 3 and the BSC Code, cl 17. A fortiori, the right to privacy—unlike reputation, a primary right under the Convention—must encompass politicians when they are acting in such a capacity. Moreover, a judge making some assessment as to the relevance of the information to fitness for office would be making his judgment not out of contempt for the views of others, or paternalism, but simply because the rights of others demanded that some line be drawn.⁴⁸¹ Finally, the courts could employ some relatively weak test whereby the press would have to show merely that in the view of a rational person, the information could be of real relevance to an assessment of fitness for office. The rational person should, however, be taken to be reasonably broad-minded and tolerant, in line with the view of the European Court that such values are essential in a democratic society.⁴⁸²

In other cases, the justification for stories about an individual's private life will be, not that they are relevant to her fitness for office, but more generally, that they contribute to discussion of matters of general interest. The problem with this justification is that it can be used so broadly as to encompass almost any invasion of privacy, apart from pictures clearly designed merely to titillate. If its breadth and imprecision are not confronted head on, it could lead to the virtual abrogation of any privacy remedy which does develop. Where such speech is not directly political, it will not lie at the core of the self-governance justification. But, to quote Lord Cooke in Reynolds: 'Matters other than those pertaining to government and politics may be just as important in the community'.⁴⁸³ Such speech which, as Zimmerman puts it, can 'inform the social, political, moral and philosophical positions of individual citizens'⁴⁸⁴ could include revelations relating to matters as diverse as eating disorders, abortion, attitudes to sexuality, education and the like; it will often concern not politicians, but celebrities and their relatives⁴⁸⁵ and those who, for a short time and for a particular reason only, are thrust into the public gaze.

It is suggested that the courts should be slow to accept that the use of a person's private life to provoke discussion, efficacious as it may be, is justified under Art 10 grounds. The example of so called 'outing' illustrates the objection: the argument in favour of such revelations is that if the public comes to learn that a person they admire or respect is homosexual, this may force them to re-examine their own 479 It should be noted that the German Supreme Court has held that 'even politicians who are in the limelight are entitled to have their privacy respected' (BGHZ 72, pp 120, 122–23).

480 (1986) 8 EHRR 103, para 42 (emphasis added).

481 As Lord Nicholls put it in Reynolds [1999] 4 All ER 609, p 624: '...an outside body...one other than the newspaper itself [must] decide... This is bound to be so, if the decision of the press itself is not to be determinative... The court has the advantage of being impartial [and] independent of government.'

482 See, eg, Otto-Preminger (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 47.

483 Ibid., p 640.

484 Ibid., p 346. Meiklejohn accepted a wide definition of protected speech: 'The First Amendment is an absolute' (1961) Sup Ct Rev 245, p 256.

485 The relatives of celebrities are increasingly becoming a focus for media attention: see the analysis of Natasha Walker, (2000) The Independent, 14 February, and the Spencer case itself, in which the stories complained of appeared under headlines such as: 'Di's sister-in-law in booze and bulimia clinic' (News of the World, 2 April 1995).

prejudices against homosexuality.⁴⁸⁶ The objection is that this justification is utilitarian to the point of ruthlessness. It amounts in effect to forcing a person to provide highly personal information for the purposes of fuelling public debate and therefore amounts to one of the clearest breaches one could imagine of the Kantian imperative to treat persons as ends in themselves. For example, the disputed article concerning the former child prodigy, in the American case of Sidis,⁴⁸⁷ was ‘a merciless’ dissection of Sidis’ life, which had a ‘devastating effect’ upon him, but was justified partly on the basis that, as Zimmerman puts it, it provided ‘helpful insights into the problems experienced by gifted children’,⁴⁸⁸ or, as the court said, it was ‘instructive’.⁴⁸⁹ It is apparent that such an approach would have the effect, as in America, of virtually demolishing the right to privacy, since virtually all pieces of personal information about a person in the public view could be seen as relevant to some area of public debate.⁴⁹⁰ Moreover, as argued above,⁴⁹¹ one of the principal justifications for open discussion of different lifestyles and the like is to promote autonomous choice and diversity: acts of intrusive journalism, likely to deter others from taking up controversial lifestyles, are in clear conflict with this aim.

In assessing the speech value of a given publication, the court should, as suggested above,⁴⁹² consider whether the restrictions which each party proposes to place upon the other are ‘necessary in a democratic society’. The plaintiff’s concerns might in some cases be sufficiently answered, not by injunctioning the publication, but simply by requiring it to be anonymised. On the other hand, in relation to a publication which, it was claimed, contributed to public debate, it might be asked whether there was not another means of so contributing which would not have involved a violation of privacy. Given that in our contemporary, confessional culture, there are a large number of people, ranging from private individuals to celebrities, who are prepared to reveal intimate aspects of their lives in a wholly voluntary manner, it might be difficult to maintain that the invasion of privacy involved in publishing completely involuntary revelations was in any way necessary for that continuation of public debate which is admittedly valuable. Where, instead, it was claimed that a publication threw light on a particular person’s fitness for office, if the court decided that the basic facts conveyed should be protected under Art 10, it could go on to consider whether the details of the publication went further than was necessary in informing the public. Thus, it has been said that while it is arguable that the public have a right to know about a Cabinet minister’s adulterous affair, they do not need to know ‘the content of such a person’s intimate conversations or the details of his or her sexual activity’.⁴⁹³ Thus, a court might make some attempt to sift out those aspects of journalistic 486 In Sipple v Chronicle Publishing Co (201 Cal Rpt 665 1984), an ex-marine foiled an assassination attempt upon President Ford, thereafter attracting great media interest. A Californian newspaper revealed that Sipple was homosexual, a matter which he had concealed from his relatives. The court decided the case partly on the basis that ‘the exposure was motivated by the wish to combat the stereotyping of homosexuals as “timid, weak and unheroic”’.

487 113 F 2d 806 (2d Cir 1940).

488 Zimmerman, op cit, fn 195.

489 Zimmerman, op cit, fn 195, p 807.

490 See Zimmerman’s defence of this position (op cit, fn 195, p 353).

491 See the discussion of Raz’s views, pp 620–21 above.

492 Page 625.

493 National Heritage Select Committee, op cit, fn 1, para 5.

reportage which serve some serious function from those which, under the banner of promoting democratic accountability, merely peddle titillation or gossip. As was said in Mills, the freedom to publish only that which judges view as responsible is no freedom. Nevertheless, if the right to respect for privacy, now given clear recognition for the first time in domestic law, is to be afforded genuine weight, some consideration must be given to the genuine public interest value of privacy-invading speech, taking into account the factors discussed.

Remedies

The privacy measures considered in this chapter—apart from the ‘powers’ of the PCC in relation to the PCC Code—offer a variety of remedies. The ITC has a number of internal remedies at its command and since it is a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, it must act in accordance with Arts 10 and 8 in applying them. Various criminal offences arise under the DPA 1998, while reporting restrictions can be enforced in contempt proceedings. Compensation is available under s 13 of the DPA and journalists are subject to a less restricted liability to pay damages than other data controllers. However, as indicated above, it appears that interim injunctions are not obtainable under s 32 of the DPA unless the claimant is seeking to prevent re-publication of the material. If the doctrine of confidence is relied on, a number of civil remedies are available, and those remedies are presumably also available where an action is brought directly for invasion of privacy under Art 8 against a media body which is a public authority under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA.⁴⁹⁴ Where an action was brought directly against a media body, either under the doctrine of confidence or, in the case of the BBC or Channel 4 under the HRA, the claimant would normally be seeking an injunction. In the case of the ITC, the order sought by the claimant could be a declaration or a mandatory order, since he or she would be asking the ITC to use its powers either to punish a broadcaster or to prevent a future broadcast. Orders against the BSC would presumably take the form of mandatory orders or declarations. These remedies are considered below, together with the impact on them of s 12 of the HRA.

An account of profits⁴⁹⁵ is available in confidence cases. Damages are also available,⁴⁹⁶ whether or not the court could also have ordered injunctive relief in the particular circumstances.⁴⁹⁷ While there is, as yet, no authority for the award of 494 See further Chapter 4, pp 157–59.

495 The court will not award both, on the basis that this would compensate the plaintiff twice over. See the comments of the Law Commission in its Working Paper No 58, Cmnd 5012, 1972, para 123.

496 Under Lord Cairns’ Act; see Wacks, op cit, fn 1, pp 149, 151, and fns 28 and 44.

497 Damages may be awarded in addition to, or substitution for, injunctive relief regardless of whether, in the particular circumstances of the case, a court would have chosen to grant injunctive relief provided the court has jurisdiction to grant an injunction: Hooper v Rogers [1975] 1 Ch 43, p 48, per Russell LJ. See also Race Relations Board v Applin [1973] 1 QB 815 and the views of Capper (‘Damages for breach of the equitable duty of confidence’ (1994) 14 LS 313) and Gurry, op cit, fn 153, Chapter 23. See Wacks, op cit, fn 1, p 151, note 46; cf the views of Megarry VC in Malone v Comr of Police for the Metropolis (No 2) [1979] 1 Ch 344.

damages for emotional distress, precedents exist in other areas of law.⁴⁹⁸ However, the most important issue both for plaintiffs and for media freedom will be the question of the basis on which the courts will grant an interlocutory injunction to restrain publication. From the plaintiff's perspective, obtaining an injunction is vital in privacy cases, far more so than in defamation. This is because the damage done to reputation by initial publication can be subsequently restored by a public finding that the allegation was false. By contrast, if private information is made public, the law can compensate for this harm at final trial by awarding damages, but it cannot in any way cure the invasion of privacy: it cannot erase the information revealed from people's memories. From the defendant's perspective, on the other hand, if the story is topical, even an interim injunction might kill it off completely. Thus, as Robertson and Nichol put it: 'In breach of confidence... the critical stage is usually the application for an interim injunction... If the publisher is able to publish... the action will often evaporate... If the story is enjoined the publisher will often lose interest...'.⁴⁹⁹ Similarly, Leigh and Lustgarten comment: 'the interim stage is the critical one... [it is] effectively the disposition of the matter'.⁵⁰⁰

Prior to the inception of the HRA it was only necessary for the plaintiff to make out an arguable case for confidentiality⁵⁰¹ in order to obtain an injunction; the courts then sought to maintain the status quo, on the basis that if the story was published, the material would lose its confidential character, and there would be nothing to have a final trial about.⁵⁰² However, this consideration could be outweighed by the defence of public interest at the interlocutory stage. The view of Lord Denning in Woodward v Hutchins,⁵⁰³ that the mere fact that defendants intend to plead public interest at final trial should preclude interim relief, did not find wide support; instead, it appeared that, whilst a plea of public interest could defeat a claim for such relief, the defence had to be supported by evidence and have a credible chance of success at final trial.⁵⁰⁴ However, that test was thought to be potentially unfavourable to the media because, in balancing the rights of the two parties, courts took the view that while the plaintiff's right to confidentiality would be wholly defeated by publication, the press could always still publish the story if they won 498 Examples include contract (Jarvis v Swans Tours Ltd [1973] 1 QB 233), copyright and under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, which gives the courts power to award damages on the same basis as in tort and which under s 66 allows courts to award damages for injury to feelings alone. Space precludes full discussion of the point, but it is clearly, therefore, an area free of authority; to decide that as a blanket rule, such damages could never be available, by leaving the plaintiff potentially remediless, would be clearly out of line with the Convention notion of effective protection for rights; Strasbourg has recognised the need to compensate for 'moral damage', including emotional distress (see Van Dijk and Van Hoof, op cit, fn 46, pp 179–82).

499 Media Law, 1992, p 190.

500 Ibid, p 533 (referring to the granting of interim injunctions generally); see also p 551.

501 Eg, HRH Princess of Wales; Shelley Films Limited; Francome.

502 See AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109. Thus in Francome [1984] 1 WLR 892, p 900, Fox LJ said: 'Unless Mr Francome is given protection until the trial, I think that a trial might be largely worthless from his point of view even though he succeeded/ Similarly, in Lion Laboratories [1984] 1 QB 530, p 551, Griffiths LJ said: 'there will usually be a powerful case for maintaining the status quo by the grant of an interlocutory injunction to restrain publication until trial of the action.'

503 [1977] 1 WLR 760, CA.

504 See Lion Laboratories [1984] 1 QB 530, pp 538 and 553, per Stephenson LJ (explicitly rejecting Lord Denning's approach in Woodward); ibid, p 548 per O'Connor LJ and p 553 per Griffiths LJ; similarly in Hellewell, where the public interest argument prevented the award of an injunction.

at trial; they were thus inclined toward protecting the more fragile right of the plaintiff.⁵⁰⁵

The HRA addresses this issue directly. In this context, s 12 is of interest in respect of injunctions or other orders granted under its own powers, contained in s 8,⁵⁰⁶ and at common law, where freedom of expression would be affected. It will be recalled that s 12 applies (per sub-s (1)): ‘...if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression’; it provides (per sub-s (3)) that: ‘no such relief is to be granted so as to restrain publication before trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed’. Section 12(4) specifically instructs the courts that when they are dealing with, inter alia, journalistic material, they should consider the extent to which ‘it is, or would be, in the public interest for the material to be published’ and thus remove any lingering doubts as to whether the court should consider the strength of the public interest defence at the interim stage. Sub-section (3), in allowing the court to grant injunctions only where it believes that the plaintiff will succeed at trial, requires the court to undertake a substantial balancing test at the interim stage; it also makes it clear that the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the privacy interest would probably succeed at trial. Undertaking such an evaluation at the interlocutory stage is not proving to be a difficult task, as the findings in Douglas,⁵⁰⁷ *Venables*⁵⁰⁸ and *Mills*⁵⁰⁹ suggested.⁵¹⁰ Since the judges have the confidential information in question before them at that stage, they may be able to find quite readily that the defence is made out (as Laws J did in Hellewell) or will probably succeed (as in Lion Laboratories) or that it does not justify publication at large (as in Francome). Since, as we have suggested above, the paradigmatic privacy claim will often involve speech of little or no value in public interest terms,⁵¹¹ it might, at least in some cases, be fairly easy to determine that the publication in question raises no serious speech or public interest issue.

When undertaking this inquiry, the courts obviously have to take account of Art 10 jurisprudence on interim injunctions; indeed, as noted above, s 12 instructs them to have ‘particular regard’ to Art 10. The leading case on prior restraints is Observer

505 This will generally follow under the ‘balance of convenience’ test (American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon [1975] AC 396). See AG v Guardian Newspapers [1987] 3 All ER 316, which concerned an application for an interim injunction to restrain publication of confidential information (extracts from Spycatcher). Lord Brandon remarked (ibid, p 1292): ‘the choice lies between one course [allowing publication] which may result in permanent and irrevocable damage to the cause of [the plaintiff] and another course which can only result in temporary and in no way irrevocable damage to the cause of the newspapers...it seems to me clear that the second...course should...be preferred...’; see also the similar reasoning of Lord Ackner, ibid, p 1305.

506 See Chapter 4, pp 172–75.

507 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

508 [2001] 1 All ER 908, Fam Div.

509 [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322.

510 The position in defamation, in which the courts refuse an interim injunction if the defendants intend to plead justification, may be distinguished: justification is a factual claim, the investigation of which will often require sifting through a mountain of evidence and so cannot be resolved at the interlocutory stage; by contrast, the defence in confidence cases generally requires not an empirical, but an evaluative judgment.

511 Eg, Russbridger (op cit, fn 9) instances a story in the News of the World in January 1999, in which a lap dancer gave full details of a recent sexual encounter with the singer Tom Jones.

and Guardian v UK,⁵¹² in which the Court considered the compatibility with Art 10 of interim injunctions preventing those newspapers from publishing Spycatcher material. The Court laid down the basic principle that:

while Article 10 does not in terms prohibit the imposition of prior restraints on publication...the dangers inherent in [them] are such that they call for the most careful scrutiny on the part of the Court...news is a perishable commodity and delay of its publication, even for a short period, may well deprive it of all its value and interest.⁵¹³

While the court's actual decision in the case seemed to suggest that the need to preserve the plaintiff's rights will in itself point strongly towards the imposition of an interim injunction,⁵¹⁴ the relatively cautious approach adopted may have been influenced by the fact that the very sensitive issue of national security was at stake. It is suggested that the domestic judiciary should look rather to the general principle laid down in the case that the granting of interim injunctions is a particularly significant prima facie infringement of Art 10, given the perishable qualities of news. This factor would then have to be weighed against the strength of the privacy claim, in the manner suggested earlier and, in accordance with s 12, a court should award the interim injunction only if it considers that the privacy argument is the stronger one.

7 CONCLUSIONS

This chapter has considered the various methods of protecting personal information available in domestic law and has focused in particular on the impact of the DPA 1998 and the HRA. The HRA has, as indicated, not only created a new right of privacy enforceable against public authorities, it has had and will have an effect on existing common law and statutory provisions, including those of the DPA. Its effect is twofold. First, it has provided the impetus under ss 6, 2 and 12 to develop the existing common law so that it protects privacy, while ss 2 and 3 may arguably be used to influence statutes in order to develop such protection.⁵¹⁵ Secondly, it provides, where necessary, the means of balancing such increased protection against freedom of expression under ss 12, 6 and 3, but especially s 12.

Both these effects are especially apparent, as this chapter has sought to demonstrate, in relation to the common law action for breach of confidence. It is now developing into a privacy law in all but name, and may provide a more effective and subtle means of protecting privacy than commonly thought. Legitimation of this judicial enterprise can now be found in the HRA: its introduction of the 512 (1991) 14 EHRR 153; for comment see Leigh, I, 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' [1992] PL 200.

513 Ibid, para 60.

514 It was found that the initial injunctions, which prevented publication for over a year, had the aim of maintaining the Attorney General's ability to bring a case claiming permanent injunction, a case which would have been destroyed if Spycatcher material had been published before that claim could be heard. This factor was found to establish the existence of a pressing social need justifying the restriction of Art 10. The finding that the continuation of the injunctions after the book had been published in the US could not be justified was based simply on the fact that such publication had destroyed the confidentiality of the material, making it impossible to maintain the Attorney General's rights as a litigant.

515 See p 564 above.

Convention into UK law allows the courts to draw upon the decisions discussed and, importantly, upon the general principles expressed in the Strasbourg jurisprudence. As the chapter has tried to demonstrate, such an enterprise may also be grounded in universal human rights values as expressed in other jurisdictions; case law from these jurisdictions may also point the way to resolution of some of the problems discussed above which the judiciary will need to confront as they engage in incremental development of the action.

The principal objection to the development of privacy rights has always been the perceived threat to media freedom. This chapter has argued that this fear is largely misplaced and indeed that the right to free speech and to protection for privacy are 'mutually supportive',⁵¹⁶ because, as the German Supreme Court has put it, both are 'essential aspects of the liberal democratic order'.⁵¹⁷

The introduction of some legal protection for privacy might encourage a movement away from the prurient trivia currently infesting so many of our newspapers and therefore, far from threatening free speech in the press, could enhance it. It is essential, however, that the senior judiciary appreciate the need for a proper resolution of speech and privacy interests. In this regard, if Art 10 had not been introduced into UK law, and its importance highlighted by s 12 of the incorporating Act, the developments considered in this chapter would have been less opportune.

516 Emerson, C, 'The right of privacy and the freedom of the press' (1979) 14(2) Harvard Civil Rights Civil Liberties Law Review 329.

517 BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, 322–46.

POWERS OF THE SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE SERVICES; STATE SURVEILLANCE; SEARCH AND SEIZURE OF PROPERTY

1 INTRODUCTION

Agents of the State frequently invade privacy. They may enter property, seize documents, intercept telephones and place persons under surveillance. The method of obtaining information creates an invasion of privacy; its use creates a further invasion. These actions are undertaken by the police, other law enforcement agencies and the security and intelligence services with the aim of promoting internal security or preventing and detecting crime. Such aims are clearly legitimate; the question is whether the safeguards against unreasonable or arbitrary intrusion are adequate. Under the requirements of the Human Rights Act (HRA), such safeguards should include a clear remedy for the citizen who has been the subject of unauthorised surveillance or other intrusion, and strict control over the power to effect such intrusion or issue authorisation for it. The latter safeguard is particularly crucial since the citizen may not even be aware that intrusion is taking place. This is particularly true of telephone tapping and the use of surveillance devices.

However, not only have legal developments failed to keep pace with technological ones, the principles which in a liberal democracy should inform the law governing such invasions of privacy have largely failed to find expression in it. It will be argued that the value of privacy still finds little place in it despite the fact that the central statute now governing this area, the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, was introduced specifically in order to meet the demands of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The common law has always given a high priority to preventing interference with personal property¹ and therefore, prior to the inception of the HRA, privacy received some incidental protection. Remedies for intrusion on property are found in the torts of trespass and nuisance, while seizure of goods is also prima facie tortious.² Trespass is defined as entering on to land in the possession of another without lawful justification. It is confined to instances in which there is some physical entry; prying with binoculars is not covered and, obviously, nor is electronic eavesdropping. The limitations of the law have been determined in certain decisions. In *Hickman v Maisey*³ the defendant, who was on the highway, was watching the plaintiff's land. It was found that the plaintiff owned the land under the highway and that the defendant was entitled to make ordinary and reasonable use of it. Such watching was held not to be reasonable; the defendant had gone outside the accepted use and therefore had trespassed. Thus, it was made clear that intention in such instances is all important, but that unless behaviour could be linked to some kind of physical presence on land, trespass would not provide a remedy.

1 See McLorie v Oxford [1982] 1 QB 1290.

2 Under the torts of trespass to goods and conversion.

3 [1900] 1 QB 752, CA.

This decision can be contrasted with that in *Bernstein v Skyviews and General Ltd*⁴ in order to determine the limits of trespass. The defendants flew over the plaintiff's land in an aircraft in order to take photographs of it and the question arose whether the plaintiff had a right in trespass to prevent such intrusion. It was held that either he had no rights of ownership over the air space to that height or, alternatively, if he did have such rights, s 40 of the Civil Aviation Act 1942 exempted reasonable flights from liability. The court was not prepared to find that the taking of one photograph was unreasonable and a remedy could not be based solely on invasion of privacy as, of course, there is no such tort. The distinction between this decision and that in Hickman arises partly because the plaintiff could not show that he had an interest in what was violated—the air space—and so he fell outside the ambit of trespass.

The tort of nuisance has not provided a means of protecting privacy except in extreme instances. Liability for nuisance will arise if a person is disturbed in the enjoyment of his or her land to an extent that the law regards as unreasonable. There is a dearth of authority on the issue of straightforward surveillance but, in an Australian case, Victoria Park Racing Company v Taylor,⁵ where a platform was erected in order to gain a view of a racecourse which diminished the value of the plaintiff's business, no remedy in nuisance was available. The activity was held not to affect the use and enjoyment of the land, but dicta in the case suggested that there would, in general, be no remedy in nuisance for looking over another's premises. However, dicta in Bernstein favoured the possibility that grossly invasive embarrassing surveillance would amount to a nuisance and that possibility was followed up (though not explicitly) in somewhat different circumstances in Khorasandjian v Bush.⁶ An injunction was granted against the defendant restraining him from using violence to or harassing, pestering or communicating with the plaintiff, the child of the owner of the property in question. This decision, which sought to extend the tort to cover interference with rights to privacy, was criticised by the House of Lords in Hunter v Canary Wharf,⁷ where it was confirmed that the tort is essentially concerned with injury to land. Thus, it is fair to conclude that trespass and nuisance offer only limited protection in this area from the crudest and most obvious forms of invasions of privacy.

Therefore, under the common law, when an invasion of privacy did not fall within these narrow areas of tortious liability, it did not require lawful authority. Thus police search and seizure of property required such authority, but the interception of communications and much state surveillance had no comprehensive legal basis. This chapter demonstrates that the European Convention on Human Rights, both before and after the inception of the HRA, has been the driving force for change. The state has been forced, incrementally, to accept that a legal basis for the invasion of privacy by state agents must be put in place. Such a basis is now in place, contained in a range of statutes of which the most recent and the most comprehensive is the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000. However, the

4 [1978] QB 479; [1977] 2 All ER 902.

5 (1937) 58 CLR 479.

6 [1993] 3 All ER 669. For discussion of this decision see (1993) 143 NLJ 926 and (1993) 143 NLJ 1685.

7 [1997] AC 655, pp 691G–692B.

creation of a legal basis for State invasion of privacy does not necessarily mean that the requirements of Art 8 have been met. The main concern of this chapter is to consider how far Art 8 principles are in actuality reflected in these statutes, a concern that has been given a sharper focus now that the HRA is in force.

2 POLICE POWERS OF ENTRY AND SEARCH⁸

In America, the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution guarantees freedom from unreasonable search and seizure by the police, thus recognising the invasion of privacy which a search of premises represents. A search without a warrant will normally⁹ be unreasonable; therefore, an independent check is usually available on the search power.¹⁰ In contrast, the common law in Britain, despite some rulings asserting the importance of protecting the citizen from the invasion of private property,¹¹ allowed search and seizure on wide grounds, going beyond those authorised by statute.¹² Thus, the common law did not provide full protection for the citizen and the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE) went some way to remedy this by placing powers of entry, search and seizure on a clearer basis and ensuring that the person whose premises are searched understands the basis of the search and can complain as to its conduct if necessary. Whether the new procedures actually do provide sufficient protection for the privacy interests of the subject of the search is the question to be examined by this section.

Entry without warrant

The Police and Criminal Evidence Act (PACE)

The power to enter premises conferred by ss 17 and 18 of PACE is balanced in a manner similar to the method employed in respect of stop and search, which is discussed in Chapter 13. The power can be exercised under s 17 where: an officer wants to arrest a person suspected of an arrestable offence; in order to arrest for certain offences under the Public Order Act 1936 or the Criminal Law Act 1977; to recapture someone unlawfully at large such as an escapee from a prison, court or mental hospital; to save life or limb or prevent serious damage to property or to execute a warrant of arrest arising out of criminal proceedings. This last provision allows an entry to be made to search for someone wanted under a warrant for non-payment of a fine.

8 See generally Feldman, D, The Law Relating to Entry, Search and Seizure, 1986; Stone, RTH, Entry, Search and Seizure, 1989; Lidstone, K and Bevan, V, Search and Seizure under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 1992; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 2nd edn, 1999, Chapter 7.

9 Coolidge v New Hampshire (1973) 403 US 443: exception accepted where evidence might otherwise be destroyed.

10 For comment on the efficacy of this check, see Lafave, W, Search and Seizure, 1978.

11 See, eg, rulings in Entinck v Carrington (1765) 19 St Tr 1029; Morris v Beardmore [1981] AC 446; [1980] 2 All ER 753.

12 The ruling in Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693 authorised seizure of a wide range of material once officers were lawfully on premises. Thomas v Sawkins [1935] 2 KB 249 allowed a wide power to enter premises to prevent crime (see above, p 433).

A further power of entry arises under s 18 if a person has been arrested for an arrestable offence and the intention is to search the person's premises immediately after arrest:

...a constable may enter and search any premises occupied or controlled by a person who is under arrest for an arrestable offence, if he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that there is on the premises evidence, other than items subject to legal privilege, that relates:

- (a) to that offence; or
- (b) to some other arrestable offence which is connected with or similar to that offence.

Thus, the power is subject to some significant limitations; it does not arise in respect of an arrest under s 25. If a search was considered necessary in respect of a s 25 arrest, a search warrant would have to be obtained unless the provisions of s 32 applied. Section 32 allows a search of premises after arrest for any offence if the arrestee was arrested on those premises or was on them immediately before the arrest.

The Terrorism Act 2000

The provisions for warrantless search of premises under PACE after arrest are wide enough to cover many circumstances in which police officers might wish to search for items relating to a terrorist investigation. But, they are supplemented by special powers under warrant which are discussed below and also, in an emergency, by a power which arose under Sched 7, para 7(1) of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act (PTA) 1989 allowing a police officer of at least the rank of superintendent to authorise a search by written order if there are 'reasonable grounds for believing that the case is one of great emergency and that in the interests of the State immediate action is necessary'. There is evidence that the use of special search powers without the need to rely on reasonable suspicion or on a warrant have some value in terrorist investigations.¹³ Nevertheless, the use of such powers represents an invasion of liberty which requires a strong and clear justification rather than a reliance on an uncertain phrase such as 'the interests of the State'. The power is reproduced in the Terrorism Act 2000 in Sched 5 para 3.

A further power of search arose under s 16C and para 7 of Sched 6A which were added to the PTA by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. Section 16C allow police officers of at least the rank of superintendent, engaged in a terrorism investigation, to establish in certain circumstances a police cordon around an area. Once the cordon is in place, para 7 of Sched 6A gave a power of search. The power was reproduced in ss 33–36 of the Terrorism Act 2000. It must be authorised in writing by an officer of at least the rank of superintendent who must have reasonable grounds for believing that material which would be of substantial value to the investigation, and which is not excluded or special material or material covered by legal privilege (see below), is on specified premises within the cordon. The power is exercised by a constable who may enter and search premises and may seize items not protected by legal privilege if he has reasonable grounds for believing that they will be of substantial value to the investigation.

13 See Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism, p 195.

The Police Act 1997

As discussed below, this Act places police powers of surveillance on a statutory basis. It also provides powers of entry, search and seizure. An authorisation may be issued if the search is believed to be necessary because it will be of substantial value in the prevention and detection of serious crime¹⁴ and the objective cannot reasonably be achieved by other means (s 93(2)). As explained below,¹⁵ the main check on these extensive powers is provided by the special commissioners appointed from the senior judiciary (s 91(1)). Where the entry and search contemplated is of a dwelling house, prior approval by the commissioner is necessary, but this requirement is waived where the authorising officer believes that the search is urgent. Since the belief does not need to be based on reasonable grounds, such a safeguard may have little impact in practice. These controversial extensions of the police powers of entry are therefore subject to very limited independent oversight and, unlike the s 18 power, they may be divorced from the needs of an immediate criminal investigation.

Search warrants

Searching of premises other than under ss 17 and 18 can also occur if a search warrant is issued under s 8 of PACE by a magistrate. A warrant under s 8 will only be issued if there are reasonable grounds for believing that a serious arrestable offence has been committed and where the material is likely to be of substantial value to the investigation of the offence. A large number of other statutes also provide for the issuing of warrants to the police and to other public officials. Special provisions arise, inter alia, under s 27 of the Drug Trafficking Act 1994, s 2(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 (in relation to serious fraud) and, as discussed below, in relation to the security and intelligence services under the Intelligence Services Act 1994.

A wide power to search premises arose under Sched 7, para 2 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989¹⁶ which, in contrast to the warrant power under PACE, was not dependent on the need to allege a specific offence and could therefore take place at a very early stage in the investigation. This power was reproduced in the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 5, which as Chapter 8 indicated, applies to a wider range of groups. A justice of the peace must be satisfied that a terrorist investigation is being carried out and that there are reasonable grounds for believing that there is material which is likely to be of substantial value to the investigation. Also, it must appear that it is impracticable to gain entry to the premises with consent and that immediate entry to the premises is necessary. A warrant could also be issued under s 15(1) of the PTA in order to allow entry to premises to effect an arrest under s 14(1)(b). This power was thought necessary since the general PACE powers would not be applicable due to the broad nature of s 14(1)(b).¹⁷ It was continued in the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 5.

14 For the definition of serious crime, see below, p 692.

15 See p 702.

16 See Walker, op cit, fn 13, pp 185–97.

17 See below, Chapter 13, pp 783–84.

A warrant authorising the police to search premises does not of itself authorise officers to search persons on the premises. The Home Office circular on PACE stated that such persons could be searched only if a specific power to do so arose under the warrant (for example, warrants issued under s 23 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971).

Applications for warrants by police officers and the execution of the warrant must comply with the procedures set out in ss 15 and 16 of PACE. The application for the warrant must be supported, under s 15(3), by an 'Information' in writing. It must specify the enactment under which it is issued, the premises to be searched¹⁸ and the articles or persons to be sought (s 15(6)).

Section 16 governs the procedure to be followed in executing the warrant. The warrant must be produced to the occupier (although it seems that this need not be at the time of entry if impracticable in the circumstances)¹⁹ and must identify the articles to be sought, although once the officer is on the premises, other articles may be seized under s 19 if they appear to relate to any other offence. Further, the warrant authorises entry to premises on one occasion only and does not allow for a general search of the premises²⁰ since the search must only be for the purpose for which the warrant was issued (s 16(8)).

Under s 16, if a search is under warrant, a copy of the warrant must be issued to the subject of the search. The warrant will identify the articles or persons sought and the offence suspected, but need not specify the grounds on which it was issued or give the name of the constable conducting the search. A warrant, like the Notice of Powers and Rights (discussed below) therefore provides the occupier with limited information. Moreover, as noted above, it need not be produced to the occupier before the search begins if the purpose of the search might be frustrated by such production.²¹ However, within these limitations, the courts seem prepared to take a strict view of the importance of complying with this safeguard. In *Chief Constable of Lancashire ex p Parker and McGrath*²² police officers conducted a search of the applicant's premises in the execution of a search warrant issued under s 8 of PACE. However, after the warrant had been signed by the judge, the police detached part of it and reattached it to the other original documents. In purported compliance with s 16 of PACE, the police produced all these documents to the applicants. Thus, the police did not produce the whole of the original warrant and moreover, did not supply one of the documents constituting the warrant. The applicants applied for judicial review of both the issue and the execution of the warrants. It was determined that s 16(5)(b) of PACE had been breached in that the warrant produced to the applicants was not the original warrant as seen and approved by the judge and a declaration was granted to that effect. The police had admitted that there was a breach of the requirement under s 16(5)(c) that a copy of the warrant should be supplied to the occupier of the premises.

18 Southwestern Magistrates' Court ex p Cofie [1997] 1 WLR 885.

19 Longman [1988] 1 WLR 619, CA; for comment, see Stevens, R, Justice of the Peace, 1988, p 551.

20 See Chief Constable of Warwick Constabulary ex p Fitzpatrick [1999] 1 WLR 564.

21 Longman [1988] 1 WLR 619, CA.

22 (1992) 142 NLJ 635.

Power to enter premises at common law

At common law, a power to enter premises in order to prevent crime arises from the much criticised case of Thomas v Sawkins.²³ Lord Hewart CJ contemplated that a police officer would have the right to enter private premises when 'he has reasonable grounds for believing that an offence is imminent or is likely to be committed'. This judgment may receive some endorsement from s 17(5) and (6), which provides that all common law powers on entry are abolished except to deal with or prevent a breach of the peace. However, this narrows down the power of entry, as it does not arise in respect of any offence. Thomas v Sawkins arose in the context of a public meeting held on private premises, but common law powers do not seem to be confined to such circumstances; in *McGowan v Chief Constable of Kingston on Hull*²⁴ it was found that police officers were entitled to enter and remain on private premises when they feared a breach of the peace arising from a private quarrel.

Voluntary searches

Code of Practice B made under PACE,²⁵ which governs powers of entry, search and seizure, makes special provision for voluntary searches. Paragraph 4 of Code B as originally drafted provided that a search of premises could take place with the consent of the occupier and provided under para 4(2) that he must be informed that he need not consent to the search; in requiring that the consent should be in writing, it recognised that there might sometimes be a doubt as to the reality of such consent and went some way towards resolving that doubt. After revision in 1991, para 4 went further in that direction. Under sub-para 4.1 the officer concerned must ensure that the consent is being sought from the correct person, whereas previously this problem was only addressed in a Note for Guidance (4A), and then only in respect of lodgings. Sub-para 4.3 provides that the search must cease if the consent is withdrawn during it and also contains an express provision against using duress to obtain consent.²⁶ However, it has been doubted whether these provisions have had much effect on ensuring that use of consensual search is not abused because it is not always made clear to occupiers that they can withhold consent.²⁷

Power of seizure

At common law prior to PACE, a wide power of seizure had developed where a search was not under warrant. Articles could be seized so long as they either implicated the owner or occupier in any offence or implicated third parties in the offence for which the search was conducted.²⁸ However, the power of seizure under PACE is even wider than this. Under s 8(2), a constable may seize and retain anything for which a search has been authorised. The power of seizure without warrant is 23 [1935] 2 KB 249; for criticism, see Goodhart (1947) 6 CLJ 222; see further Chapter 9, p 433.

24 [1968] Crim LR 34. But see the ruling in Mcleod v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 493.

25 See Chapter 13, p 757 for discussion of the PACE Codes of Practice.

26 For criticism of these provisions see Bevan, K and Palmer, C, Bevan and Lidstone's The Investigation of Crime, 1996, pp 117–21.

27 See further Dixon, D, 'Consent and the legal regulation of policing' (1990) 17 JLS 345–62.

28 Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693; Garfinkel v MPC [1972] Crim LR 44.

governed by s 18(2) which provides that: 'A constable may seize and retain anything for which he may search under subsection (1) above.' This power is greatly widened, however, by the further power of seizure arising under s 19:

The constable may seize anything which is on the premises if he has reasonable grounds for believing:

- (a) that it has been obtained in consequence of the commission of an offence; and
- (b) that it is necessary to seize it in order to prevent it being concealed, lost, damaged, altered or destroyed.

The constable may seize anything which is on the premises if he has reasonable grounds for believing:

- (a) that it is evidence in relation to an offence which he is investigating or any other offence; and
- (b) that it is necessary to seize it in order to prevent the evidence being concealed, lost, altered or destroyed.

Under s 22(1), anything which has been so seized may be retained 'so long as is necessary in all the circumstances'. It was made clear in *Chief Constable of Lancashire ex p Parker and McGrath*²⁹ that the above provisions assume that the search itself is lawful; in other words, material seized during an unlawful search cannot be retained and if it is, an action for trespass to goods may arise. It was accepted in this instance that the search was unlawful (see below), but the Chief Constable contended that the material seized could nevertheless be retained. This argument was put forward under the provision of s 22(2)(a), which allows the retention of 'anything seized for the purposes of a criminal investigation'. The Chief Constable maintained that these words would be superfluous unless denoting a general power to retain unlawfully seized material. However, it was held that the sub-section could not bear the weight sought to be placed upon it: it was merely intended to give examples of matters falling within the general provision of s 22(1). Therefore, the police were not entitled to retain the material seized.

Excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege

Under s 9, excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege cannot be seized during a search not under warrant and it is exempt from the s 8 search warrant procedure under s 8(1). However, the police may gain access to excluded or special procedure material by making an application to a circuit judge in accordance with Sched 1 or, in the case of special procedure material only, to a magistrate for a search warrant. Access to excluded material may only be granted where it could have been obtained under the previous law relating to such material. Excluded material is defined under s 11 to consist of material held on a confidential basis, personal records,³⁰ samples of human tissue or tissue fluid held in confidence and journalistic material held in confidence. Personal records include records held by schools, universities, probation officers and social workers. 'Special procedure material' defined under s 14 operates as a catch-all category which is, it seems, frequently used³¹ to cover confidential material which does not qualify as personal records or journalistic material.³² A production order will not be made unless there is reasonable suspicion that a serious arrestable offence has been committed, the material is likely to be of substantial value to the investigation and admissible at trial. It should be noted that when inquiries relating to terrorist offences are made, Sched 7, para 3 of the Prevention of Terrorism (T.R) Act 1989 allowed access to both special procedure and excluded material. This power is reproduced in Sched 5 of the Terrorism Act 2000. The judge only needs to be satisfied that there is a terrorist investigation in being, that the material would substantially assist it and that it is in the public interest that it should be produced. It may well be that once the first two requirements are satisfied, it will be rare to find that the third is not.

29 [1993] 2 WLR 428; [1993] 1 All ER 56; (1992) 142 NLJ 635.

30 Defined in s 12.

The ruling in *Guildhall Magistrates' Court ex p Primlacks Holdings Co (Panama) Limited*³³ made it clear that a magistrate must satisfy him or herself that there were reasonable grounds for believing that the items covered by the warrant did not include material subject to the special protection. The magistrates had issued search warrants authorising the search of two solicitors' firms. Judicial review of the magistrates' decision to issue a warrant was successfully sought; it was found that the magistrate had merely accepted the police officer's view that s 8(1) was satisfied rather than independently considering the matter.

The strongest protection extends to items subject to legal privilege, since they cannot be searched for or seized by police officers and therefore, the meaning of legal privilege' is crucial. Under s 10, it will cover communications between client and solicitor connected with giving advice or with legal proceedings. However, if items are held with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose they will not, under s 10(2), attract legal privilege. It seems that this will include the situation where the solicitor unknowingly furthers the criminal purpose of the client or a third party. In *Crown Court at Snaresbrook ex p DPP*³⁴ it was found that only the solicitor's intentions regarding the criminal purpose were relevant, but the House of Lords in *Central Criminal Court ex p Francis and Francis*³⁵ rejected this interpretation in finding that material which figures in the criminal intentions of persons other than solicitor or client will not be privileged. A judge must give full consideration to the question whether particular documents have lost legal privilege.³⁶

This interpretation of s 10(2) was adopted on the basis that otherwise, the efforts of the police in detecting crime might be hampered, but it may be argued that it gives insufficient weight to the need to protect the special relationship between solicitor and client and, as argued below, may be vulnerable to challenge under the HRA.

31 See Lidstone, K (1989) NILQ 333, p 342.

32 For comment on these provisions see Stone [1988] Crim LR 498.

33 [1989] 2 WLR 841.

34 [1988] QB 532; [1988] 1 All ER 315.

35 [1989] AC 346; [1988] 3 All ER 375. For comment see Stevenson (1989) Law Soc Gazette 1 February, p 26.

36 Southampton Crown Court ex p J and P [1993] Crim LR 962.

New powers of seizure under the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001

The Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP) extends the power of seizure very significantly. The further powers of seizure it provides in s 50 apply to police powers of search under PACE and also to powers of seizure arising under a range of other statutes and applicable to bodies other than police officers, as set out in Schedule 1 of the CJP. The new power of seizure under s 50(1) depends on three conditions. The person in question must lawfully be on the premises. Once there, if he finds something which he has reasonable grounds for thinking is something he is authorised to seize, and it is not reasonably practicable at the time to determine whether what he has found is something he is authorised to seize, he can seize as much of it as is necessary to make that determination. A further new power of seizure under s 50(2) allows the person in question to seize material which he has no power to seize but which is attached to an object he does have the power to seize, if it is not reasonably practicable to separate the two.

This provision is significant since inter alia it allows police officers to remove items from premises even where they are not certain that—apart from s 50—they have the power to do so. Thus a number of items can now be seized from premises although no power of seizure—apart from that now arising under s 50—in fact arises.

As indicated above, the seizure of excluded or special procedure material is restricted, while material covered by legal privilege cannot be seized. Most significantly, s 50 may serve to undermine these protections for certain material since where such material is part of other material and cannot practicably be separated, it can be seized. It can also be seized where a police officer takes the view on reasonable grounds that it is something that he has the power to seize, although it turns out later that it falls within one of the special categories.

Special provisions are made for the return of excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege. For obvious reasons, these provisions are most significant in relation to material covered by legal privilege since they could aid in undermining the privilege. Under s 54 such material must be returned unless it falls within s 54(2). Section 54(2) covers a legally privileged item comprised in other material. Such an item will fall within that sub-section if the retention of the rest of the property would be lawful and it is not reasonably practicable to separate the legally privileged item from the rest of the property without prejudicing the use of the rest of that property. Section 57(3) provides that ss 53–56 do not authorise the retention of property where its retention would not be authorised apart from the provisions of Part 2 of the CJP. Under s 62 inextricably linked property cannot be examined or copied but under sub-section 4 can be used to the extent that its use facilitates the use of property in which the inextricably linked property is comprised.

The provisions of ss 57 and 62, taken together with the provisions of ss 54 and 55 appears to create two categories of property. Property within the first can be retained as it would have been but for the CJP. Property within the second is not subject to an obligation to return but cannot be treated as it would have been had it fallen within the first category. It can be used to a limited extent in accordance with s 62(4). Section 62 makes it clear that s 62(4) applies to excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege which has not been returned since it is compromised in other lawfully held property.

Thus, ss 50, 54 and 55 taken together do provide avenues to the seizure and non-return of the specially protected material. The new provisions thus circumvent the limitations placed on the seizure of excluded or special procedure material and, most importantly of all, provide an avenue to the seizure and use of legally privileged material. It can be said that for the first time legally privileged material has lost part of the protection it was accorded under the common law and under PACE.

These wide powers are 'balanced' by the provisions of ss 52–61 which provide a number of safeguards. Notice must be given to persons whose property has been seized under s 52, and under s 59 he or she can apply to the 'appropriate judicial authority' for the return of the whole or part of the seized property, on the ground that there was no power to seize, or that excluded or special procedure material, or legally privileged material, is not comprised in other property as provided for in ss 54 and 55. Under s 60 a duty to secure the property arises which includes the obligation under s 61 to prevent inter alia, copying of it. But despite these safeguards, it is unclear that the new powers, especially to seize and use legally privileged material, are compatible with the requirements of the Convention under the HRA.

Procedural safeguards under Code of Practice B

As revised in 1991 and 1995, Code of Practice B made under PACE provides for an increase in the amount of information to be conveyed to owners of property to be searched by use of a standard form, the Notice of Powers and Rights (para 5.7). It covers certain information including specification of the type of search in question, a summary of the powers of search and seizure arising under PACE and the rights of the subjects of searches. This notice must normally be given to the subject of the search before it begins, but under para 5.8 need not be if to do so would lead to frustration of the object of the search or danger to the police officers concerned or to others. These exceptions also apply under para 5.8 to leaving a copy of the warrant where the search is made under warrant. As explained above, s 18(4) provides that premises occupied or controlled by a person arrested for an arrestable offence may be searched after the arrest if an officer of the rank of inspector or above gives authority in writing. Under para 3.3, the authority should normally be given on the Notice of Powers and Rights. This clears up previous confusion³⁷ as to the form the authority should take.

Under original paras 4 and 5, the amount of information to be conveyed to the subject of a search depended on its status. Before any non-consensual search, an officer had to convey certain information orally to its subject: his identity, the purpose of the search and the grounds for undertaking it. In the case of a consensual search, it was only necessary to inform its subject of its purpose. Thus, the subject of an apparently consensual search dissatisfied with its conduct or intimidated by the officers concerned would have found it more difficult to make a complaint than would the subject of a non-consensual search. Under current paras 4 and 5 as revised, the subjects of all searches, regardless of the status of the search, must receive a copy of the Notice of Powers and Rights and, under para 5.8 where a consensual search has taken place but the occupier is absent, the Notice should be endorsed with the name, number and station of the officer concerned. Oddly enough, it is not stated expressly that this information must be added to the Notice where the subject of a consensual search is present. Sub-paragraph 5.5 provides that officers must identify themselves except in the case of inquiries linked to terrorism, but this provision appears to apply only to non-consensual searches due to the heading of that section. It might be thought that a person who voluntarily allows police officers to come onto his or her premises does not need the information mentioned, but this is to ignore the possibility that such a person might wish to withdraw consent during the search but might feel too intimidated to do so.

³⁷ In Badham [1987] Crim LR 202 it was held that merely writing down confirmation of an oral authorisation was insufficient.

The power to search and seize is balanced by the need to convey certain information to the subject of the search in question, thereby rendering officers (at least theoretically) accountable for searches carried out. However, it is arguable that the provisions are largely of a presentational nature: they ensure that a large amount of information is conveyed to the occupier and make an attempt to ensure that community relations are not adversely affected by the operation of the search power,³⁸ but have little to say about the way the search should be conducted. In other words, the regulation of the search power under Code B emphasises the provision of information to the owner of premises so that officers can be rendered accountable for searches made, rather than regulating circumstances relating to the nature of the search itself in order to minimise the invasion of privacy represented by such searches. In contrast, searches made in order to gain evidence relating to civil proceedings, under orders known as Anton Piller orders,³⁹ must observe a number of safeguards: they must be organised on weekdays in office hours so that legal advice can be obtained before the search begins; the defendant must be allowed to check the list of items to be seized before items can be removed and in some circumstances, an independent solicitor experienced in the execution of such orders must be present, instructed and paid for by the plaintiff.⁴⁰ It may be argued that there is a greater public interest in the prevention of crime than in ensuring that evidence is obtained by a party to civil proceedings and therefore the police need at times to make an immediate search of premises, but the power to do so without judicial intervention should, it is submitted, be narrowed down to instances where the urgency of the search was demonstrable, while Code B should contain clearer safeguards applicable to all searches, allowing, for instance, for a legal advisor to be present during a non-urgent search and including a clear prohibition on non-urgent searches at night. At present, searches should be conducted at 'a reasonable hour'⁴¹ and under Note for Guidance 5A this is explained to mean at a time when the occupier or others are unlikely to be asleep. But, as discussed elsewhere,⁴² the Notes for Guidance are not part of the Codes and are of very uncertain legal status: a prohibition on the non-urgent entry and search of property at night by State agents—perhaps one of the most unpleasant invasions of privacy possible—requires 38 There is provision under para 2.5 for informing the local police community relations officer before a search of premises takes place if it is thought that it might adversely affect the relationship between the police and the community, subject to the proviso that in cases of urgency it can be performed after the search has taken place.

39 From Anton Piller KG v Manufacturing Processes Ltd [1976] Ch 55; [1976] 1 All ER 779, CA.

40 These conditions, and others, were laid down in Universal Thermosensors Ltd v Hibben (1992) 142 NLJ 195. For discussion of the concern created by such orders prior to this decision see (1990) 106 LQR 601.

41 Code B, para 5.2.

42 See Chapter 13, p 758.

a more certain basis. The provision that an occupier may ask a friend or neighbour to witness the search unless there are reasonable grounds for believing 'that this would seriously hinder the investigation' would usually be inadequate to allow the occupier to obtain legal advice or the presence of a solicitor.⁴³

Impact of the HRA and police accountability

The PACE search and seizure provisions are clearly intended to make lawful actions which would otherwise amount to trespass to property and to goods only in very specific circumstances and only where a certain procedure has been followed. Invasion of a person's home has traditionally been viewed as an infringement of liberty which should be allowed only under tightly controlled conditions and in the exercise of a specific legal power. The HRA affords specific expression to these values. The PACE provisions suggest some determination to strike a reasonable balance between the perceived need to confer on the police a general power to search property and the need to protect the privacy of the citizen. It is less clear that this is true of the TA and CJP provisions.

Breaches of Code of Practice B

Although Code B plays a part in creating safeguards for individual privacy, breaches of Code B will not attract tortious liability⁴⁴ and unlike Codes C, D and E (discussed in Chapters 13 and 14), exclusion of evidence will rarely operate as a form of redress because the courts are very reluctant to exclude physical evidence⁴⁵ and therefore it can have little impact on Code B provisions. Such reluctance may be justifiable since the significance of Code B can be attributed to their regulation of invasive procedures rather than to their concern to ensure the integrity of the evidence thereby obtained. As Chapter 13 demonstrates, Codes C, D and E, on the other hand, are arguably concerned more with outcome than with rights (with the exception of access to legal advice) which are fundamental in themselves. This difference is due partly to the nature of the rights involved: privacy of the home or of the person represents an important value in itself, unlike a person's right to the contemporaneous recording of an interview. However, this does leave something of a gap as far as a means of redress for breaches of Code B is concerned in comparison with the other three Codes, since the only means available will normally be by way of a complaint. The possibility of raising arguments in criminal proceedings under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA which might lead—in effect—to an enhancement of the status of the Codes of Practice is discussed in Chapter 14.⁴⁶

Reliance on Art 8

Article 8 values might come to influence this scheme due to the use of arguments under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, either raised in criminal proceedings, in civil actions against the police for trespass, trespass to goods or for conversion, or as freestanding

43 Paragraph 5.11.

44 PACE 1984, s 67(10).

45 See below Chapter 14, pp 890–96.

46 See Chapter 14, pp 851–54 and 902–07.

actions under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. It could be argued that whether or not a basis in law for an entry to property is established, rendering the action non-trespassory, various features of the police actions amount to infringements of Art 8. Where it was clear that a legal basis for the entry itself was likely to be established, a freestanding action could be brought against the police as a public authority under s 7(1)(a), arguing that although the entry had such a basis, such features amounted to a breach of Art 8. The use of Art 8 arguments in criminal proceedings under s 7(1)(b) is discussed in Chapter 14.⁴⁷

The European Court of Human Rights has found that entry, search and seizure can create interferences with all the Art 8 guarantees apart from that of the right to respect for family life.⁴⁸ Search for and seizure of documents is covered by the term 'correspondence' and the documents do not have to be personal in nature.⁴⁹ Such interferences can be justified only if they are in accordance with the law (Art 8(2)). This requirement covers not only the existence of national law, but its quality.⁵⁰ The statutory and common law powers probably meet this requirement⁵¹ and have the legitimate aim of preventing crime or protecting national security.

It must further be shown that the interference 'corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued'.⁵² It was found in the context of intercept warrants in *Klass v FRG*⁵³ that judicial or administrative authority for warrants would provide a degree of independent oversight: sufficient safeguards against abuse were available. This requirement was also stressed in Kopp v Switzerland.⁵⁴ It could be argued that the arrangements whereby magistrates issue search warrants might fail to meet this requirement since, although in appearance an independent judicial check is available before the event, the 'check' may be almost a formality in reality.⁵⁵ These provisions provide a scheme which is reasonably sound in theory, but which is dependent on magistrates observing its requirements. Research suggests that in practice, some magistrates make little or no attempt to ascertain whether the information a warrant contains may be relied upon, while it seems possible that magistrates who do take a rigorous approach to the procedure and refuse to grant warrants are not approached again.⁵⁶ It might be considered, therefore, that a breach of Art 8 might be established in respect of the practice of certain magistrates. It may be noted, however, that this argument failed in the Scottish case of Birse v HM Advocate.⁵⁷

47 See pp 892–93, and also Chapter 13, pp 853–54.

48 See Funke v France (1993) 16 EHRR 297; Mialhe v France (1993) 16 EHRR 332.

49 See Niemetz v Germany A 251-B (1992).

50 Kopp v Switzerland (1999) 27 EHRR 91, paras 70–71.

51 In McLeod v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 493 powers to enter to prevent a breach of the peace were found to meet this requirement (paras 38–45).

52 Olsson v Sweden A 130 (1988), para 67.

53 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

54 (1999) 27 EHRR 91.

55 See the comments of Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1st edn, 1993, p 414 and of Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2000, p 863.

56 This point is made by Dixon, D (1991) 141NLJ 1586.

57 Unreported, 13 April 2000.

It is also arguable that the decision of the House of Lords in *Central Criminal Court ex p Francis and Francis*⁵⁸ regarding material subject to legal professional privilege may require re-consideration in relation to Art 8. As indicated above, the House of Lords found that privilege is lost when the material is innocently held, but is for a third party's criminal purpose. The approach in *Niemetz v Germany*⁵⁹ was to the effect that a search of a lawyer's office had led to a breach of Art 8 since it was disproportionate to the aims of preventing crime and of protecting the rights of others. That decision also raises questions about the provisions of Part 2 of the CJP. Since the CJP was accompanied by a declaration of its compatibility with the Convention rights, legal advice to the government must have been to the effect that Part 2 was compatible with Art 8. Clearly, this advice could subsequently be found to be flawed; the judiciary remain entirely free (in the higher courts, as Chapter 4 explained) to make a declaration of incompatibility between one or more of the Part 2 provisions and Art 8.

Clearly it could be argued that the limitations placed on the seizure and the use of legally privileged material by Part 2 may represent a proportionate response to the aim of preventing crime under Art 8(2). In other words, an interference with the Art 8 rights represented by the existence of legislation or in any particular instance could be viewed as relatively minimal, consistent with the need to serve that aim. On the other hand, the use of Part 2 provisions in practice may undermine the relationship between client and solicitor. Probably the attitude of the courts will depend upon the facts of any instance which comes before them and upon the attitude of the particular court to the value of affording the convention rights real efficacy.

3 POWERS OF THE SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE SERVICES

Introduction

Traditionally, the security and intelligence services were governed by informal non-statutory mechanisms. The Security Service (MI5) was governed by the unpublished Findlater-Stewart Memorandum and then by the Maxwell-Fyfe Directive published in 1952. The Intelligence Service (MI6) was governed by a Directive to 'C'—the title given to the Chief of the Service. Until 1994, MI6 'maintained [its] existence in legal darkness'.⁶⁰ After an existence which spanned almost all of the 20th century, it was only in 1989 that the Government admitted to the existence of the Security Service⁶¹ and only in 1994 to the existence of the Secret Intelligence Service.⁶² GCHQ, the signals intercept body, was also placed on a statutory basis in 1994.

58 [1989] AC 346; [1988] 3 All ER 375. For comment see Stevenson, op cit, fn 35.
59 A251–B(1992).

60 Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'The Security Service Act 1989' (1989) 52 MLR 801, p 802.

61 The Secret Service bureau was established in 1909 and became known as MI5 in January 1916.

62 See also Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, In From the Cold: National Security and Parliamentary Democracy, 1994, Coda for discussion of the new statutory framework for MI6 and Wadham (1994) 57(6) MLR 916. For discussion of aspects of the new position of MI6 see Davies, P, 'Integrating intelligence into the machinery of British central government' (2000) 78(1) Public Administration 29.

The central impetus for change arose from the need to comply with the demands of the European Convention on Human Rights.⁶³ Once a model for the statutory framework of MI5 had been devised in the form of the Security Service Act 1989, based on the model used for the Interception of Communications Act 1985, also introduced to comply with the Convention, the model was extended to the Secret Intelligence Service and GCHQ in the Intelligence Services Act 1994. A complaints mechanism relying on deliberation in secret by a Commissioner and tribunals was created. At the same time, a level of parliamentary oversight of the agencies was added. Thus, in 1997, the Labour Government inherited a particular statutory framework. It largely adopted, it will be argued, the model it provided when it made changes to the agencies' accountability in the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000.

In the era of the Northern Irish peace process, fragile as it is, and of the HRA, with its guarantee of protection for individual privacy in Art 8, the powers of the three agencies raise a number of concerns. The Government considers that current levels of terrorist activity provide a justification for increasing the funding for the services. This view of the Government is reflected in the recent budgets for the three agencies and, as the Government puts it, it has 'set spending plans which will enable the agencies to face up to the formidable tasks, old, new and changing, which confront them'.⁶⁴ The Security Service has had a role in countering terrorist threats since the 1960s. But that role is likely to undergo some redirection in response to the redefinition of terrorism, discussed in Chapter 8,⁶⁵ which is now contained in s 1(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000. The Government and the parliamentary committee charged with oversight of the agencies, the Intelligence and Security Committee, agree in considering that such redirection aids in justifying the maintenance of the services: 'The [Intelligence and Security] Committee acknowledges the continued need for the intelligence and security agencies in a changed but still dangerous world and believes they must be maintained and funded in a sustainable way. The Government reached the same conclusions in the Comprehensive Spending Review'⁶⁶

But in its Third Report in 1998, the Committee raises concerns regarding the continued existence of the services in the current era:

So far from being invented to justify the agencies' continued existence [new challenges to the services] are real enough, and the country rightly expects to be protected against them... However, the agencies face these tasks in a new environment of greater openness and accountability. They also face them with new technologies available to bring new capacities for the collection of information in many forms, which may pose new challenges to ensuring that the privacy of law-abiding individuals is respected... [in times of no grave national threat] public confidence can be very fragile. That is the inevitable consequence of operating within a 'ring of secrecy' which prevents a more balanced public view of their activities. The public must therefore be confident that 63 See Harman and Hewitt v UK Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

64 The Government Response to the Intelligence and Security Committee's Annual Report Cm 4089, 1998, p 3, para 1. The figure for 1999/2000 was £743.2fn for all three services; in 2000/2001 it was £745.0m: The Intelligence and Security Committee Report 1997-98, Cm 4073, p 9. Individual figures for the three services were not published.

65 Home Office and Northern Ireland Office, Legislation against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998.

66 Op cit, fn 64.

there is adequate independent scrutiny and democratic accountability on their behalf by people within that ring of secrecy That is the task of this Committee.⁶⁷

The Fourth Report, for 1998/99, also adopted a robust tone.⁶⁸ It took particular exception to the continuing refusal of the Government to publish a national audit office report on the excessive spending of the agencies on refurbishment. The Chairman, Tom King, said: 'The cloak of secrecy has been used to cover up inadequacies and serious lapses in expenditure control.' The Chairman of the Commons Public Accounts Committee endorsed this view on the day the Intelligence Committee's Fourth Report was published.

The Intelligence and Security Committee, in both its Third and Fourth Reports, is clearly signalling its concern at the probable tension between the continued existence of doubtfully accountable agencies, with an increasing remit, in an age when the expectations of accountability have never been higher. The implication is that the confidence in the balance supposedly struck by the statutory mechanisms between individual rights, especially to privacy, and the demands of secrecy, has never been more fragile.

While making gestures in the direction of openness and accountability, the statutory mechanisms, including the most recent one, the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA), are still, it will be argued, imbued with the culture of secrecy⁶⁹ Therefore, it is questionable whether the more extensive statutory basis for the agencies' activities which is now available can create confidence in them. It has been shaken by a number of allegations from ex-MI5 or MI6 agents. Spycatcher, written by Peter Wright, a former member of MI5, alleged that MI5 had 'bugged and burgled its way around London', that the Service had tried to destabilise the Labour Government of Harold Wilson, and that the Director General from 1956–65, Roger Hollis, was a Soviet agent.⁷⁰ Richard Tomlinson, a former MI6 officer, was prosecuted in 1998, as was David Shayler, a former MI5 officer, in 2001⁷¹ under the Official Secrets Act, in both instances for seeking to make public a number of grievances and concerns about the services. Concerns were also raised over MI5's and MI6's handling of the Vasili Mitrokhin affair in 1999⁷² and regarding allegations of involvement in the attempt to assassinate Colonel Gadafy.

67 Op cit, fn 64, p vii.

68 Cm 4532, published on 25 November 1999.

69 Admittedly, the specifically operational aspects of the work of the security and intelligence services it covers would be secret anywhere in the world. But the tendency to curb the scrutinising role of the ordinary courts discussed in this chapter, especially in relation to the interception of communications, suggests that secrecy remains the dominant value.

70 See AG v Times Newspapers Ltd [1991] 2 All ER 398; [1992] 1 AC 191, discussed in Chapter 7. The last two allegations appear to be unreliable, see MI5: The Security Service, 3rd edn, 1998, pp 39–40; Mitrokhin, V and Andrew, C, The Mitrokhin Archive, 1999, confirmed that the allegation regarding Roger Hollis was untrue.

71 He was imprisoned in France pending determination of the extradition request which was so that he could face charges under the Official Secrets Act, s 1. France refused to extradite him. Once he returned to the UK, in August 2000, he was charged with an offence under s 1(1) of the Act: see Shayler, Transcript of the Preparatory hearing on 14 May 2001 and the judgment of the Court of Appeal on 28 September 2001. It was found that no defence to a charge under s 1(1) could arise by reliance on s 3 HRA, but that a defence of necessity could arise. See further Chapter 7, pp 349–51. For discussion of the background to the prosecution and the civil actions brought against Shayler, see Best, K, 'Implications of the Shayler affair' (2001) 6 J Civ Lib 18.

72 Mitrokhin was a KGB defector who identified Melita Norwood and others as Soviet agents in the Mitrokhin Archive, 1999.

It will be contended below that ministerial responsibility, parliamentary oversight and the complaints and checking mechanisms of the relevant Commissioners and tribunals create only a limited and flawed control of the agencies. Although the changes to the tribunal system occurring under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 represent a step in the direction of greater accountability, they are, it will be argued, unlikely to have much impact in terms of creating stricter control, since in various respects, including the role of parliamentary oversight, the new tribunal system is based on the old model⁷³ Without radical structural change to these methods, which will allow some breaching of the ring of secrecy, no real control will be achieved. The HRA may aid in providing some of the impetus for such change, but its direct impact on the agencies, in terms of ensuring protection for privacy, is likely to be minimal, for the reasons discussed below.

The framework for the agencies

The functions of MI5 are set out in s 1 of the Security Services Act 1989. Section 1(1) provides: 'the function of the Service shall be the protection of national security and, in particular, its protection against threats from espionage, terrorism and sabotage, from the activities of agents of foreign powers and from actions intended to overthrow or undermine Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means.' Section 1(3) adds the function of safeguarding 'the economic well-being of the UK' but only from external threats. The Act was amended to add ss 1(4) by s 1 of the Security Services Act 1996 in order to add to the two existing functions of the Security Service a third function: 'to act in support of the activities of police forces, [the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS), the National Crime Squad and other law enforcement agencies in the prevention and detection of serious crime].' The words in square brackets were added by s 134(1), Sched 9, para 60 of the Police Act 1997. As indicated above, the definition of terrorism was greatly widened under the Terrorism Act 2000. This means that the functions of the Service have been widened quite significantly since the 1989 Act was passed. Sections 1(2) and 3(2) of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 provide that the function of MI6 and of GCHQ will be exercisable only in the interests of national security with particular reference to the defence and foreign policies of HM Government and in the 'interests of the economic well-being of the UK' and 'in support of the prevention and detection of serious crime'. MI6 is empowered under s 1(1) to obtain and provide information relating to the actions or intentions of persons outside the British Isles and perform tasks relating to such actions and intentions. Thus, MI6 is geared to external rather than internal security, in accordance with its traditional role, but this does not mean that it does not carry out operations on British soil. Targeted individuals may temporarily come to Britain and information relating to them may be found here. The police have pointed out that NCIS is a more open and accountable body than MI5 and, further, that there is little point in putting resources into a police intelligence body if MI5 then removes some of its main functions.

73 See below, pp 714 et seq.

In order to perform their functions, the agencies operate their broad powers under a secrecy and a lack of accountability which would not be acceptable in respect of the police or other law enforcement agencies. But under a model which gave a high priority to oversight and democratic accountability, it would be found that the agencies should carry out no function which could be carried out by a service, such as the police, which was more open to scrutiny. A confusion of functions between such services and MI5 is occurring due to the fact that this principle has not been followed, although given the secrecy surrounding the operations of the agencies, it is not possible to come to any conclusion as to the genuine necessity of affording them a serious crime function or of allowing them to investigate the activities of a wider range of groups by designating them 'terrorist'. MI5 is specifically empowered to function against terrorist groups. MI6 and GCHQ can operate against them, since part of their function is to further the interests of national security which terrorism is assumed to threaten. Thus, widening the definition of terrorism widens the function of all three agencies.

The Intelligence and Security Committee

The 1989 Act provided for no real form of parliamentary oversight of the Security Service.⁷⁴ But the 1994 Act set up, under s 10, the Parliamentary Committee, the Intelligence and Security Committee, to oversee the 'expenditure, administration and policy' of MI5, MI6 and GCHQ.⁷⁵ Operational matters were omitted from their remit. Thus, for the first time, all three services were made, to an extent, accountable to Parliament. The Committee's Report is not, however, presented directly to Parliament but to the Prime Minister, who may censor it before presentation on broad grounds—it need not be damaging to national security, merely to the continued discharge of the functions of the Services. Appointment to the Committee is by the Prime Minister. Since the Committee is not a Select Committee, it has no powers to compel witnesses to appear before it. The members of the Committee have been notified that s 1 of the Official Secrets Act will apply to them as though they were members of the services themselves and therefore, they will commit a criminal offence if they disclose any information or document they have obtained as a result of their work. They would have no defence that the disclosure revealed a serious abuse of power which could not be otherwise addressed, or that the information was already in the public domain. 'Sensitive' information can be withheld from the Committee by agency heads⁷⁶ and non-sensitive information can be withheld by the Secretary of State.⁷⁷

It was clear at its inception that the extent to which the work of the Committee was likely to have a real impact on the agencies depended on its appointees and on the way they interpreted their role. The 1996–97 Report of the Intelligence and Security Committee made no recommendations as to independence at all, in quite strong contrast to the 1997–98 Report, which adopted a more adversarial approach. Tom King chaired the Committee over this period of time and appears to be adopting 74 See further Leigh and Lustgarten, op cit, fn 60.

75 For discussion of the introduction of the Committee in 1994 see Leigh and Lustgarten, op cit, fn 62.

76 Schedule 3, para 3(2).

77 Schedule 3, para 3(4).

an increasingly robust stance. The 1998 Report signalled a change of direction towards a more rigorous scrutiny, and this continued in the 1999 Report, also under his chairmanship.

The 1998 Report was completed after the system had been in place for four years. In its section on oversight, it looked especially at the oversight available in other countries, having talked in the past year to counterpart bodies. They found that other countries have 'more extensive forms of "independent" oversight'.⁷⁸ One feature of such 'more extensive' models of oversight is the Inspector General (IG), a full time appointment who has wide powers of access to operational and other information. The Commissioner for the Security Service has similar powers of access, but it is not his function to review operations and the tribunals only do so in response to a direct complaint. Clearly, many members of the public who might have grounds for complaint would not be able to bring one, since they would be unaware of the operation. An IG would be able to consider operational abuse of power without depending on a complaint. The Committee pointed out that it cannot 'investigate directly different aspects of the Agencies' activities' and it found that the Committee's reach should be extended by an additional 'investigative capacity'.⁷⁹ It considered that without this capacity, it cannot make authoritative statements and needed some reinforcement of authority. In its 'Future Programme of Work' it set forth a number of issues to be pursued in 1998 and 1999, including the question whether individuals should have rights in connection with the destruction or otherwise of any file held on them; protections against storage and use, against individuals' interests, of inaccurate information, and the implications of the European Convention. Following this Report, additional support was given to the Committee on a non-statutory basis, reflecting their interest in an 'Inspector General' model of accountability. This is a step forward in those terms, but since no powers are granted, the co-operation of the services will be on a consensual basis only.

Warrant procedure

The legal constraints on targets in the UK may be compared with those in Canada and the US. In the US, warrants are only issued if there is 'probable cause' that the target is a foreign power or agent of a foreign power and collection is for the purpose of obtaining foreign intelligence.⁸⁰ In Canada, warrants may be issued only if there are 'reasonable grounds' for believing that the warrant is required to investigate a threat to national security.⁸¹ It is apparent that the constraints in these jurisdictions are narrower and, in particular, the serious crime work is not included. The functions of the agencies in assisting in preventing or detecting serious crime is likely to form a much smaller percentage of their work than will widening the definition of terrorism. The MI5 booklet published in 1998⁸² mentions 'arrangements' governing the role of the Service in assisting in serious crime work and the need for a close working relationship with the other agencies in question.⁸³ The arrangements are 78 See p 24, para 62.

79 See p 25, para 69.

80 Under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

81 Under the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act 1984, s 2.

82 MI5: The Security Service (op cit, fn 70).

83 Ibid, p 18.

not published. Therefore, two executive bodies are left to determine, in a barely accountable and 'invisible' manner, the key issue of principle at stake here.

The warrant procedure for all three agencies is governed partly by ss 5 and 6 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 and partly by Part II of RIPA. Under s 5(2) of the 1994 Act, the Home Secretary can issue a warrant authorising the 'taking of any such action as is specified in the warrant in respect of any property so specified or in respect of wireless telegraphy so specified'. In other words, members of the agencies can interfere in any way with property so long as it appears that the action would be of 'substantial value' to the agency in carrying out any of its functions.

The Security Services Act 1996 added sub-ss 3, 3A and 3B to s 5 of the 1994 Act. Section 5(3) provides that warrants issued to GCHQ and MI6 in respect of their 'serious crime' function 'may not relate to property in the British Islands'. Section 5(3A) provides that in respect of the Security Service's serious crime work a warrant may not relate to property within Britain unless s 3B applies. Section 3B applies if the conduct in question appears to constitute one or more offences and either involves the use of violence, results in substantial gain or is conduct by a large number of persons in pursuit of a common purpose or is an offence for which a person of 21 or over with no previous convictions could be expected to receive a sentence of imprisonment of three years or more.

The purpose of the 1996 Act was to allow the Security Service to aid the police in preventing and detecting serious crime, by which the Government stated that it meant organised crime. However, the terms of the Act do not limit its application to serious or organised crime. It could be used, for example, against persons engaging in public protest who might well (given the breadth and vagueness of some public order law), commit an offence, such as obstruction of the highway, and who can be said to be acting in pursuit of a common purpose. Thus, a distinction is created between the agencies in terms of what they may do in relation to property, and this is continued in Part II of the RIPA. But, clearly, all three were able to engage in other activities in relation to persons in the British Islands, whether under warrant or not, so long as, formally speaking, the activities were in accordance with their functions. This position became untenable under the HRA and therefore, in anticipation of its coming into force, such activities were provided with a statutory basis under the RIPA. 'Directed surveillance' and covert 'human intelligence sources' can be used by MI6 and GCHQ, but 'intrusive surveillance', which entails an intrusion onto 'residential premises', can normally be used only by MI5 in respect of its serious crime work.⁸⁴

It was suggested in debate in Parliament that the 1994 Act should contain a clear set of principles which would govern and structure the operations of the services in carrying out these statutory functions. It was suggested that they should include the requirements that the more intrusive the technique, the higher the authority should be to authorise its use, and that except in emergencies, less intrusive techniques should be preferred to more intrusive ones.⁸⁵ The Government rejected these amendments to the 1994 Act on the ground that they were implicit in s 5 of the Act. Section 5 provides that the Secretary of State should be satisfied that 'what the action seeks to achieve cannot reasonably be achieved by other means'. This imprecise requirement is clearly no substitute for the more detailed set of principles suggested. If a member of the Service wishes to intercept communications on the public telephone system, another level of control is imposed, since the procedure under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 applies (discussed below). The RIPA addressed the anomaly that members of the services could engage in various forms of surveillance in reliance merely on the procedure under the 1994 Act, but that in respect of this particular form, an extra layer of control was added.

84 See RIPA 2000, s 42.

85 HC Standing Committee E, Col 72,8 March 1994.

The result of s 5 is that a private individual can have surveillance devices placed on his or her premises or can be subject to a search of the premises even though engaged in lawful political activity which is not intended to serve any foreign interest. An amendment to the Security Services Bill was put forward that would have exempted such a person from the operation of the legislation, but it was rejected by the Government.

The authorisation must be by the Home Secretary, personally, under s 6(1) of the 1994 Act, except in the case of emergency warrants which may be authorised by a senior official, with express authorisation from the Home Secretary. The arrangements for intrusive surveillance under the RIPA are similar, as explained below,⁸⁶ but no independent authorisation procedure is necessary in respect of the other two forms of surveillance. The s 6 warrant procedure begins with a letter from the agency to the Home Office. It is considered in the warrants division which may require further information in order to strengthen the application. As Leigh and Lustgarten point out, this process could be viewed as a gulling of their political master by collusion between 'the Security Service and its Whitehall counterpart', or it could be seen as 'conscientious control' over the requests, endowing stronger ones with greater credibility and rejecting weaker ones.⁸⁷ Under s 5 of the 1994 Act, the Home Secretary should then consider whether it is necessary for the action to be undertaken on the ground that 'it is likely to be of substantial value in assisting the agency in question in carrying out its function, as indicated above'. He must be satisfied that what is sought to be achieved could not be achieved by other means and as to the arrangements for disclosure of information obtained. It is not possible to ascertain how far each of these matters is subjected to serious scrutiny or how far, assuming that they were taken seriously, a Home Secretary would be able to detect weaknesses in the application. Obviously, these matters would depend partly on the particular Home Secretary in question. But applications are very rarely rejected and, as Lustgarten and Leigh point out, political considerations as well as legal ones enter into the approval.⁸⁸ The warrants are issued for six months initially by the Home Secretary and may be renewed by him for that period so long as it is thought necessary for them to continue. There is no overall maximum period and some warrants may therefore be, in effect, permanent. If issued by a senior official, the warrant ceases to have effect after two working days.

The warrant procedure has been compared unfavourably with that in other mature democracies. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service may only be granted warrants on the authorisation of a Federal Court judge, thus ensuring a measure of independent oversight. Moreover, the warrant will not be issued unless the facts relied on to justify the belief that a warrant is necessary to investigate a threat to national security are set out in a sworn statement.⁸⁹ In the US, the warrants are authorised by special Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act courts comprising selected federal judges, although in certain circumstances, the Attorney General can authorise searches or warrants by executive order only. These arrangements present a strong contrast with those in the UK, since there is no judicial involvement at all in the UK in the issuing of warrants under either the 1994 or 2000 Acts. Any judicial involvement can occur only after the warrant has been issued. Thus, the crucial stage of the procedure is entirely in executive hands—one part of the executive is authorising another to interfere with individual rights. The impact of judicial authorisation must not be overestimated; clearly, some judges may develop a tendency to rubber-stamp requests. But the fact of placing papers before a judge may foster internal scrupulousness in their preparation. Since many persons will have no means of knowing that they have been targeted and therefore will have no ability to make a complaint, judicial involvement at the complaints stage only is of marginal importance. The failure to allow such involvement in the warrant procedure may be viewed as one of the key weaknesses in the scheme.

86 See pp 697-98.

87 Op cit, fn 62, p 57.

88 Ibid, p 58.

The system for accountability therefore relies mainly on a level of ministerial control, but only as regards activities of the agencies which are under warrant or require ministerial authorisation under the RIPA. As indicated, a further, judicial level of control is then added which relates only to the warrant procedure. The Commissioner is supposed to provide oversight of the procedure, but only after the event. At present, the same Commissioner, Stuart-Smith LJ, operates as Commissioner in respect of all three agencies, and will be re-appointed to continue his role as ‘the Intelligence Services Commissioner’ under s 59 of the RIPA. The oversight is, however, limited. The Commissioner can only oversee the issuance of warrants under ss 5 and 6 of the 1994 Act; he cannot order that they should be quashed; nor can he order an operation against a particular group to cease. The Commissioner cannot address instances in which no warrant was necessary, since the procedure in question is not unlawful. The remit of the Commissioner precludes consideration of unauthorised actions since he can only consider whether a warrant was properly authorised. If an action does not require a warrant, such a question becomes irrelevant. This is also true of actions which are unlawful and unauthorised by warrant, such as burgling a property.

Personal files

The Intelligence and Security Committee has taken a particular interest in the creation and use of personal files stored by the agencies, particularly those on British citizens. A particular concern was to consider ‘the protection for an individual against having information inappropriately or inaccurately gathered, stored and used against their interests’⁹⁰ These files play a significant role in security vetting, 89 For discussion of the impact of this system in practice see Leigh, I, ‘Secret proceedings in Canada’ (1996) 34 Osgoode Hall LJ 113.

90 Report of the Intelligence and Security Committee for 1997/98, Cm 4073, p 16, paras 39 and 40.

which affects a wide range of jobs in the UK. It applies to senior staff in a range of government departments, to independent bodies such as the BBC and in the private sector.⁹¹ Security checks will include consideration of information, if any, held on an applicant by MI5.

The Security Service currently holds 250,000 hard copy files on individuals and a further 4,000 are archived on microfiche. Of these, 17,500 are currently coded 'green'⁹² or active, and 13,000 relate to British citizens. The Service is currently reviewing files for destruction by category. The Committee expressed concern that reviewing was restricted to individuals over 55. Thus, files may be retained on individuals under that age because they had 20 years ago joined an organisation then classed as subversive, whereas a file would not be opened on a person joining the same organisation today.⁹³ The Committee found: 'We believe...that some form of independent check should be built into the process...'⁹⁴ The Government response to this recommendation suggests that secrecy remains the overriding priority. 'The Government does not believe that the process of reviewing files for destruction would be assisted by independent scrutiny.'⁹⁵

The Committee took a somewhat less robust view of the SIS and GCHQ records and data. SIS has 86,000 records, half of which relate to UK citizens. Many of them relate to the staff of the Agency and its contacts. Of these, 75% are closed and some relate back to 1909. Thus, it appears to have no destruction policy and of course no independent check that it is not holding files on British citizens needlessly. The argument for an independent check may not be as pressing as in respect of the Security Service, but it is clearly applicable, especially as internal procedures reveal an unawareness of the abuses which can arise if files are stored for many years without review.

Like SIS, GCHQ does not hold and create personal records in the same way that MI5 does. But its rationale is to hold personal data collected by intercepting communications. GCHQ informed the Committee that such data 'which may arise from collection under warrant or otherwise (emphasis added) is a necessary and sometimes key analytical tool'. GCHQ has a lawful basis for interception under s 5 of the 1994 Act and under s 3(2)(a)(i) of the 1985 Act. But these words imply that GCHQ is currently holding some personal data without a basis of legal authorisation. Since such holding of data was not a criminal offence or civil wrong, this practice of GCHQ could not be said to be unlawful until the HRA came fully into force. Assuming that it amounts to an infringement of Art 8, it is now unlawful, since it cannot be said to be in accordance with the law. As discussed below, it may well be the case that no avenue, other than the complaints mechanism, is available to an individual to challenge the holding of his or her personal information which has been obtained unlawfully. In future, such a matter could be brought before the 91 See First Report from the Select Committee on Defence, Session 1982–83, Positive Vetting Procedures in Her Majesty's Services and the Ministry of Defence HC (182/83) 242 and the Radcliffe Report, Cmnd 1681, 1962, Chapter 7; Linn, I, Application Refused: Employment Vetting by the State, London, 1990; Hollingsworth, M and Norton-Taylor, R, Blacklist: The Inside Story of Political Vetting, London, 1988. The current vetting guidelines are set out in a statement made at HC Deb Vol 251–766w, 15 December 1994.

92 This is part of the 'traffic lighting' process for files: 'green' files are active; 'amber' ones are closed but may have papers added; 'red' ones are closed and retained for research only.

93 Ibid, p 19, para 47.

94 Ibid, p 20, para 50.

95 The Government Response to the Intelligence and Security Committee's Annual Report Cm 4089, 1998, p 5, para 16.

new tribunal set up under the RIPA; this is discussed below. The Government has said that all GCHQ interception, use and retention of material is carried out only in accordance with the 1994 and, where appropriate, 1985 Acts and 'these arrangements are subject to continuing scrutiny by the Commissioners' under the two Acts.⁹⁶

One means of allowing a check on the retention and use of personal information would be to allow some access, with use of editing, under the forthcoming Freedom of Information Act to the personal data held by all three agencies. However, the three agencies will all be excluded from the Act. They are also now fully exempt from the obligation to apply the data protection principles under the Data Protection Act 1998, on the basis that the files are held for national security purposes. Under the 1984 Act, personal data held on national security grounds was not exempt from the principles, although the agencies did not register under the Act on national security grounds. The protection is therefore weaker under the 1998 Act, although a person directly affected by the exemption can appeal against the issue of a national security certificate, under s 28 of the 1998 Act. Since the agencies, and MI5 in particular, have a role in relation to serious crime, this position is anomalous. As the Data Protection Registrar (now Commissioner) has argued, MI5 should be placed in the same position as the police in relation to this role.⁹⁷ The Commissioner has no general statutory remit to obtain access to files for monitoring purposes. But individual cases referred to him may raise general issues of file keeping. The position may be compared to that in Canada, where the agencies are subject to privacy and access to information legislation, although individuals have no right of access to their files and are not informed that the file exists. An edited version of the file may be made available which will be limited to information already in the public domain. The key point is that the Commissioners in Canada have access to the files. In the US, records may only be established and held if they are relevant to the conduct of authorised intelligence operations and they are subject to the Freedom of Information Act. Individuals can ask to see files; they may be given an edited version and the agency can choose neither to confirm nor deny that material has been withheld. These arrangements, qualified as they are, represent an improvement on the complete exclusion of the agencies from the relevant privacy and FoI legislation, as in the UK.

Complaints

Taking the Interception of Communications Act as a model, the 1989 Act set up a Commissioner under s 4 and a tribunal under s 5 as a means of oversight for MI5. The procedure for complaints and composition of the tribunal are dealt with in Scheds 1 and 2. The 1994 Act adopted the same model for MI6 and GCHQ under ss 8, 9 and Scheds 1 and 2.

No duty is imposed on the agencies to disclose the fact to an individual that an operation has occurred, after it is over. Most individuals will have no means of ⁹⁶ Government Response, p 6, para 19.

⁹⁷ Our Answers: Data Protection and the EU Directive (95/46/EC), the Data Protection Registrar, July 1996. This position was also strongly criticised by Justice in its report Under Surveillance: Covert Policing and Human Rights Standards, 1998, p 90. For the position of the police under the 1998 Act, see Chapter 10, p 605.

knowing that it has occurred and therefore will be unlikely to bring a complaint. If an individual brings a speculative complaint to the tribunal, uncertain whether surveillance or intrusion has occurred, the result may leave him or her none the wiser. The tribunals only reported that the result was unfavourable to the complainant, not whether an operation was indeed taking place, but was viewed as justified. The tribunals were not permitted to give reasons for their decisions.⁹⁸ Service personnel who felt that they had been required to act improperly in bugging or searching a person's property may not disclose the matter.

As discussed in Chapter 7, s 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1989 prevents members or former members of the security and intelligence services disclosing anything at all about the operation of those services. These provisions also apply to anyone who is notified that he or she is subject to the provisions of the section. Similarly, s 4(3) of the Act prohibits disclosure of information obtained by, or relating to, the issue of a warrant under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 or the Security Services Act 1989.

The 1989 and 1994 Acts provide no avenue for members of the agencies to complain to the Commissioner or Tribunals. Therefore, any disclosure of information to them or to the individual citizen concerned by such members would be a criminal offence under the Official Secrets Act. Thus, the persons who would be most aware of an abuse of power are denied this means of either supporting a complaint or enabling the individual concerned to instigate one. They can complain to the Security and Intelligence Services Staff Counsellor, appointed by the Prime Minister in 1987, but the office is, as Leigh and Lustgarten put it, 'a safety valve for conscience-troubled officials, rather than a form of oversight'.⁹⁹ The Reports of the Counsellor for the Prime Minister, Home Secretary and Foreign Secretary are unpublished and therefore there is no means of knowing whether his work has any benefit in terms of terminating unlawful or improper agency activities.

Under Sched 1, para 2 of the 1989 Act, the Security Service Tribunal could investigate two types of complaint: that the agency had instituted inquiries about the complainant and, if so, whether it had reasonable grounds for so doing. If the inquiries were due to a person's membership of a category of persons, the only question to be asked was whether there were reasonable grounds for believing him or her to be a member of that category, not whether the Service had reasonable grounds for investigating the group in question. Where information had been disclosed to an employer, the tribunal would investigate whether there were reasonable grounds for believing the information to be true. No inquiry is to be made into the misleadingness of the information or its factual truth. Nor can the tribunal consider the reasonableness of the categorisation of a particular group, or part of a group. The final ground for complaint was apparently wide: a person 'may complain to the tribunal if he is aggrieved by anything which he believes the Service has done in relation to him or any property of his'.¹⁰⁰ But the tribunal cannot investigate a complaint which relates to property and must pass it to the Commissioner who would utilise the principles applied by a court on an application for judicial review.¹⁰¹

98 Schedule 1, para 5(3) of the 1989 Act and Sched 1, para 6 of the 1994 Act.

99 Ibid., p 430.

100 1989 Act, Sched 1, para 1; 1994 Act, Sched 1, para 1.

101 1989 Act, Sched 1, para 4; 1994 Act, Sched 1, para 3(b).

The standard of scrutiny in the tribunals was unlikely to be rigorous: in *Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Ruddock*¹⁰² (determined prior to the coming into force of the 1985 Act) the question was whether the decision of the Home Secretary in granting the warrant was 'so outrageous in its defiance of logic or accepted moral standards that no sensible person who applied his mind to the question to be decided could have arrived at it'. Since the tribunals can merely ask whether the agency had 'reasonable grounds' for its action, they cannot consider the questions whether the action was proportionate to the invasion of privacy and whether the action could have been carried out by the police. The tribunals both sit in secret and the complainant has no right to be informed of the findings of the investigation, only whether it is favourable or unfavourable. The Commissioner is operating under severe constraints, which arguably render his office a merely tokenistic one. He sits as a full time judge, has no staff and takes roughly two weeks' leave plus his own free time to carry out his role. He has been appointed to carry out his task in respect of all three agencies, and therefore he is expected to oversee bodies with, as noted, a combined budget of £747m and a staff of around 5,000.¹⁰³ In the US, Canada and Australia, the equivalent bodies have a full time staff.

Given these limitations, it is unsurprising to find that no complaint has ever been upheld by the tribunals or Commissioner. Between the introduction of the 1989 Act and the end of 1997, the tribunal set up under s 4 of the 1989 Act investigated 275 complaints; none was upheld.¹⁰⁴ The Report of the Security Services Commissioner presented to Parliament in June 1999¹⁰⁵ reports that the tribunal received 28 complaints in 1998, of which 18 were investigated and none was upheld. The Commissioner received 16 complaints and upheld none.¹⁰⁶ The Prime Minister has the power to censor the report before it is presented to Parliament, a power which is clearly exercised routinely. It appeared to be almost impossible, in practice, for a member of the public who was dissatisfied with the outcome of the complaints procedure to seek a remedy in the courts. The tribunals were set up as the only avenue of complaint and, under s 5(4) of the 1989 Act and s 9(4) of the 1994 Act, the decisions of the tribunals, including decisions as to their jurisdiction, were not questionable in any court of law.

Commentators have not viewed this system for complaints as a success and the Commissioner has implied that it was flawed from the outset. He has said that the limitations of the complaints mechanism are the fault of the 'architects' of the statutory provisions.¹⁰⁷ It has been said: 'A major cause for concern... is the failure to confront adequately the need for accountability and review of the Services.'¹⁰⁸ John Wadham of Liberty described the Security Service Tribunal as 'useless'.¹⁰⁹ Gill found: 'this structure... has been constructed neither for elegance nor impact'.¹¹⁰

102 [1987] 1 WLR 1482.

103 This is an estimate; the numbers have been censored from the Parliamentary Committee's Report 1998, pp 42 and 47.

104 MI5: The Security Service, op cit, fn 70, p 33.

105 Report of the Commissioner for 1998, Cm 4365.

106 Ibid, p 5.

107 Leigh and Lustgarten, p 438.

108 Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 178.

109 Op cit, fn 62, p 439.

110 Gill, P, Policing Politics: Security Intelligence and the Liberal Democratic State, 1994, p 295.

Lustgarten and Leigh sum up the problem: 'in so far as the government believed that by creating these new structures it would reassure the public that all is well it seriously miscalculated.'¹¹¹ As indicated below, a new complaints system has been established under the RIPA. A new tribunal has replaced the current ones and has also taken over the Commissioner's complaints' role. An Interception of Communications Commissioner as well as a Chief Surveillance Commissioner will be appointed under the RIPA. The remit of the new Commissioners will overlap with that of Stuart-Smith LJ, when he is re-appointed, since it will include some oversight of surveillance undertaken by the agencies.¹¹²

Impact of the HRA

Now that the HRA is fully in force, it can be said that the Convention represents a set of principles which may be read into the 1989, 1994 and 2000 Acts so long as no irreducible incompatibility between the statutory provisions and the rights exists.¹¹³ Further, the three agencies in question, the relevant ministers and the oversight bodies (apart from the Parliamentary Committee)¹¹⁴ as public authorities are bound by the rights under s 6 of the HRA. Although, formally, this is the legal position, the means whereby the Convention rights can be enabled to have a real rather than a theoretical impact on the agencies are highly circumscribed. They are discussed below, but although possible methods of bringing the HRA to bear on the agencies in court are considered, it is contended that the main impact of the HRA in this context will be an educative and cultural one: it will provide the openness the Parliamentary Committee currently favours with a clearer basis, and it may have an eventual, incremental impact on the work of the oversight bodies, in terms of the attitude they bring to their work. Most significantly, it may help to provide the impetus for the further evolution of the oversight.

Convention requirements

The Art 8(1) guarantees of respect for private life, the home and correspondence are clearly of most relevance to the activities of the agencies. The Introduction to Part III argued for a broad view of what constitutes invasion of privacy, based on the notion of control of personal information.¹¹⁵ An interference with property will normally create an interference with one or more of the guarantees, as indicated above.¹¹⁶ This would include planting a 'bug' on the premises in question, or entering them in order to remove property.¹¹⁷ Less obvious invasions will also engage Art 8. The provisions of the Acts themselves may constitute a continuing invasion of privacy.¹¹⁸ In Harman and Hewitt v UK,¹¹⁹ the European Commission of Human Rights

111 Op cit, fn 62, p 439.

112 See p 702. For the role of the Chief Surveillance Commissioner, see the same page.

113 The HRA, s 3.

114 Parliament itself is not a public body under s 6 and nor is a person exercising function in connection with proceedings in Parliament (s 6(3) (b)). It is probable that the Committee is not a public authority under this definition.

115 See pp 530–32.

116 See p 648.

117 See below, pp 703–06.

118 See Klass v FRG (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

found that secret surveillance by MI5 of two former NCCL officers, Patricia Hewitt and Harriet Harman, had infringed Art 8(1), although they had not been subjected to direct intrusion. The intrusion was termed ‘indirect’ since information about them obtained from the telephone or mail intercepts of others had been recorded.

The use made of personal information, including disclosure to others, might also engage Art 8(1). In MS v Sweden,¹²⁰ the applicant complained that the use of medical records in respect of a compensation claim had infringed Art 8. The Court found that the disclosure did constitute an interference with the respect for private life, although it was found to be justified under Art 8(2).¹²¹ The findings in *G, H and I v UK*¹²² implied that the compiling and use of personal files by the Security Service might fall within Art 8, although they also raised questions regarding the onus placed on applicants to establish that they were likely to have been the victims of surveillance—in that instance of positive vetting for civil service posts. *Esbester v UK*¹²³ confirmed that a security check based on personal information would fall within Art 8. It may be concluded that many, if not almost all, activities of the agencies in obtaining, collecting, using and disclosing personal information are likely to engage Art 8.

Once Art 8(1) is engaged, the question is whether the interference can be justified under para 2. To be justified, State interference with the Art 8 guarantee must first be in accordance with the law. As indicated in Chapter 2, interpreting ‘prescribed by law’ (treated as an equivalent provision at Strasbourg), Strasbourg has asked first whether the interference has some basis in domestic law, and secondly whether it is of the right ‘quality’.¹²⁴ In *Huwig v France*¹²⁵ and in *Kruslin v France*¹²⁶ the Court said that the requirement of quality means that the law ‘should be accessible to the person concerned, who must moreover be able to foresee its consequences for him, and compatible with the rule of law’. The application in *Harman and Hewitt v UK*¹²⁷ was declared admissible since the activities of MI5 in placing the applicants under surveillance were not in accordance with the law. No sufficient basis in law existed at the time, and the successful application led to the passing of the 1989 Act. Although there is room for argument that certain of the terms used in the 1989 and 1994 Acts are too imprecise and broad to satisfy the ‘in accordance with the law’ requirement, it is unlikely that this would be found to be the case in respect of primary legislation in this context, unless the domestic courts are prepared to take a much stricter view of that requirement than that taken at Strasbourg. In Christie v UK,¹²⁸ the Security Service and Interception of Communications Acts were both found to meet this requirement and the Commission noted: ‘the [Strasbourg] case

119 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

120 (1999) 28 EHRR 313.

121 On the grounds of being necessary in a democratic society to further the economic well being of the State.

122 15 EHRR CD 41.

123 18 EHRR CD 72. See also Harman v UK Appl No 20317/92 (1993) unreported.

124 See Sunday Times v UK A 30, para 49 (1979), discussed in Chapter 5, pp 229–30.

125 (1990) 12 EHRR 528, para 26.

126 (1990) 12 EHRR 547, para 27.

127 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

128 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

law establishes that the requirements of foreseeability in the special context of sectors affecting national security cannot be the same as in many other fields'. Nevertheless, in criticising the provisions of the 1996 Act, Peter Duffy and Murray Hunt have argued that it breaches Art 8¹²⁹ since it probably does not pass the Convention requirement that an interference with private life should comply with rule of law principles. Executive discretion is so unfettered under the Act that any interference may not be 'in accordance with the law' as interpreted in *Huwig v France*¹³⁰ and Kruslin v France.¹³¹ No application from the UK has been made since the passing of the 1996 Act and therefore, the 'in accordance with the law' question cannot be regarded as finally settled.

In Esbeater v UK,¹³² which concerned the alleged supply of information by MI5 regarding the applicant's membership of the Communist Party of Britain and of CND, leading to the revocation of a job offer, the Commission found that the 1989 Act complies with the 'in accordance with the law' requirement since the grounds under s 3 were expressed sufficiently precisely. This was a cautious, narrow application of the Convention requirements by the Commission. In Leander v Sweden,¹³³ which concerned the holding of information in a secret police register, the Court found that unpublished statements explaining the law could not meet the accessibility requirement. Since, as indicated above, vetting procedures are either unpublished or have not been placed on a statutory basis, it might have been expected that they would fail to meet this requirement. The Commission in Esbeater seemed to fail to distinguish between the different invasions of privacy created by vetting, and to have failed to look for a satisfactory basis in law in relation to the interference created when the information is supplied. Possibly this is a context in which the Court will eventually allow a narrower margin of appreciation in scrutinising the quality of the domestic basis for vetting more rigorously, bearing in mind its deterrent effects which may undermine freedom of association. Chapter 8 contends that the Court's freedom of association jurisprudence in the context of membership of political groups has recently become somewhat more interventionist.¹³⁴ Since security vetting tends to raise issues under both Art 8 and Art 11, it is possible that such a stance may also become more evident under Art 8.

Any residual activities undertaken by the Security and Intelligence Services which at present are not covered by the procedures under the 1994 and 2000 Acts may not be in accordance with the law, assuming that the primary right under Art 8(1) is engaged. For example, at present, agents must acquire a warrant if they intend to enter property or interfere with it. They are also bound by the terms of Part I of the RIPA; under s 1, as discussed below, it is a criminal offence to tap into a public or private telecommunications system without authorisation. But certain surveillance techniques may not be covered by Parts I or II of the RIPA. Until the inception of the HRA, use of such techniques was lawful under civil or criminal law in the sense that since no law forbade them, they were assumed to be permitted. The 129 See (1997) 1 EHRR 11.

130 (1990) 12 EHRR 547.

131 (1990) 12 EHRR 528.

132 18 EHRR CD 72. See also Harman v UK Appl No 20317/92 (1993) unreported.

133 (1987) 9 EHRR 443.

134 See p 398.

Intelligence and Security Committee in its 1998 Report¹³⁵ spoke of 'executive and judicial checks that intelligence and security services are obeying the law, in particular on acts which would be unlawful but for express authorisation'.¹³⁶ The implied distinction is between acts which do not require such authorisation and acts which do. But under the HRA it is unlawful for a public authority to fail to abide by the Convention rights and therefore, as explained below, this distinction between acts which require express authorisation and those which do not will tend to break down. All these activities require a basis in law under the HRA since all, or almost all of them represent an infringement of privacy. Following the principle laid down in Harman and Hewitt v UK,¹³⁷ it is clear that placing the use of certain surveillance activities on a legal basis, which includes requiring warrant applications, is insufficient if others remain unregulated.

*Christie v UK*¹³⁸ concerned an interference, telephone tapping, which requires a warrant if it is not to amount to a criminal offence, as the Commission pointed out. No breach of Art 8 was found. It is unclear, but possible, that had the complaint concerned a procedure which did not require a warrant but which infringed Art 8, its basis in law might have been viewed as insufficient, given that no involvement of the Secretary of State in checking warrants or, under s 6 of the 1985 Act, in reviewing the use of resultant material, would have been necessary.

This contention must be put forward tentatively. It may be that activities which did not require authorisation until the inception of the HRA might be said to have a form of legal basis under the statutory provisions if they are carried out in accordance with the stated functions of the agencies in the 1989 and 1994 Acts. But it is suggested that this basis is so exiguous and leaves discretion so unfettered that it may in future be found to fail to satisfy the 'accordance with the law' requirement. The case of *G, H and I v UK*¹³⁹ raised questions concerning the efficacy of the 1989 Act, although the applications failed. As indicated above, the RIPA is intended to provide the necessary legal basis. Clearly, there may still be activities of the agencies which fall outside it. Further, it is questionable whether the RIPA itself provides a basis of sufficient quality, a matter that is discussed further below.

Assuming that an interference is 'in accordance with the law', under the 1989, 1994 or 2000 statutes, it must also, under Art 8(2), have a legitimate aim, be necessary in a democratic society and be applied in a non-discriminatory fashion (Art 14). In cases of invasion of privacy by the State, Strasbourg's main concerns have been with the requirements of 'in accordance with the law' and 'necessary in a democratic society'. In this context, the 'legitimate aim' requirement has always been found to be satisfied. This is unsurprising since the grounds available for interference are so broad. They are: the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well being of the country, the prevention of disorder or crime, the protection of health or morals, the protection of the rights or freedom of others. The provision against non-discrimination under Art 14 has not been so far a significant issue in the State invasion of privacy jurisprudence. The Court has interpreted 'necessary

135 Cm 4073.

136 Ibid., p 23.

137 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

138 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

139 15 EHRR CD 41.

in a democratic society' as meaning: 'an interference corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued'¹⁴⁰ As explained in Chapter 4, the doctrine of proportionality is strongly linked to the principle of the margin of appreciation. The width of that margin appears to depend partly on the aim of the interference in question and partly on its necessity. In relation to the aim of national security, the Court has allowed a very wide margin to the State.

In *Klass v Federal Republic of Germany*¹⁴¹ the European Court of Human Rights found, bearing the margin of appreciation doctrine in mind, that German telephone tapping procedures were in conformity with Art 8 since, inter alia, they provided for compensation in proceedings in the ordinary courts for persons whose phones had been unlawfully tapped. The legality of such interceptions could be challenged in the ordinary courts. No such provision is available under the Security Services Act 1989 or the Intelligence Services Act 1994 in respect of analogous intrusions, although, theoretically, the old tribunals could award compensation, either of their own motion or on a reference from the Commissioner.¹⁴² This system would appear to represent a significantly lower standard of accountability than the West German one in respect of phone tapping and it is at least possible that a breach of Art 8 would have been found in Klass had the margin allowed to Germany been narrower.

*Leander v Sweden*¹⁴³ concerned rather similar complaints mechanisms. Information on the applicant was stored on a secret police register for national security purposes and used for employment vetting. This created an interference with Art 8(1), but a wide margin was allowed to the State in choosing the means of protecting national security. The aggregate of remedies available, recourse to an independent Ombudsman and Chancellor of Justice, were found to be sufficient to satisfy Art 13. In *Harman v UK*¹⁴⁴ and Esbestor v UK,¹⁴⁵ the Commission found that the 1989 Act complied with the procedural requirements of Art 8(2), at least in the national security context. In Christie v UK,¹⁴⁶ in respect of the almost identical mechanisms under the 1985 Act, the Commission found, 'having regard to the wide margin of appreciation in this area', the safeguards provided by the tribunal and the Commissioner were sufficient in the instant case.

These findings need not be taken to mean that the oversight mechanisms provided under the 1989 and 1994 Acts, and now under the 2000 Act, meet Convention requirements. They were made in relation to the particular case, not as abstract comment on such mechanisms in general, and they were heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation, especially wide where national security is in issue. As argued in Chapter 4, that doctrine is not available at national level and this, it is contended, means that it should not influence national decision makers. An activist domestic judge considering, judicially or extra-judicially (assisting the new tribunal, or as a 140 Olsson v Sweden A 130 (1988), para 67.

141 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

142 Schedule 1, para 6(1) and para 7(2) of the 1989 Act. Schedule 1, para 8(1)(b) and para 8(2)(b) of the 1994 Act.

143 (1987) 9 EHRR 443.

144 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

145 18 EHRR CD 72.

146 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

member of it, or on appeal) whether the domestic complaints or reference provisions meet Strasbourg standards, and untrammelled by the margin of appreciation doctrine, might conclude that the controls built into the UK system under the 1989, 1994 and 2000 Acts are insufficient to prevent abuse. The framework is largely based on scrutiny of the procedure after the event and in a manner which keeps most of its key aspects in the hands of the executive. In this respect it fails to accord with the rule of law, since a part of the executive is authorising another part to invade rights; the checking procedure which is then marginally available appears to provide a largely illusory protection and in respect of key aspects of it, the only recourse is to the executive again. Arguably, the safeguards would not appear to satisfy Art 8(2).

But it is more probable that the judiciary would find that traditional notions of deference in the national security context would yield the same result as the application of the margin of appreciation doctrine.¹⁴⁷ There are signs, however, that at Strasbourg, in its very recent decisions, the Court is becoming less deferential towards claims of national security, although admittedly they have been in the context of Art 6 rather than Art 8, a significant difference due to the qualifications under Art 8.¹⁴⁸ The question whether the new, single tribunal provides an effective remedy for the citizen is discussed below.¹⁴⁹

Using the HRA in practice

Clearly, there have always been, theoretically, methods of seeking to curb the agencies' powers when they impinge on individual citizens. Agents could be prosecuted for burglary, for example, if the action was unauthorised or improperly authorised. Prosecution of agents is, however, highly unlikely, since no means of referring an investigation to the police is provided in the statutes; further, any risk of revealing secrets would probably be avoided simply by taking a decision not to prosecute. It would also be difficult to acquire evidence due to the provisions against providing evidence to complainants. Actions for trespass to property or other tortious liability could be brought against agents, although the secrecy of operations makes this very unlikely. Any such action brought in the post-HRA era would have to accord with the Convention. The HRA extends the theoretical protection available for the citizen since, under ss 6, 7 and 8, it creates civil liability where activities are carried out that were not previously unlawful, but which breach the Convention guarantees. However, allegations that such breaches have occurred would have to be brought in the new tribunal created under s 65 of the RIPA, not in the ordinary courts, as indicated below.¹⁵⁰

The new tribunal has a duty under s 6 of the HRA to comply with the Convention in adjudicating on complaints and the Commissioner will have such a duty in overseeing not only warrants, but also the discharge of the duties of the Home Secretary and the agencies under the RIPA. The tribunal, Commissioner and Home Secretary are bound by the Convention under s 6; they are also providing oversight of bodies which are themselves so bound.

147 See further Chapter 4, pp 186–87. See also the Rehman case, discussed in Chapter 15, p 956.

148 Tinnelly v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 249 (discussed below, p 721); McElduff v UK Appl No 21322/92.

149 See pp 723–24.

150 See pp 714 et seq.

However, reliance on court action in efforts to secure the agencies' compliance with the guarantees will be very unlikely, largely due to the secrecy of the operations. Action in the ordinary courts at the citizen's instigation may in any event be almost entirely ruled out. As indicated above, ouster clauses contained in s 5(4) of the 1989 Act and s 9(4) of the 1994 Act barred the way to obtaining judicial review of the decisions of the Commissioner and tribunals. Both were post-*Anisminic*¹⁵¹ ouster clauses in that they covered decisions of the tribunals and Commissioner as to their jurisdictions. The new tribunal will also be protected by such a clause, although there will also be a very narrow right of appeal. Judicial review of ministerial decisions in the ordinary courts appears to be ruled out since complaints should be brought to the relevant tribunal or Commissioner and now to the new tribunal. However, judicial review could be sought, it was made clear in the preparatory hearing in Shayler,¹⁵² of the refusal of a minister or other person within s 12 of the Official Secrets Act 1989 to authorise a member of the agencies to disclose matters relating to the work of the services.¹⁵³ Any such refusal would have to comply with the Convention rights, and a court considering the matter would not merely consider whether the decision was reasonable, but whether it had so complied.

Security vetting in the UK, taking into account information held on an applicant by MI5, raises a number of Convention issues. The position of applicants who are dismissed or refused employment as regards obtaining recourse to industrial tribunals has recently improved due to the government response to the findings of the European Court of Human Rights in Tinnelly v UK.¹⁵⁴ The Court found that a ministerial certificate, stating that the reasons for the failure to employ the applicants were national security ones, effectively blocked the applicants' claim, since the judge could not go behind its terms and consider the claim, and therefore a breach of Art 6 had occurred. As a result of the ruling, the law as regards employment hearings in which national security is a factor was changed. Section 90 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 provides for the creation of a tribunal, modelled on the Special Immigration Appeals Tribunal, to review the issue of ministerial certificates in Northern Ireland.¹⁵⁵ Thus, the issue of national security will be justiciable. However, the extent to which the evidence can be tested will be questionable. As White puts it: 'the central difficulty with the type of Tribunal set up by the 1998 Act is that it attempts to create an adversarial forum where one of the parties is severely hampered in presenting his or her case.'¹⁵⁶ This tribunal provided a model for the new tribunal to be set up under the RIPA; the discussion of its procedure and its compatibility with the Convention below are therefore of relevance. Section 193 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 and s 10 of the Employment Appeals Tribunals Act 1996 were amended¹⁵⁷ so that complaints of unfair dismissal cannot be dismissed on national security grounds unless it is demonstrated that the reason for dismissal

151 Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 AC 147. See further p 719, fn 389.

152 Transcript of the Hearing of 14 May 2001, para 25.

153 Under the Official Secrets Act 1989, ss 7(3)(b) and s 7(5); see further Chapter 7, p 348.

154 (1998) 27 EHRR 249. For discussion, see McEvoy, K and White, C, 'Security vetting in Northern Ireland' (1998) 61 MLR 341, pp 349–54.

155 For discussion see White, C, 'Security vetting, discrimination and the right to a fair trial' [1999] PL 406–18.

156 Ibid, p 413.

157 By the Employment Rights Act 1999, Sched 8. Security and Intelligence service members may also have access to industrial tribunals, under Sched 8.

was on those grounds. All these tribunals, including the new one in Northern Ireland, are bound by s 6 of the HRA, and therefore their procedure must comply with the Convention, and the Convention points considered above could be raised before them. In industrial tribunals, under the previous position, the assertion of national security grounds would have precluded their consideration.

The possibility of further actions at Strasbourg in future cannot be ruled out, probably under Arts 8, 6 or 13, despite the fact that at the present time, as indicated below, the domestic arrangements probably satisfy the Convention requirements in a number of respects. As Chapter 2 points out, decisions of the Commission, taken some years ago and heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation, may not reflect the stance of the Court over the next few years, post-2000. Given the arguments canvassed here, it might be argued that no domestic remedy which must be exhausted, other than that represented by the new tribunal procedure exists; such absence would speed up the process of taking a case. In other fields, the HRA itself might offer such a remedy which would require exhaustion in the ordinary courts, but in this one that argument is much weaker owing to the provisions of ss 65 and 67(8) of the RIPA.

Conclusions

Consideration of the oversight and accountability system above indicates that no fundamental change has taken place and is unlikely to do so as a result of the inception of the HRA. There are signs of a strengthening accountability, taking into account the RIPA changes, particularly the introduction of the new tribunal, but the mechanisms are still, it is contended, too weak to live up to the expectations currently created in the new era of openness and accountability under the HRA. At the time when they were put in place, the mechanisms were viewed as a radical departure from the old order and all that could be expected of the governments in question. Now, although their inadequacies are apparent, they have provided the model for the mechanisms provided under the RIPA. In the current era, the assumptions underlying them look more questionable.

But the introduction of such mechanisms and the extension of a statutory basis for the agencies, under the RIPA, are first steps in a process. It is perhaps no longer likely, now that these first steps have been taken, that the impetus for greater accountability will come from Strasbourg, and the barriers in the way of using the HRA in the domestic courts to create more accountability look almost insurmountable, except, to an extent, in criminal proceedings. It has been suggested that the impetus is most likely to come from pressure from the current oversight mechanisms themselves, especially the Parliamentary Committee, from MPs and from commentators. It is possible that greater accountability will be achieved through the operation of the new tribunal but, as argued below, its efficacy is clearly open to question.

4 THE INTERCEPTION OF COMMUNICATIONS

Introduction

The interception of communications clearly presents a profound threat to the core value of privacy identified in the Introduction to Part III, informational autonomy. However, a State has a duty to preserve national security and to prevent and detect crime. But, as Leigh and Lustgarten put it: 'in attempting to protect democracy from threats such as terrorism there is the ever-present risk that...that which was to be preserved has been lost.'¹⁵⁸ The approach which succeeds in preserving respect for democracy and for the value of individual privacy, as a hallmark of democracy, while affording respect to State interests, is one which is increasingly reflected in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, even taking into account the wide margin of appreciation conceded in this particular area.¹⁵⁹

Methods of communication and, in response, methods of interception have become increasingly sophisticated. Telephonic interception was possible for much of the 20th century, but its incidence and the interception facilities have recently increased.¹⁶⁰ In other words, its value in terms of combating crime and terrorism has long been recognised. But legal recognition of the harm interception causes, in terms of creating invasions of privacy, has lagged behind. Prior to 1985, there was no requirement to follow a particular legal procedure when authorising the tapping of telephones or the interception of mail. The tapping of telephones was neither a civil wrong¹⁶¹ nor a criminal offence. Interference with mail was a criminal offence under s 58 of the Post Office Act 1953, but under s 58(1) such interference would not be criminal if authorised by a warrant issued by the Secretary of State. The conditions for issuing warrants for interception of postal or telephonic communications were laid down in administrative rules which had no legal force.¹⁶² Under these rules, the interception could be authorised in order to assist in a criminal investigation only if the crime was really serious, normal methods had been tried and had failed, and there was good reason for believing that the evidence gained by the interception would lead to a conviction. If the interception related to security matters, it could be authorised only in respect of major subversion, terrorism or espionage, and the matters obtained had to be directly useful to the Security Service in compiling information allowing it to carry out its function of protecting State security.

The Interception of Communications Act 1985 was introduced as a direct result of the ruling in the European Court of Human Rights in *Malone v UK*¹⁶³ that the existing British warrant procedure violated the Art 8 guarantee of privacy. The Court held that UK domestic law did not regulate the circumstances in which telephone 158 Leigh and Lustgarten, op cit, fn 62, p 41.

159 See, eg, the pronouncements of the Court in Klass v FRG (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

160 Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act 1998, published June 1999, Cm 4364, p 2, para 13 and p 11.

161 Malone v MPC (No 2) [1979] Ch 344.

162 See Report of the Committee of Privy Councillors, Cmnd 283, 1957.

163 (1984) 7 EHRR 14; for comment see (1986) 49 MLR 86.

tapping could be carried out sufficiently clearly or provide any remedy against abuse of the power. This meant that it did not meet the requirement of being 'in accordance with the law' under Art 8(2). The decision therefore required the UK Government to introduce legislation to regulate the circumstances in which the power to tap could be used.

Thus, the driving force behind the response of the UK Government in the Interception of Communications Act 1985 was the need to provide a statutory basis for interception. Nevertheless, it was an incomplete reform. Despite its misleading name, the 1985 Act only covered certain limited means of intercepting communications. It did not cover interception by means of listening devices or all forms of telephone tapping. It covered the interception of only one means of telephonic communication—communication via the public telecommunications system. This covered telephone, fax, telex and any other data transmission on the system, such as e-mail.¹⁶⁴ Given the immense increase in the use of mobile phones,¹⁶⁵ pagers, cordless phones, the potential for e-mail transmission outside the telecommunications system, and the growth of internal telephone systems over recent years, the Act became increasingly marginalised. Marginalisation was likely to increase since e-mails are likely to be sent more frequently via mobile phones, using satellites.¹⁶⁶ It was therefore apparent that the statutory basis for interception provided by the 1985 Act was inadequate and would probably be shown to be so in reliance on the HRA.¹⁶⁷ The Labour Government responded by introducing a far more comprehensive basis under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, Part I.

The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, Part I (RIPA)

The intention of the Labour Government was to bring all forms of interception within the RIPA, Part I so that the 1985 Act would be superseded and could be repealed.¹⁶⁸ Under s 2(1) of the RIPA, the term 'public telecommunications system' used in s 2(1) of the 1985 Act, covers any system 'which exists (whether wholly or partly in the UK or elsewhere) for the purpose of facilitating the transmission of communications by any means involving the use of electrical or electro-magnetic energy'. This includes all such systems which provide or offer a telecommunications service to the public or part of it. This definition would cover all the forms of communication, including e-mail, mentioned above, provided by any private company¹⁶⁹ Section 2(1) of the RIPA also covers private telecommunications 164 Prior to the inception of the RIPA 2000, the government maintained that some use of email was covered by the 1985 Act where public telephone lines were used.

165 Mobile to mobile communication would appear to fall outside the 1985 Act. Mobile communication which partially uses the telecommunications system (when a system such as BT Cellnet or Vodafone sends a signal to the telecommunications system) may be within it.

166 Possibly without use of a 'server' computer.

167 See the Consultation Paper 'Interception of Communications in the UK' (1999) Cm 4368.

168 Part I has repealed the key sections of the 1985 Act: ss 1–10, s 11(2)–(5), Sched 1.

169 These would include, eg, BT, Orange, Vodafone. It would also cover other providers of e-mail systems such as Freeserve or Yahoo. However, it is in fact unclear that the technology to intercept e-mails sent via the internet is available. Such e-mails are sent by so called 'split package' technology; the message is split into a number of different packages, sent by different global routes. If a hundred million messages are sent a day, split into tiny particles, interception of particular messages may be almost impossible.

systems—most obviously those confined to a particular company or body—although its coverage of private systems is limited to those which are attached to the public system directly or indirectly¹⁷⁰ Its wording appears to be wide enough to cover most forms of telecommunication currently available, apart from entirely self-standing private systems,¹⁷¹ although not necessarily those which may arise in the near future. Ironically, the point was made in parliamentary debate that ‘the Bill does not recognise the changing technologies’.¹⁷²

Issuance of warrants

The 1985 Act provided very wide grounds under s 2(2) on which warrants for the purposes of interception could be authorised by the Secretary of State, and the same grounds appear in the RIPA, with one addition. Under s 5(3), a warrant may be issued if necessary ‘(a) in the interests of national security’; ‘(b) for the purpose of preventing or detecting serious crime’;¹⁷³ or ‘(c) for the purpose of safeguarding the economic well-being of the UK’. In relation to the third ground, the information must relate, under s 5(5), to ‘the acts or intentions of persons outside the British Isles’. This wording almost exactly reproduces that used under s 2(4) of the 1985 Act. These grounds are significantly wider than those under the old Home Office guidelines previously relied upon in order to authorise warrants. The last ground falls under sub-para (d): ‘in circumstances appearing to the Secretary of State to be equivalent to those in which he would issue a warrant by virtue of paragraph (b), for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of any international mutual assistance agreement.’ This ground relates to Art 16 of the EU draft Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters.¹⁷⁴ Its purpose is to require satellite operators based in the UK to provide technical assistance to another Member State. The discussion below reveals that the safeguards relating to warrants issued on this ground are significantly weaker than those relating to the other three. This is an instance in which the EU’s ‘Third Pillar’ policies relating to law and order and national security have allowed decisions to be taken on matters which may infringe human rights, possibly to the extent of breaching the Convention. Such decisions are taken within ‘a framework where the EU’s democratic deficit is most prominent’.¹⁷⁵

Section 5(2) of the RIPA, however, contains a stronger proportionality requirement than that contained in s 2(3) of the 1985 Act. The Secretary of State ‘shall not’ issue an interception warrant unless he believes that the conduct it authorises ‘is proportionate to what is sought to be achieved’. This includes asking, under s 5(4), whether the information which it is thought necessary to obtain under the warrant could reasonably be obtained by other means. This question also had to be asked 170 Its coverage of private systems is a direct response to Halford v UK [1997] IRLR 471.

171 Such as intranet systems not connected to any public system.

172 HC Deb Col 806,6 March 2000.

173 Defined in s 81(3).

174 The EU draft Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters (5202/98-C4-0062/98) was set out in the EU-FBI telecommunications plan adopted by the EU in January 1995. Under ENFOPOL, the information required includes e-mail addresses, credit card details, passwords, IP addresses, customer account numbers.

175 Norton-Taylor, in Blackburn and Plant (eds), Constitutional Reform: The Labour Government’s Constitutional Reform Agenda, 1999, p 208. See also Enhancing Parliamentary Scrutiny of the Third Pillar, Select Committee of the European Communities, HL Session 1997–98, 31.7.97.

under s 2(3). But s 5(2) implies that further matters should be considered. For example, where the information cannot reasonably be obtained by other means, the proportionality of the particular interception warrant with its objective could still be considered. This might involve considering its contents and duration. Clearly, s 5(2) was introduced in an effort to meet the proportionality requirement under Art 8(2), discussed below. Under s 7(1) of the RIPA, the warrants must be personally signed by the Secretary of State or, under s 7(2) in urgent cases, or cases under the fourth ground, by 'a senior official' with express authorisation from the Secretary of State. A 'senior official' is defined in s 81(1) as 'a member of the Senior Civil Service' and under s 81(7) the Secretary of State 'may by order make... amendments [to] the definition of "senior official"'. Under the 1985 Act the official had to be 'an official of his Department of or above the rank of Assistant Under Secretary of State'. In this respect, the requirements have been relaxed under the RIPA.

This new procedure is based on the model provided by the 1985 Act in that it allows for administrative oversight, but maintains executive authorisation of interception; it may therefore be contrasted with that in the US, where prior judicial authorisation is required,¹⁷⁶ and with that in Denmark where authorisation is by an investigating magistrate.¹⁷⁷ The Commissioner, appointed under s 8 of the 1985 Act, and re-appointed as the new Interception of Communications Commissioner under s 57(8) of the RIPA, has a role in overseeing the issuance of warrants, but this is a general review role, which occurs after the event. The possibility of replacing an executive with a judicial mechanism was entirely rejected by the Labour Government. In debate on the Bill, it received support only from the Liberal Democrats.¹⁷⁸ Judicial involvement only at the complaint stage (discussed below) is of little significance as a safeguard since many persons will have no means of knowing that tapping is occurring. Nevertheless, prior judicial involvement in authorising warrants cannot be said at present to be a requirement of Art 8.¹⁷⁹

Under s 4(5) and (6) of the 1985 Act, the warrants were issued for an initial period of two months and could be renewed for one month in the case of the police and for six months in the case of the security and intelligence services. Under s 9(6) of the 2000 Act, warrants are issued for an initial period of three months if by the Secretary of State and can be renewed for six months if he states his belief that the grounds under s 5(3)(a) or (c) apply. If the other grounds apply, the renewal period is three months. If signed by a senior official, they can be issued initially for five working days but renewed for three months. In the case of all warrants, particularly those issued in respect of the prevention or detection of serious crime, to the police, these are significant increases. The period in respect of the serious crime ground may be compared with that in Denmark, which is four weeks, renewable.¹⁸⁰

As was the case under the 1985 Act, there is no overall limit on renewals and it is likely to continue to be the case that some warrants will be very long standing. The number of interception warrants issued is also likely to increase. The Commissioners' Reports only cover the warrants authorised by the Home Office

176 Berger v NY (1967) 388 US 41.

177 Code of Criminal Procedure, Art 126m.

178 HC Deb Col 8076, March 2000.

179 Klass v FRG (1978) 2 EHRR 214; Mersch v Luxembourg 43 D & R 34 (1985).

180 Code of Criminal Procedure, Art 126m.

and Scottish Office. These figures show that at the end of 1989, 315 warrants were in force and 522 were issued during the year.¹⁸¹ By 1993, a clear upward trend in the numbers of warrants issued was evident: in 1993, 1,005 warrants for telephone tapping and 115 for mail interceptions were issued; 409 warrants were in force at the end of the year.¹⁸² The trend continued: in 1996 1,795 telecommunications warrants were in force or were issued during the year; by 1998, the figure had risen to 2,251.¹⁸³ As the Commissioner accepts, these figures do not provide a satisfactory guide as to the number of persons subject to interception, since a single warrant can cover a large organisation. The figures do not cover all the warrants authorised, since those authorised by other departments, including the Foreign Office, are viewed as too sensitive.

Section 8(1) of RIPA suggests that the warrants should be precise; they must specify a person or an address. However, a 'person' can equal 'any organisation and any association or combination of persons'.¹⁸⁴ Once a warrant is obtained, all communications to or from the property or 'person' specified must be intercepted, if that is what is required in order to give effect to the warrant.¹⁸⁵ Failure to comply with the warrant is an offence under s 11(7) carrying a maximum sentence of two years. Under s 11(4), telephone tapping and mail interceptions are conducted by Post Office or 'public telecommunications employees' or by persons controlling or partly controlling private systems wholly or partly in the UK.¹⁸⁶

Under s 6(2), the request for the warrant may be made by a number of persons from a non-exhaustive list. They include: the Director General of the Security Service, the Chief of MI6, the Director of GCHQ, the Director General of the National Criminal Intelligence Service, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis; the Chief Constable of the RUC, Chief Constables in Scotland,¹⁸⁷ the Commissioners of Customs and Excise; the Chief of Defence; the relevant person for the purposes of any international mutual assistance agreement. The Bill originally provided: 'or any such other person as the Secretary of State may by order designate.' The Government was eventually persuaded to omit the last provision. A number of other such powers are, however, scattered throughout the Act, meaning that this statute, comprehensive as it is, leaves open a great deal of leeway for significant and more covert extension. On Second Reading of the Bill in the Commons this list was criticised on two grounds. The Conservative opposition considered that the list was not extensive enough and that, in particular, the Benefits Agency of the DSS¹⁸⁸

181 Report of the Commissioner for 1989, Cm 1063, p 2. Similar figures are available for other years; see reports for 1986, Cm 108 and for 1987, Cm 351.

182 See Report of the Commissioner for 1993, Cm 2522.

183 The figure for postal interceptions rose from 115 in 1996 to 167 in 1998. Figures from the Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act for 1998 published June 1999, Cm 4364, p 11.

184 RIPA 2000, s 78(1) which, with the addition of an 'association', reproduces s 10(1) of the 1985 Act.

185 Section 11(4).

186 Bearing in mind the range of companies which are affected and the difficulty of complying, especially in relation to the internet, a provision regarding practicality was necessary. Section 11(5) recognises that there may be circumstances under which it is not reasonably practicable to comply with the duty to implement the warrant. The prosecution must prove that it was practicable.

187 'Of any police force maintained under or by virtue of section 1 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967.'

188 HC Deb Cols 778 and 831, 6 March 2000.

and the Inland Revenue¹⁸⁹ should be added to it. The Liberal Democrats, supported by Tom King, Chair of the Intelligence and Security Committee, argued that primary legislation, not a statutory instrument, should be used in order to add bodies to the list.¹⁹⁰

Lawful interception without a warrant

Sections 3 and 4 of the RIPA allow for lawful interception without a warrant. Section 3(2) covers instances where it is reasonably believed that both parties to the communication have consented to the interception.¹⁹¹ In such circumstances, the interception must also be authorised within Part II, s 26. This provision effects a compromise in relation to so called ‘participant monitoring’ (where one party is aware of the interception). It was pointed out in the leading Canadian authority¹⁹² that the consent of one party does not affect the infringement of privacy suffered by the other. But s 3(2) does not demand that ‘participant monitoring’ should be subject to the controls necessary for other interceptions; it is subject only to the lesser controls for ‘directed’ surveillance, discussed below. Section 4 covers persons whose communications are intercepted who are believed to be outside the UK, instances where the Secretary of State has made regulations covering the interception for business¹⁹³ purposes (s 4(2)), and instances in psychiatric hospitals or prisons (within the relevant applicable statutes). These provisions may raise questions as to their compatibility with the Convention, which are considered below.

Use of the intercepted material

Section 15 provides safeguards regarding the use of the intercepted material. They are intended to limit the persons who can see the material and to ensure that it is destroyed once it is no longer necessary to retain it for the authorised purposes. However, the Act does not state how these objectives are to be achieved; it is left to the Secretary of State to put arrangements into place to secure them. Further, s 15 does not apply to material obtained without warrant, under ss 3 or 4. Since, as indicated below, personal criminal intelligence information obtained from interceptions and then stored and processed electronically is not subject to the stronger controls under the data protection regime of the 1998 Data Protection Act, it is clear that the controls created under s 15 are potentially crucial in protecting this aspect of privacy.

Unauthorised interceptions

Section 1 of the 1985 Act dealt with unauthorised interceptions and made it a criminal offence to intercept a postal communication or telecommunication intentionally without authorisation. It did not cover taps outside the public telecommunications system. So, for example, no criminal or even civil wrong was committed by the 189 HC Deb Col 821,6 March 2000.

190 HC Deb Cols 768 and 831,6 March 2000.

191 This provision is clearly more protective of privacy than its counterpart under the 1985 Act, s 1(2), which relied on the consent of one party only.

192 Duarte [1990] 53 CCC (3d) 1.

193 ‘Business’ includes government departments.

Chief Constable of Merseyside when a tap on the internal police phone system was used against Alison Halford in order to seek to discredit her and undermine her sex discrimination claim against the police service.¹⁹⁴ The RIPA, which under s 1 reproduces the old s 1 offence with extensions, also covers interception of private systems, unless they are entirely freestanding. However, it is subject to an exception under s 1(6) which might have been applicable in the Halford case.¹⁹⁵ Section 1(6) provides that conduct is excluded from criminal liability if the interceptor 'is a person with a right to control the operation or the use of the system; or he has the express or implied consent of the [person intercepted]'. Section 1(3) creates civil liability in relation to unauthorised interception of a private, not a public system. Possibly in future, therefore, a person in a situation similar to that of Alison Halford might be able to bring a civil action only.

The role of the Commissioner

The Commissioner is a senior judge appointed by the Prime Minister on a part time basis to monitor the warrant procedure and to consider complaints. He had a duty under s 8(1)(a) of the 1985 Act, which will continue under s 57(2)(a) of the RIPA, to keep the warrant procedure under review. Apart from the statutory limitations of his powers, the practical constraints on them have been overwhelming. He had no staff and carried out the checking procedure personally on a part time basis. Clearly, as he accepts, these constraints precluded consideration of every warrant which is brought to his attention. His powers were very limited. He could not order that warrants should be quashed or that the material obtained should be destroyed; under s 8(9) he could merely report a contravention of ss 2–5 to the Prime Minister, which had not already been the subject of a tribunal report, or a contravention of s 6 which covered destruction of material, and he had to prepare an annual report for the Prime Minister under s 8(6). These arrangements regarding checking of warrants were largely continued under RIPA, under ss 57¹⁹⁶ and 58 when he became the Interception of Communications Commissioner, although staff may be appointed. His complaints role was taken over by the new tribunal.

The remit of the Commissioner gave him the opportunity to note that unauthorised tapping had occurred, but only when he was informed of it by the agencies concerned. Where he was so informed, he was told at the same time that the unauthorised action had been recognised, usually 'immediately', and all resultant material destroyed. His view was that these unauthorised actions, that is, criminal offences under s 1, termed 'errors' were 'comparatively few in number when considered in the context of the volume and complexity of the operations carried out'.¹⁹⁷ In his annual reports, the Commissioner found no instance in which a warrant was issued unjustifiably. Although Crown servants, telecommunications and postal workers were under a duty to provide the Commissioner with the 196 Under s 57(2), 'Subject to subsection (5), the Interception of Communications Commissioner shall keep under review the exercise and performance by the Secretary of State of the powers and duties conferred or imposed on him by or under sections 1 to 11'.

194 See Halford v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 523.

195 Ibid.

197 Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act 1998, published June 1999, Cm 4364, p 10.

information he required to carry out his task, under s 8(3) of the 1985 Act (continued and extended to a wider range of people under the 2000 Act),¹⁹⁸ he had no effective means of checking that information had not been withheld. He received a list of warrants issued, renewed, modified or cancelled since the last visit, and checked a sample of them. He had no means of knowing whether the list was in fact complete, and unauthorised interception was not, unsurprisingly, recorded on it. If the Commissioner acquires staff to aid him in these tasks, when he carries them out under the RIPA, a greater proportion of warrants may be checked. But these basic limitations affecting his role remain unchanged under the RIPA arrangements. The key reform under the RIPA is to the tribunal system.

The old tribunal

Section 7 of the 1985 Act established a tribunal to consider complaints from people who believed that their telephone had been tapped or their mail intercepted. It should be noted that the statutory provisions had no retrospective effect. Thus, complaints could relate only to post-commencement activities. The RIPA sets up a new tribunal, under s 65, which will, as indicated above, replace the current one and those set up under the Security Services Act and the Intelligence Services Act. It will also take over the role of Commissioners in hearing complaints under s 102 and Sched 7 of the Police Act 1997, (discussed below) while it will have a new role in considering surveillance undertaken by other public authorities. It will be able to consider pre-commencement activity, within certain limitations. Thus, its role extends well beyond that of the old Interceptions of Communications Tribunal. It will therefore have immense significance as the central mechanism protecting citizens against abuse of State surveillance powers. The new tribunal is discussed fully below.¹⁹⁹

The old tribunal set up under the 1985 Act (which consisted of five senior lawyers) had a duty under s 7(3) of that Act, on receiving a complaint, to investigate whether a warrant had been issued and if so, whether it was properly issued—whether there were adequate grounds for issuing it and whether statutory procedures were complied with. Under s 7(4), the tribunal applied ‘the principles applicable by a court on an application for judicial review’ to this exercise. The tribunal could only consider the matters referred to in ss 2–5 of the 1985 Act concerning the issuance of warrants; it could not consider the questions whether the action was proportionate to the invasion of privacy and whether the action could have been carried out by other means.

The Report of the Commissioner for 1998 states that the tribunal received 75 complaints in 1998, of which 72 were investigated and none was upheld.²⁰⁰ The 1997 Report²⁰¹ states that since it was established in 1986, the tribunal has received 568 complaints and that none has ever been upheld. According to the Report, in only eight of these cases was interception being carried out by a government agency and in each case it was properly authorised. The possibility that in some of the 198 See s 58(1), s 21(4) and s 49.

199 Pages 714 et seq.

200 Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act 1998, published June 1999, Cm 4364, p 10.

201 Cm 4001.

other 560 cases, or in others, unauthorised interception was occurring is seen in the Report as 'Very remote' since it would involve a criminal conspiracy between the agency and the Public Telecommunications Operators. It may be noted that the Act did not provide any possibility of recognising that an invasion of privacy could occur due to the possibility that a phone had been tapped. The Court accepted in *Klass v federal Republic of Germany*²⁰² that this possibility represented a continuing invasion of privacy, since conversations would be inhibited.

Parliamentary oversight

Under the 1985 Act, parliamentary oversight, such as it was, was limited to interceptions which fell within the statute. Under the new statute, the oversight is equally limited, but it will cover a far wider range of interceptions. Modelled on the old arrangements, the annual report of the new Commissioner must be presented to Parliament and published as a Command Paper, under s 58(6). The Prime Minister may censor the report under s 58(7) if it appears to him that it contains matter 'prejudicial to national security, to the prevention and detection of serious crime or to the economic well-being of the UK'. These grounds are the same as the previous ones under the 1985 Act. A new, broad one has been added: the matter may be excluded if it appears to be prejudicial to 'the continued discharge of the functions of any public authority whose activities include activities that are subject to review by that Commissioner'. It may be unnecessary, in any event, for the Prime Minister to censor the report; the practice has been for the Commissioner to designate the part to be withheld.

Thus, parliamentary oversight will continue to be highly circumscribed since no Committee is directly charged with monitoring State surveillance. Bearing in mind the brevity of the Commissioner's reports, the opportunity for Parliament to oversee these arrangements is very limited. The parliamentary oversight is clearly much weaker than that applicable in Germany, as considered in the Klass case²⁰³ (below). The opportunity of enabling the new, comprehensive interceptions statute to reflect notions of openness and accountability to Parliament in the era of the Human Rights and Freedom of Information Acts has been lost.

The impact of the HRA

As indicated, Part I of the RIPA was intended to be compatible with the requirements of the Convention. Since it allows for State invasion of privacy, the Convention Article of most relevance is Art 8. The discussion below identifies some of the aspects of Part I which are arguably of doubtful compatibility with Art 8. It then goes on to consider the effect of the HRA in this context and the means available under it of seeking to ensure that the Convention rights are adhered to when interception is used.

202 (1978)2EHRR 214.

203 Ibid.

Interference with the primary rights

As indicated above, the interception of communications is likely to represent an interference with the Art 8(1) rights to respect for private life, the home and correspondence. The Court found in *Klass*²⁰⁴ that the possibility that an interception was occurring could infringe Art 8, and this was also accepted in Malone v UK.²⁰⁵ In Klass, the Court said: 'in the mere existence of the legislation itself there is involved, for all those to whom the legislation could be applied, a menace of surveillance; this menace necessarily strikes at freedom of communication between users of the postal and telecommunications services...'²⁰⁶ Thus, the provisions of the 1985 Act could be viewed as representing a continuing invasion of privacy, whether or not in any individual case an intercept had actually been used, and the same can now be said of Part I of the RIPA.

As the Court explained in Halford v UK,²⁰⁷ under the Convention the issue would be whether, on the particular facts, the essence of the complaint concerned the actual application to her of the measures of surveillance or that her Art 8 rights were menaced by the very existence of the law and practice permitting such measures. Halford v UK concerned the tapping of the applicant's office telephone by the police at a time when she was bringing a claim of sex discrimination against the police authority in question. The Government argued that in using the private internal office system, the applicant could not expect to retain her privacy and that an employer should in principle be able to monitor calls made by an employee on the internal system without prior warning or consent.²⁰⁸ The Court disagreed, finding that calls made from business premises as well as the home may be covered by the notions of 'private life' and 'correspondence' within the meaning of Art 8(1). This stance was also taken in Kopp v Switzerland.²⁰⁹ The Court emphasised in that case that the interception of the telephone calls constituted the interference with the right under para 1; the fact that the recordings were not subsequently used was irrelevant. Thus, the Court has taken quite a broad approach, strongly protective of informational autonomy, to the meaning of the terms used in Art 8(1), thereby widening their application beyond obviously private spheres, including the home. The use made of material obtained from intercepts, including disclosure to others, may also fall within Art 8(1).²¹⁰

In accordance with the law

As indicated above, State interference with the Art 8 guarantees must be in accordance with the law, under para 2, if it is to be justified and this requirement covers not only the existence of national law, but its quality. In Halford v UK,²¹¹ the interception of the internal office telephone was clearly not in accordance with the law since domestic law provided no regulation at all of such interception, and therefore the Court found a breach of Art 8.

204 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

205 (1984) 7 EHRR 14.

206 See p 21, para 41.

207 [1997] IRLR 471; (1997) 24 EHRR 523.

208 Para 43.

209 (1999) 27 EHRR 91, paras 70–71.

210 MS v Sweden (1999) 28 EHRR 313.

211 (1997) 24 EHRR 523.

Part I of the RIPA was introduced in response to the findings in *Halford v UK*²¹² and, generally, to provide a statutory basis for interception outside the public telecommunications system. Thus, a basis in national law now exists. Once such a basis is found, its quality must be considered; it must be asked whether it is 'compatible with the rule of law...there must be a measure of legal protection in domestic law against arbitrary interferences by public authorities with [the right to respect for private life under Art 8(1)]. Especially where a power of the executive is exercised in secret, the risks of arbitrariness are evident.'²¹³ In *Kopp v Switzerland*²¹⁴ the Court clearly stated that the essential requirements of a national legal basis are those of accessibility and foreseeability so that, in this context, the citizen is sufficiently aware of the circumstances allowing interception. It must be clear as to the 'circumstances in and conditions on which public authorities are empowered to resort to any such secret measures'.²¹⁵

In Christie v UK,²¹⁶ the 1985 Act was found to meet this requirement in relation to the terms 'national security' and 'economic well being'. The Commission viewed those terms as sufficiently precise since they had been explained by 'administrative or executive statements'. The Interception of Communications Tribunal had investigated and had found no breach in relation to the warrant procedure; this could be taken to mean that no warrant had been issued, a matter outside the jurisdiction of the tribunal, or that one had been properly issued. The other issue concerned the retention of information collected through the tap by the Security Service. It is notable, however, that this was a decision of the Commission only, that it was influenced by the margin of appreciation doctrine and that it was not made in the context of the 'serious crime' provision under the Act.

In Kruslin v France,²¹⁷ a basis in law was found for interception but it was not found to be of sufficient quality owing to its imprecision, which was found to fail to satisfy the requirement of foreseeability.²¹⁸ Similarly, in Kopp v Switzerland, which was also concerned with crime, not national security, the Court said: 'interception...constitutes a particularly serious interference with private life and correspondence and must accordingly be based on a "law" that is particularly precise.'²¹⁹ In another case outside the realm of national security or economic well being, Valenzuela v Spain,²²⁰ the Court also found that the legal basis available for interception did not satisfy the requirements of foreseeability. In particular, the conditions necessary under the Convention to satisfy that requirement, including the nature of the offences which might give rise to an intercept order, were not included in the relevant provisions.²²¹ A development towards greater stringency

212 Ibid.

213 Malone v UK A 82, para 67; 4 EHRR 330. The Court reaffirmed this in Halford v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 523 above: 'this expression...relates to the quality [of domestic law], requiring it to be compatible with the rule of law' (para 49).

214 (1999) 27 EHRR 91, paras 70–71.

215 Halford v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 523, para 49.

216 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

217 (1990) 12 EHRR 528.

218 Ibid., para 30. See also Huwig v France (1990) 12 EHRR 528, para 29.

219 Ibid., para 44.

220 (1998) 28 EHRR 483.

221 Ibid., para 75.

appears to be evident in the jurisprudence, at least within the 'prevention of crime' context

It is arguable that the 1985 Act did not fully meet the 'in accordance with the law' requirement since, inter alia, the serious crime ground was not defined as Valenzuela v Spain requires. It is defined in the RIPA, albeit in broad terms.²²² The question whether Part I of the RIPA meets this requirement in all respects remains open, bearing in mind the possible future development of the Strasbourg jurisprudence on this matter. The grounds under s 5(3), including the 'mutual assistance' ground, are clearly ill defined.

The fact that the Act provides for authorisation by executive, rather than judicial warrant, is also relevant to the requirement of foreseeability. In Kopp v Switzerland, in finding a breach of Art 8 for failure to satisfy that requirement, the Court said: 'it is...astonishing that this task should be assigned to an official of the Post Office's legal department, who is a member of the executive, without supervision by an independent judge.'²²³

The provision under s 3 of the RIPA allowing for interception with consent on the basis of reasonable belief may be questionable under Art 8, depending on the steps which must be taken in practice to establish the consent, especially in relation to the recipient of the communication.²²⁴ Moreover, the authorisation procedure is less demanding than that in relation to interception by warrant and might appear, therefore, to be out of accord with the requirement of quality. However, at the present time the procedure is in principle in accordance with Art 8. The Court has found that where one party to the conversation had given consent under the equivalent provision of the 1985 Act, s 1(2), Art 8 was not breached since citizens would be sufficiently aware of the risk.²²⁵

Legitimate aims and necessity in a democratic society

If an interference is 'in accordance with the law', it must have a legitimate aim and be necessary in a democratic society. The legitimate aims under Art 8(2), set out above,²²⁶ are very broad and echo those used under s 5(3), apart from the fourth one. But since the aim of that ground is to prevent crime, this aim would probably be viewed as legitimate. Thus, this requirement appears to be satisfied.

The Court has interpreted 'necessary in a democratic society' as meaning: 'an interference corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.'²²⁷ The doctrine of proportionality, as Chapters 2 and 4 indicated, is strongly linked to the principle of the margin of appreciation. The width of that margin appears to depend partly on the aim of the interference in question and partly on its necessity. In relation to the aim of national security, the Court has allowed a very wide margin to the State.

222 In s 81(3).

223 Ibid., para 46.

224 See Lambert v France (1999) 1 EHRLR 123. In Kruslin v France (1990) 12 EHRR 547, para 26, it was accepted that although the line of a third party had been tapped, an interference with the applicant's Art 8 rights had occurred, since his conversations on that line had been intercepted and recorded.

225 Nadir Choudhary v UK (1999) 1 EHRLR 522. See also Smith v UK [1997] EHRLR 277.

226 See p 665.

227 Olsson v Sweden A 130 (1988), para 67.

In *Klass v federal Republic of Germany*²²⁸ the European Court of Human Rights found, bearing the margin of appreciation doctrine in mind, that German telephone tapping procedures were in conformity with Art 8 since they contained a number of safeguards. An oversight body, a parliamentary board,²²⁹ could consider, on an application from an aggrieved individual or ex officio, whether the interception had been authorised and its necessity. There was also quite a substantial degree of parliamentary scrutiny: the minister in question had to report to a parliamentary board and also to give an account of the interceptions ordered to a Commission. The possibility was available of compensation for persons whose phones had been unlawfully tapped and of challenges to interception in proceedings in the ordinary courts, and the individual warrants had to be reviewed by a Commission headed by a person qualified for judicial office.

The Court did not, however, state that these were the minimal safeguards necessary; it said:

The Court considers that in a field where abuse is so easy in individual cases and could have such harmful consequences for democratic society as a whole, it is in principle desirable to entrust supervisory control to a judge. Nevertheless, having regard to the supervisory and other safeguards provided...the Court concludes that the exclusion of judicial control does not exceed the limits of what may be deemed necessary in a democratic society. The Parliamentary Board and the... Commission are independent of the authorities carrying out the surveillance, and are vested with sufficient powers and competence to exercise an effective and continuous control. Furthermore, the democratic character is reflected in the balanced membership of the Parliamentary Board. The Opposition is reflected on this body and is therefore able to participate in the control of the measures ordered by the... Minister...²³⁰

In Christie v UK,²³¹ the Commission found: 'having regard to the wide margin of appreciation in this area' the safeguards provided by the Interception of Communications Tribunal and the Commissioner were sufficient in the instant case where the applicant was a trade unionist with links with communist Eastern Europe and his phone was being tapped on the grounds of 'national security' and 'economic well-being'. The interception was proportionate to those legitimate aims, on the facts of the case. Similar findings were made, rather readily, by the Commission in *Remmers and Hamer v The Netherlands*²³² in the context of serious crime.

Bearing in mind the findings in Klass, the findings in Christie need not be taken as absolutely conclusive evidence that the oversight mechanisms provided by the 1985 Act, and maintained, with modifications, under Part I of the RIPA, meet Convention requirements. They were made in relation to the particular case, not as abstract comment on the mechanisms or on the warrant procedure in general, and they were heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation. As indicated in Chapter 4, that doctrine is not available at national level and this, it is contended, means that it should not influence national decision makers, including judges acting judicially or extra-judicially, and other national bodies. The Government

228 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

229 Under Law G10.

230 Ibid, p 235.

231 78-A DRE Com HR 119.

232 (1999) 27 EHRR CD 168.

and the Commissioner have assumed that the decision in Christie closes the question as far as the 1985 Act is concerned and as the statement of compatibility accompanying it demonstrates, the Government takes this stance in respect of Part I, Chapter I of the RIPA as well. But in respect of interception under warrant, under the RIPA, the issue could be re-opened in future, under developments in the Court's jurisprudence, bearing in mind the possibility of changing standards in other Member States.

Therefore, a national judge (probably sitting in the new tribunal,²³³ not in an ordinary court) would be free to take a more rigorous look at the safeguards provided by the RIPA and at the necessity of an interference. The approach taken in practice would depend on the tendency to follow the traditionalist model: it might be found that traditional notions of deference to the executive in this sensitive area would yield the same result as adherence to the margin of appreciation doctrine. But a judge might be prepared to depart from a deferential stance outside the national security context. As indicated above, it is a statutory requirement for the Secretary of State or Senior Official to consider proportionality²³⁴ in issuing a warrant. Therefore, the new tribunal would be expected to consider whether the statutory requirements have been met, taking Strasbourg guidance into account, but adopting a more rigorous scrutiny. The continued lack of judicial authorisation under the RIPA should be considered, when looking at the necessity of an interference, bearing in mind the fact that the other safeguards available, including parliamentary oversight, are weaker than those considered in Klass.

Obligations of oversight bodies, of those applying for warrants and of those carrying them out

As a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, the Interception of Communications Commissioner has a duty to abide by the Convention rights in discharging his oversight role. The Commissioner should ensure that the agencies he oversees are themselves ensuring Convention compliance. The members of the agencies and telecommunications and postal workers are bound by s 6 not to infringe the Convention in carrying out their work. In other words, all the public authorities involved should comply with the requirements of the Convention.

Parliament is not bound by s 6, but in considering reports of the Commissioner or in debating any issues arising from the operation of the RIPA, it would be expected that the Convention requirements would be strictly borne in mind, especially as a statement of compatibility accompanied the Act.

Raising Convention issues in court proceedings

Under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, Convention issues could be raised in prosecutions against agency members, police officers, telecommunications or postal workers or other public authorities in respect of the various offences arising from non-cooperation with State interception created under the 2000 Act. But this would not normally involve consideration of the key issue—the invasions of privacy allowed for under the RIPA. Consideration of the compatibility of intercepts with Art 8 in court proceedings appears to be almost entirely precluded by s 17 of the RIPA. Section 17 is based on s 9 of the 1985 Act which provided: 'In any proceedings before any court or tribunal, no evidence shall be adduced and no question asked in cross-examination which...tends to suggest that 'the offence under s 1 has been or is to be committed by postal or telecommunications workers or Crown Servants or 'that a warrant has been or is to be issued to any of those persons'.

233 Note that tribunal members, apart from the President, need not be judges (see Sched 3).

234 Section 5(2).

Section 17 provides:

subject to s 18, no evidence shall be adduced, question asked, assertion or disclosure made or other thing done in, for the purposes of or in connection with any legal proceedings which (in any manner)-

- (a) discloses, in circumstances from which its origin in anything falling within subsection (2) may be inferred, any of the contents of an intercepted communication or any related communications data; or
- (b) tends (apart from any such disclosure) to suggest that anything falling within subsection (2) has or may have occurred or be going to occur.

Section 17(2) covers:

- (a) conduct...that was or would be an offence under s 1(1) or (2) of this Act or under s 1 of the...1985 Act;
- (b) a breach by the Secretary of State of his duty under section 1(4) of this Act;
- (c) the issue of an interception warrant or of a warrant under the...1985 Act;
- (d) the making of an application by any person for an interception warrant, or for a warrant under that Act;
- (e) the imposition of any requirement on any person to provide assistance with giving effect to an interception warrant.

This is clearly a far more comprehensive clause than s 9, although it is subject to certain exceptions under s 18, which may allow Convention points to be raised, in accordance with the courts' duty under s 6 of the HRA. This rule is clearly arbitrary, since material deriving from the use of bugging and other surveillance devices can be adduced, as discussed below.

Section 18(1) provides that s 17(1) does not apply in proceedings before the tribunal, for an offence under the RIPA, s 1 of the 1985 Act, s 4(3)(a) of the Official Secrets Act, and a number of other provisions relating to the secrecy of interceptions. Section 18(4), (6), (7) and (9) provides a number of very significant new exceptions. Section 18(4) applies *inter alia*²³⁵ where the interception was by consent under s 3; s 18(6) provides that s 17(1)(b) does not prevent doing anything which discloses conduct for which a person has been convicted under ss 1(1), 11(7), 19 or s 1 of the 1985 Act. Under s 18(7), s 17(1) does not prohibit disclosure of '(a) any information that continues to be available for disclosure' to the prosecution 'for the purpose only of enabling that person to determine what is required of him by his duty to 235 Section 18(4) also provides that s 16(1)(a) does not apply if the interception was lawful by virtue of s 1(5)(c) (relating to stored material obtained under another statutory power), or s 4(1) (persons believed to be outside UK). For discussion of ss 17 and 18, see Mirfield, P [2001] Crim LR 91.

secure [its] fairness' or (b) disclosure to a relevant judge²³⁶ by order of the judge 'to be made to him alone'. Under s 18(8), a judge shall not order such a disclosure unless satisfied that 'the exceptional circumstances of the case make the disclosure essential in the interests of justice'. If disclosure is ordered, s 18(9) allows the judge, in 'exceptional circumstances', to 'direct the prosecution to make any admission of fact...that the judge thinks is essential in the interests of justice'. But any such direction must not, under s 18(10), contravene s 17(1). Thus, where intercept material is still available, its disclosure to the judge or to the prosecution may be ordered. It may be noted that the material may still be in existence at the time of the trial, since it is preserved, for the benefit of the prosecution, under s 15(4)(d). Communications data (details of calls made) may be adduced in evidence, since it is not an intercepted communication as defined in s 17(4), so long as it does not suggest that the offences in question have been committed.²³⁷

Section 9 of the 1985 Act meant that if an intercept had been used to obtain material, whether unauthorised or not, the information gained would be inadmissible in evidence. But s 9 only applied to the forms of interception which the Act covered. Section 9 was considered in two House of Lords' decisions, which led to a bizarre and anomalous situation. In Ejffick,²³⁸ the defendants were prosecuted for conspiracy to supply controlled drugs and police officers obtained part of the evidence against them by means of intercepting and taping their telephone calls. The offence under s 1 had not been committed since the calls taped were made on a cordless telephone which was not found to be part of 'a public telecommunications system' as required under s 1. The appellants were convicted, and appealed on the ground that the evidence deriving from the intercepted telephone calls should have been ruled inadmissible under s 9 of the Interception of Communications Act 1985, or under s 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), since they were made without a warrant for interception.

The House of Lords determined that argument under s 9 failed because its provisions were aimed at preventing disclosure of information which tended to suggest that the offence of unauthorised interception (under s 1(1) of the 1985 Act) had been committed by specified persons, or that a warrant had been or was to be issued to such persons. These matters were not in issue since the interception was not within the Act. Section 9 was not intended to render inadmissible evidence obtained which would not reveal such matters. Clear statutory language would have been needed to oust the principle that all logically probative evidence should be admitted. As this was not the case, and as the instance in question did not appear to fall within s 9, the evidence was admissible. The submission in respect of s 78 of PACE failed because it was not suggested that the police officers had deliberately contravened the 1985 Act. It was found that no unfairness to the defendants had occurred due to the admission of the evidence, but this begs the question whether 236 Inter alia, a judge of the High Court or Crown Court. This provision will amend the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996, s 3(4).

237 This position continues that established under the 1985 Act in Morgans v DPP [2000] 2 WLR 386, HL; [1999] 1 WLR 968, CA in which it was found that s 9 of that Act does not preclude a court from receiving evidence of printouts obtained by a logging device.

238 [1994] 3 WLR 583; (1994) 99 Cr App R 312, HL; (1992) 95 Cr App R 427, CA. For criticism of the Court of Appeal decision, see Leigh, I (1992) 142 NLJ 944-45, 976-77; Smith, JC [1992] Crim LR 580. See generally Spencer (1999) 58 CLJ 43.

the manner in which the evidence was obtained—on no legal basis and by means of a surreptitious act—could affect the fairness of the trial.

In Preston,²³⁹ in contrast, a lawful intercept had occurred and the defence wanted admission of the material derived from it which, it was alleged, might have led to the acquittal of the defendants. In a decision which accepted somewhat reluctantly that the 1985 Act created a scheme designed to elevate the interests of secrecy above individual rights to privacy or to a fair trial, the House of Lords found that s 9 was designed to prevent information as to the manner of authorising and carrying out the intercepts from being uncovered at the trial. It was intended, inter alia, to prevent the defendant from seeking to uncover the source of information behind the decision to use an intercept. Thus, the defence had no right to obtain disclosure of the material deriving from the intercepts. Further, since on the proper interpretation of s 2(2) read in conjunction with s 6(3), destruction of material gained by the intercepts had to be undertaken once the criminal investigation (not the prosecution) was complete, such material would not be available.

The result of this decision was that although telephone tapping could be used as an investigative tool in the criminal process, material deriving directly from an intercept would not be admissible and the defence would not be allowed to ask any questions designed to discover whether an intercept was used. Thus, the prosecution might at times be disadvantaged, since some probative material would not be admissible,²⁴⁰ but the other side of the coin was that material deriving from the intercept could not be disclosed to the defence even if (as the defence alleged in Preston) it might show the innocence of the defendants. One exception, favourable to the prosecution, to the rule deriving from s 9, as interpreted in Preston, was allowed in Rasool and Choudhary.²⁴¹ It was determined that where intercepts are consensual, material deriving from them will be admissible. The rule in s 9(1)(a) was not found to be sufficient to make consensual material inadmissible; it was found to be irrelevant to the question of admissibility that an offence had been committed in obtaining the evidence. Choudhary's appeal was dismissed while Rasool's was allowed on that ground. Similarly, in Owen,²⁴² the evidence deriving from an intercept was found to be admissible, on the basis that it did not suggest that the offence under s 1 had been committed. The defendant, in prison on remand, had admitted the offence with which he was charged in a phone call to his wife. He was deemed to have consented to the interception since notices warning of the likelihood of interception had been posted near telephones in the prison. The defendant claimed that he had not seen any such notice. But it was found that, on the basis that one of the parties had impliedly consented, the admission of the evidence would not suggest that the offence under s 1 of the Act had been committed.²⁴³

239 [1993] 4 All ER 638; (1994) 98 Cr App R 405, HL. For discussion, see Tomkins, A (1994) 57 MLR 941.

240 This factor influenced the Commission in declaring the application from Preston inadmissible: Preston v UK, 2 July 1997, Appl No 24193/94; available from the Commission's website.

241 [1997] 4 All ER 439. Choudhary applied, unsuccessfully, to Strasbourg: Choudhary v UK (1999) 1 EHRLR 522. For a further exception, see Aufla [1998] 2 Cr App R 16.

242 [1999] 1WLR 949.

243 Since under s 1(2) of the Act, interceptions without warrant but with consent is not an offence.

The anomalous result of Effick and Preston was that in one, unlawfully obtained evidence, favourable to the prosecution, could be used as part of the prosecution evidence, while in another, lawfully obtained evidence could not be used at the behest of the defence. However, the decision in *Morgans*²⁴⁴ addressed this anomaly. The House of Lords found that s 9 covers intercepts both with and without warrant. These decisions appear to have influenced Part I of the RIPA. Most obviously, the new statute covers most forms of communication so that the argument used in Effick regarding cordless phones could not be raised. Section 18(4), which refers inter alia to interceptions without a warrant where one party has consented to the interception (s 3), covers the findings from Rasool and Owen. Significantly, in certain imprecisely defined circumstances, disclosure relating to intercept material can be made to the prosecution and, if ordered, to the judge. But the defence may remain unaware of the source of the material. The fact that the use of the intercept led to the uncovering of other evidence, which is adduced, might be relevant to any challenge the defence could mount to the evidence. This position may not accord with the equality of arms principle under Art 6 of the Convention, since prosecution and defence may not be equally affected by the unavailability of the evidence.²⁴⁵ The compatibility of ss 17 and 18 with the Art 6(1) guarantee of a fair trial may be raised. If the use of interception is lawful, and probative evidence is obtained, it is hard to identify the legitimate purpose of refusing to adduce it directly in court. Section 18 addresses the question of proportionality to a very limited extent, but the question arises whether the requirements of equality of arms can be satisfied by a provision which allows the intercept material to be disclosed to the prosecution but not to the defence. More generally, the question of the fairness of the trial arises in relation to the exclusion of probative evidence.

In circumstances similar to those in Preston in which the defence seeks disclosure of the evidence, whether or not it has been disclosed to the prosecution, the defence could make representations to the judge under s 18(9)(b), arguing that the term 'exceptional circumstances' must be rendered compatible with Art 6 under s 3 of the HRA, taking into account the requirements of fairness in the particular instance.²⁴⁶ If the evidence is crucial to the defence, but the judge refuses to make an order, an appeal could be mounted on the basis that the judge had not complied with Art 6. Perhaps the most difficult situation would arise where, as in Malone, the defence suspected that an unauthorised intercept had been used. The defence might wish to mount an argument that evidence causally related to such use, rather than directly deriving from it, should be excluded since it would not have been obtained but for the illegality. Such exclusion could be argued for under s 78 of PACE, interpreted compatibly with Art 6.²⁴⁷ But ss 18(10) and 17(1) stand in the way of obtaining an admission that an unauthorised intercept had been used. Possibly where an activist view of the exclusion of evidence requirement under Art 6 was taken, the only recourse would be to obtain a declaration of incompatibility between 244 [2000] 2 WLR 386. For an interesting application of the Morgans argument, see Sargent [2001] UKHL 54.

245 This could be argued by analogy with the decisions in Windisch v Austria (1990) 13 EHRR 281 and Kostovski v Netherlands (1989) 12 EHRR 434.

246 See pp 709–11. The findings in Rowe and Davis v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 1, although in a different context, which concerned unfairness arising from the non-disclosure of evidence, would be applicable.

247 See further Chapter 14, pp 892–906.

those provisions and Art 6(1) under s 4 of the HRA on the basis of unfairness under Art 6(1). However, if it was assumed that no appeal could succeed since those provisions would have to be applied, the defendants might view seeking such a declaration as worthless since it could not provide them individually with any redress. It appears therefore that although ss 17 and 18 show signs of seeking to escape from certain of the effects of s 9 of the 1985 Act, they nevertheless provide a scheme whose central aim is to preserve the secrecy surrounding interceptions, whether or not the interests of justice are thereby compromised.

Sections 17 and 18 are most likely to be relevant in criminal proceedings, but other proceedings are also affected. As discussed below, the route to judicial review of the decisions of the new tribunal may be barred by the ouster clause contained in s 67(8) of the RIPA²⁴⁸ and based on s 7(8) of the 1985 Act. Section 65(2), which provides that the jurisdiction of the new tribunal is to be 'the only appropriate tribunal' for the purposes of s 7(1) (a) of the HRA, also stands in the way of review. Section 65 is discussed further below,²⁴⁹ and it is suggested that judicial review of executive decisions in the ordinary courts is possible in respect of some surveillance. But in respect of the interception of communications, s 17 would also have to be circumvented. Since s 18(9) applies to criminal proceedings only, the way to judicial review in the ordinary courts appears to remain barred. The only, faint, possibility seems to be that eventually, a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 of the HRA between s 17 and Art 6 might eventually be made on appeal from proceedings for permission to seek review.

The possibility of a tort action, including that of a new cause of action based on breach of Art 8, is also probably ruled out on the same grounds. Where the existing law fails to cover interceptions which infringe Art 8, new tortious liability could have been created. Under the 1985 Act, the possibility would have been open of bringing an action once the HRA was fully in force in respect of forms of phone tapping outside the 1985 Act. This position was unsatisfactory and anomalous. But it did leave open the possibility, now probably closed down under Part I of the RIPA, of raising such matters in the ordinary courts. At present, apart from prosecutions for the offences created by the RIPA, or enforcement of interception in the civil courts, the new tribunal would probably provide the only judicial forum in which the Convention points discussed above could be raised.

Conclusions

The discussion suggests that court action as a method of seeking to ensure that the HRA is fully complied with in this context is highly circumscribed and uncertain. No clear and effective method is currently available, unless the new tribunal proves to be more effective than its predecessor. Parliamentary oversight is also limited. If the Convention rights are to have any real impact domestically in this context, this may be most likely to occur through incremental internal change in procedures, rather than through the courts or the complaints mechanisms.

248 Replacing s 7(8) of the 1985 Act and replacing s 91(10) of the 1997 Act in so far as complaints are concerned, and creating a new ouster clause in relation to complaints regarding surveillance by a range of other public authorities.

249 See pp 715–16.

It is notable that the inception of proceedings in the ordinary courts in relation to interception under Part I of the RIPA is at present a privilege intended to be accorded only to the State. The role of the judiciary in the ordinary courts in protecting individual citizens, at their instigation, from abuse of State power in conducting interceptions has been almost entirely removed. Instead, the intention is that the courts should be used only to seek to further State ends—as a means of enforcing the use of intercepts. Thus, civil or criminal proceedings can be used under ss 11(7) and (8) in order to compel private companies to intercept the communications of their customers. At the same time, a citizen whose communications appear to have been unlawfully intercepted has no means of challenging the interception in the ordinary courts, even assuming that she becomes aware of it. It is a criminal offence under s 19, a classic ‘reverse onus’ clause, for a telecommunications worker, for example, to inform a member of the public that her phone has been tapped under an unlawfully issued warrant. The unsatisfactoriness of this regime leads to the conclusion that further safeguards against arbitrary invasion of privacy by interception, and consequent modifications of Part I of the RIPA, may eventually be introduced as a result of Strasbourg findings or possibly as a result of relying on Art 8 under the HRA in applications to the new tribunal.

5 STATE SURVEILLANCE²⁵⁰

Introduction

The last 20 years have seen an immense and still increasing expansion in the availability and use of a range of highly sophisticated surveillance devices, and State surveillance has become more intensive since the Labour Government came to power in 1997.²⁵¹ The recent growth in State use of such devices as part of intelligence-led policing has received encouragement from official studies.²⁵² The growth in such policing, which involves using covert investigative techniques proactively to target suspects, is due, as the group Justice has pointed out, to the need to respond to organised crime, to the availability and efficacy of the new technology, and to the wider use of criminal intelligence following the growth of national and transnational agencies, including Europol and the National Criminal Intelligence Service,²⁵³ and transnational agreements.²⁵⁴ ‘Bugging’ equipment has become much more sophisticated in the last 20 years, with the result that it is now very powerful, readily concealable and relatively cheap.²⁵⁵ The criminal intelligence 250 For discussion see Leigh, I, ‘The security service, the press and the courts’ [1987] PL 12–21.

251 See below, p 696.

252 Audit Commission, Helping with Enquiries, 1993; Home Office Review of Police Core and Ancillary Tasks, 1995. See Manwaring-White, S, The Policing Revolution, 1983; Report of the Commissioner for 1993, Cm 2522; Security Services Work Against Organised Crime, Cm 3065, 1996.

253 Justice: Under Surveillance, 1998, p 7. Walker and Taylor have pointed out that the use of surveillance techniques by police avoids adherence to the PACE interviewing rules and makes it less likely that evidence will be excluded: ‘Bugs in the system’ (1996) J Civ Lib 105, pp 107–08.

254 See the Memorandum of Understandings on the Lawful Interception of Communications, EU JHA-Council, 25.10.95.

255 See Taylor and Walker, op cit, fn 253.

information obtained can be matched and disseminated with increasing rapidity using the new technology.

Thus, surveillance devices and techniques offer an important weapon to the police and security services in the maintenance of law and order and the protection of national security. However, as the Supreme Court of Canada has said of them: '...one can scarcely imagine a State activity more dangerous to individual privacy than electronic surveillance.'²⁵⁶ This was also the view of the Younger Committee, which considered the range of devices then in use.²⁵⁷ The use by State bodies of surveillance techniques and their legal basis resembles the pattern considered above in relation to the interception of communications. Despite the development of such techniques and the increased use of them by the police and the security services, they had until recently no or a quasi-legal basis—a position which was possible under a constitution based on negative liberties since the State, like the ordinary citizen, was, according to a key decision, entitled to do anything which the law did not forbid.²⁵⁸ They operated until recently outside the realms of parliamentary, judicial or administrative control. Bearing in mind the power of the State to conduct surveillance and its intrusiveness, this was an especially anomalous position.

Under administrative guidelines,²⁵⁹ the use of listening devices could be authorised by Chief Constables in order to assist in a criminal investigation, if the crime was really serious, normal methods had been tried and had failed, and there was good reason for believing that the use of such equipment would lead to a conviction. Also, the authorising officer had to weigh the seriousness of the offence against the degree of intrusion necessary. When it became apparent in 1996 that this regime was inadequate, as explained below, since it did not meet the demands of the Convention, the use of certain surveillance techniques by the police was placed on a statutory basis in the Police Act 1997. Following the lead of the Interception of Communications Act 1985, it gives an impression of covering the use of surveillance devices by the police, while leaving many areas of their use outside its statutory framework.

The imminence of the HRA, and the effect of Art 8 in particular, was the driving force for change. The unsatisfactory nature of the arrangements was pointed out in 1998 by Justice in a report²⁶⁰ which argued for integration of surveillance techniques with interception, in one comprehensive statute. The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act provides that comprehensive basis. Overlapping with the 1997 Act, most of which it will not repeal, Part II of the RIPA covers a far wider range of both techniques and public authorities, including the police. It places the use of surveillance by the security and intelligence services on a clearer statutory basis, overlapping with the Intelligence Services Act 1994. By providing a comprehensive statutory basis that coincided (roughly) with the coming fully into force of the HRA, 256 Duarte (1990) 65 DLR (4th) 240.

257 Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972.

258 See Megarry VC in Malone v MPC [1979] Ch 344.

259 Guidelines on the Use of Equipment in Police Surveillance Operations, House of Commons Library, 19 December 1984.

260 See fn 253 above.

Part II sought to avoid the embarrassment of the findings in Malone v UK,²⁶¹ *Halford v UK*²⁶² and Khan v UK.²⁶³ As indicated above, Malone led to the inception of the Interception of Communications Act 1985 since it was found at Strasbourg that the interference with privacy represented by telephone tapping was not in accordance with the law, as it had no satisfactory legal basis. In Halford it was found that the tapping of the applicant's internal office phone had no such basis, while the same finding was made as regards the use of 'bugging' devices in Khan. The finding in Halford was addressed in Part I of the RIPA, that in Khan in Part III of the 1997 Act.²⁶⁴ Assuming that the forms of surveillance covered by Part II of the RIPA engage Art 8 in the sense that they represent an interference with the respect for private life guaranteed under that Article,²⁶⁵ the Convention arguments raised in those cases would have been raised in the domestic courts under the HRA (under s 7(1)(a) or (b)) particularly in respect of forms of so called 'directed' surveillance (see below) if Part II of the RIPA had not been introduced. It also provides a fuller complaints mechanism, with a view to keeping most scrutiny of surveillance out of the ordinary courts, but nevertheless satisfying the demands of the Convention. In contrast with the position under Part I, it does not create a criminal offence of conducting unauthorised surveillance. Part II also seeks to deal with the problem of encryption by requiring disclosure of the key to information under s 49,²⁶⁶ rendering refusal punishable under s 53, a classic 'reverse onus' clause.

Thus, for the first time a statutory basis for a number of investigative techniques has been created, clearly a welcome development. But it is questionable whether Part II is any more adequate at the level of principle than the previous scheme. It is clearly not as vulnerable to challenges under the Convention. Nevertheless, its compatibility with the Convention remains in doubt, as discussed below. The Justice Report (1998) influenced its introduction, but while the first of their key recommendations—that there should be an integrated, comprehensive statutory basis for surveillance—has largely been met, it is questionable whether this is true of the second—using a 'coherent set of principles as required by Art 8' to underpin the new scheme.²⁶⁷

The Police Act 1997 Part III

The House of Lords in Khan,²⁶⁸ confronted with evidence obtained by police bugging involving trespass, recommended legislation, taking into account the fact that the 261 A 82(1984), 7 EHCR 14.

262 [1997] IRLR 471.

263 (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

264 By the time that the European Court of Human Rights made this finding, Part III of the 1997 Act had already been passed. Nevertheless, at the time when the police used the bugging device to obtain evidence against Khan, no sufficient basis in law was available to meet the demands of Art 8.

265 The Strasbourg decisions, discussed pp 703–05, strongly suggest that this would be the case.

266 A s 49 notice requires service providers to disclose encryption keys and to keep secret the fact that a key has been disclosed. This provision may lead to adoption of a 'voluntary' key escrow system—a system whereby private encryption keys are deposited with a third party. Such a system would provide protection from prosecution for those who had genuinely lost or deleted their keys. But it clearly has significant privacy implications. See further Akedenz, Y, 'UK Government policy on encryption' [1997] WSCL 1.

267 Under Surveillance: Covert Policing and Human Rights Standards, 1998; see Recommendation 1, p 107.

268 [1996] 3 All ER 289; [1996] 3 WLR 162; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024, HL; [1995] QB 27, CA.

regime governing the use of bugging devices was not on a statutory basis and therefore might not comply with the 'in accordance with the law' requirement under Art 8.²⁶⁹ Their recommendation was one of the factors behind the passing of the Police Act 1997, which therefore represents another instance in which powers posing a grave threat to privacy and other individual rights were governed only by administrative guidelines until it became apparent that such a course could not be justified under the Convention.

The authorisation procedure

The Police Act, Part III placed the practice under the relevant Home Office guidelines²⁷⁰ on a statutory basis, with certain changes. It only covers the installation of devices which could have attracted liability under trespass, criminal damage or unlawful interference with wireless telegraphy, under the Wireless Telegraphy Acts 1949 and 1967. Therefore, it does not cover 'stand off devices. Also, it does not cover devices installed with the consent of the person able to give permission in respect of the premises in question.²⁷¹ The use of surveillance devices in a range of circumstances therefore falls outside it, as do a range of techniques, in particular the use of informants.²⁷² Such matters continued to be governed by the Guidelines until Part II of the RIPA (see below) came into force.

Part III of the Police Act is largely modelled on the Interception of Communications Act and therefore contains certain similar objectionable features. The basis for allowing the use of bugging is very broad. An authorisation may be issued if the action is expected to be of substantial value in the prevention and detection of serious crime and the objective cannot reasonably be achieved by other means (s 93(2)). Serious crime is defined under s 93(4) to include crimes of violence, those involving substantial financial gain, and those involving a large number of people in pursuit of a common purpose.²⁷³ These definitions appear to be significantly wider than those under the old guidelines. The last possibility could allow bugging to be used against, for example, members of CND or anti-road protesters, if it was expected, inter alia, that their activities might infringe s 68 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.²⁷⁴ The 1999 Code of Practice, however, adopted under s 101 of the Act, emphasises that the bugging powers must only be used in cases of serious crime such as drug trafficking.

Under s 93(5), an authorisation to interfere with property may be issued by the 269 See the comments of Lord Nolan [1996] 3 WLR 162, p 175 and Lord Slynn, p 166. See also the Home Affairs Select Committee 3rd Report for 1994–5, Organised Crime HC 18–1, which recommended a statutory basis. It may be noted that Khan v UK Appl No 35394/97 was declared admissible at Strasbourg: (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58, and the application was successful (Judgment of the Court of 12 May 2000, 8 BHRC 310) since at the time there was no sufficient basis in law for the interference with Art 8. See further Chapter 14, p 906.

270 HO Circular to Chief Constables, Guidelines on the Use of Technical Equipment in Police Surveillance Operations.

271 Under the Guidelines and the Code of Practice, Intrusive Surveillance. One example would be the placing of listening devices in a police station: see Bailey and Smith [1993] Crim LR 861; Musqud Ali [1966] QB 668.

272 See H [1987] Crim LR 47 and Jelen and Katz [1990] 90 Cr App R 456. The use of a wired informant may require permission under the HO Circular; Part II of the RIPA—provisions covering covert human sources—now applies.

273 Or the crime is one for which a person of 21 or over with no previous convictions could reasonably be expected to receive a prison sentence of three or more years.

274 See Chapter 9, pp 483–85.

Chief Officer of Police or, if that is not practicable, by an officer of the rank of Assistant Chief Constable of the force in question (s 94), if s 93(2) applies. The authorisation will be given in writing, except in cases of emergency, when it may be given orally by the Chief Officer in person (s 95(1)). A written authorisation will last for three months, an oral one for 72 hours. Both forms may be renewed in writing for a further three months. The commissioners appointed under s 91(1) must be notified of authorisations as soon as they are made (s 96), but this does not prevent the police acting on the authorisation. There is no administrative check under the 1997 Act, as there is under the 1985 one: no minister is involved in the bugging authorisations. Apart from authorisations falling within s 97 (below), no other independent prior check is available although special Information Commissioners (to become Surveillance Commissioners under the RIPA, Part II) have an oversight role. As has been pointed out in relation to the checking procedure under the 1985 Act, subsequent independent checks are clearly not as effective as prior ones. Again, these arrangements may be compared with those in Denmark, where authorisation of the use of listening devices, wherever placed, and including 'participant monitoring', must be by an investigating magistrate.²⁷⁵

As initially drafted, the Bill made no provision for any prior independent scrutiny of the bugging warrants at all, thereby adopting the model used for the 1985 Act, but without even the intervention of Home Office officials. The warrants were to be issued by the Chief Constable of the force in question, continuing the old practice. Michael Howard, the then Home Secretary, considered that exclusion of an independent authorising body was necessary since the police must be able to react instantly to prevent crime. This proposal was severely criticised from various quarters²⁷⁶ and amendments requiring prior independent approval were put forward by Labour and the Liberal Democrats.²⁷⁷ The Labour amendment is reflected in s 97; prior approval of authorisation is not required in all instances. Under s 97(2), such approval by a Commissioner is required where the specified property is believed to be a dwelling, hotel bedroom or office premises. It is also needed where the authorising officer believes that information of a more sensitive nature may be acquired.

The involvement of special commissioners, even such a limited involvement, may provide a degree of independent oversight and scrutiny, although the commissioners will probably tend to accept and agree with police representations. Nevertheless, apart from other considerations, the involvement of Commissioners may mean that internal procedures will be tightened up before representations are made. No provision is made under the Act for independent review of the ²⁷⁵ Art 126 1 and Code of Criminal Procedure.

²⁷⁶ The criticism came from the pressure group, Liberty, and from some sections of the press, including sections of the tabloid press. It was argued that other countries accept prior judicial authorisation for bugging warrants and the UK accepts judicial involvement in other aspects of the policing process such as the authorisation of search warrants.

²⁷⁷ Labour proposed that an information commissioner appointed from the judiciary should be involved in checking the warrants, while the Liberal Democrats proposed that a judge acting in his or her capacity as a judge should undertake this role. See Standing Committee F Fifth Sitting Cols 131 et seq, 11 March 1997. The House of Lords accepted both amendments and Michael Howard then reached an agreement with Jack Straw, then the Shadow Home Secretary, that an information commissioner appointed from the judiciary should be involved in checking warrants if certain authorisations were in question.

authorisations in the ordinary courts. Nevertheless, under the Labour amendment, scrutiny of police practices will be, arguably, somewhat more effective than scrutiny of those of the Security Service, not weaker, as Michael Howard originally proposed. Clearly, this is a more satisfactory situation, since the arguments for excluding the judiciary from the process are weaker when matters pertaining to national security are not in question.

Various groups and bodies had put forward pleas for exemption from the provisions of the Bill. These included Catholic priests—who were afraid that the confessional would be bugged—doctors and solicitors. Section 97(2)(b) and the Code of Practice, Intrusive Surveillance, adopted under s 101 of the Act²⁷⁸ reflect the concerns of these groups to an extent. Where the action authorised is likely to result in ‘any person acquiring knowledge of matters subject to legal privilege, confidential personal information or confidential journalistic material’, prior authorisation is required. Under s 98, ‘matters subject to legal privilege’ include communications between a professional legal advisor and his or her client connected with the giving of legal advice or relating to legal proceedings. Once approval for an authorisation has been given allowing, for example, for a solicitor’s office to be bugged, all conversations between solicitors and clients would be recorded. Under s 99, ‘confidential personal information’ includes information relating to a person’s physical or mental health or to spiritual counselling. But under s 97(3), even where s 97 applies, no approval is needed if the authorising officer ‘believes that the case is one of urgency’. No requirement that the belief should be based on reasonable grounds is included. However, the Code of Practice provides that in all but exceptional cases the police must obtain prior approval of the authorisation where s 97 applies: the ‘urgency’ provision must not be used routinely. It may be noted, however, that s 101 is to be repealed by the RIPA and this Code will be replaced by a new Code to be issued under s 71 of that Act.

The Code of Practice: Intrusive Surveillance

The Code of Practice was revised in November 1999.²⁷⁹ The revision appeared to be intended to limit further the power of intrusive surveillance in relation to the especially sensitive categories of information. Under the Code, surveillance operations will be banned in churches or temples where a minister of religion is giving spiritual counselling such as absolution. In order to use bugging equipment in such circumstances, not only will the provisions of the Act have to be complied with, but the police will also have to seek permission from the head of the appropriate church or faith. This provision brings the Church of England and other churches and faiths into line with the Roman Catholic Church: the sacramental confessional was given added protection under the original Code.

The relationship between the Code of Practice and the statute is significant. The Act grants broad discretionary powers to conduct intrusive surveillance and interfere with property to senior law enforcement officials, but seeks to constrain 278 It was issued on 27 October 1998.

279 The revised Code was published by the Home Office on 18 November 1999. As noted, it will be replaced under the RIPA.

and structure these powers in two main ways. First, there are general precedent conditions for the exercise of such powers, the most significant being the requirement that the action is likely to be of substantial value in preventing or detecting serious crime. Secondly, there are specific countervailing provisions intended to protect privacy and confidentiality. In this respect, s 97 is the key provision, but the Code of Practice, a set of quasi-legal rules, provides a due process underpinning. Section 97, with its ancillary statutory provisions, together with the Code provisions, could be viewed as providing a detailed domestic scheme satisfying the demands of Art 8. But this view fails to take account of the rule of law implications of placing a number of key protective provisions on a quasi-legislative basis within what Baldwin has termed ‘tertiary rules’, or government by circular.²⁸⁰

In common with many of the Codes accompanying ‘State power’ legislation discussed in this book,²⁸¹ the Code provisions are not on their face discretionary; they are in general phrased in the precise terms of mandatory instructions. Nevertheless, no formal sanction, apart from an internal disciplinary one, is provided for their breach. This is also true of the statutory provisions. However, they cloak otherwise tortious actions with authority, while the mere fact that they are statutory may appear to give them greater weight than the Code provisions in the eyes of those to whom they are directed, and of the judiciary. If the provisions were not followed, it would be, theoretically, an internal disciplinary matter and in practice, police officers might pay more attention to this than to the theoretical possibility of being sued. But, as Chapter 14 points out, the same sanction is used for breach of the PACE Codes and does not appear to be effective, taking into account the very few disciplinary charges laid for their breach.²⁸² Thus, senior law enforcement officials are in effect given at least a partial discretion as to whether to follow the Code rules and thus whether to respect the Art 8 rights which they reflect.²⁸³ As pointed out in Chapter 1, the concept of a right precludes the idea of an open-ended discretion to infringe it in the pursuit of competing interests.²⁸⁴

Unless rigorous, independent review of rule-compliance and a clear remedy for breach are available, the Code rules will remain, in effect, largely discretionary, and the rights protected by them illusory. This is a concern in respect of the statutory provisions, including s 97, but it arises a fortiori in respect of the Code and will be equally true of the new Code to be introduced under s 71 of the RIPA, which will 280 See Baldwin, Rules and Government, 1995.

281 The Codes of Practice made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 considered in Chapters 13 and 14 were the forerunners of the similar Codes considered in this book—the Codes adopted under the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000.

282 See pp 915–20.

283 Ronald Dworkin has argued that if an official’s decision whether to comply with a given rule is final and unreviewable, he is endowed with a form of discretion (Taking Rights Seriously, 1977, p 69). In practice, decisions taken by police officers in relation to the provisions of the Codes of Practice discussed in this book (see, in particular, Chapter 13) are in general unlikely to be considered in courts or in police disciplinary proceedings. In a minority of instances, however, such provisions may be considered in relation to exclusion of evidence. Even then, the ‘sanction’ of such exclusion is unlikely to be used in respect of most forms of non-confession evidence, the form of evidence to which the provisions of the RIPA Code are most likely to relate. See, generally, Davis, KC, Discretionary Justice, 1980, pp 84–88.

284 See pp 11–12. Dworkin argues that it only makes sense to denote an interest as a right if it will generally win any battle with competing societal considerations: see op cit, fn 695, p 191.

also be accompanied by no clear sanction for its breach (s 72(2)).²⁸⁵ It is suggested below that the new tribunal system may prove ineffective, and that since no clear parliamentary or administrative means of seeking to enhance rule compliance is available, recourse to court-based remedies under the influence of the HRA would be of especial significance in this context if, which is very doubtful, they could find expression.

The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act Part II²⁸⁶

Part II of the RIPA 2000 covers surveillance activities of immense potential to infringe privacy that previously had no—or only a narrow—basis in law. For the first time, a comprehensive statutory basis has been created for the expanding use of covert surveillance. The growth in proactive intelligence-led policing (targeting suspects using covert surveillance rather than investigating a crime after it has happened) and the proliferation of various forms of surveillance devices provided part of the impetus for reform.²⁸⁷ Unlike Part III of the Police Act 1997 or s 5 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 with which it overlaps,²⁸⁸ Part II of the RIPA covers a very wide range of public authorities. It also covers a much wider range of circumstances. Prior to the introduction of Part II, invasions of privacy by means of covert surveillance falling outside the narrow scope of the 1997 or 1994 provisions were occurring, not on the basis of a legal power, but on the basis that the State is in the same position as the individual citizen in being free to do that which the law does not forbid. Since there was no legal right to privacy—in a broad, general sense—no legal power to invade it was needed.²⁸⁹

The pre-existing statutory provisions were mainly (although not exclusively) aimed at the form of surveillance termed ‘intrusive’ by Part II. Most significantly, a warrant or authorisation was required where there was a physical invasion of property by the police or security and intelligence services. So a wide area of surveillance fell outside those statutes and the need to cover this particular form of surveillance—in anticipation of the effects of the HRA—provided the immediate impetus for the introduction of Part II. Under the HRA it is clearly necessary for surveillance to be placed on a statutory basis even where previously it would not have attracted any form of liability, if it would amount to an invasion of privacy under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, since para 2 provides 285 On the model provided by the PACE Codes (adopted for all the Codes mentioned in this book) it will be admissible in evidence under s 72(3). It should be taken into account by courts, the new tribunal and relevant Commissioners under s 72(4).

286 It may be noted that under s 46, there are restrictions on Part II authorisations extending to Scotland.

287 The use of covert surveillance together with other targeting methods, including the use of informers, has expanded rapidly and is seen as immensely useful by the police: see Policing with Intelligence HMIC Thematic Inspection Report, 1997/99.

288 Under the Police Act 1997, Part III, s 92: ‘No entry on or interference with property or with wireless telegraphy shall be unlawful if it is authorised by an authorisation having effect under this Part’. Thus, forms of directed surveillance involving an actual interference with property (see below)—on non-residential premises—were covered by the Police Act 1997, Part III. Under the 1994 Act, s 5, the Home Secretary, on an application from a member of the Intelligence Service, can issue a warrant authorising the ‘taking of any such action as is specified in the warrant in respect of any property so specified or in respect of wireless telegraphy so specified’.

289 See above, p 533; clearly, privacy received some protection in the pre-HRA era, especially under the doctrine of trespass.

that an interference with individual privacy must be ‘in accordance with the law’. The key aim of Part II is therefore to meet a central requirement under the Convention—that of legality.

It is clear that Part II has gone some way towards achieving this aim in the sense that it has provided a much more comprehensive statutory underpinning for covert surveillance than the pre-existing one. A basis in national law has been created which purports to meet the requirements of legality under the Convention. Below, it will be considered whether it has succeeded in meeting those requirements and whether the further Convention requirements of necessity and proportionality have been met. In order to do so, the new provisions governing so called ‘intrusive’ and ‘directed’ surveillance will be examined with a view to contending that when the two regimes are contrasted, the inadequacies of the latter, in Convention terms, are starkly revealed.

Intrusive surveillance

Under s 26(3) of the RIPA, ‘intrusive’ surveillance occurs when a surveillance device is used or an individual undertaking surveillance is actually present on residential premises, or in a private vehicle, or it is carried out by such a device in relation to such premises or vehicle without being present on the premises or vehicle. ‘Residential’ is defined in s 48(1) of the RIPA as premises used as living accommodation, while ‘premises’ includes movable structures and land. The definition expressly excludes common areas of residential premises and clearly does not cover office premises (s 48(7)(b)). Thus, covert surveillance of office premises falls within the term ‘directed’, rather than intrusive, surveillance.

Section 26(3), read with s 48(7), offers only a partial definition, since it would cover all forms of covert surveillance taking place in relation to residential premises. Some forms of such surveillance can be treated as directed surveillance, as indicated below, and it is in relation to residential premises that an area of uncertainty is created as to the category into which surveillance falls.

Under s 32(3) of the RIPA authorisation of intrusive surveillance is on the grounds of ‘the interests of national security, for the purpose of preventing or detecting serious crime or of preventing disorder, in the interests of the economic well-being of the UK’. ‘Serious crime’ is defined in s 81 (3)²⁹⁰ in substantially the same terms as in s 93(4) of the Police Act 1997. Proportionality requirements are introduced under s 32(2): the authorising person must be satisfied that the action to be taken is proportionate to what is hoped to be achieved by carrying it out. Authorisations for such surveillance are granted by the Home Secretary under s 41 or, for police or customs officers, by senior authorising officers, who are the highest ranking police officers in Britain (see s 32(6)). There is also provision for the grant of authorisations 290 Section 81(2) provides that such crime satisfies the tests of sub-s 3(a) or (b). Under s 81(3), those tests are (a) that the offence is one for which a person of 21 with no previous convictions could reasonably expect a sentence of three years’ imprisonment or more, or (b) that the conduct involves the use of violence, results in substantial financial gain, or is conduct by a large number of persons in pursuit of a common purpose.

in a case of urgency by persons of almost equally high rank, other than the senior authorising officer.²⁹¹

The provisions for urgent and non-urgent authorisations under ss 33, 34, 35 and 36 mirror those under the Police Act, Part III in that, under s 35, notice must be given to a 'Surveillance Commissioner' and, under s 36, the authorisation will not take effect until it has been approved, except where it is urgent and the grounds for urgency are set out in the notice, in which case the authorisation will take effect from the time of its grant. Under s 38, senior authorising officers can appeal to the Chief Surveillance Commissioner against decisions of ordinary Surveillance Commissioners. The Commissioners have responsibility for the destruction of material obtained by surveillance, under s 37, but there is no requirement that material no longer needed for proceedings and no longer subject to an authorisation must be destroyed.

Under s 43, authorisations can be granted or renewed urgently orally by senior authorising officers or in writing by persons authorised to act on their behalf in urgent cases. If, under s 43(3)(a), an authorisation is granted or renewed by a person entitled to act only in urgent cases, or was renewed by such a person or orally, it ceases to take effect after 72 hours. Section 42 provides special rules for the intelligence services which overlap with those of s 5 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994. Under s 42, the security and intelligence services can undertake intrusive surveillance on grant of a warrant. The grounds are those under s 32(3). As far as intrusive surveillance is concerned, the function of the services in support of the prevention or detection of serious crime is excluded where the application is by a member of GCHQ or the SIS (under s 42(3)). Under s 44(3), a warrant authorising intrusive surveillance issued by a senior official, and not renewed under the hand of the Secretary of State, 'shall cease to have effect at the end of the second working day' after its issue. In the case of other such warrants, that point will be at the end of the period of six months from the day of issue or renewal.

This authorisation regime follows the model adopted for telephone tapping under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 and continued with minor modifications under Part I of the RIPA. That regime has been subjected to criticism on the basis that the mechanisms for creating executive accountability are so weak,²⁹² but it may meet Strasbourg requirements.²⁹³ The regime for intrusive surveillance provides for independent checks and for the possibility that an authorisation will not be able to take effect if it does not satisfy the requirements, including those of proportionality. Clearly, the standard of scrutiny may be variable, but the very fact that an authorisation will be checked independently may tend to foster rigour in preparing the papers.

291 Under s 34(4), such persons are of a rank almost as high as such officers. In the case of police forces, this means a person holding the rank of Assistant Chief Constable or, in the case of the Metropolitan or City of London forces, of Commander.

292 See Lloyd (1986) 49 MLR 86; Leigh [1986] PL 8.

293 As discussed above, p 665, the regime created under the 1985 Act was considered in Christie v UK 78A DR E Com HR 119; on the facts of the case no breach of Art 8 was found.

Directed surveillance

Under s 26(2) of the RIPA, all covert surveillance is directed surveillance if it is not intrusive and it is undertaken ‘otherwise than by way of an immediate response to events or circumstances, the nature of which is such that it would not be practicable for an authorisation to be sought’, and for the purposes of ‘a specific investigation or...operation’, and ‘in such a manner as is likely to result in the obtaining of private information about a person’, even if he is not identified in relation to the investigation. If the device or person is not on the premises or in the vehicle, the surveillance is ‘directed’, not ‘intrusive’ unless ‘the device is such that it consistently provides information of the same quality and detail as might be expected to be obtained from a device actually present on the premises or in the vehicle’ (s 26(5)). The (draft) Code of Practice on Covert Surveillance (2000) made under s 71(3)(a) of the RIPA seeks to draw a distinction between general law enforcement functions and the systematic targeting of an individual; only the latter may amount to directed surveillance. Anomalously enough, the term ‘directed surveillance’ also covers an interception of communications in the course of its transmission that is consented to by the sender or recipient and in respect of which there is no interception warrant (s 26(4)(b) and s 48(4)).

From the above, it appears that directed surveillance would occur where a ‘bugging’ device is placed in the hallway of a block of flats that provides information of a lesser quality than would be obtained if the device was inside one of the flats. Intrusive surveillance would occur, for example, when a ‘bugging’ device is placed in a car parked near a private house that normally provides information of the same quality as would be obtained if the device was inside the house. These examples make it clear that very fine lines may be drawn between the two forms of surveillance, although, as indicated below, the two regimes differ so sharply. Moreover, the distinction between directed surveillance and ‘general law enforcement’ functions, such as observing persons entering or leaving a house, turns on the question whether or not the observation can be viewed as an immediate response—another instance in which fine lines may be drawn. If observation of a house occurs over a period of time, it can be argued that an invasion of privacy is occurring that can no longer be viewed as an immediate response and which requires therefore a statutory underpinning.²⁹⁴

Section 47(1) provides powers for the Secretary of State to extend or modify the authorisation provisions. He can provide for any directed surveillance ‘to be treated for the purposes of this Part as intrusive surveillance’. Under s 47(2), this power is subject to the negative resolution procedure, but clearly that does not provide the same safeguards as the full parliamentary process.

‘Directed’ surveillance may be authorised on the grounds under s 28. The grounds include ‘the interests of national security, for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime or of preventing disorder, in the interests of the economic well-being of the UK, in the interests of public safety; for the purpose of protecting public health; for the purpose of assessing or collecting any tax, duty...or other...charge payable to a government department’; or for any other ‘purpose specified for the purposes of this subsection by an order made by the Secretary of State'. This order must be approved by Parliament. Proportionality requirements are introduced under s 28(2) to the effect that the authorising person must believe that the authorisation or authorised conduct is 'proportionate to what is sought to be achieved by carrying it out'.

294 Such an underpinning could be created, by order of the Secretary of State, under s 47.

The authorisation for directed surveillance is granted by a 'designated person' under s 28. Under s 30, such persons are 'the individuals holding such offices, ranks or positions with relevant public authorities as are prescribed for the purposes of this subsection by an order' made by the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State can himself be a designated person under s 30(2). The 'relevant public authorities' (set out in Sched 1) include the police, the security and intelligence services, Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue, the armed forces, the Departments of Health; Social Security; Trade and Industry; Environment, Transport and the Regions. Further authorities can be designated by order of the Secretary of State. The prescribed persons in the relevant public authorities are now set out in The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (Prescription of Offices, Ranks and Positions Order 2000).²⁹⁵ In police forces, the prescribed office is that of Superintendent; in urgent cases, that of Inspector. The draft Code of Practice, para 3.10 recommends that authorising officers should not 'ideally be responsible for authorising their own activities (emphasis added)...however, it is recognised that this may sometimes be unavoidable...'

Under s 43, written authorisations cease to have effect after three months, although they may be renewed for additional three month periods (security or intelligence service authorisations may be renewed for six months). Urgent authorisations cease to have effect after 72 hours unless they are renewed either orally (if the urgency subsists) by a person whose entitlement to act is not confined to urgent cases, or in writing. Authorisations cannot be granted orally except in urgent cases and by a person whose entitlement to act is not confined to such cases. Under s 43(3)(b) 'in a case not falling within paragraph (a) in which the authorisation is for the conduct or the use of a covert human intelligence source', the period is 12 months from its grant or last renewal. In a case falling outside s 43(3)(a) or (b), it is three months under s 43(3)(c). Under s 44(5)(a), when an authorisation for the carrying out of directed surveillance is granted by a member of any of the intelligence services and renewed by an instrument 'endorsed under the hand of the person renewing [it] with a statement that the renewal is believed to be necessary on grounds falling within section 32(3)(a) or (c), the authorisation (unless renewed again) shall cease to have effect at the end of the period of six months'.

A Chief Surveillance Commissioner, who may be assisted by Assistant Commissioners, has a general oversight role in relation to this regime, under s 62. But, this independent check occurs only after the event. Therefore, its impact on accountability may be minimal.

Other surveillance

Under s 47, the Secretary of State may also by order 'apply this Part, with such modifications as he thinks fit, to any...surveillance that is neither directed nor intrusive'. The power is intended to afford, if necessary, a statutory basis for the use of other powers which may be found to have fallen outside this Act. The compatibility of this basis with the Convention is questionable, partly because, it is suggested, the legal basis for the powers is so uncertain and so dependent on the exercise of executive power. The term 'such modifications' implies that lesser safeguards than those available for directed surveillance might be adopted, a possibility which would be likely to have Art 8 implications. These matters are considered below.

295 SI 2000/2417.

Confidential information

Certain safeguards relating to the type of information that can be gathered using directed or intrusive surveillance are created, but the relevant rules appear only in the draft Code of Practice, not in the Act itself. Para 2.3 relates to certain types of confidential information: confidential personal information (relating to physical or mental health or to spiritual counselling), matters subject to legal privilege and confidential journalistic material. Under para 2.10, if it is 'possible that a substantial proportion of the material acquired could be confidential material' (emphasis added), applications should be granted 'only in exceptional and compelling circumstances, with full regard to the proportionality issues'. Para 2.8 reminds those granting the authorisation that an undertaking has been given that material subject to the seal of the confessional will not be the subject of operations. General principles apply to confidential material, under para 2.11; they include the requirement to destroy the material 'as soon as it is no longer necessary to retain it for a specified purpose' and to refrain from dissemination of it unless 'an appropriate officer [having sought legal advice] is satisfied that is necessary for a specific purpose'. These rules fail to introduce any independent check into the process even where material is most clearly of a private nature. As far as directed surveillance is concerned, the question of acquiring and using confidential material is subject, in essentials, to the same regime as is available for non-confidential material.

The use and storage of information obtained by surveillance techniques is in general left to be governed by the Code of Practice to be made under s 71, although the Surveillance Commissioners also have power, when quashing authorisations of intrusive surveillance under s 37, to order the destruction of records. At present, storage and retention of police information are governed by a detailed ACPO Code²⁹⁶ which instructs on the applicability of data protection principles to such information. As indicated above, concerns have been raised regarding record keeping by the Security Service, bearing in mind the fact that it does not have to comply with the Data Protection Act 1998, even in its criminal function.²⁹⁷ Under the 1998 Act, in relation to personal information, the police do not have to comply with the fair and lawful processing provisions of the first data protection principle,²⁹⁸ subject access requests, or restrictions on disclosure of personal information, if to do so would be likely to prejudice the prevention and detection of crime or the apprehension and prosecution of offenders. These are not blanket exemptions; they should be considered in their application to individual cases. But it is unclear that careful scrutiny on this basis occurs.²⁹⁹ The RIPA Code of Practice will therefore be of 296 Code of Practice for Data Protection, 1995.

297 See p 604.

298 Except in relation to 'sensitive' data.

299 See the 1998 Justice report (op cit, fn 97) Chapter 4, esp pp 92–95.

significance since it could provide much greater clarity and safeguard a significant aspect of privacy. But, it is argued that such a significant task should not be undertaken by quasi-legislation.³⁰⁰

The oversight role of the Commissioners

The Police Act 1997 set up a complaints system which, apart from the lack of a special tribunal, strongly resembled that under the 1985 Act, considered above. The similarity was the more striking since the system related to ordinary crime, not necessarily to terrorism or other activities, having a potential impact on national security. This model has now been continued under s 62 of the RIPA which adds additional functions to those of the 'Chief Surveillance Commissioner', so that his role mirrors that of the Interceptions of Communications Commissioner. The office of Commissioner under s 91 of the 1997 Act is continued, but the Commissioners are re-designated 'Surveillance Commissioners' and their complaints role will be removed. Assistant Surveillance Commissioners may be appointed under s 63 of the RIPA to aid the Chief Surveillance Commissioner. Such aid will clearly be needed since he will provide oversight, not only of police surveillance, but also of surveillance carried out by all the persons covered by Part II of the RIPA. Thus, the oversight role of the Surveillance Commissioners is broader than their role in relation to authorisations, since the latter relates only to the police and customs, while the former covers other public authorities and the Home Secretary's authorising role under s 41. Thus, the role of the Surveillance Commissioners overlaps with that of the Intelligence Services Commissioner who has an oversight role which, as indicated above, covers, inter alia, surveillance carried out by those services.

Under s 107 of the Police Act 1997, the Chief Commissioner has reporting duties similar to those of the Intelligence Services Commissioner. (His duty under s106, to report to the Prime Minister if an appeal is allowed and where a finding in favour of a complainant is made by a Commissioner, was repealed under Sched 4 of the 2000 Act.) He must make an annual report on the discharge of his functions. The report must be presented to Parliament and published as a Command Paper. The Prime Minister may exclude matters from the report under s 107(4) of the Act if it appears to him that it contains matter 'prejudicial to the prevention and detection of serious crime' or to the discharge of the functions of a police authority, the service authorities for the National Criminal Intelligence Service or the duties of the Commissioner for Customs and Excise.

Closed circuit television

The increasing use by local authorities of closed circuit television as a form of visual surveillance is not regulated by RIPA 2000, Part II. It is not either directed or intrusive surveillance since it is not undertaken for a specific purpose. Section 163 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 clarifies the power of local authorities to install closed circuit cameras for surveillance purposes.³⁰¹ The fact of capturing 300 See Chapter 13, pp 757–58 for analogous discussion in relation to the PACE Codes.

301 See Brentwood Council ex p Peck [1998] CMLR 697, now in the Strasbourg system. For further discussion see Norris, Moran and Armstrong (eds), Surveillance, CCTV and Social Control, 1999.

the image of a person on CCTV may not, in all circumstances, in itself constitute an invasion of privacy, although the mere fact that a person is in a public place should not preclude that possibility.³⁰² Even where it is arguable that an invasion of privacy has not occurred, the use of the information later on may create one.³⁰³

Impact of the HRA

Interference with the guarantees of Art 8

A preliminary question in terms of the Convention requirements might, in this context, concern the status of the individual in question as a victim, where he or she was uncertain whether surveillance had occurred. The Court put forward the following reason in *Klass v federal Republic of Germany*³⁰⁴ for regarding the applicants as 'victims' under Art 25 despite the fact that they were uncertain whether or not their phones had been tapped: '[normally an applicant cannot challenge a law in abstracto...the position is different [when] owing to the secrecy of the measures objected to, he cannot point to any concrete measure specifically affecting him'. Thus the existence of legislation permitting secret measures, including the RIPA and the Police Act 1997, may allow a person to claim to be the victim of a breach of Art 8 although she would also have to show a 'reasonable likelihood that surveillance had occurred'.³⁰⁵ Given that the provisions in the HRA regarding the status of 'victims' rely on the Convention jurisprudence,³⁰⁶ this finding would aid the claim of such a person in the ordinary courts. The remit of the new tribunal under s 65 RIPA, discussed below, might not allow it to consider such a claim, unless it interprets its jurisdiction more widely.

Assuming that there is a reasonable likelihood that surveillance had occurred, a key question for the new tribunal or court would be whether in the particular circumstances it fell within Art 8(1). The extent to which Art 8 provides protection from surveillance outside the home or other living accommodation such as hotel rooms might be considered. The principles at stake are similar to those discussed above in relation to interception: all these forms of surveillance interfere with informational autonomy. But while it is now clearly settled in the Strasbourg jurisprudence that in most circumstances interception (at least in the form of telephone tapping) creates an interference with Art 8 guarantees, this cannot be said with equal certainty of all the diverse forms of surveillance covered by Part II of the RIPA or Part III of the 1997 Act.

However, 'the State [has an obligation] to respect private life by controlling the activities of its agents [in collecting personal information]'.³⁰⁷ It has been indicated that interference with property for surveillance purposes by the security and intelligence services has been found to fall within Art 8.³⁰⁸ Collection and use of 302 See below, pp 704–06.

303 See further the Justice Report, op cit, fn 97, p 31.

304 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

305 G, H and I v UK 15 EHRR CD 41.

306 See Chapter 4, pp 164–65.

307 Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 310.

308 See pp 662–65.

information derived from covert investigative techniques may do so unless the applicant is already involved in criminal activity.³⁰⁹ The acquiring of information represents one form of invasion of informational autonomy; further invasions may occur due to the storage and dissemination of the information. In a number of cases, Strasbourg has found that the collection of information about an individual by the State without his or her consent will, in principle, interfere with the right to respect for private life³¹⁰ and it has contemplated the possibility that compiling and retaining the information will also do so.³¹¹ The use of listening devices has been found to create an interference with the Art 8(1) guarantee.³¹² Systematic or even indirect targeting of an individual is also very likely to involve such an interference.³¹³

The Strasbourg case law suggests that where an interference occurs in an obviously 'private' place, an infringement of the primary right will be found. The extent to which, outside such places, an invasion of privacy might be found in respect of surveillance is a matter which is subject to a developing jurisprudence at Strasbourg and nationally. An individual may expect to retain a degree of privacy in a semi-public environment, such as a restaurant,³¹⁴ gymnasium,³¹⁵ solicitor's office,³¹⁶ pub or shop.³¹⁷ Strasbourg has been prepared to extend the notion of private space beyond obvious places such as the home; as Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick put it: 'it is not enough just for the individual to be himself: he must be able to a substantial degree to keep to himself what he is and what he does...the idea of private space need not be confined to those areas where the person has some exclusive rights of occupancy'.³¹⁸ In this respect, the Strasbourg approach may be developing in a direction which will take it away from the current UK statutory approach: 'the expanding understanding of private life set out in the Niemetz case³¹⁹ indicates that a formal public/private distinction about the nature of the location will not always be decisive.'³²⁰

This identifiable general trend suggests that this is another instance in which the emphasis should be on the evolutive nature of the Convention³²¹ rather than on the outcome of particular applications to the Commission, such as that in X v United Kingdom.³²² The Commission found that the actions of the police in taking and filing photographs without consent of a woman arrested for taking part in a political

309 Ludi v Switzerland A 238 (1992).

310 See: Murray v UK A 300 (1994), paras 84, 85; McVeigh v UK (1981) 25 DR 15, p 49.

311 See G, H and I v UK 15 EHRR CD 41 (application of first and third applicants failed on the basis that they had not shown sufficient likelihood that such compiling or retention had occurred).

312 See Govell v UK (1997) 4 EHRLR 438; Khan v UK Appl No 35394/97 (declared admissible on 20 April 1999) (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58; Judgment of the Court: 8 BHRC 310.

313 Harman and Hewitt v UK (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

314 A situation considered in a decision of the German Supreme Court: BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, pp 322–46.

315 The location where surreptitious photographs were taken of the former Princess of Wales, in HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Newspapers Limited and Others (1993) Transcript, Association of Official Shorthand Writers, 8 November 1993.

316 See Niemetz v FRG A 251-B (1992).

317 See R v Broadcasting Standards Council ex p BBC [2000] 3 WLR 1327.

318 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op cit, fn 307, p 309.

319 Niemetz v FRG A 251-B (1992).

320 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op cit, fn 307, p 309. Niemetz v FRG A 251-B (1992) concerned office premises, making it clear that rights to respect for privacy are not dependent on an interest in property.

321 The Convention must be given an 'evolutive' interpretation (Johnstone v Ireland A 112 (1986), para 53), which takes account of current standards in European society (Tyrer v UK A 26 (1978), para 31). These would be expected to include the presence of privacy laws across Europe.

demonstration disclosed no prima facie breach of Art 8. The reasoning was unclear, but a central factor appeared to be the public and voluntary nature of her activities. The decision has been viewed as out of line with the trend of Art 8 jurisprudence: 'In the opinion of some scholars, the...decision may well be an outdated aberration in the case law of the Strasbourg organs.'³²³

The approach in other jurisdictions may indicate the direction in which the Strasbourg jurisprudence is likely to develop. The German Supreme Court³²⁴ refused to follow the approach of the Appeal Court that privacy 'stopped at the doorstep' and that therefore, no action lay for invasion of privacy in respect of events which had taken place outside the home or other clearly private spaces. The approach indicated was that one may still be entitled to respect for privacy in semi-public places if, as the court put it, it is clear by reference to 'objective criteria' that one wishes to be left alone' so that one can, 'relying on the fact of seclusion, act in a way that [one] would not have done...in public'. In other words, the interest in privacy was clearly distinguished from property interests. The Canadian Criminal Code also reflects such a stance.³²⁵ Thus, it may be argued that public/private distinctions based on location are too simplistic and that a test of a reasonable expectation of privacy or, more broadly still, of control of private information would be more satisfactory.³²⁶ On the basis of such a test, if, for example, one person engages in a whispered exchange with another in an almost empty street, and this exchange is recorded by means of a listening device, it is contended that an invasion of privacy has occurred which may fall within Art 8(1). It may be noted that this test would bring some use of CCTV—where it captures private actions in semi-public or even public places—within Art 8(1).

As Leigh and Lustgarten observe: 'An atmosphere in which people practise self-censorship...is stultifying and fearful... Citizens should be able to assume that unless there are overwhelming reasons to the contrary, their thoughts and feelings will be communicated only to those to whom they choose to utter them.'³²⁷ These comments clearly apply equally to conversations in the street, in a vehicle, in pubs, in hotel rooms. Obviously, there may be circumstances in which it is impossible to speak without expecting to be overheard, as in a crowded train. But in other circumstances, this expectation would depend entirely on the circumstances. In a reasonably quiet street it would be viewed as socially and probably morally unacceptable to approach two persons speaking quietly together with the obvious intention of eavesdropping on their conversation, since the two would have a reasonable expectation of enjoying 323 Bygrave, LA, 'Data protection pursuant to the right to privacy in human rights treaties' (1999) 6(3) IJLTT 247, p 265. Bygrave notes: '...there are good grounds for holding that it ought to be accorded little weight in present and future interpretation of Article 8'. In spite of these comments, however, Bygrave concedes that in the later decision of Friedl v Austria (1995) A 305B (not treated by the Court on the merits due to friendly settlement) 'the Commission laid weight upon the same...kind of factors as those mentioned in X v United Kingdom' (ibid, p 266). See also Stewart-Brady v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 284, in which a claim of an interference with Art 8 rights due to the taking of a photograph was declared inadmissible (although these findings were made in the context of positive State obligations and there was a conflict with Art 10).

322 (1973) Appl No 5877/7216 YBCHE, 328.

324 BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, pp 322–46.

325 Section 487.01(4).

326 The Press Complaints Commission's Code of Practice defines 'private places [as] public or private property where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy'. Such a test was recommended by the Irish Law Reform Commission Consultation Paper: Privacy, Surveillance and Interception, 1996.

327 Op cit, fn 62, p 40.

a degree of privacy. It follows, therefore, that the issue as to whether the respect for private life has been infringed by the secret recording of a communication should be resolved not by reliance on fine distinctions regarding the degrees of 'privacy' to be associated with different locations, but according to the intentions and reasonable expectations of at least one of the parties to it.³²⁸ In other words, a shift in the meaning of 'privacy' would have to occur, one which appears to be in accordance with the notion of informational autonomy as the core privacy value and with changing perception of privacy at Strasbourg. Therefore, there is a sound argument that the use of surveillance devices or techniques in most circumstances will lead to findings that an Interference with the rights to respect for private life and, where appropriate, to the home and correspondence, under Art 8 has occurred.

In accordance with the law

Once it is established that such an interference has occurred, it cannot be justified if it is not in accordance with the law. Until the 1997 Act and then the RIPA 2000, Part II were introduced, the use of various techniques had no sufficient basis in law.³²⁹ Such a basis is now established, but it is questionable whether it is of sufficient quality.³³⁰ The regimes governing the forms of surveillance show dissimilarities, especially between 'intrusive' and 'directed' surveillance. The position regarding the use of intrusive surveillance is broadly the same as that discussed above, in relation to interception, under Part I of the RIPA, since the provisions are equally foreseeable and accessible.³³¹ The same may be said of the regime under s 97 of the 1997 Act.

Bearing in mind the strictness of these requirements in this context, discussed above,³³² it is unclear that the requirement as to quality would be found to be satisfied in respect of certain of these provisions. This may be said in relation to the use of directed surveillance, and of listening devices within the 1997 Act, but outside s 97. The definition of directed surveillance is confusing and imprecise and creates an uncertain divide between directed and intrusive surveillance. Despite such uncertainty, the regime for intrusive surveillance is much stricter. This uncertainty creates, it is suggested, a fundamental flaw in RIPA 2000, Part II, which may mean that it cannot meet the requirement of quality, in that respect. As indicated above, ss 28, 29 and 30 allow the Secretary of State, by order, to make provision regarding 'designated persons', further grounds, and for allowing further bodies to engage in directed surveillance on the very broad grounds under ss 28 and 29. The extent to which, in all these instances, power is placed in executive hands so that it might be exercised in an unpredictable fashion calls into question the quality of the law, even accepting that in some, but not all, of these 328 This proposition finds support from the position in the US. The US Supreme Court has found: 'the Fourth Amendment protects people not places'; the significant issue was not the location of the covert device, but the existence of a reasonable expectation that privacy would be protected (Katz v US (1967) 389 US 347, pp 351–53).

329 See above, pp 690–1 and pp 696–7. See further op cit, fn 97, Chapter 7.

330 As indicated above, Art 8 may not be satisfied merely on the ground that interferences with privacy have a basis in primary legislation. See p 680.

331 See p 680.

332 See pp 680–81.

instances there is a lesser invasion of privacy, calling for less precision.³³³ The accessibility of the law would also be questionable, bearing in mind the opportunities for its extension by executive order, albeit with the approval of Parliament. In respect of all these provisions, the means of keeping a check on their arbitrary use is in doubt due to the failure to include any independent check at all on authorisations of directed surveillance, outside the public authority in question.³³⁴ No judicial or administrative check is necessary, in contrast to the provisions for intrusive surveillance and interception.

Legitimate aims

Assuming that an interference with the Art 8(1) guarantee occurs, which is found, in the particular circumstances which confront a court or the new tribunal, to be in accordance with the law, it must be shown that it had a legitimate aim. The 'legitimate aim' requirement would probably be readily satisfied in respect of intrusive surveillance and the use of surveillance devices under the 1997 Act since the grounds justifying interference under Art 8(2) correspond with the three grounds under s 32(3) of the RIPA and with the 'serious crime' ground under the 1997 Act. This is also probably true of the power to use CCTV under s 163 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

There may be room for argument that certain of the grounds for the use of directed surveillance under s 28(3) are less clearly within para 2 since they cover, inter alia, the purpose of collecting any contribution due to a government department. However, they would probably fall within the 'economic well-being' exception.³³⁵ The possibility is left open of including other grounds, by order of the Secretary of State. Any such further grounds would also have to fall within the para 2 aims. So far, under Art 8(2), the State has always satisfied the legitimate aim requirement.

Necessary in a democratic society

It must further be shown that the interference 'corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued'.³³⁶ In assessing proportionality in relation to the aim of national security, the Court has allowed a very wide margin of appreciation to the State,³³⁷ but it is less wide in relation to the prevention of crime and arguably also in respect of the other grounds. In any event, the margin of appreciation doctrine should be irrelevant in domestic decisions. In terms of the outcomes of applications, Strasbourg has not provided clear guidance on the question of when a pressing social need would be discerned 333 This may be argued by analogy with the findings in Malone v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 14 regarding telephone metering as opposed to interception.

334 In Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433, the Court said: 'in view of the risk that a system of secret surveillance poses...the court must be satisfied that there exist adequate and effective guarantees against abuse' (para 60).

335 MS v Sweden (1999) 28 EHRR 313, para 38.

336 Olsson v Sweden A 130 (1988), para 67.

337 Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433.

in this context. In a number of key cases, including Khan v UK,³³⁸ which concerned the use of a listening device, it was found that the interference had no basis in law.³³⁹ In a further group of cases, it was found that the interference had such a basis and the safeguards available, particularly in the context of national security, were found to be sufficient, taking the margin of appreciation into account.³⁴⁰ But some analogous jurisprudence is available.

As indicated above, it was found in *Klass v FRG*³⁴¹ that judicial or administrative authority for warrants would provide a degree of independent oversight. While the arrangements for intrusive surveillance under the RIPA 2000, Part II or under s 97 of the 1997 Act may meet this requirement, those under s 93 or for directed surveillance might fail to do so since no independent administrative or judicial check is available before the event. In this respect, the contrast with the arrangements for intrusive surveillance is very clear, bearing in mind the fact that directed surveillance is a means of acquiring large amounts of personal information; the only distinction between it and intrusive surveillance may be the quality of the sound or vision—the content of the information may be almost identical. Therefore, the strong distinction created between the two types of surveillance may be unwarranted. In particular, where a person has authorised himself to conduct surveillance, the requirement of independence could be said to be completely abrogated; it is hard to see that in such an instance, it can be said that a check on the requirements of proportionality is in place.

The key criticism of Part II is that a twin-track scheme is created under it whereby a much more rigorous regime is in place for intrusive as opposed to directed surveillance: intrusive surveillance requires authorisation at a higher level within the public authority and at an external level. Directed surveillance requires lower level internal authorisation and no external authorisation—merely review after the event by the Surveillance Commissioner. This markedly different regime leads to the suggestion that the new regime for directed surveillance fails to meet Convention requirements. The general principles espoused at Strasbourg may also be indicative. If it is accepted that informational autonomy lies in the ‘core’ of Art 8, as a value which a democratic society should respect,³⁴² interferences with it by a public authority should receive the strictest scrutiny. Such scrutiny would be of the arrangements for authorisation and their application in the particular instance. Even where the authorisation process itself was found to satisfy Art 8(2), a particular authorisation might be found to allow an interference disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In particular, issues of proportionality might also arise where a listening device placed outside a house provided information of only a marginally lower quality than would be provided were it on the premises. The use of CCTV may be proportionate to the legitimate aim—of preventing crime—pursued, but the lack of regulation of the use of the information obtained may mean that there are insufficient safeguards available.

338 (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

339 Eg, Malone v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 14, Halford v UK [1997] IRLR 471; (1997) 24 EHRR 523.

340 Eg, Christie v UK 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

341 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

342 See Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711, p 731.

Using the HRA

Duties of Commissioners

All the Commissioners should comply with the Convention in relation to their reviewing functions under the 1997 Act and Part II of the RIPA. The position is very similar to that in respect of the Interception of Communications Commissioner, since all the Commissioners are bound by the Convention under s 6 of the HRA and are also providing oversight of bodies which are so bound. The Surveillance Commissioners are providing oversight of police officers and other 'public authorities' using surveillance while the Intelligence Services Commissioner is providing oversight of the Services' activities under the RIPA and the Intelligence Services Act.

Criminal proceedings

Significantly, there is no equivalent in the Police Act or Part II of the RIPA to s 17 in Part I of the RIPA, which, as indicated above, largely disallows reference to interceptions in any court or tribunal proceedings. Clearly, any such provision would be counter-productive in prosecution terms. But this does mean, depending on the extent of disclosure to the defence, that a defendant may become aware at some point during criminal proceedings that a surveillance operation has occurred, and therefore will be able to take any avenues of redress that may be open, including raising Convention arguments in the trial itself.

The issues of exclusion of evidence and of disclosure will be most significant. The duty of disclosure to the defence is restricted under the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 and the residual common law rules on the public interest.³⁴³ The fact that a particular surveillance technique has been used may not be disclosed on the basis that it is 'sensitive' material. Under that Act, the duty of the CPS is to disclose to the defence all material which it considers might undermine the prosecution case, except sensitive material which should not be disclosed in the public interest. The sensitivity of the material may be based on the need to use the technique in question in a future operation. If the prosecutor considers that the material is sensitive, an application to a court for a ruling to protect it on grounds of public interest immunity must be made.³⁴⁴ It can be made ex parte with notice to the defence or, in an exceptional case, without notice. In any such application, a judge, bound by s 6 of the HRA, would have to consider Art 6 requirements in respect of such disclosure.³⁴⁵

If it is clear in criminal proceedings that surveillance has been used in order to obtain evidence against the defendant, the defence could seek to establish that it was unauthorised or improperly authorised or was not covered by Part III of the

343 The 1996 Act, s 21(2).

344 See ss 3(6) and 7(5).

345 These guidelines were provided in Davis, Rowe and Johnson [1993] 1 WLR 613. Now that the use of public interest immunity in that case has been found to breach Art 6 by the Court (Rowe and Davis v UK Appl No 28901/95; [1999] Crim LR 410; judgment of the Court of 16/2/00 (2000) 30 EHRR 1) they will have to be re-examined. The domestic courts will have the opportunity of doing so now that Human Rights Act is [contd]

1997 Act or Part II of the RIPA. The defence could also raise the argument, under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, that therefore a breach of Art 8 had arisen or that, although the surveillance was properly authorised, a breach had nevertheless occurred since, for example, the requirements of proportionality under Art 8(2) had not been met. Assuming that the surveillance was not authorised, it would not be unlawful unless existing tortious liability had arisen and/or the public authority in question had incurred liability under s 6 of the HRA for breaching Art 8. In other words, surveillance which incurs no tortious or criminal liability, but only leads to a breach of Art 8, is unlawful only in the sense that the public authority using it (normally, of course, the police) has failed to abide by its duty under s 6 of the HRA. It should be noted that there is no offence of conducting unauthorised surveillance, in contrast to the position as regards unauthorised interception,³⁴⁶ and, as indicated below, surveillance will not be unlawful solely on the ground that authorisation has not been sought. The court, as itself a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, is bound to offer redress for a breach of Art 8. The public authority using it would also have to provide such redress, but as explained below, owing to s 65 of the RIPA, this argument would usually be raised in the new tribunal where a complainant is seeking a remedy for breach of Art 8. But, in criminal proceedings, the redress sought could include exclusion of evidence. Thus, the defence could argue either that the evidence had been obtained unlawfully since, for example, the police had committed a trespass in obtaining it and had breached Art 8, or that it had been obtained unlawfully due to such a breach alone. In either instance, there might appear to be an argument, which is considered further in Chapter 14, that the evidence obtained should be excluded under s 78 of PACE. However, the courts are likely to be unreceptive to this argument.

The leading case of *Khan (Sultan)*³⁴⁷ on exclusion of evidence obtained by the unlawful use of a listening device would apply, and at present it is clear that the stance taken will be continued in the post-HRA era since it has been re-affirmed by the House of Lords in AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999).³⁴⁸ In Khan, a listening device had been secretly installed on the outside of a house which Khan was visiting. The case against him rested solely on the tape recording obtained. The defence argued, inter alia, that the recording was inadmissible as evidence because the police had no statutory authority to place listening devices on private property and that therefore, such placement was a trespass, and, further, that admission of the recording would breach Art 8. The House of Lords agreed with the Court of fully in force. The findings in the same context in Fitt and Jasper v UK (1999) EHRLR 430 will be relevant. The Court said that in those instances, the judge had been able to consider the sensitive material in question and therefore was able to conduct a balancing act between fairness to the defence and to the prosecution. On that basis, no breach of Art 6 was found. The Davis, Rowe and Johnson guidelines may be compared with those adopted in other countries, particularly those used in Denmark after the Van Traa Inquiry Report (an inquiry which is generally viewed as an especially useful guide to the use of such methods in modern policing) into the use of covert methods, including particularly the use of informers and undercover officers. The new Danish law adopted in response sought to ensure that the trial judge or defence would not be subject to complete non-disclosure of evidence and of investigative methods.

346 Under RIPA 2000, s 1, it is an offence to intercept communications intentionally and without lawful authority.

347 [1996] 3 All ER 289; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024, HL; [1995] QB 27, CA.

348 [2001] 2 WLR 56.

Appeal that the evidence was admissible, relying on the decision in *Sang*³⁴⁹ to the effect that improperly obtained evidence other than ‘involuntary’ confessions is admissible in a criminal trial subject to a narrow discretion under s 78 of PACE to exclude it.³⁵⁰ The decision in Khan not to exclude the evidence was found to accord with Art 6 at Strasbourg.³⁵¹ A Chamber of the Court found that, at the time, the interference with the Art 8 guarantees had no basis in law and therefore a breach of Art 8 was found. This breach was not found to necessitate exclusion of the evidence obtained on the basis that the assessment of evidence is a matter for the national courts, and therefore no breach of Art 6 was found. This issue is discussed further in Chapter 14.³⁵²

Thus, although arguments may be raised in court that Art 8 has been breached in conducting surveillance, it is unlikely that exclusion of any evidence obtained would follow. Thus, use of this avenue as a means of encouraging the police to respect the Art 8 guarantees has been at present almost entirely closed off.

Civil actions

Covert surveillance conducted without an authorisation is not unlawful on that basis alone. The (draft) Code of Practice on Covert Surveillance 2000 made under s 71(3)(a) of the RIPA makes this position explicit in para 2.1: ‘There is no requirement on the part of a public authority to obtain an authorisation for a covert surveillance operation and the decision not to obtain an authorisation would not, of itself, make an action unlawful.’ Intrusive surveillance involving an entry onto property and/or damage to it could be challenged in the ordinary courts since, if unauthorised, its use will amount to a crime or tort. Where directed, surveillance involves an entry on to non-residential premises or damage to them such actions would also be available.

Other forms of surveillance may breach Art 8, but will not be trespassory or attract any criminal liability. In such circumstance a complainant might, theoretically, have a remedy under the doctrine of confidence, assuming that some information was obtained and was used in some manner.³⁵³ But, in such cases, the State body in question would normally be able to argue that the public interest defence applied.³⁵⁴ Any court adjudicating on an action in confidence or trespass in this context would be bound by s 6 of the HRA to ensure that the Convention rights were complied with,³⁵⁵ but the action would be based on the pre-existing common law, rather than on s 7(1)(a).³⁵⁶ Where surveillance attracts no existing criminal or civil liability, the position is more complex. The bodies or persons authorising and

349 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

350 See Chapter 14, p 892.

351 Khan v UK Appl No 35394/97 (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58, Judgment of the Court (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

352 Pages 903–06.

353 See Chapter 10, pp 565–93.

354 This defence succeeded in Hellewell [1995] 1 WLR 804 in respect of unauthorised police use of a photograph of the defendant, who had been convicted of theft from shops, as part of a shopwatch scheme.

355 See Chapter 4, p 157.

356 The process of infusion of the rights into the common law may lead to the creation of new torts or at least a stretching of the boundaries of the old ones. See the comments of Sedley LJ in Douglas and Others v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992, Chapter 10, p 582.

undertaking covert surveillance are all public authorities under s 6 of the HRA and therefore an action for breach of Art 8 could be brought against them under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA³⁵⁷ where covert surveillance occurred but was not authorised, or improperly authorised, or properly authorised, but nevertheless in breach of Art 8. A s 7(1)(a) action, however, against the bodies most likely to use surveillance, in particular the police,³⁵⁸ would have to be brought in the new tribunal set up under Part IV of the RIPA due to the provision of s 65(2)(a) of the RIPA, which is discussed below. Thus, in most circumstances a tort action in direct reliance on Art 8 would not be open.

It should be noted that persons engaged in all forms of surveillance under Part II are exempted from civil liability under s 27(2) in respect of conduct ‘incidental’ to authorised conduct and—in an opaquely worded provision—in relation to conduct to which the warrant or authorisation procedure under a ‘relevant’ Act³⁵⁹ is inapplicable (not capable of being granted) and where it would not reasonably be expected to have been sought. This appears to cover forms of surveillance engaged in by public authorities which have no statutory basis and which, but for s 27(2), might attract liability under existing torts or under s 7 of the HRA in respect of a breach of Art 8. Since s 27(2) could, potentially, prevent a court from discharging its duty under s 6 of the HRA there is a case for suggesting that courts should restrict its ambit by using s 3 of the HRA to interpret the term ‘reasonably’ restrictively.

Actions under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA

The public authorities using forms of surveillance and authorising officers within the authorities are all, by definition,³⁶⁰ subject to the Convention under s 6 of the HRA. The possibility of challenging decisions of such public authorities, as opposed to those of Commissioners, under s 7(1)(a), might appear to be available. However, s 65 of the RIPA stands in the way of Convention-based actions in the ordinary courts. Under s 65(2), the new tribunal will be the appropriate forum for the purposes of s 7(1)(a) of the HRA in relation to certain proceedings. These proceedings are indicated in ss 65(3) and (5). In essence, these provisions mean that s 65 stands in the way of challenges to actions of the security and intelligence services, or persons acting on their behalf, based on s 6 of the HRA (since s 7(1)(a) of the HRA is intended to provide for the bringing of proceedings where a public authority has acted unlawfully under s 6). Section 65(5) and (6) also bar the way to 357 Under s 7(1)(a) ‘a person who claims that a public authority has acted (or proposes to act) in a way that is made unlawful under s 6(1) may bring proceedings against the authority in the appropriate tribunal...’. Under s 6(1) ‘It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right [unless the proviso of s 6(2) applies].’

358 Section 65(6) provides: ‘for the purposes only of subsection (3), conduct to which Part II applies, an entry on or interference with property or an interference with wireless telegraphy is not conduct falling within sub-s (5) ‘unless it is conduct by or on behalf of a person holding any office, rank or position with (a) any of the intelligence services; (b) any of Her Majesty’s forces; (c) any police force; (d) the National Criminal Intelligence Service; (e) the National Crime Squad; or (f) the Commissioners of Customs and Excise...’.

359 RIPA 2000; Intelligence Services Act 1994, s 5; Police Act 1997, Part III.

360 Section 81(1) provides that ‘public authority’ has the meaning given it by the HRA 1998, s 6.

actions in the ordinary courts under s 7(1)(a) against the police, intelligence services, Customs and Excise, NCIS and the National Crime Squad in respect of surveillance under Part II of the RIPA or s 93 of the 1997 Act, which raises Convention issues under s 6 of the HRA. These s 7(1)(a) actions must be brought only in the new tribunal.

Judicial review

Scrutiny of the Commissioners' oversight function in the ordinary courts appears to be precluded. The 1997 Act contains an ouster clause in s 91(10) which is very similar to that contained in the Interception of Communications Act 1985. It provides: 'The decisions of the Chief Commissioner or...any other Commissioner (including decisions as to his jurisdiction) shall not be subject to appeal or liable to be questioned in any court'. The inclusion of 'decisions as to his jurisdiction' was, of course, intended to make the Commissioners' decisions unreviewable. This ouster clause was not repealed by the RIPA, but it now no longer relates to the Commissioners' complaints' role, which was removed under s 70(2)(c) of that Act.³⁶¹

Section 65 does not prevent challenges by way of judicial review or civil actions against public authorities other than the police or the intelligence and security services or other bodies listed in s 65(6) relating to surveillance.³⁶² Also, judicial review of decisions of those bodies listed could be sought without relying on s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. Any possibilities of bringing judicial review against the police or intelligence services which existed in the pre-HRA era still exist, due to s 11 of the HRA, so long as such possibilities do not depend on using s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. The ironic possibility arises, in relation to surveillance, that the development of judicial review taking Art 8 into account, as in the pre-HRA era,³⁶³ might be more far-reaching and of greater significance than such development in reliance on s 7(1)(a), despite the fact that the review would be less intensive.³⁶⁴

Section 66 leaves open the possibility that the remaining jurisdiction of the ordinary courts in relation to surveillance (and, if necessary, to interception) will be partially ousted, by executive order, in providing: 'An order under section 65(2)(d) allocating proceedings to the Tribunal may (a) provide for the Tribunal to exercise jurisdiction in relation to that matter to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of any court or tribunal; but (b) if it does so provide, must contain provision conferring a power on the Tribunal, in the circumstances provided for in the order, to remit the proceedings to the court or tribunal which would have had jurisdiction apart from the order.' In other words, an avenue to court action would be left open if this course was taken in future.

361 Sections 106, 107(6) and Sched 7 of the 1997 Act will be repealed under the RIPA 2000.

362 This is of significance where, eg, a public authority not yet brought within the RIPA 2000, Part II used surveillance without falling within any existing liability, or where this occurred and the public authority, although within the Act, fell outside those listed in s 65(6).

363 See Chapter 3, pp 108–10.

364 See Chapter 4, pp 170–01.

Conclusions

The upshot, then, is that challenges by way of judicial review or tortious actions remain available against some public authorities, whether or not it is argued that the authority has breached s 6 of the HRA. Actions against the police or intelligence services in relation to surveillance operations, based on ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the HRA, will have to be brought in the new tribunal only because of s 65 of the RIPA. It is notable that court action was not ruled out expressly under the Security Services Act 1989, the Intelligence Services Act 1994 or the Police Act 1997, although it was—in effect—under s 9 of the 1985 Act. In providing for complaint to be made to the old tribunal, s 5 of the 1989 Act and s 9 of the 1994 Act implied that complaint could not be made to a court. The same could be said of the Commissioner mechanism under the 1997 Act. But the provisions did not expressly exclude the jurisdiction of the courts since otherwise, the agencies would then have been placed, in effect, above the law. Section 65 does not exclude the courts' jurisdiction regarding surveillance by the police and intelligence services except in relation to breach of the Convention rights. Therefore, one purpose of the RIPA is to insulate all surveillance undertaken by the intelligence services, and much of that undertaken by the police, from the effects of the HRA, applied in the ordinary courts, except within prosecutions.

6 THE NEW TRIBUNAL

Introduction

This new tribunal, set up under s 65 of the RIPA,³⁶⁵ has taken over from the Interception of Communications Tribunal and the Intelligence and Security Services Tribunals; it has also taken over the complaints role of the Commissioners set up under Part III of the 1997 Act.

It may be noted initially that in practice, applications to the tribunal will not be frequent since, as noted above, an individual has normally no means of knowing that an interception or surveillance has occurred; in contrast to the position in Germany³⁶⁶ or Denmark,³⁶⁷ the police and the other State agencies have no duty to inform him or her of the interception, after it is over. This position is contrary to the recommendation of the Data Protection Working Party for the European Commission which said in May 1999 that a 'person under surveillance [should] be 365 Schedule 3 governs the membership of the new tribunal. Members, who are appointed for five years by the Lord Chancellor on behalf of the Queen, must have held 'high judicial office' or have a 10 year general qualification within the meaning of s 71 of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990; in Scotland and Northern Ireland they must be practitioners of at least 10 years' standing. Thus, they need not be judges, although the President must be a judge. Its members will be remunerated by the Secretary of State, but can be removed from office only on an address to the Queen by both Houses of Parliament under Sched 3, para 1(5). These arrangements afford the tribunal a measure of independence from the executive.

366 See Klass v Federal Republic of Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214. Germany's new bugging law contains this requirement.

367 Criminal Procedure Code, para 788.

informed of this as soon as possible'.³⁶⁸ An individual will therefore normally be able to bring complaints or proceedings to the new tribunal only if she has become aware of the surveillance due to criminal proceedings. Section 17 of the RIPA will normally prevent this occurring in respect of interception and therefore complaints regarding interception are likely to be very rare. Police officers or other State agents who are aware that improperly authorised or unauthorised interception is occurring have no means of complaining to the new tribunal or the Commissioners.³⁶⁹ Section 4(3) of the Official Secrets Act 1989, as amended by the 2000 Act,³⁷⁰ is also available to punish such disclosures.

A further limitation is placed on complaints relating to interceptions. Section 67(5) provides that unless the tribunal in the circumstances considers it 'equitable' to do so, such complaints will not be considered if made more than one year after the conduct in question took place. Otherwise, conduct under s 65(5) can be considered whenever it occurred. Thus, pre-commencement surveillance can be brought before the tribunal.

Jurisdiction

Under s 65(2), the new tribunal will have three main functions and a potential fourth one. First, challenges to surveillance on Convention grounds by certain bodies or to interception by all bodies must be brought within it. In the words of the subsection, 'it will be the only appropriate tribunal for the purposes of section 7 of the HRA 1998 in relation to any proceedings under subsection (1)(a) of that section (proceedings for actions incompatible with Convention rights) which fall within sub-section 3 of this section'. Under s 65(3), they are proceedings against any of the intelligence services '...or against any other person in respect of any conduct, or proposed conduct, by or on behalf of any of those services' or 'relating to the taking place in any challengeable circumstances of any conduct falling within subsection (5)'.

Section 65(5) applies to 'conduct...(whenever it occurred) by or on behalf of any of the intelligence services; in connection with the interception of communications in the course of their transmission by means of a postal service or telecommunication system'; conduct to which... Part II applies, any entry on or interference with property or any interference with wireless telegraphy'. Section 65(6) introduces a significant limitation in providing: 'for the purposes only of subsection (3)', conduct to which Part II applies, an entry on or interference with property or an interference with wireless telegraphy is not conduct falling within sub-s (5) 'unless it is conduct by or on behalf of a person holding any office, rank or position with (a) any of the intelligence services; (b) any of Her Majesty's forces; (c) any police force; (d) the National Criminal Intelligence Service; (e) the National Crime Squad; or (f) the Commissioners of Customs and Excise...'. In other words, as indicated above, the 368 See Statewatch (1999) Vol 9 Nos 3 and 4. The UK is the only Member State to have entered a derogation to Principle 2(2) of the Council of Europe Recommendation on the use of data in the police sector R(87)15.

369 Under RIPA 2000, s 19(4), any such disclosure would be an offence punishable on indictment by a maximum term of five years' imprisonment: s 19(4)(a).

370 Schedule 4, para 5.

intention is that surveillance by these bodies can be challenged only in the tribunal where it is argued that they have breached a Convention right.

Secondly, the tribunal is the appropriate forum for complaints if, under s 65(4), 'it is a complaint by a person who is aggrieved by any conduct falling within subsection (5) which he believes to have taken place in relation to him, to any of his property, to any communications sent by or to him, or intended for him, or to his use of any postal service, telecommunications service or telecommunication system; and to have taken place in challengeable circumstances or to have been carried out by or on behalf of any of the intelligence services'. Sections 65(7) and (8) apply in relation to both ss 65(3) and (4). Section 65(7) defines 'challengeable circumstances' as conduct which '(a) takes place with the authority, or purported authority, of anything falling within subsection (8); or (b) the circumstances are such that (whether or not there is such authority) it would not have been appropriate for the conduct to take place without it, or at least without proper consideration having been given to whether such authority should be sought'.

Thus, in its complaints and 'proceedings' jurisdiction, the tribunal can consider unauthorised interception. In relation to complaints, the term used under s 67(3)(b) is 'investigate the authority' which does not appear to confine the tribunal, bearing in mind the meaning of challengeable circumstances', to merely considering whether the authority (if it exists) was properly given. Section 65(8) covers: interception warrants under the Acts of 1985 or 2000, an authorisation under Part II of the 2000 Act, a permission of the Secretary of State under Sched 2 (relating to powers to obtain data protected by encryption), or an authorisation under s 93 of the Police Act 1997.

Thirdly, the tribunal has jurisdiction (s 65(2)(c)) to determine a reference to them by a person that he has suffered detriment as a consequence 'of any prohibition or restriction' under s 17 (the exclusion of evidence section) on his relying on any matter in, or for the purposes of, civil proceedings. It is notable that no means is provided of seeking redress for detriment arising when evidence is excluded in criminal proceedings.³⁷¹ Finally, under s 65(2)(d), the Secretary of State can also, by order, allocate other proceedings to the tribunal but a draft of the order must have been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.³⁷²

Procedure

The new tribunal is modelled on the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC)³⁷³ which in turn provided the model for the new tribunal set up under the Northern Ireland Act 1998.³⁷⁴ The Investigatory Powers Tribunal Rules³⁷⁵ came into force on the same date as the HRA—2 October 2000. Under s 68, the tribunal is entitled to determine its own procedure, subject to these rules. The new rules follow 371 See R v Preston [1993] 4 All ER 638 (above, p 686) in which the appellants may have suffered detriment due to the exclusion of material derived from phone tapping under the predecessor of s 17, s 9 of the 1985 Act.

372 Section 66(3).

373 Set up under s 1 of the Special Immigration Appeals Act 1997 in response to the findings in Chahal v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 413.

374 Under s 90. See also Chapter 15, pp 954–56.

375 SI 2000/2665.

the old practices in various respects. Hearings will be secret.³⁷⁶ The Rules envisage the possibility of an oral hearing, but there is no right to such a hearing.³⁷⁷ The Rules allow for the possibility of separate oral hearings; the applicant and the representatives of the public authority will not confront each other.³⁷⁸ Under s 68(6) and (7)(i) 'every person by whom or on whose application there has been granted any authorisation under Part II...must disclose or provide to the Tribunal all such documents and information as the tribunal may require [in the exercise inter alia of its jurisdiction under s 65(2)(a)]'. But information given at the separate hearing can be withheld from the applicant unless the person providing it consents to its disclosure.³⁷⁹

The new tribunal, like the old one, will merely report its conclusion; it cannot report the reason for the decision.³⁸⁰ If it finds that no warrant or authorisation exists and that apparently no surveillance or interception is occurring, or that proper authorisation occurred, it will merely inform the complainant that the complaint has not been upheld. The complainant who suspects, for example, that his or her phone or e-mails are being tapped is then left not knowing whether in fact tapping is occurring. But, if the complaint is upheld, she will know that tapping was occurring but unauthorised. This is, at least theoretically, an improvement on the old position since the fact that a complaint was not upheld could mean that unauthorised tapping was occurring. For example, on 6 December 1991, Alison Halford complained to the Interception of Communications Tribunal in respect of the suspected tapping of her home and office telephones.³⁸¹ From the circumstances, it appeared that tapping was probably occurring. She was informed on 21 February 1992, without any reason given, that the complaint had not been upheld: no contravention of ss 2–5 of the Act had been found. It later confirmed by letter that it could not specify whether any interception had in fact taken place. She was left in ignorance as to whether an intercept had indeed been authorised, whether one was in place, although unauthorised, or whether no interception was occurring.³⁸² Had it been authorised it is inconceivable, bearing in mind the circumstances, for it to have been authorised properly.

376 Rule 9(6): 'The Tribunal's proceedings, including any oral hearings, shall be conducted in private.'

377 Rule 9(2): 'The Tribunal shall be under no duty to hold oral hearings but may do so in accordance with this rule (and not otherwise).' Rule 9(3): 'The Tribunal may hold oral hearings at which the complainant may make representations, give evidence and call witnesses.'

378 Rule 9(4): 'The Tribunal may hold separate oral hearings which the person whose conduct is the subject of the complaint, the public authority against whom s 7 proceedings are brought...may be required to attend and at which that person or authority may make representations, give evidence and call witnesses' (emphasis added).

379 Under Rule 2, the tribunal may not disclose to the complainant or any other person any information disclosed or provided to the tribunal in the course of [an oral hearing] without the consent of the person who provided it.

380 The 2000 Act, s 68(4). This matter was covered by the 1985 Act, s 7(4)(1) and Sched 1, para 4(2).

381 See the facts of Halford v UK[1997] IRLR 471; (1997) 24 EHRR 523, p 679 above.

382 Lord Nolan, the current Commissioner, has defended the failure to inform complainants as to whether an intercept has occurred on this basis: 'If the tribunal were able to tell a complainant that he or she had not been the subject of legitimate interception, silence or any equivocal answer on another occasion might be interpreted as an implication that interception had taken place. Furthermore a positive answer would allow criminals or terrorists to know whether they were subject to interception or not.' (Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act 1998, Cm 4364, published June 1999, p 2, para 13 and p 11).

In its 'proceedings' under s 65(2)(a), the tribunal uses 'the principles applicable by a court on an application for judicial review'. Under the HRA it should therefore apply the principles a court bound by s 6 of the HRA would apply on such an application. The proportionality requirements under the RIPA should be strictly scrutinised. But one problem is, as Leigh and Lustgarten have argued, that the procedure may be unsuitable as a means of conducting such scrutiny due to its inefficacy in a fact finding role.³⁸³ Clearly, this problem is likely to be exacerbated by the non-disclosure of relevant information.

So it appears likely that the determinations of the new tribunal will be as secretive as those of the old and the position of the complainant equally weak. Clearly, the difficulty with tribunals of this nature is that they may seek to give the appearance of adversarial proceedings, but the limitations under which they operate, which severely curtail opportunities of challenging evidence, undermine the potential benefits of such proceedings.³⁸⁴

Remedies

The remedial powers of the new tribunal will be similar to those of the old.³⁸⁵ Under s 67(7), 'the Tribunal...shall have power to make any such award of compensation or other order as they think fit; [subject to the power of the Secretary of State to make rules under section 69(2)(h)]...and...may make an order quashing or cancelling any warrant or authorisation; and an order requiring the destruction of any records of information which has been obtained in exercise of any power conferred by a warrant or authorisation; or is held by any public authority in relation to any person' (subject to s 69 orders). Thus the award of remedies continues to be discretionary; the successful complainant or applicant could be left remediless. The tribunal will not have the power to make a declaration of incompatibility.³⁸⁶ If the new tribunal finds in favour of an applicant, a report would not automatically go to the Prime Minister under s 68(5); it would do so only if the Secretary of State bore some responsibility in the matter.

Recourse to the courts from the tribunal

At present, the RIPA seeks to make it impossible for a member of the public who is dissatisfied with the outcome of the tribunal procedure to seek a remedy in the courts. The Act, like the 1985, 1989, 1994 and 1997 Acts, contains a post-Anisminic ouster clause. Section 67(8) provides: 'Except to such extent as the Secretary of State may by order otherwise provide, determinations, awards, orders and other decisions of the tribunal (including decisions as to whether they have jurisdiction) shall not be subject to appeal or be liable to be questioned in any court.' This leaves open the 383 See p 54. See Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 158 CLJ 509.

384 See Walker, op cit, fn 13, p 82; he advocates an inquisitorial system for such tribunals; see also White [1999] PL 413, discussing the new tribunal set up under the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

385 Under the 1985 Act, s 7(5), the tribunal could order quashing of the warrant, destruction of material obtained and payment of compensation to the victim.

386 See the HRA 1998, s 4(5), discussed in Chapter 4, p 149.

possibility that a tribunal or other body might be established to hear appeals.³⁸⁷ Under s 67(9), the Secretary of State is under a duty to establish such a body to hear appeals relating to the exercise of the tribunal's jurisdiction under s 65(2)(c) or (d), but not, significantly, in relation to the broader and much more important jurisdiction under s 65(2)(a) or (b).

The upshot is, at present, that the citizen cannot challenge a finding as to interception rather than surveillance outside the tribunal since both s 17 and s 67(8) stand in the way of so doing. A citizen seeking to challenge a tribunal decision in respect of surveillance would be unaffected by s 17, but would have to seek to circumvent s 67(8).

Under s 3 of the HRA it is conceivable that s 67(8) could be interpreted in an application for leave under Order 53³⁸⁸ in accordance with the Convention in such a way as to allow review. The argument for seeking to circumvent s 67(8) would depend upon the extent to which the tribunal appeared to meet Convention requirements, considered below. The courts have not so far circumvented such post-Anisminic³⁸⁹ clauses. It could be argued that the wording of s 67(8) cannot be intended to be taken literally. The courts could rely on Anisminic itself in seeking to satisfy s 6 of the HRA, in that since the word 'decision' is used in relation to tribunal findings themselves, and in relation to its jurisdiction, the argument is open that any decision tainted by an error of law is a nullity; and therefore the ouster clause cannot bite on it.

Since the tribunal can determine its own jurisdiction under s 67(8), and it is bound by s 6 of the HRA, argument could also be raised before it that, at least in respect of the circumstances of certain claims, it does not provide a fair hearing under Art 6, due inter alia to orders made under s 69, and that therefore its duty under s 6 requires it to declare that its jurisdiction does not cover such claims. If the tribunal is unreceptive to such claims, which is, of course, likely, they may eventually have to be raised at Strasbourg.

The influence of the HRA

The tribunal is bound by all the rights, including Art 6, under s 6 of the HRA, but Art 6 will apply only if the tribunal hearings are within its field of application. The proceedings or determination of complaints in the new tribunal might be viewed as the 'determination of civil rights and obligations' under Art 6(1). The term 'civil' has, however, been taken to mean that these are rights in private rather than public law,³⁹⁰ although it has been argued that: 'Recent jurisprudence by which more and more rights and obligations have been brought within Art 6, is not easy to explain in terms of any distinction between private and public law which is found in European national law'.³⁹¹

387 Section 67(8) by an Order of the Secretary of State.

388 Of the Rules of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court Act 1981, s 31.

389 In Anisminic v Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 AC 147 the House of Lords refused to accept that the jurisdiction of the courts was entirely ousted on the basis that the Commission had acted outside its powers. Therefore, it had not made a determination; it had made a purported determination—ie, a nullity. The ouster clause under the RIPA seeks to avoid this possibility, since it provides that the jurisdiction of the tribunal cannot be questioned in any court.

390 Ringeisen v Austria A 13 (1971), para 94.

391 Harris, O'Boyle, Warbrick, op cit, fn 307, pp 174–75.

In its proceedings, it will be likely to inquire into breaches of Art 8, which represents a right binding on public authorities, including the agencies, under s 6 of the HRA. At Strasbourg, that in itself would not be sufficient to engage Art 6, while domestically, the guarantees may be viewed as operating in public law only, in which case Art 6 would not apply. On the other hand, certain of the rights claimed are private law rights, since where authorisation is not given, existing tortious liability may arise.³⁹² The term 'civil' has an autonomous Convention meaning and therefore cannot merely be assigned the meaning of 'private' as understood in UK administrative law. Whether a breach of the RIPA, which gives rise to liability only under Art 8, could be viewed as a matter of private law is debatable, although Strasbourg may be moving towards a position in which 'all those rights which are individual rights under the national legal system and fall into the sphere of general freedom... must be seen as civil rights'.³⁹³ Where it could be argued that breach of the RIPA did not give rise to liability under Art 8,³⁹⁴ which may be the case in relation to some use of covert human sources, this question would be even more problematic.³⁹⁵

The better view is, it is contended, that the tribunal is bound by Art 6, at least in relation to its 'proceedings' jurisdiction, in which it is acting in a more judicial manner. It has potentially a pivotal role in upholding Convention rights in the face of the most significant assertions of State power. It would therefore be contrary to its role to find that it itself was not bound by the key due process guarantee. From a domestic standpoint, it would be anomalous in the extreme if were not so bound, bearing in mind its role in satisfying s 7(1)(a) of the HRA in respect of the obligations of a wide range of bodies, including, in particular, the police, under the RIPA. Whether it is within the field of application of Art 6 will be a matter which, initially, will be raised before the tribunal itself. If it considers that it is adjudicating on a public law matter, and is therefore outside Art 6, the matter will no doubt be raised at Strasbourg eventually.

Assuming that the tribunal is covered by Art 6(1) or, under the development of the Strasbourg jurisprudence may be found to be so covered in future, it is hard to see that it meets the Art 6 fair hearing requirements, bearing in mind the procedure it may follow, indicated above, since the complainant or applicant may be in such a weak position before it. As Chapter 2 indicated, since Art 6(3) contains minimum guarantees, the para 1 protection of a fair hearing goes beyond para 3.³⁹⁶ In investigating a fair hearing, the domestic authorities are not confined to the para 3 guarantees; they can consider further requirements of fairness. If consideration is given to the procedures in question, it is apparent that, apart from any of the other requirements of fairness, the minimal safeguards of Art 6(3) may not be satisfied. In particular, as indicated above, the power to limit or prevent cross-examination, 392 See Golder v UK A 18 (1975).

393 Bentham v UK B 80 (1983), para 10, dissenting opinions of Mr Melchior and Mr Frowen.

394 See above, pp 703–06, for discussion as to invasions of privacy which are likely to engage Art 8.

395 But see Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393, in which it was found that although, strictly speaking, there was no legal basis for the action and so no dispute to trigger Art 6, Art 6 applied to blanket immunities preventing access to a court.

396 See p 58.

or exclude the applicant³⁹⁷ or her legal representative, or limit disclosure of evidence, may not comply with Art 6(1) or (3).³⁹⁸

As indicated, the tribunal will apply the principles of judicial review in its adjudications, which will include considering proportionality, since it is bound by s 6 of the HRA, and Art 8(2) requires such consideration. The problem will be, as Chapter 4 indicated, that in order to consider proportionality the tribunal may need to evaluate a number of factual matters. But it is bound, as indicated, by subordinate legislation and may have no discretion as to requiring cross-examination or disclosure of documents. Thus, the procedural limitations under which it operates may place even greater difficulties in its path in considering issues of proportionality than there would be in an ordinary court, in judicial review proceedings. If it therefore operates a very light touch' review, based in effect on Wednesbury unreasonableness, it will fail to satisfy the demands of Art 13, as recently interpreted at Strasbourg³⁹⁹ and therefore a fortiori it will not satisfy Art 6. This will depend on its interpretation of the requirements of judicial review: under the HRA the use of judicial review principles by the tribunal should now include consideration of compliance with the Convention rights and therefore a more intensive review. If, despite the constraints it is under, it operates such review, at least in instances in which national security is not in issue, Art 13 may now be satisfied.⁴⁰⁰ Its inability to give reasons or to take a binding decision may not render it ineffective.⁴⁰¹

Following Tinnelly v UK,⁴⁰² if it is argued that documents or sources cannot be disclosed on grounds of national security or the prevention of crime under Art 8(2), the applicant could argue that the Art 6 requirements override such a claim. The success of such an argument would depend upon the particular circumstances of a claim and in particular the ground under the RIPA in question since, as the Court found in Tinnelly, proportionality should be found between the infringement of the rights of the claimant and the aim in question. Where the aim concerns, for example, one of the 'economic' grounds founding directed surveillance under the RIPA, the claim of the State would be less pressing and the question of proportionality should be more intensively scrutinised. If this was impossible due to the procedural constraints, the applicant could claim that the tribunal should consider whether its duty under s 6 of the HRA requires it to disapply the subordinate legislation in question, and conduct, in such circumstances, a more intensive inquiry. This possibility would be open to it since s 6(2)(b) of the HRA does not apply in respect of subordinate legislation, while it cannot be said that s 69

397 See, on this point, Zana v Turkey (1997) 27 EHRR 667, in which, in the context of terrorism, the applicant was not allowed to be present at the trial; a breach of Art 6 was found on this basis.

398 See further Chapter 14, pp 900–02.

399 Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493. The domestic court found that the continuance of the ban on homosexuals in the armed forces was not beyond the range of responses which was open to a reasonable decision maker. The Strasbourg Court considered that the threshold at which the domestic court could find the policy irrational was set so high that it effectively precluded consideration of the proportionality of the ban with the aim in view. Therefore judicial review was not found to satisfy the requirements of Art 13. The findings in Smith and Grady v UK on this point marked a departure from the stance preciously taken: see Soaring v UK A 161 (1989). See also Esbester v UK 18 EHRR CD 72, on this point.

400 See further Chapter 2, pp 83–85 and Chapter 4, p 135.

401 Esbester v UK 18 EHRR CD 72.

402 (1998) 27 EHRR 249.

of the RIPA, which only provides that the Secretary of State may make the orders in question, requires the tribunal to depart from Art 6.

In respect of the national security ground under the RIPA, the tribunal may take the view that it cannot consider the documents in question or other relevant matters in order to make a finding as to proportionality. In Balfour v foreign and Commonwealth Office,⁴⁰³ the court found that once an actual or potential risk to national security had been demonstrated by a public interest immunity certificate, the court should not exercise its right to inspect the documents. This view of national security as the exclusive domain of the executive was not adhered to in the robust approach taken to the concept in the context of deportation by the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (on which the new tribunal is partially modelled) in the case of Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman.⁴⁰⁴ However, the Court of Appeal overturned their ruling, finding that the threat to national security was for the government to determine and that it should be broadly defined to include the possibility of future threats, including those to the UK's 'allies'. The House of Lords confirmed that finding.⁴⁰⁵

These findings are not, it is argued, fully in accordance with the findings of the Strasbourg Court in Tinnelly or in Chahal v UK.⁴⁰⁶ Both, particularly Tinnelly, took the view that the threat to national security should be demonstrated. Where Art 13, as opposed to Art 6, was in question, as in Chahal, the requirements thereby placed on the State would be weaker, since Art 13 must be read with Art 8(2).⁴⁰⁷ But where Art 6 is engaged, as indicated, the requirements would be stricter. The tribunal may be placed in the difficult position of choosing between the domestic and the Strasbourg jurisprudence as to the stance it should take in respect of assertions of national security considerations. If so, the way would be open, under s 3 of the HRA, to depart from the former.

As indicated above, it could also be argued before the Tribunal (or, if necessary, at Strasbourg) that it ought to provide an effective remedy under Art 13. It may be noted that in *Khan v UK*⁴⁰⁸ the Court found that exclusion of evidence under s 78 of PACE would not provide such a remedy,⁴⁰⁹ so it must be provided—in respect of the surveillance of a number of public authorities—only in the tribunal. This is clear since ss 7 and 8 of the HRA are intended to take the place of Art 13 domestically and the tribunal is the 'appropriate forum' for s 7(1)(a) purposes. In Khan v UK, which also critiqued police disciplinary procedures, it was found that the procedures failed to meet Art 13 standards due to the influence of the Home Secretary. Although the arrangements for the new tribunal differ,⁴¹⁰ the strong influence of the Home Secretary in determining the procedure to be followed might be said to impair the tribunal's independence.

403 [1994] 2 All ER 588.

404 [1999] INLR 517.

405 [2001] 3 WLR 877, HL; [2000] 3 All ER 778, CA; for comment see Ryder [2000] J Civ Lib 358.

406 (1998) 27 EHRR 249 (in the context of Art 13).

407 Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433.

408 (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

409 Paragraph 44.

410 See fn 365.

The tribunal should play a part in providing an aggregate of remedies which, combined, would provide an effective remedy,⁴¹¹ but the other potential remedies, such as raising complaints with an MP, are too ineffective to make much contribution. In Harman and Hewitt v UK,⁴¹² a breach of Art 13 was found on the basis of the lack of an effective remedy. The 1989 Act was precisely intended to address this failure by creating the oversight mechanisms. In Christie v UK,⁴¹³ the Commission avoided the question whether the Interception of Communications Tribunal had provided an effective remedy since it found that the applicant did not have an 'arguable case' and that therefore Art 13 was inapplicable.⁴¹⁴ However, it found that it did provide such a remedy 'in principle'.⁴¹⁵

In Govell v UK,⁴¹⁶ the use of a bugging device was the subject of an unsuccessful police complaint. The Commission found that the police investigative system did not meet the requisite standards of independence under Art 13 since, inter alia, the Home Secretary appointed and remunerated members of the Police Complaints Authority and the Home Secretary had a guiding role in determining the withdrawal of charges. In Chahal v UK, the Advisory Panel on deportation decisions was not found to satisfy Art 13 since it failed to offer sufficient safeguards for Art 13 purposes. The Court said that the remedy offered should be 'as effective as it can be' given the need, in the context in question, to rely on secret sources. In relation to the new tribunal, it might be argued that the Orders made by the Secretary of State may reduce its efficacy to the point where it no longer satisfies Art 13. While the tribunal's adjudications may appear adversarial in a superficial sense, the position of the applicant may be so weakened by the procedural limitations under which it operates that it cannot be said to be effective.

Unless a means of appeal from the tribunal is created in relation to its jurisdiction under s 65(2)(a), there will be no clear independent domestic means of determining whether the tribunal offers an effective remedy and whether it should abide by Art 6, which does not require that a court to which to appeal should be available. But it could be argued that Art 6 itself requires that the question of its own field of application should be able to be raised before an independent body.⁴¹⁷ While the Strasbourg jurisprudence would probably not support such an argument at present, it could be argued—somewhat less boldly—that Art 6 requires that the question whether a particular body provides an effective remedy under Art 13 should be able to be raised before an independent body and not merely in the disputed body itself. In principle, this is a strong argument, bearing in mind the fact that the new tribunal will be, in most circumstances arising under the Intelligence Services Act 1994, the Police Act 1997 and the RIPA, the only forum in which citizens will be able to raise the issue of violation of Art 8 rights.

411 Ibid.

412 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

413 Also, in Christie v UK 78-A DR E Com HR 119 the Commission found that the Interception of Communications Act 1985, the model for the 1989 and 1994 Acts, met the 'in accordance with the law' requirement of Art 8(2).

414 Similarly, in Halford v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 523, in respect of alleged tapping of the applicant's home phone, which was within the 1985 Act, the Court avoided this question in relating to the old tribunal since it found that the applicant did not have an 'arguable case' and that therefore, Art 13 was inapplicable.

415 See also Esbester v UK (1993) 1860/91; affirmed in Matthews v UK [1997] EHRLR 187.

416 (1997) 4 EHRLR 438.

417 See Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1998.

The mere fact that a body termed a 'Tribunal' has been created should not obscure the possibility that it may have a merely cosmetic effect. Had a body been created which appeared to have even less credibility, such as a Panel of Advisors or Commission, or a body required to accept National Security certificates, the guarantee under Art 6 of access to a court⁴¹⁸ or, under Art 13, of providing an effective remedy, might have been found at Strasbourg to have been violated⁴¹⁹ and the domestic expectation would have been that this would eventually be the case. But the formal appearance of the new tribunal may be belied by the nature of its proceedings which may mean that, substantively, it is as ineffective as such bodies would have been.

7 CONCLUSIONS

The central value which is revealed by consideration of the statutory schemes governing the operation of the intelligence services and the State surveillance arrangements generally is secrecy, in the protection of State interests. The value of individual privacy is, it is argued, consistently and readily overcome, at almost every point in the arrangements at which a choice was made. The HRA had aroused the expectation not only that a new comprehensive statutory basis for invasion of privacy would be introduced, but that it would be underpinned by Convention principles.⁴²⁰ While the introduction of such a basis in the RIPA is clearly a significant step forward in terms of protection of individual rights, there is little evidence of commitment to those principles despite the influence of the Convention on its inception. The same may be said of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 and of the Police Act 1997: both were introduced largely to meet the demands of Art 8 and both, it is argued, fail to show the respect for individual privacy which would therefore be expected. Perhaps ironically, the scheme enshrined in PACE 1984 for search and seizure does show such respect, to an extent, although it is only incidental to its traditional concern to protect the interest in property. Perhaps the contrast between PACE and the other statutory schemes considered reflects the lack of understanding of the value of individual privacy, as opposed to property, which has long influenced the common law and which, despite the reception of Art 8 into domestic law, continues to influence the regulation of secret investigatory powers.

The ability of the ordinary citizen to rely on Art 8 under the HRA in order to protect her privacy from State intrusion is highly circumscribed in a number of respects. A breach of Art 8 in searching for and seizing confidential documents is very unlikely to lead to their exclusion from evidence in court. Where there is doubt as to the standard of scrutiny applied by a magistrate in considering an application for a search warrant, again leading to a breach of Art 8, it is unclear that any redress is likely to be available. Perhaps the most striking feature of the RIPA is the determination evinced under it to prevent citizens invoking Convention rights in the ordinary courts against State bodies in respect of the profound threat to privacy represented by interception and surveillance.⁴²¹ The development of Convention jurisprudence in the ordinary courts in relation to such techniques has largely been prevented, before it had a chance to begin. A conflict is therefore revealed, it is contended, between the values underlying the RIPA and those underlying the HRA, despite their introduction by the same government.

418 Such a guarantee has been implied into Art 6(1): see Omar v France (2000) 29 EHRR 210.

419 As in Tinnelly (1998) 27 EHRR 249 and Chahal (1997) 23 EHRR 413 respectively.

420 This was the expectation of the Justice report, op cit, fn 97.

The democratic values enshrined in the Convention demand that citizens in the democracy should be able to feel confident that surveillance and interception by the State is undertaken for appropriate ends, by proportionate means and with respect for privacy. The RIPA, like the Security Services Act, the Intelligence Services Act and the Police Act, pays lip service to proportionality while largely emasculating methods of scrutinising it. It is apparent that statutory schemes which hide the operations they empower largely from scrutiny, and which, for the most part, place power in the hands of the executive, while shrouding the citizen's complaints' mechanisms in secrecy, fail to reflect those democratic values.

421 For further discussion, see Akdeniz, Y, Taylor, N and Walker, C, 'RIPA (1): State surveillance in the age of information and rights' [2001] Crim LR 73.

BODILY INTEGRITY AND AUTONOMY; SEXUAL EXPRESSION AND IDENTITY; FAMILY LIFE

1 INTRODUCTION¹

This chapter is centrally concerned with personal autonomy in the sense of the ability of the individual to make decisions free from State interference regarding the most intimate aspects of her personal life. It also touches on the question of the positive obligations of the State in relation to furthering the ability to exercise autonomy. As a linked value, it considers the interest of the individual in freedom from humiliation, also in terms of both negative and positive obligations. It will be found that in some respects this area resembles that considered in Chapter 10—the non-consensual disclosure of personal information. In both, domestic law showed a marked failure to recognise the value of autonomy at stake, which in the one instance may be termed informational and in the other, substantive.² As Chapter 10 demonstrated, it was only gradually, and ultimately under the impetus of the Human Rights Act (HRA), that personal information found legal protection from non-consensual publication. Similarly, it was the influence of the European Convention on Human Rights that, as this chapter will demonstrate, led to changes in domestic law to reflect respect for the sexual orientation of homosexuals.

However, there are a number of aspects of self-determination that are still unrecognised in domestic law and it is clear that individuals will seek to rely on Art 8 and other relevant Articles under the HRA in order to try to create such recognition. One such aspect is that of choice as to the manner and time of death. Another concerns rights of transsexuals over their own identity. Below, the extent to which UK law recognises the values of dignity and autonomy in the contexts in question and the possible influence of the HRA in improving such recognition are considered.

Recognition of the values of bodily integrity and autonomy, sexual identity, family life under the Convention

As the discussion of Art 8 in Chapter 2 indicated, a wide range of issues may be accommodated within the right to respect for private life. Other Convention guarantees, particularly those of Art 3, may also be relevant. The right to respect for family life, as the discussion below indicates, is a narrower concept, with which the right to respect for private life overlaps. The European Court of Human Rights has clearly recognised that private life covers individual, personal choices: Dudgeon

1 See generally Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1993, Part 3; Markesinis, B (ed), Protecting Privacy, 1999; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2000, Chapters 12 and 13; Janis, M, Kay, R and Bradley, A, European Human Rights Law: Text and Materials, 2nd edn, 2000, Chapter 6; Feldman, D, 'The developing scope of Art 8 of the ECHR' [1997] EHRLR 265; Feldman, D, 'Secrecy, dignity or autonomy? Views of privacy as a civil liberty' (1994) 47(2) CLP 42, p 54; Warbrick, C, 'The structure of Article 8' [1998] EHRLR 32.

2 See discussion, pp 530–33.

3 (1982) 4 EHRR 149.

v UK.³ Equally, respect for family life covers freedom of parental choice,⁴ within limits created by the opposing interests of the child.⁵ Thus, the interest of individuals in exercising freedom of choice in decisions as to the disposal of or control over the body may be protected. Usually the individual is, in effect, asking the State to leave him or her alone to make such decisions in order to preserve autonomy. This is a negative obligation which is clearly within the scope of Art 8 where the interference can be viewed as arbitrary.⁶

In some instances, however, the individual will be requiring the assistance of the authorities in ensuring that he or she is able to exercise autonomy. The scope for the acceptance of positive obligations as an aspect of respect for private or family life is less wide. But the European Court has characterised claims that the State is under an obligation to provide such assistance, as necessary in order to demonstrate respect for private or family life.⁷ In other words, the State may be obliged to provide legal protection for the individual even when the public authorities are not themselves responsible for an interference with the Art 8 right, although given that the State merely has to show ‘respect’, its discretion in determining the means of so doing tends to be increased.⁸

Where a positive obligation is claimed, Strasbourg will afford a wide margin of appreciation. The margin can widen or narrow depending on the circumstances of the case, resulting in a variation of the intensity of the Court’s review of the States’ actions. Two further factors may also be present in this context and may influence Strasbourg in conceding a particularly wide margin of appreciation where a complainant seeks to lay a positive obligation on the State. First, where the harm complained of flows from the action of a private party, rather than the State itself, so that the so-called ‘horizontal effect’ of the Convention is in issue and, secondly, where there is a potential conflict with another Convention right. Clearly, these factors may arise independently of each other. In a number of key decisions under Art 8 discussed in Chapter 10, all three were present,⁹ which may explain the somewhat unsatisfactory and misleading nature of some of the judgments given. These factors may also arise in this context and may explain the cautious nature of certain of the decisions.

Horizontal effect under the HRA

As the discussion of horizontal effect under the HRA in Chapters 4¹⁰ and 10 made clear, an individual who wishes to rely on Art 8 in respect of the privacy interests considered must identify the responsibility that a public authority bore in the matter

4 See Huffman v Austria (1993) 17 EHRR 293; X v Netherlands (1974) 2 DR 118.

5 See Rieme v Sweden (1992) 16 EHRR 155.

6 See Belgian Linguistic (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252, para 7; X and Y v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235; Hokkanen v Finland (1994) 19 EHRR 139.

7 X v UK Appl No 7154/75; 14 D & R 31, p 32 (1978); Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, para 31. See also Chapter 2, p 68 and Chapter 10, pp 538–41.

8 See JS v UK Appl No 191173/91, 3 January 1993. The Commission rejected an application in which it was alleged that an insurance company had carried out a clandestine surveillance in investigating a claim.

9 All three were present in: Water v UK (1986) 48IR 154; Spencer v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105, and N v Portugal Appl No 20683/92, 20 February 1995; however, the third was influential only in Winer.

10 See pp 161–64.

in order to rely on the HRA under s 7(1)(a) or (b). But such a person could also rely on the courts' duty under s 6 of the HRA in respect of the development of the existing law, or on the interpretative obligation under s 3.¹¹

2 BODILY INTEGRITY AND AUTONOMY

Introduction

Under Art 8, bodily privacy has a number of aspects. The European Court of Human Rights adopted a broad definition of privacy in X and Y v Netherlands:¹²

...[the concept of] private life...covers the physical integrity...of the person... Art 8 does not merely compel the State to abstain from...interference [with the individual]: in addition to this primarily negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in effective respect for private...life.¹³

Thus, Art 8 recognises that individuals have an interest in preventing or controlling physical intrusions on the body and they may therefore lay claim to a negative right to be 'left alone' in a physical sense. Such a right might also encompass positive claims on the State to ensure that bodily integrity is not infringed. Thus, the State may fail to respect privacy if it fails to prevent infringement of it by others or if in itself it allows such infringement.

Bodily integrity

Interference with bodily integrity may breach the guarantee of freedom from degrading punishment under Art 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the guarantee of respect for privacy under Art 8. In general, any compulsory physical treatment of an individual will constitute an interference with respect for private life.¹⁴ We will return below to the question as to the level of consensual bodily harm which will be forbidden.

Corporal punishment and discipline

Certain forms of physical punishment may be seen as an unjustified intrusion into bodily integrity. Corporal punishment was outlawed in UK State schools¹⁵ after the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Campbell and Cosans v UK,¹⁶ which was determined not on the basis of Arts 3 or 8 but under Art 2 of the First Protocol, which protects the right of parents to have their children educated according to their own philosophical convictions. However, corporal punishment in private schools was not outlawed, and in *Costello-Roberts v UK*¹⁷ the European 11 See comment in Chapter 4, p 161, fn 137.

12 (1985) 8 EHRR 235.

13 Ibid., paras 22 and 23.

14 X v Austria 18 D & R 154 (1979).

15 Under the Education (No 2) Act 1986.

16 (1984) 2 EHRR 293.

Court of Human Rights found that the UK had a responsibility to ensure that school discipline was compatible with the Convention even though the treatment in question was administered in an institution independent of the State. However, although the court considered that there might be circumstances in which Art 8 could be regarded as affording protection to physical integrity which would be broader than that afforded by Art 3, in the particular circumstances the adverse effect on the complainant was insufficient to amount to an invasion of privacy. The court took into account the 'public' context in which the punishment had occurred and its relatively trivial nature.

However, corporal punishment in both private and public sector schools has now been abolished.¹⁸ Parents or persons with parental responsibility may still use reasonable force to discipline a child. So long as the force remains reasonable, the parent will have a defence to a charge of battery.¹⁹ In *A v UK*²⁰ the applicant was a nine year old who had been beaten by his stepfather with a garden cane. The stepfather was acquitted of assault causing bodily harm after the jury was instructed that the crime did not include reasonable chastisement by a parent. It was found that the beating fell within Art 3 and that it was incumbent on States to take measures to ensure that individuals within their jurisdiction are not subject to Art 3 treatment. Had the beating been less severe, a breach of Art 8 rather than Art 3 might have been found. It is clear that, by definition, beating amounting to Art 3 treatment cannot be viewed as reasonable and therefore, in future, the defence of reasonable chastisement could not cover the degree of force used in A. Where a child has suffered punishment by a parent that fails to reach a level of severity which would fall within Art 3, he or she could rely on the criminal law of battery and use Art 8, under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA in arguing that the defence of reasonable chastisement should be narrowed down or abolished.

Intrusions on dignity in custody

Under Art 8, physical intrusions on the bodily integrity of individuals by State agents may be justified if the requirements of Art 8(2) are satisfied. Equally, UK law also recognises a need to create a balance between the interest of the State in allowing physical interference with individuals for various purposes, including the prevention of crime and the interest of the individual in preserving his or her bodily integrity. UK law determines that in certain circumstances, bodily privacy may give way to other interests. Articles 3 and 8 together provide substantive guarantees against certain types of custodial ill treatment. But, clearly, Art 3 will cover only the grossest instances of ill treatment. It is notable that the Convention contains no provision equivalent to that under Art 10 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which provides 'persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person'.

17 (1993) 19 EHRR 112; A 247-C.

18 Education Act 1996, s 548, as substituted by School Standards and Framework Act 1998, s 131.

19 Hopley (1860) 2F & F 202.

20 (1999) 27 EHRR 611.

In the Greek case,²¹ the conditions of detention were found to amount to inhuman treatment due to overcrowding, inadequate food, sleeping arrangements, heating, toilets and provision for external contacts. Failure to obtain medical treatment after a forcible arrest was found to infringe Art 3 in Hurtado v Switzerland.²² Conduct which grossly humiliates is degrading treatment contrary to Art 3.²³ Art 8 may be viewed as overlapping, to an extent, with Art 3, but it also covers some matters which would not be serious enough to amount to Art 3 treatment.²⁴ As indicated in Chapter 11, its guarantee of a right to respect for privacy is subject to a number of exceptions in para 2, including for the prevention of crime. In order to bring Art 8 into play, it must be found that its protection extends to the matter in question—in this context, it would probably be that ‘private or family life’ is affected. Certain conditions or incidents of detention may fall outside Art 8, such as a failure to provide an interpreter. But a failure to allow a juvenile or a mentally disturbed person to consult privately with a member of his or her family, acting as an appropriate adult, might be viewed as an interference with either private or family life.

Code of Practice A made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), para 3.5, provides safeguards for a search by police officers of more than outer clothing which appear to be coterminous with the right to respect for privacy under Art 8. Strip and intimate searching would probably fall within Art 8 as well as—depending on the circumstances, including the use of force—Art 3.²⁵ Section 55 of PACE 1984, as amended by s 79 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, allows intimate searches, on the authorisation of an inspector, but recognises that the violation they represent may occur only in reasonably well defined circumstances. Examination may occur only if there is reasonable suspicion that drugs or implements which might be used to harm others may be found. The examination may only be carried out by a nurse (or a medical practitioner in respect of drugs or a weapon) or, if that is not practicable, it can be carried out by a police officer who must be of the same sex as the person to be searched. The provisions of s 55 are fleshed out in Annex A of Code of Practice C. Strip searches, as opposed to intimate searches, are covered only by part B of Annex A. It is notable that the authorisation of a strip search, prior to 1995, had to be by the custody officer, but that that requirement is no longer in place under the current Code of Practice C provisions.²⁶ If a violation of Art 8 was alleged in respect of a strip search, it might be found to be in accordance with the law since it is authorised under Code C²⁷ to have a legitimate aim (the prevention of crime), but to be disproportionate to the aim pursued and therefore unnecessary in a democratic

21 12 YB 1 (1969) Com Rep.

22 A 280-A(1994) Com Rep.

23 The Greek case, 12 YB 1 (1969) Com Rep.

24 See the findings in the corporal punishment case of Costello-Roberts v UK (1993) 19 EHRR 112 (above). The Court found that the treatment was not severe enough to fall within Art 3; in the particular circumstances it did not fall within Art 8, but the Court considered that there might be circumstances in which Art 8 could be viewed as affording a wider protection to physical integrity than that which is afforded by Art 3.

25 Violations of both Articles, together with Art 14, were argued for in Wanyonyi v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 195 in respect of racial abuse and humiliation during strip and intimate searching. The application was declared inadmissible for failure to exhaust domestic remedies.

26 Code C, Annex A, Part B.

society, since that element of independence has been removed. If so, the Code provision, which is not itself authorised by incompatible primary legislation as required under s 3(2)(c) of the HRA, could be struck down. Articles 8, 3 and 14 might also be engaged where the interrogation itself was of an especially intrusive nature, particularly where it could also be said to be discriminatory; this possibility is pursued in Chapter 13.

The question as to how far clothing could properly be removed for other purposes in police custody was considered in Lindley v Rutter,²⁸ and a general order to remove the bras of all female detainees in the police station was challenged. Justification was put forward for the order on the grounds that the detainees might otherwise injure themselves. However, it was found that such treatment constituted an affront to human dignity and therefore needed a clearer justification which could be derived only from the specific circumstances of the arrestee: something particular about the individual in question would be needed to support a suspicion that she might do herself an injury. It was found that in removing a detainee's bra where such specific justification did not exist, the police officer in question had acted outside her duty. Thus, the court evinced a reluctance to accept a generalised basis for invasion of privacy.

Bodily autonomy

Personal autonomy has been recognised for some time in the USA as strongly linked to privacy. In Doe v Bolton,²⁹ Douglas J said that 'the right to privacy means freedom of choice in the basic decisions of one's life respecting marriage, divorce, procreation, contraception, education and upbringing of children'. At Strasbourg, the value of personal autonomy has also received quite clear recognition.³⁰ Personal autonomy connotes an interest not only in preventing physical intrusion by others, but also with the extent to which the law allows an individual a degree of control over his or her own body. Domestically, recognition of the value of individual bodily self-determination has arguably become more prominent this century. Thus, abortion and suicide are no longer crimes under the Abortion Act 1967 and the Suicide Act 1961.

Control over the body: euthanasia

But the choice of adults as to the disposal of their own bodies is highly circumscribed. Although suicide is no longer a crime, aiding and abetting suicide has not been decriminalised. Thus, for example, a relation of a person who is unable to commit suicide because she is incapacitated through illness cannot help her to die in order to avoid severe pain and suffering without risking prosecution for murder or 27 Arguably, the Code provisions satisfy this requirement. Interpreting 'prescribed by law' in Sunday Times v UK A 30 (1979), para 49, the European Court of Human Rights found: 'the law must be adequately accessible' and 'a norm cannot be regarded as a "law" unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct'. Where the Codes create an interference with suspects' rights, they are couched in reasonably precise language. See further Chapter 13, pp 757–58.

28 [1980] 3 WLR 661.

29 (1973) 410 US 179; (1973) 35 L E 2d 201.

30 Dudgeon v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 149; Lustig-Prean v UK (1999) 7 BHRC 65. For discussion, see Feldman, op cit, fn 1.

manslaughter. Euthanasia is not recognised in UK law³¹ except in the very narrow sense that allowing a patient in a persistent vegetative state to die will be acceptable if it can be said, objectively speaking, to be in his or her best interests because no improvement can be expected.³² Also, under the so called 'double effect' doctrine, a doctor will not be guilty of murder if she administers a very high level of a pain-killing drug which she knows is likely to cause death so long as the primary intention is to relieve pain.³³ Clearly, as Chapter 2 indicated, a conflict with Art 2 might arise³⁴ if euthanasia was allowed in other situations; it has merely been found at Strasbourg that passively allowing a person to die need not attract criminal liability in order to satisfy Art 2.³⁵ The consent of the victim would be irrelevant; euthanasia is not covered by any of the Art 2 exceptions.

In 2001, an action was brought under the HRA against the Director of Public Prosecutions in relation to his decision that a husband who wishes to help his wife to die once her terminal Motor Neurone Disease reaches a certain stage would be liable to the risk of prosecution.³⁶ The woman wanted a declaration that her husband would not be prosecuted and argued that the State has a responsibility to make such a declaration since otherwise, Arts 3 and 8 would be breached. The claim was backed by the UK group Liberty. The claim was ultimately rejected by the House of Lords. A parallel action was brought in a Canadian case, Rodriguez v British Columbia.³⁷ A similar argument was received sympathetically; it was found that the Criminal Code prohibition on aiding and abetting suicide did infringe her right to security of the person. However, the application failed on the basis that it did not do so in breach of the principles of fundamental justice, the exception clause.

Since Art 3 is not qualified, it is possible that the claim under the HRA might succeed, although no decision at Strasbourg covers it. Moreover, if the declaration in question was made, it might be argued that the authorities were failing to fulfil their Art 2 obligations. On the other hand, it could be argued that homicide law would be unaffected by the declaration: euthanasia would continue to constitute murder, but in particular and rare instances on public policy grounds, no prosecution would be brought since there would be no, or an insufficient public interest in bringing one. Any such decision would obviously be controversial. Its effect might be to prompt Parliament to act to introduce a law similar to that operating in the Netherlands, which would arguably be the preferable course.³⁸

31 For discussion, see Orst, S, 'Conceptions of the euthanasia phenomenon' [2000] J CIV LIB 155.

32 Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] AC 789, HL.

33 Cox [1992] BMLR 38. In Moor (see [2000] J CIV LIB 155), a doctor who had administered a very high dose of diamorphine to an elderly patient who had pleaded with him for a speedy death was charged with murder. He was acquitted on the basis of evidence showing that the double effect doctrine applied, not on the basis of any right to be assisted to die.

34 See pp 40–1.

35 Widmer v Switzerland, No 20527/92 (1993), unreported. See also p 40.

36 The claim was rejected on appeal to the HL: R (on the Application of Diane Pretty) v DPP and Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] UKHL 61.

37 (1993) 85 CCC (3d) 15.

38 However, the law in The Netherlands has been severely criticised: see Keown, J, 'The law and practice of euthanasia in the Netherlands' [1992] 108 LQR 51–78. For discussion of the moral issues see Dworkin, R, Life's Dominion, 1993.

Control over the body: abortion

The European Court of Human Rights has so far avoided the question whether the foetus is protected by Art 2—in other words, whether it would come within the term ‘everyone’. In Open Door Counselling v Ireland, the Court deliberately left open the possibility that Art 2 might place some restrictions on abortion.³⁹ If it was to find that the foetus is protected, the result, in terms of changes to almost all the State parties’ laws on abortion, would be immense, since only abortion falling within the exceptions to Art 2 would be permitted. There would be an immense increase in dangerous illegal abortions and women would travel outside the Member States for abortions, leading to an increase in later terminations. It has been found in the context of national legislation on abortion that the woman seeking abortion can rely on Arts 2 and 8, since her life and physical and mental health are in question.⁴⁰

The Commission has, however, committed itself to the view that the foetus is not protected under Art 2. In H v Norway,⁴¹ the Commission found that the lawful abortion of a 14-week foetus on social grounds did not breach Art 2. It took this stance partly on the basis that otherwise, a conflict with the mother’s Art 8 rights might arise, and partly because, since the State Parties’ laws on abortion differ considerably from each other, a wide margin of discretion should be allowed.

As argued in Chapter 4, there are strong reasons for considering that a question concerning an irreconcilable conflict of moral views should be left to the national legislatures.⁴² The stance taken in a number of other jurisdictions suggests that where this human rights issue comes before the highest national courts, the woman’s right to security of the person and to freedom of choice is viewed as paramount⁴³ and it has been found that the right to life does not extend to the foetus.⁴⁴

Limitation of parental freedom of choice

Two specific limitations on parental freedom of choice are represented by the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985 and the Surrogacy Act 1985 (although it should be noted that surrogacy is only curbed by the Act, not outlawed: it only prevents the enforcement of commercial surrogacy arrangements). Carrying out female circumcision is a criminal offence unless it is performed for reasons of medical necessity. In deciding whether the operation is necessary for the mental health of the female, matters of custom and ritual cannot be taken into account: s 2(2) of the Act.

These two statutes place, it is argued, appropriate limits on parents’ choice as to the welfare of children. It may be suggested that uncontrolled surrogacy arrangements may amount in themselves to an affront to human dignity. Female genital mutilation clearly represents an invasion of autonomy, since it is normally

39 ECtHR, Judgment of 29 October 1992; (1992) 15 EHRR 244. For comment, see (1992) 142 NLJ 1696.

40 X v UK, Appl No 8416/78; 19 D & R 244 (1980).

41 Appl No 17004/90 (1992) 73 DR 155.

42 See pp 191–92. For discussion, see Dworkin, op cit, fn 38.

43 See the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in Morgentaler v R [1988] 1 SCR 60; the decision of the US Supreme Court in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey (1992) 505 US 833.

44 Christian Lawyers Assoc of South Africa v The Minister of Health 1998 (11) BCLR 1434; Borowski v AG of Canada (1987) 39 DLR (4th) 731.

practised on girls who are far too young to give consent. It can also lead to life-long health problems. The practice almost certainly amounts to Art 3 treatment and therefore the UK authorities would fail to adhere to their obligations under the Convention if the law allowed the procedure to occur. The practice of female genital mutilation has been condemned by a number of international bodies including the World Health Organisation and under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Political Rights.

In general, there is a presumption against allowing any procedure in respect of a child which is being carried out for a non-therapeutic purpose.⁴⁵

Medical treatment

The notion of personal autonomy has arisen frequently in the context of allegedly negligent medical treatment, but the law has not so far made much progress in the direction of granting it recognition.⁴⁶ It was argued in *Sidaway v Board of Governors of the Bethlem Royal Hospital*⁴⁷ that a patient who was not fully informed as to the risks associated with the operation she was to undergo should be able to succeed against the doctor in negligence when one of those risks did materialise. However, it was found that so long as the doctor had acted in accordance with practice accepted as proper by a body of medical practitioners (the test deriving from Bolam v Friern HMC)⁴⁸ with regard to disclosure of risks, the action must fail. It may be argued that this stance fails to accord sufficient weight to the personal autonomy of the patient. The Bolam test was modified by the House of Lords in Bolitho v Hackney Health Authority.⁴⁹ The Lords considered that the Bolam test was still applicable, but that a court need not find that a doctor was not negligent merely because some medical experts had testified that the doctor's actions were in accord with accepted medical practice. The court had to be satisfied that the medical experts' opinion was reasonable, although in most instances the fact that the experts took a particular view would be in itself grounds for finding it to be reasonable.

The decision in Bolitho may accord greater weight to self-determination, in the sense that, in terms of information giving, accepted medical practice may be found occasionally to be negligent. But the extent of the obligation to give information may still be unclear. Where a number of choices of treatment lie before a patient, how far might it be expected that he or she should participate in the decision making process? For example, if a patient had a serious cancerous condition, there might be two main options: radical treatment which would be disfiguring, but might prolong life, or conservative treatment which would not prolong life, but would not disfigure. Length of life would have to be weighed against quality of life. It might appear that only the patient who knows intimately which of the options fits with his or her own aspirations and lifestyle and who must live for the rest of his or 45 See the Tattooing of Minors Act 1969, s 1; the Children Act 1989. See further Feldman, 1993, Chapter 4, pp 158–60.

46 See Teff, H, 'Consent to medical procedure: paternalism, self-determination or therapeutic alliance?' (1985) 101 LQR 432.

47 [1985] AC 871; [1985] 2 WLR 480, HL.

48 [1957] 2 All ER 118.

49 [1998] AC 232.

her life with the decision taken, should make it and therefore all the risks and benefits of both courses of action should be disclosed.

Furthermore, it might be argued that the degree of self-determination allowable should be greater depending on the type of operation in question. For this purpose, treatment could be divided into three categories: it might be termed elective (sterilisation, cosmetic surgery), semi-elective (this would be a large category which would include on the one hand pain relieving operations and, on the other, operations in the face of life threatening conditions such as cancer) and non-elective (emergency operations where the patient, either due to unconsciousness or extreme pain, was unable to make a choice). It might be argued that self-determination should be complete in respect of purely elective operations and should be a highly significant factor in respect of semi-elective ones. In other words, the law should not impose or allow any further constraint on the patient's exercise of self-determination than is inherent in the situation already.

The law has not, however, recognised these distinctions or, indeed, any general right to bodily privacy in terms of the disclosure of risks. The Sidaway case concerned an operation which might be termed semi-elective in that it was aimed at pain relief, but where a purely elective operation was in question in Gold v Haringey Health Authority,⁵⁰ the same principles applied. Clearly, in order that a patient can exercise self-determination, he or she must know of the options for treatment and of the likely outcome in each instance. The patient can then give or withhold consent to the proposed course of treatment and, further, can question it. However, the test to be applied as to whether a doctor has been negligent in failing to inform the patient of certain possibilities—the Bolam test—does not lay a heavy burden upon doctors in terms of the amount of information which must be given. This test may be acceptable in respect of decisions as to diagnosis and treatment (although it may be argued that it puts the plaintiff in medical negligence cases in an extremely difficult position), but arguably it is unacceptable in respect of the duty to disclose information so that the patient can give an informed consent to the treatment proposed. It is arguable that judges have put their fear of defensive medicine and a flood of medical litigation before the need to uphold the right of the patient to control over his or her own body.

Given that positive obligations have been recognised as within the compass of Art 8, the argument could be raised in an action for negligence in circumstances similar to those of Gold or Sidaway, that the doctor or hospital had failed to respect personal autonomy as a value recognised under Art 8 by failing to furnish sufficient information relating to the risks of the operation. The tort of negligence might undergo development as a result, as did confidence as a result of the decision in *Douglas and Others v Hello!*⁵¹

50 [1987] 2 All ER 888.

51 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

3 SEXUAL EXPRESSION AND IDENTITY

Introduction

In the UK, individuals enjoy a limited power of choice as to the expression of sexuality. At present, sexual freedom is restricted by the criminal law, which prohibits certain acts.⁵² The rationale for such prohibition depends partly on use of the criminal law as the means of affirming and upholding a certain moral standard and partly on the need to prevent certain specific harms. The debate as to whether or not the proper function of the criminal law is to interfere in the private lives of adult citizens in order to enforce a particular pattern of behaviour where no clear harm will arise from the prohibited behaviour remains unresolved and is no doubt irresolvable.⁵³ However, the view put forward in the Wolfenden Report 1957,⁵⁴ to the effect that the criminal law should confine itself to prohibiting specific harms, has received quite widespread support.⁵⁵

The use of Art 14 and of European Union law in relation to claims regarding employment detriment based on transsexuality and homosexuality are considered in Chapter 16.

Incest

Incest is punishable with a maximum sentence of seven years' imprisonment or with life imprisonment if with a girl under 13 years of age.⁵⁶ One justification for prohibiting incest is that the genetic risks associated with it appear to be high, but this argument could equally be extended to anyone affected by a hereditary disease who would then also be prohibited from intercourse. Moreover, the risk of producing children with genetic defects can provide only a partial rationale for the existence of the offence, since it may arise whether or not the man is sterile or the woman past child-bearing age or otherwise unable to have children.⁵⁷ On the other hand, the erosion of freedom created by this offence is limited, since it only prohibits acts with a certain group of persons. Following the principles put forward in the Wolfenden Report 1957, this offence should be abolished, although a more limited offence would have to replace it in order to protect younger members of families from the attentions of adult members.

52 For consideration of such offences, see Smith, JC and Hogan, J, Criminal Law, 8th edn, 1996, Chapter 14; Honore, T, Sex Law, 1978.

53 For discussion of the relationship between privacy and morality, see Leander, S, 'The right to privacy, the enforcement of morals and the judicial function: an argument' (1990) Current Legal Problems 115. See also the discussion of these issues in the leading case of Dudgeon (1982) 4 EHRR 737, especially the dissenting opinion of Judge Walsh, paras 9–23.

54 Cmnd 247. This view was challenged by Lord Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals, 1965.

55 See the Dudgeon judgment itself. In Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 39 (discussed below), the Court refused to rely on the protection of morality exception in Art 8(2), but looked only at the risk of physical harm. The stance taken by the Constitutional Court of South Africa in National Council of Gay and Lesbian Equality v Ministry of Justice (1998) (6) BCLR 726 (W) was opposed to the view that the criminal law should impose a view of morality on consenting adults wishing to express their sexuality in a particular manner. A stance similar to that in Laskey was taken by the Supreme Court of Canada in R v Butler [1992] 1 SCR 452.

56 Sexual Offences Act 1956, ss 10 and 11.

57 It may be noted that s 44 of the 1956 Act defines sexual intercourse as penetration without the need to show emission of seed.

Anal sexual intercourse

The offence of buggery consisted at common law of intercourse per anum by a man with a man or woman and intercourse per anum or vaginam with an animal and it could be committed by a husband with his wife.⁵⁸ The common law was enacted in s 12(1) of the Sexual Offences Act 1956. An exception was provided to the common law position by s 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1967, which permitted consensual buggery between two males both of whom were 21 or over (the highest age of consent for homosexual intercourse in the European Community until 1994), done in private.

Under s 12(1) of the 1956 Act, a homosexual act done in 'public' will be an offence and this will include any place where anyone apart from the two parties is present. Thus, a homosexual act occurring in a house owned by one of the parties (known either as the 'agent' or the 'patient') would be criminalised if another person was in the same room, although unaware of what was occurring. If there is uncertainty as to whether a place is private or public it must be resolved by reference to all the facts, including the likelihood of a third person coming on the scene.⁵⁹ It is an offence under s 4 of the 1967 Act to procure another man to commit with a third man an act of buggery, while any agreement between two or more persons to facilitate homosexual activity may be caught by the common law offence of conspiracy to corrupt public morals. The existence of this offence was affirmed in *Knulier Ltd v DPP*⁶⁰ in which Lord Reid made clear the policy of the law regarding homosexual acts:

I read the [1967] Act as saying that, even though [buggery] may be corrupting, if people choose to corrupt themselves in this way that is their affair and the law will not interfere. But no licence is given to others to encourage the practice.

He went on to equate homosexual connection with prostitution as an activity which was not in itself unlawful, but which was not 'lawful in the full sense'. Thus, it is fair to say that the legalisation of homosexual acts was effected in almost the narrowest conceivable manner and suggested a bare toleration of them.⁶¹

*Dudgeon v UK*⁶² concerned the law in Northern Ireland (Offences Against the Person Act) 1861, which made buggery between consenting males of any age a crime. Dudgeon, who was suspected of homosexual activities, was arrested on that basis and questioned, but the police decided not to prosecute. He applied to the European Commission on the grounds of a breach of the right of respect for private life under Art 8. The European Court of Human Rights held that the legislation in question constituted a continuing interference with his private life, which included his sexual life. He was forced either to abstain from sexual relations completely, or to commit a crime. However, the court considered that some regulation of homosexual activity was acceptable; the question was what was necessary in a democratic society. The court took into account the doctrine of the margin of appreciation, as considered in the Handyside case,⁶³ where it was held that State 58 Jellyman (1838) 8 C & P 604.

59 Reakes [1974] Crim LR 615.

60 [1973] AC 435; [1972] 3 WLR 143; (1972) 56 Cr App R 633, HL.

61 For discussion see Michael, J, 'Homosexuals and privacy' (1988) 138 NLJ 831.

62 (1982) 4 EHRR 149.

63 (1976) 1 EHRR 737.

authorities were in the best position to judge the requirements of morals. However, the court found that the instant case concerned a very intimate aspect of private life. A restriction on a Convention right cannot be regarded as necessary unless it is proportionate to the aim pursued. In the instant case, there was a grave detrimental interference with the applicant's private life and on the other hand there was little evidence of damage to morals. The law had not been enforced and no evidence had been adduced to show that this had been harmful to moral standards. So the aim of the restriction was not proportional to the damage done to the applicant's privacy and, therefore, the invasion of privacy went beyond what was needed. In response to this ruling, Northern Irish law was changed under the Homosexual Offences (NI) Order 1982. Dudgeon demonstrates that the European Court of Human Rights is prepared to uphold the right of the individual to choose to indulge in homosexual practices⁶⁴ and suggests that the term 'private life' in Art 8 may be used to cover a wide range of situations where bodily or sexual privacy is in question.

In the European Community, Irish criminal law was until recently the most hostile to homosexuals; sexual acts between members of the same sex were outlawed in the Republic until June 1993, when the Irish Government introduced reform by lowering the age of consent for homosexual acts to 17, thus bringing it into line with the more progressive European countries. It was argued in Dudgeon that the age of consent should be lowered in order to ensure respect for the private life of homosexuals, but the European Court accepted that it was within the Member States' margin of appreciation to fix the age of consent at a level which would seem to protect the rights of others. It was recommended in 1984 by the Criminal Law Revision Committee that the age of consent should be lowered to 18, but this recommendation was not implemented. However, Parliament decided to include in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill 1994 a clause lowering the age of consent for male homosexuals to 18. Adoption of 16 as the age of consent was debated but rejected. The UK Government took the view, which it put forward in Dudgeon, that female homosexual activity does not present as great a danger to society, and particularly to young persons, as male homosexual activity. This may explain why the age of consent for lesbian acts remains the same as for heterosexual intercourse. That 16 is the age of consent is apparent on the basis that, although such acts may be capable of being indecent assaults,⁶⁵ they will normally be consented to and so will not be assaults. However, a girl under 16 cannot give the relevant consent and so any homosexual act done to or with a girl beneath that age would be unlawful, as would a heterosexual act. The reason given in Dudgeon for this apparent liberalism on behalf of the UK has been attacked as misleading; Edwards argues that its true basis lies in a traditional belief in the sexual passivity of females.⁶⁶ In its impact, this differentiation between male and female homosexuals was an instance of straightforward sexual discrimination working to the disadvantage of men.

Section 143 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 amended s 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1967 to lower the age of consent to 18. The differential ages of 64 Cf the stance of the US Supreme Court in Bowers v Hardwick (1986) 478 US 186; for comment see (1988) 138NLJ 831.

65 Under the Sexual Offences Act 1956, s 14.

66 Edwards, S, Female Sexuality and the Law, 1981, p 42.

consent under s 143 continued to allow discrimination between homosexuals and heterosexuals and between male and female homosexuals. In Sutherland v UK,⁶⁷ s 143 of the 1994 Act was successfully challenged under Art 8 in conjunction with Art 14 on the basis that it allowed discrimination between male and female homosexuals, since the age of consent for female homosexual intercourse is 16 under the criminal law as it stands at present, as indicated above. The Commission found by 14 votes to 4 that the fixing of a minimum age of consent at 18 as opposed to 16 was a violation of Art 8 and was discriminatory treatment under Art 14. It took into account the fact that many other States have equalised the ages of consent for homosexual and heterosexual acts and further found that the interference could not be justified on the grounds, including that of protecting public morality, put forward under Art 8(2). It appeared that the European Court of Human Rights was prepared to reconsider its remarks on the point in Dudgeon since, as indicated above, it tends to take the view that in sensitive matters of this nature, it should hold back until a clear European standard seems to be emerging; at the stage when a trend is clear, but no such standard has emerged, it will tend to invoke the margin of appreciation.⁶⁸ Given the changes in the law on this matter in the different Member States, it seemed that such a standard was emerging regarding equalisation of the ages of consent. The decision was postponed since the government assured the Commission that the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Bill would proceed equalising the age of consent.⁶⁹ This was eventually achieved under s 1 of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000; the Government had to use the Parliament Act 1911 (as amended) procedure in order to pass the Bill against the opposition of the House of Lords.

Section 1 of the 1967 Act, as amended by s 1 of the 2000 Act, now lowers the age of consent for male homosexual intercourse to 16. Heterosexual buggery is decriminalised by s 1 so long as both parties are over 16. The act must still take place in private and s 12(1), (1B) provides that the act will not be in private if it takes place when two or more persons take part or are present, or it takes place in a public lavatory. Despite these changes, it is highly likely that the current law governing the sexual freedom of homosexuals is still not in accord with Art 8 due to the restrictions on homosexual intercourse which do not apply to heterosexuals. In particular, the law is almost certain to be changed so as to allow consenting homosexual intercourse in private between more than two men as a result of the 'Bolton Seven' case brought against the UK.⁷⁰ The applicants were prosecuted in 1998 on the basis of a video which showed them engaging in consensual group sex. They were convicted of gross indecency. One of the men, Williams, and another, Connell, admitted to having had sex with one of the other five who was, at the time, six months under the then age of consent, 18. Williams was convicted of buggery, although his suspended sentence was later revoked by the Court of Appeal. At the time of the convictions, the court was warned that the prosecutions breached Art 8. Five of the men applied to the European Court of Human Rights and, in July 2001, in order to avoid defeat in the Court, the Government offered each of them compensation in an out of court settlement.

67 Appl No 25186/94; [1997] EHRLR 117.

68 See discussion on this point in relation to transsexuals, below, pp 743–4.

69 On 8 September 1999.

70 ADT v UK (2000) 2 FLR 697; see The Guardian, 27 July 2001.

By these incremental steps, legal acceptance of the sexual autonomy of homosexuals has almost been brought about, in the sense of achieving equality with heterosexuals, although the process will not be complete until the restrictions are equal. If the change in the law regarding the numbers of men who may engage in consensual sex fails to achieve equality, Art 8 and 14 arguments are likely to be raised in any domestic prosecutions under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, and the same is true of other provisions of the criminal law which still enshrine inequality.⁷¹

Sado-masochism⁷²

Most sado-masochistic acts are currently unlawful in the UK, regardless of the participants' consent to them. Following Donovan,⁷³ a person can consent to the infliction of minor or trivial injury, but not to 'any hurt or injury calculated to interfere with health or comfort...it need not be permanent but must be more than merely transient or trifling'. Donovan appears to be incompatible with *Aitken*⁷⁴ in which it was found, in effect, that a person can consent to the risk of serious injury. However, in the leading case of Brown,⁷⁵ the House of Lords followed Donovan in finding that a person cannot consent to the infliction of harm amounting to actual bodily harm. However, consent to such harm may negate liability if there is good reason for the harm to be caused. There are a number of activities involving the causing of or the risk of consensual harm which have been found to be justified as in the public interest. These include rough horseplay,⁷⁶ organised games and some informal friendly athletic contests (although not prize fights).⁷⁷

In *Brown*⁷⁸ a group of sado-masochistic homosexuals had regularly over a period of 10 years willingly participated in acts of violence against each other for the sexual pleasure engendered in the giving and receiving of pain. They were charged with causing actual bodily harm contrary to s 47 and with wounding contrary to s 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and were convicted. The convictions were upheld by the Court of Appeal which certified the following point of law of general public importance: 'Where A wounds or assaults B occasioning him actual bodily harm in the course of a sado-masochistic encounter, does the prosecution have to prove lack of consent on the part of B before they can establish A's guilt under s 20 and s 47 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861.' The House of Lords, by a majority of three to two, answered this question in the negative, finding, therefore, that consent could operate only as a defence and would be allowed so to operate only where the public interest would thereby be served. It was found that in a sado-masochistic context, the inflicting of injuries amounting to actual bodily harm could not fall within the category of 'good reason' and therefore, despite the consent of all the participants, the convictions of the defendants were upheld.

71 See further Chapter 17, p 1068. For discussion, see Wintemute, R, Sexual Orientation and Human Rights, 1995, Chapter 4.

72 For discussion see Leigh (1976) 39 MLR 130.

73 [1934] 2 KB 498.

74 [1992] 1WLR 1006.

75 [1993] 2 WLR 556; [1993] 2 All ER 75; for comment see (1993) 109 LQR 540; (1994) 20(3) JLS 356.

76 Jones (1986) 83 Cr App R 375.

77 Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534.

78 [1993] 2 WLR 556; [1993] 2 All ER 75, HL.

The judgments of the majority in the House of Lords are couched in terms which suggest that distaste for the activities in question was a significant influencing factor. Lord Mustill, in the minority in the House of Lords, considered each of the grounds considered by the majority to be in favour of criminalising the activities in question and discounted each of them. These included fear of the spread of AIDS and the possibility that things might get out of hand if activities such as these were allowed. AIDS, as Lord Mustill pointed out, may be spread by consensual buggery, which is legal, rather than by the activities in question. If a person consents to a lesser harm than that which is actually inflicted, the existing law could be used to punish the perpetrator.

It is unclear that any public interest was served by bringing the prosecution: the activities in question were carried on privately, and there was no suggestion that any of the Victims' were coerced into consenting to them: all had apparently chosen freely to participate. No hospital treatment was needed and the police only discovered what had been occurring by chance. Thus, this decision may be criticised for its subjectivity; it is unclear why it is acceptable that boxing contests may be carried out which can result in serious permanent injury or even death, while activities such as those in Brown are criminalised although they may result in a lesser degree of harm.⁷⁹ Similarly, it is difficult to reconcile Brown with *Aitken*⁸⁰ and with Wilson.⁸¹ In Aitken, a group of RAF officers, including G, at a party set fire to G's fire resistant suit, as a practical joke. G attempted to resist them, but was badly burned. The convictions of the officers for causing grievous bodily harm contrary to s 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 were quashed on appeal on the ground that the officers honestly believed that G had consented to their actions. In other words, it was found that G could consent to the risk of serious injury, injury of a more serious nature than that inflicted in Brown. In Wilson,⁸² a husband branded his wife's buttocks with a hot knife at her request. The Court of Appeal found that consensual activity between husband and wife in the privacy of the matrimonial home was not a proper matter for criminal prosecution. An inference which may be drawn from the contradictory nature of decisions in this area is that while boxing, rough horseplay or private heterosexual activities are regarded by some members of the judiciary as acceptable and perhaps 'manly', they have little or no sympathy with or understanding of the value of some aspects of sexual expression, especially the sexual expression of homosexuals. The majority in the House of Lords did not appear to regard the decision as allowing an interference with private sexual activity between adults, but rather as an application of the criminal law to offences of violence which had a sexual motive.

Three of the men who were convicted in Brown applied to the European Commission on Human Rights, arguing that their convictions were in breach of Art 8 of the Convention,⁸³ since they constituted an interference with their private life. The Commission found that no violation of Art 8 had occurred and referred 79 See further on this point Roberts's discussion of the Law Commission, Consultative Paper No 139, Consent in the Criminal Law, 1995; (1997) 17(3) OJLS 389.

80 [1992] 1WLR 1006.

81 [1996] 3WLR 125.

82 Ibid.

83 Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 39 Appl No 21974/93. The case of V, W, X, Y and Z v UK Appl No 21627/93 raises the same issues.

the case to the Court, which came to the same conclusion: Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v UK.⁸⁴ The Court considered that the activities in question could be seen as occurring outside the private sphere: many persons were involved and videos had been taken. However, as the issue of privacy was not in dispute, the Court accepted that an interference with respect for the applicants' private life had occurred.

The question was whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society. It found that the harm was serious, since it concerned genital torture. The State is entitled to regulate the infliction of physical harm, and the level of harm to be tolerated by the State where the victim consents is in the first instance a matter for the State concerned. The activities had the potential to cause harm in the sense that if encouraged, harm, including the spread of AIDS, might occur in future. Was the interference proportionate to the aim pursued? Numerous charges could have been preferred, but only a few were selected. The level of sentencing reflected the perception that the activities were rendered less serious by the consent of the Victims'. The Court, therefore, found that the State had not overstepped its margin of appreciation, taking into account the need for regulation of such harm and the proportionate response of the authorities. Thus, no violation of Art 8 was found. The partly dissenting judgment of Judge Pettiti is of interest. He reasoned that the case did not fall within Art 8 at all, since Art 8 provides protection for persons' intimacy and dignity, not for a person's baseness or criminal immorality. The wording of this judgment echoes the wording of parts of the majority judgments of the House of Lords in allowing distaste and lack of sympathy for the activities in question to have some bearing.

The judgment of the Court reflects, it is suggested, the tendency of the operation of the margin of appreciation to dilute the Convention standards. As suggested elsewhere in this book,⁸⁵ a strong justification for trusting human rights and freedoms to the judicial as opposed to the democratic process is that the interests of minorities (including sexual minorities) may thereby be safeguarded, whereas, if they were at the mercy of majoritarianism, they might be at risk. However, this judgment lends credibility to the arguments of those who view the Convention as ineffective as a protector of minorities who stray too far from conventional forms of sexual expression, even where all involved are consenting adults. Clearly, if a similar prosecution is brought in future, Art 8 arguments might be raised with more success, bearing in mind the fact that the margin of appreciation doctrine has no application in domestic law.

Sexual identity

UK law does not at present give full expression to the fundamental interest of individuals in determining their own identity. This significant aspect of private life has arisen in two cases brought under the European Convention on Human Rights against the UK by transsexuals. In *Rees v UK*⁸⁶ the applicant, who was born a woman but had had a gender re-assignment operation, complained that he could not have his birth certificate altered to record his new sex, thereby causing him difficulty in applying for employment. However, the court refused to find a breach of Art 8, because it was reluctant to accept the claim that the UK was under a positive obligation to change its procedures in order to recognise the applicant's identity for social purposes. It followed a similar route in Cossey v UK,⁸⁷ although it did consider whether it should depart from its judgment in Rees in order to ensure that the Convention might reflect societal changes. However, it decided not to do so because developments in this area in the Member States were not consistent and still reflected a diversity of practices. In *B v France*⁸⁸ it was found that although there had been development in the area, no broad consensus among Member States had emerged. Nevertheless, the civil position of the applicant in terms of her sexual identity was worse than that of transsexuals in the UK and on that basis, a breach of Art 8 could be found.

84 (1997) 24 EHRR 39.

85 See Chapter 4, p 180.

86 (1986) 9 EHRR 56.

These decisions accept that sexual identity is an aspect of private life, although they do not afford full recognition to a right of individuals to determine both their own identity and the public expression of it. However, the Court appears to be coming closer to recognising a breach of Art 8 in such circumstances.⁸⁹ In his dissenting Opinion in Sheffield and Horsham v UK, Judge Van Dijk said: 'there has been a steady development in the direction of fuller legal recognition [of the status of transsexuals] and there is no sign of any retreat in this respect.'⁹⁰ It is possible that, under the HRA, the domestic courts will anticipate the position it seems likely, eventually, to take since the relevant legislation, s 1(1) of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953, could be reinterpreted under s 3. It can be changed if a 'factual' error is made. The question of what constitutes such an error is open to interpretation.

4 FAMILY LIFE

Introduction

Respect for family life and for private life can come into conflict with both competing individual and societal claims since it may allow restriction not only of activities of the State detrimental to individuals, but also of beneficial activity. Once a 'circle' has been drawn round the home or the family, privacy interests can be invoked to prevent action to benefit the weaker members within it.⁹¹ Once the State has relinquished responsibility for the regime inside the circle, it will be regulated informally in a manner which may work unfairness for the weaker members within it. This statement from the Association of Chief Police Officers on domestic violence illustrates the danger: '... we are... dealing with persons bound in marriage and it is important for a host of reasons to maintain the unity of the spouses.'⁹² A similar 87 A 184; (1990) 13 EHRR 622. A similar application also failed in Sheffield and Horsham v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 163.

88 (1992) 13 HRLJ 358; for comment see [1992] PL 559.

89 Sheffield and Horsham v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 163, para 60.

90 Ibid., para 3.

91 For full discussion of this issue, see Donovan, K, Sexual Divisions in Law, 1985, Chapter 5.

92 HC Select Committee on Violence in Marriage Report, 1975, p 366.

view was expressed by the Home Office in 1975: '...the point at which the State should intervene in family violence should be higher than that which is expected in the case of violence between strangers.'⁹³

Such views are unlikely to be expressed at the present time, although the debate on marital rape⁹⁴ produced some of a similar nature; it was suggested by one commentator that marital rape should be equated with a trivial crime such as assault partly on the basis that otherwise, the marriage might not survive. The danger may be summed up as a desire on the part of the State to devote its energies to keeping the circle intact rather than trying to regulate what occurs within it.⁹⁵ Such informal withdrawal of regulation might be bolstered by the guarantee of respect for family life under Art 8. Of course, the danger of an assertion of individualism at the expense of social responsibility is not confined to feminist concerns. Socialist and Marxist theorists have argued that delineation of an area as private hampers State organisation of society for the benefit of weaker groups because intervention in housing or education policy in order to ensure equality can be met by a claim that it would fail to show respect for private or family life.⁹⁶

However, there are signs that Art 8 jurisprudence recognises this danger and has rejected the notion that respect for family life, and perhaps for privacy generally, entails failure to interfere in the family when other rights or freedoms are in danger of abuse. In Marckx v Belgium,⁹⁷ the applicant complained under Art 8 in conjunction with Art 14 that an illegitimate child was not recognised as the child of his or her mother until the latter had formally recognised the child as such. Also, the child was treated under Belgian law as, in principle, a stranger to the parents' families. In finding that the State was under an obligation to ensure the child's integration in the family and therefore, that Art 8 applied, the court impliedly rejected the view put forward by the UK judge, Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice:

It is abundantly clear that the main if not indeed the sole object and intended sphere of application of Art 8 was that of what I will call the 'domiciliary protection' of the individual. He (sic) and his family were no longer to be subjected to domestic. Such and not the internal regulation of family relationships was the object of Art 8.

Now that Art 8 protection for the family is available in domestic law, it is reasonably clear that this notion of the meaning of respect for family life represents an impoverished view of the Convention requirements. Respect for family life means, negatively, that the State should abstain from interference except where to do so would mean failing to adhere to the requirements of respect for the private life of the child or to the requirements of another Convention Article.⁹⁸ The requirement of respect for family life also places positive obligations on the authorities to 'allow those concerned to lead a normal family life'.⁹⁹

93 Ibid, p 418.

94 See Chapter 17, p 1064–65.

95 This argument is complicated, it has been suggested, by the 'male oriented' nature of the law; in other words, looking to the State for an objective source of control of the private sphere may be misguided (see MacKinnon, C, 'Feminism, Marxism, method and the State' (1982) 7 Signs 515).

96 See Unger, R, Law in Modern Society, 1976; Kamenka, 'Public/private in Marxist theory and Marxist practice', in Benn and Gaus (eds), Public and Private in Social Life, 1983.

97 (1979) 2 EHRR 330.

98 See Riem v Sweden (1992) 16 EHRR 155.

99 Z and E v Austria (1986) 49 DR 67.

The concept of 'family life'

This concept under Art 8 may encompass many types of 'family'—formal or informal—but if the 'family' in question might not fall within the term as, for example, a foster parent might not do, there might still be an interference with private life.¹⁰⁰ Generally, a close relationship falling within the term will be presumed where close ties such as those between parent and child exist; for other relations, the presumption will be the other way. In *X, Y and Z v UK*¹⁰¹ the Court considered that no breach of Art 8 had arisen where the UK refused to recognise a female to male transsexual as the father of a child born after artificial insemination by a donor. The father had lived with the mother in a stable relationship for 10 years and acted as the child's father after the birth. Nevertheless, the Court did find that a family relationship existed between the 'father' and the child, taking into account his involvement with the child before and after the birth.

Respect for family life

Various aspects of family life have been in issue in cases brought against the UK.¹⁰² *W, B v UK*¹⁰³ concerned a claim that access should be allowed to children in the care of the local authority. The court noted that Art 8 does not contain any explicit procedural requirements, but found that, in itself, that fact could not be conclusive. When the local authority made decisions on children in its care, the views and interests of parents should be taken into account and the decision making process should allow for this. If parents' views were not taken into account, then family life was not being respected. Therefore, a breach of Art 8 was found on the basis that there was insufficient involvement of the applicants in the process. This decision thus avoided a judgment on the substantive merits of denying parents a right of access to children in care. Had the parents been involved in the decision making process which had then led to the same conclusion, it would seem that no breach of Art 8 would have occurred.

Although the term 'family' may receive a broad interpretation, this has not consistently been the case with respect to the requirements arising from the need to respect family life. In X v UK,¹⁰⁴ which was found inadmissible by the Commission, it was determined that 'family life' cannot be interpreted so broadly as to encompass a father's right to be consulted in respect of an abortion. The Commission could have rested the decision on para 2—the 'rights of others' exception—by taking the rights of the woman in question into account, but it preferred to interpret the primary right restrictively. Had it not adopted such an interpretation, 'family life' might have come into conflict with 'private life' since pregnancy and its management has been accepted as an aspect of a mother's private life, although not to be divorced entirely from consideration of the life of the foetus.¹⁰⁵ Family life has also received 100 See generally Liddy, J, 'The concept of family life under the ECHR' [1998] EHRLR 15; Kilkelly, U, The Child and the ECHR, 1999, Chapter 9.

101 (1997) 24 EHRR 143.

102 Z and E v Austria (1986) 49 DR 67.

103 Judgment of 8 July 1987, A 121; (1987) 10 EHRR 29.

104 Appl No 8416/78; 19 D & R 244 (1980).

a narrow interpretation in immigration cases in respect of a right to enter a country. In *Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v UK*¹⁰⁶ it was found that:

The duty imposed by Art 8 cannot be considered as extending to a general obligation...to respect the choice by married couples of the country of their matrimonial residence and to accept the non-national spouses for settlement in that country.

However, where an alien is in contrast faced with expulsion from a country in which he or she has lived for some time and where members of the family are established, the Court has recently shown itself willing to uphold the right to maintain family ties if satisfied that the ties are clearly in existence.¹⁰⁷

105 Brüggemann and Scheuten v Federal Republic of Germany Appl No 6959/75, 10 D & R 100 (1975), Eur Comm HR, Report of 12 July 1977. See above, p 41 for possible conflict between Art 8 and Art 2 in respect of abortions. See above, p 745 for further discussion of the possible conflict between family life and private life.

106 Judgment of 28 May 1985, A 94; (1985) 7 EHRR 471. A breach of the Convention was found when Art 8 was read in conjunction with Art 14 (see above, p 957).

107 See Moustaquim v Belgium, A 193 (1991); (1991) 13 EHRR 802 and Djeroud v France, A 191-B, 1991; for comment see (1991) YBEL 554–56. See further Chapter 15, pp 957–58.

PART IV

PERSONAL LIBERTY

Part IV considers the extent to which agents of the State have the power to interfere with individual liberty and freedom of movement. Such interference occurs in the name of the prevention of crime, the preservation of national security or, in the case of curbing the entry of asylum seekers, in the interests of the economic well being of the country. In the case of police powers to arrest and detain, and of powers to remove persons from the country, complex statutory schemes put in place under the previous Conservative governments have been built upon by the current Labour Government in creating increasingly illiberal schemes. There remains the possibility that the Human Rights Act (HRA) may prove a corrective to the authoritarian tendency of the statutory schemes in this context. But, at the present time, its impact is already appearing uncertain, inconsistent and muted.

Clear tensions can be discerned between a number of the recent statutes considered in the three following chapters and the Human Rights Act. This is especially true of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 (despite amendment), the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001. As will be indicated, the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Bill 2001, which contains a clause allowing for detention without trial for non-British citizens suspected of terrorism, with appeal to the Special Immigration Appeals Tribunal (SIAC, discussed in Chapter 15) may be said to represent, at present, the culmination of this authoritarian tendency. The tension between the Bill and the Human Rights Act has reached a point at which it was only possible to declare the 2001 Bill compatible with the Convention by derogating from Article 5 in respect of the clause in question. It is doubtful, however, whether the derogation was justified since it is not clear that a state of emergency justifying it currently exists in the UK. However, the derogation cannot be questioned in court and would therefore have to be challenged at Strasbourg.

The legislation considered in these three chapters has, it is suggested, certain hallmarks, all of which are of doubtful legitimacy in Human Rights Act terms. There is a tendency to increase the discretion of the police and of other law enforcement officials, and, as discussed in Chapter 11, to seek to curb the ability of the ordinary courts to keep a check on the use of that discretion in the interests of protecting individuals from abuse of power. In so far as the ordinary courts can consider executive use of coercive power, either resulting from use of various legislative provisions or from their misuse, in judicial review proceedings or in the course of the criminal process, the judiciary has not shown a clear determination to use the Human Rights Act as a corrective. Thus they have not, Chapter 14 will argue, shown a willingness to rely on Article 6 to exclude evidence as a form of redress for police misuse of power which has resulted in the production of non-confession evidence. The weakness of the Strasbourg jurisprudence in this respect may have played a part in the adoption of this stance, but the far more likely explanation is that they have clung to their traditional common law-based fondness for retaining the maximum discretion for the judiciary. Where, in contrast, executive discretion is at stake, as in immigration decisions, they have, as Chapter 16 suggests, shown a preparedness, at times, to rely on the Human Rights Act to do precisely what s 6 of that Act allows them to do—to declare that a breach of the Convention rights by a public authority is unlawful. The Labour government has been gravely displeased by such uses of the Act which it itself introduced—a displeasure which, it is suggested, underlies some of the provisions of the new Anti-Terrorist Bill. Far from sympathising with activist interpretations of the Convention, or even with applications of the plain words of the HRA and the Convention, the government appears, in this crucial context, to want the judges to deliver less rights protection than Strasbourg does.

FREEDOM FROM ARBITRARY SEARCH, ARREST AND DETENTION: SUSPECTS' RIGHTS IN CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIONS

1 INTRODUCTION¹

The exercise of police powers such as arrest and detention represents an invasion of personal liberty which is tolerated in the interests of the prevention and detection of crime. However, the interest in personal liberty requires that such powers should be strictly regulated. One way of putting this is to say that due process requirements inevitably place curbs on police powers. Thus, the rights-based due process model seeks to recognise the 'primacy of the individual and the complementary concept of limitation of official power'.² It calls for the police to be subject to tightly defined and rigorous control and for clear, legally guaranteed safeguards for suspects, with clear remedies for abuse through the courts.³ In contrast, the crime control model values a 'quick, accurate and efficient administrative fact-finding role...over slow, inefficient, and less accurate judicial trials' in order to achieve 'the dominant goal of repressing crime'.⁴

Current analysis of aspects of the criminal justice system continues to rely quite heavily on the two familiar models of crime control and due process.⁵ But while a rhetorical commitment to due process is still evident,⁶ there is a clear perception that the law does not currently reflect this model. As Sanders and Young put it: 'Police and Court officials need not abuse the law to subvert the principles of justice; they need only use it.'⁷ Further, as many scholars have argued, the impact of

-
- 1 For background reading, see: Hewitt, P, The Abuse of Power, 1982, Chapter 3; Lustgarten, L, The Governance of Police, 1986; Leigh, Police Power, 1985; Robilliard, J and McEwan, J, Police Powers and the Individual, 1986; Benyon and Bourn, The Police: Powers, Procedures and Proprieties, 1986; Newburn, T, Crime and Criminal Justice Policy, 1995, Chapter 3; Leishman, F, Loveday, B and Savage, S (eds), Core Issues in Policing, 1996; Morgan, R and Newburn, T, The Future of Policing, 1997. For early comment on the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, see [1985] PL 388; [1985] Crim LR 535. For current comment on the 1984 Act and on the relevant provisions under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, see Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Chapters 5 and 9; Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 1994, 2000; Levenson and Fairweather, Police Powers, 1990; McConville, M, Sanders, A and Leng, R, The Case for the Prosecution, 1991; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 1995, Chapter 2; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 1995; Lidstone, K and Palmer, C, The Investigation of Crime, 1996; Reiner and Leigh, 'Police powers', in McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds), Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994; Klug, F, Starmer, K and Weir, S, The Three Pillars of Liberty, 1996.
- 2 Packer, H, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction, 1968. As Walker puts it: 'The primacy of individual autonomy and rights is central to the due process model', Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, p 39.
- 3 See further Baldwin, 'Taking rules to excess: police powers and the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill 1984' in Brenton and Jones (eds), The Year Book of Social Policy in Britain 1984-85, 1985, pp 9-29; Jones, P, 'Police powers and political accountability: the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure'; Hillyard, P, 'From Belfast to Britain: some critical comments on the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure', both in Politics and Power, Vol 4, 1981; Jefferson, T, 'Policing the miners: law, politics and accountability', in Brenton and Ungerson (eds), The Year Book of Social Policy in Britain 1985-86, 1986, pp 265-86.
- 4 Packer, op cit, fn 1.
- 5 Packer, ibid. Eg, the two models are extensively relied on in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice, 1999. For discussion and criticism of the two models see Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 2000, Chapter 1, Part 7.
- 6 See, eg, Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998, esp para 8 of the Introduction.
- 7 Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, p 20.

externally imposed rules on actual police practice is limited and uncertain;⁸ in particular, researchers have highlighted the problems of rule-evasion—the avoidance of apparent safeguards through the use of informal practices⁹—and of deterrence.¹⁰ There is general agreement that internal police governance and culture will be highly significant in determining the extent to which suspects' rights are delivered, but it should also be emphasised that that culture is itself likely to be influenced by enhanced possibilities of external review of internal police decisions. There appears to be academic agreement that the relationship between external rules and police culture is a complex one and that rather than tending merely towards straightforward evasion of the legal rules, the institutional culture may encourage the development of strategies intended to adapt and accommodate the rules within the practices it has already fostered.¹¹ But it is also suggested that enhanced external review of such practices under the Human Rights Act (HRA) may encourage a shift from the working rules formulated by the police towards an infusion of the legal rules into their informal counterparts. As Dixon puts it: ' [Rule] compliance has to be sought by skilfully blending negotiation and imposition.'¹²

Before the inception of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), the police had no general and clear powers of arrest, stop and search or entry to premises. They wanted such powers put on a clear statutory basis so that they could exercise them where they felt it was their duty to do so without laying themselves open to the possibility of a civil action. Thus, PACE was introduced in order to provide clear and general police powers, but these were supposed to be balanced by greater safeguards for suspects which took into account the need to ensure that miscarriages of justice, such as that which occurred in the Confait case,¹³ would not recur. The Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure,¹⁴ whose report influenced PACE, was set up largely in response to the inadequacies of safeguards for suspects which were exposed in the Confait report.¹⁵

The result was a scheme in which the broad discretionary powers granted were to be balanced by two central structuring constraints. First, there were general

8 See: the PSI Report's distinction between Presentational, Inhibitory and Working Rules; Dixon, D, Law and Policing: Legal Regulation and Police Practices, 1997.

9 See, eg, Goldsmith, A, Taking police culture seriously: police discretion and the limits of the law' (1990) Policing and Society Vol 1, pp 91–114.

10 There is some evidence that use of exclusion of evidence may encourage police officers to observe suspects' rights. See Oldfield, 'The exclusionary rule and deterrence: an empirical study of Chicago narcotics officers' (1987) 54 U Chicago L Rev 1016–69. In the context of PACE, this finding receives some support from research by Sanders, Bridges, Mulvaney and Crozier entitled 'Advice and assistance at police stations', November 1989; it was thought that unlawful denials of legal advice had been discouraged by the ruling in R v Samuel [1988] 2 All ER 135. The research found that in 1987, before the ruling, delay was authorised in around 50% of applicable cases; in 1990–91, in only one case out of 10,000. Such evidence cannot, however, be treated as conclusive of the issue; apart from other factors, police officers will be aware that the question of exclusion of evidence is unlikely to arise since the case is unlikely to come to a full trial; even if it does arise, a conviction may still be obtained. Any deterrent effect is therefore likely to be undermined.

11 See Smith, DJ, 'Case construction and the goals of the criminal process' [1997] 37 Br Journal of Criminology 319; Ericson, RV, Making Crime: A Study of Detective Work, 1981.

12 In Walker and Starmer, op cit, fn 5, p 67.

13 See Report of the Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher, HC 90 of 1977–78.

14 Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure Report, Cmnd 8092, 1981 (RCCP Report).

15 HC 90, op cit, fn 13.

precedent conditions for the exercise of such powers, the most common and significant being the requirement of reasonable suspicion or belief. Secondly, there was the provision of specific countervailing due process rights, in particular a general right of custodial access to legal advice, in most cases laid down in, or underpinned by, quasi- and non-legal rules—the Codes of Practice and Notes for Guidance made under PACE.¹⁶ Redress for breaches of the due process safeguards was largely to be within the disciplinary rather than the judicial sphere: breach of the Codes constituted automatically a breach of the police disciplinary Code.¹⁷

The driving force behind PACE may have been, despite concerns raised by the Confait case, much more to do with crime control than with due process, but it did not lose sight entirely of the reasons for adopting it. Post-PAEC, the discovery of a number of miscarriages of justice—the cases of the Birmingham Six,¹⁸ the Guildford Four,¹⁹ Judith Ward,²⁰ Stefan Kiszko,²¹ the Tottenham Three,²² the *Maguire Seven*²³—raised due process concerns again, although in only one of these instances was PACE applicable.²⁴ After the Birmingham Six were freed in 1992, the Home Secretary announced the setting up of another Royal Commission under Lord Runciman²⁵ in order to consider further measures which could be introduced, but although there appeared to be a link between the announcement of the Royal Commission and the Birmingham Six case owing to proximity in time, the Commission interpreted its remit as not requiring an analysis of the miscarriage of justice in that case. The remit was to examine the efficacy of the criminal justice system in terms of securing the conviction of the guilty and the acquittal of the innocent.²⁶ Once again, a Royal Commission was seeking to reconcile potentially conflicting aims—concern to protect due process, but also to further crime control. As a number of commentators have observed, however, not only was the former part of this remit largely swallowed up in the latter,²⁷ it failed to articulate a principled account of investigative procedures.

After the Commission reported, the Major Government passed legislation, most notably the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 (CJPOA), which increased police powers significantly while removing a number of safeguards for suspects.

16 PACE 1984, s 66, Codes of Practice.

17 Ibid., s 67(8).

18 See R v McKenny and Others [1992] 2 All ER 417.

19 See May, J (Sir), Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Convictions Arising out of the Bomb Attacks at Guildford and Woolwich in 1974, Final Report, 1993–94 HC 449, Chapter 17.

20 R v Ward (1992) 96 Cr App R 1.

21 (1992) The Times, 18 February.

22 (1991) The Times, 9 December.

23 See R v Maguire [1992] 2 All ER 433.

24 The case of the Tottenham Three revealed flaws in the PACE scheme. It predated the introduction of PACE, but PACE was being used on a dry-run basis by the Metropolitan Police at the time. In the case of Winston Silcott, one of the Three, case notes of his confession, supposedly contemporaneous, were found under ESDA to have been tampered with, and his conviction was quashed in 1991; see (1991) The Times, 9 December.

25 Runciman Report, Cm 2263, 1993, Chapter 1, para 5; Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure chaired by Lord Runciman; it was announced by the Home Secretary on 14 March 1991, HC Deb Vol 187 Col 1109. It reported on 6 July 1993; see (1993) 143 NLJ 933–96 for a summary of its recommendations in respect of Police Investigations, Safeguards for Suspects, the Right to Silence and Confession Evidence.

26 Effectiveness in securing ‘the conviction of those guilty of criminal offences and the acquittal of those who are innocent’, Runciman Report, ibid., Chapter 1, para 5.

27 See Sanders and Young, ‘The RCCJ’ [1994] 14 OJLS 435; Walker and Starmer, op cit, fn 5, especially p 57.

In particular, the 1994 Act curtailed the right of silence, although the Runciman Royal Commission had recommended that the right should be retained since its curtailment might lead to further miscarriages of justice. Thus, there were significant developments in police powers during the Major years and the balance PACE was supposed to strike between such powers and due process was, it will be argued, undermined.

Since the Labour Government took office in 1997, there have been, apart from the passing of the HRA, no indications of attempts to break with the criminal justice legislative policies of the Conservative Party. Both before and after the general election of 2001, both major parties were seeking to outdo each other in encouraging and pandering to populist notions of crime control. One especially evident tendency has been the movement away from the need to show reasonable suspicion as a condition precedent for the exercise for police powers. Despite the fact that this condition appeared to offer little restraint in practice to police officers,²⁸ it may be said that its abandonment in the introduction of new arrest and detention powers is indicative of a formal acceptance of a less fettered police discretion, as opposed to the discretion developed de facto in police practice.

However, the UK now has a benchmark by which to measure standards of procedural justice. Given the current trend away from due process which this chapter will outline, the concomitant tendency to render police powers susceptible to subjective exercise, and the de facto discretion in respect of the delivery of due process rights which has developed, due at least in part to a largely unmet need for their enforcement, the HRA may be perceived as providing an opportunity to re-infuse due process into criminal procedure. It will be argued, however, that the impact of the HRA is likely to be diluted and unpredictable due to the weakness of the Strasbourg jurisprudence in certain key areas, areas in which the common law has traditionally failed to protect due process. Early decisions under the HRA indicate, this chapter and the next will argue, that the inception of the HRA will have little impact in such areas. More generally, judicial intervention and formal rules have always had, as indicated above, an uncertain impact on the institutional culture of the criminal justice system, and it would probably be unduly optimistic to predict a clear change of stance under the HRA.

In this chapter, the powers of the police and the safeguards which restrict the use of police powers are evaluated with a view to considering how far the suspects' rights granted by PACE have had an impact on police working practice and how far, if at all, change may occur in the light of the HRA. This is followed in Chapter 14 by a consideration of the value of the means of redress available, as affected by the inception of the HRA, if the police fail to comply with the rules.

28 See 'Arrest and reasonable suspicion' (1988) 85 Law Soc Gazette, 7 September, p 22, and see below, p 765.

2 THE STRUCTURE OF THE PACE RULES

At present, the rules governing the exercise of police powers are largely contained in the scheme created under PACE, as amended, which is made up of rules deriving from the Act itself, from the Codes of Practice made under it and the Notes for Guidance contained in the Codes. It is also influenced by Home Office circulars. The difference in status between these four levels and the significance of adopting this four tiered approach is considered below. A somewhat similar scheme has been created under the Terrorism Act 2000 with a view to creating at certain points a lesser level of protection for terrorist suspects.

PACE and the Codes

There are at present five Codes of Practice: Code A, covering stop and search procedures, Code B, covering searching of premises, Code C, covering interviewing and conditions of detention, Code D, covering identification methods and Code E, covering tape recording. Thus, each covers a particular area of PACE, although not all areas are covered: arrest, for example, is governed only by statutory provisions.²⁹ It may be asked why all of the stop and search rules, for example, were not merely made part of the Act. The answer may partly lie in the need for some flexibility in making changes: the Codes are quicker and less cumbersome to amend than statutory provisions. However, it is also possible that the government did not want to create rules which might give rise to liability on the part of the police if they were broken; rules which could operate at a lower level of visibility than statutory ones may have appeared more attractive.

Section 67(10) of PACE makes clear the intended distinction between Act and Codes in providing that no civil or criminal liability will arise from a breach of the Codes. This distinction is of significance in relation to the stop and search, arrest and detention provisions of Parts I to IV of PACE.³⁰ However, it does not seem to have any significance as far as the interviewing provisions of Part V are concerned. The most important statutory safeguard for interviewing, the entitlement to legal advice, has not been affected by the availability of tortious remedies.³¹ Thus statutory and Code provisions concerned with safeguards for suspects are in an equally weak position in the sense that a clear remedy is not available if they are breached. The context in which breaches of the interviewing provisions have been considered is that of exclusion of evidence.³² In that context, the courts have not drawn a 29 HC 90, op cit, fn 13.

30 In that respect, such claims are becoming very significant; in 1991, the Metropolitan Police faced an increase in claims of 40% over 1990. See HC Deb Vol 193 Col 370w. For discussion of the use of tortious claims in this context, see Chapter 14, pp 909–15.

31 The question whether an unlawful denial of access to legal advice amounts to a breach of statutory duty has been considered in an unreported case, 26 October 1985, QB (Rose J), which is cited by Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H in Civil Actions Against the Police, 1st edn, 1992, p 359. It was held that the application would be refused even if jurisdiction to make the order sought existed as it would 'cause hindrance to police inquiries'.

32 Breach of a code provision is quite frequently taken into account in determining whether or not a confession should be excluded, usually under PACE, s 78. Breach of a code provision will not lead to automatic exclusion of an interview obtained thereby, but a substantial and significant breach may be the first step on the way to its exclusion (see Walsh [1989] Crim LR 822, CA, transcript from LEXIS).

distinction between provisions of the Act or Codes except to require that breach of a Code provision should be of a substantial and significant nature³³ if exclusion of evidence is to be considered.

Notes for Guidance

The Notes for Guidance are contained in the Codes but are not part of them.³⁴ They were apparently intended, as their name suggests, to be used merely as interpretative provisions. However, as will be seen, they contain some very significant provisions, although it is unclear what the consequences of breach of a Note are. Evidence tainted by breach of a Note for Guidance is unlikely to be excluded since, unlike Code provisions, s 67(11) of PACE does not require a court to take the Notes into account in determining any question.³⁵ However, in DPP v Blake,³⁶ the Divisional Court impliedly accepted that a Note for Guidance will be considered in relation to exclusion of evidence if it can be argued that it merely amplifies a particular Code provision and can therefore be of assistance in determining whether breach of such a provision has occurred. Moreover, certain Notes need not merely be considered in conjunction with the paragraph they derive from; the ruling in DPP v Rouse and *DPP v Davis*³⁷ that they can sometimes be used as an aid to the interpretation of Code C as a whole extended their potential impact. Thus, it may be said that the Notes are of a very uncertain status but that their importance is beginning to be recognised in decisions as to admission of evidence.

Home Office circulars

There are a large number of such circulars dealing with disparate subjects relevant to the use of police powers; some of them are intended to work in tandem with a part of PACE as amplifying provisions and some operate in an area uncovered by the other provisions. They are in an even more equivocal legal position than the Notes. Their legal significance derives from their relevance to the obligations arising from the relationship between police forces and the Home Office and it is likely to be in that context rather than in relation to questions of admissibility that they will be considered.³⁸ Clearly, argument that a court may be disinclined to consider a Note for Guidance applies a fortiori to the circulars.³⁹ It also seems clear that a decision taken in breach of a circular will not be susceptible to judicial review.⁴⁰

33 Keenan [1989] 3 All ER 598, CA.

34 This is provided for in the first paragraph of each Code; see, eg, Code C, para 1.3.

35 PACE 1984, s 67(11) provides: 'In all criminal and civil proceedings any such code shall be admissible in evidence; and if any provision of such a code appears to the court or tribunal conducting the proceedings to be relevant to any question arising in the proceedings it shall be taken into account in determining that question.'

36 [1989] 1 WLR 432, CA.

37 (1992) Cr App R 185.

38 See Home Secretary ex p Westminster Press Ltd (1991) The Guardian, 12 February; Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Lancashire Police Authority (1992) The Times, 26 May. They may also be relevant to issues arising under the Police Act 1996, s 89 (formerly the Police Act 1964, s 51). In Collins and Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374; [1984] 1 WLR 1172, Home Office circular 109/59 was wrongly interpreted by a police officer; her actions in reliance on the incorrect interpretation were held to be outside the execution of her duty. However, the question whether breach of provisions contained in a circular could lead to exclusion of evidence has not yet been determined.

3 STOP AND SEARCH POWERS

The PACE stop and search powers were meant to maintain a balance between the interest of society, as represented by the police, in crime control and national security, and the interest of the citizen in personal liberty. Under the due process model, detention short of arrest—usually, although not invariably, exercised in the form of stop and search powers - should be based on reasonable suspicion relating to the specific actions of an individual. Under the crime control model, such detention is viewed as an investigative tool which should be based on general police experience; inhibitory rules should be kept to a minimum in order to allow police officers to act on instinct; police discretion should be the guiding principle. The use of such powers is currently viewed as a necessary part of effective modern policing. It has been argued that much policing is reactive; it is initiated by civilians⁴¹ and therefore the nature of stop and search powers assumes less significance, but this argument is open to question.⁴² However, at the present time the growth of intelligence-led policing⁴³ has led to a more proactive stance, which will tend to enhance the importance of stop and search. The powers represent less of an infringement of liberty than an arrest, but on the other hand their exercise may create a sense of grievance and of violation of personal privacy. Such feelings may contribute to the alienation of the police from the community, leading to a breakdown in law and order expressed in its most extreme form in rioting,⁴⁴ and otherwise in a general lack of co-operation with the police. Thus, the extensiveness of stop and search powers may tell us something about the extent to which UK society values individual liberty, but it is also clear that this is a complex issue: too great an infringement of liberty may be as likely to result ultimately in less effective crime control as in too great a restriction of police powers.

As this chapter will indicate, the grant of further powers has not been accompanied by a concomitant strengthening of the protection for the due process rights affecting arrest and detention. One of the key structuring constraints identified above as intended to protect due process under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 was the requirement of reasonable suspicion. This requirement has been eroded in the post-PACE developments; it has been dropped from the more recently introduced special powers and under the Terrorism Act 2000 it continues to be unnecessary in respect of terrorist suspects.

The use of these powers remains a contentious matter that continues to attract public attention, especially as it has frequently been suggested that they may be 39 This point was made in Wolehover, D and Heaton-Armstrong, A, 'The questioning Code revamped' [1991] Crim LR 232, with reference to the revision of Code C.

40 See Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA [1986] AC 112, HL (non-statutory administrative guidance by government departments to subordinate authorities is not as a general rule subject to judicial review). Applicability of this rule to circulars directed to the police was confirmed in Home Secretary ex p Westminster Press Ltd (1991) The Guardian, 12 February.

41 See Shapland, J and Vagg, J, Policing by the Public, 1988.

42 In 1993–94, 24% of arrests resulted from proactive policing including stopping and searching: Phillips and Brown, Home Office Research Study No 185, 1998. Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, 2000, p 70 argue that in future, stopping and searching may play a greater part in arrests.

43 See Chapter 11, p 696.

44 See, on this point, Lord Scarman, The Brixton Disorders, Cmnd 8427, 1981; McConville, M, 'Search of persons and premises' [1983] Crim LR 604–14.

used in a discriminatory fashion. While it now appears incontrovertible that racial discrimination affects their use, the extent to which this is the case remains controversial.⁴⁵ Their recorded use has more than trebled since PACE came into force in 1986⁴⁶ and, as indicated below, a large number of further powers have been introduced in the post-PACE period. One factor influencing the rise in their use may have been the introduction of 'zero tolerance' policies in the mid-1990s. The efficacy of such powers is debatable. Only around 10%-14% of stops led to an arrest and only around 3% to a charge.⁴⁷ These figures do not include stops which did not lead to a search, or voluntary stops, and therefore the percentage of stops leading to a charge must be lower than this. There are, of course, other methods of measuring the crime control value of stop and search powers; in particular, they have some value in terms of information-gathering and, more controversially, as a means of asserting police authority on the streets.

This proliferation of usage and of powers was not accompanied by a full official review of their crime control value or adverse due process impact⁴⁸ until the issues were raised in relation to the Lawrence case in the MacPherson Report in 1999,⁴⁹ Owing to its remit, they did not form a central focus of the Report; in so far as powers to detain short of arrest were considered, the concern centred on the question of institutionalised racism in relation to their use. The part which such powers might play in miscarriages of justice and their general links with other aspects of policing, especially the interview, has hardly had an airing in recent official reports.⁵⁰ As discussed below, the possibility that informal street contacts may influence and structure the formal interview are especially significant in the post-HRA era.

The prevalence of voluntary searches also continues to undermine the reasonable suspicion requirement, and while this problem has been recognised post-PACE, no serious attempt has been made to address it. The apparently voluntary basis of a large number of searches has continued to be questionable.⁵¹ Inconsistency of practice between forces is readily apparent.⁵² Persons may be intimidated by police authority and may submit to a search where no power to search in fact exists. Such searches may come to light only if the suspect later raises the argument that the police were not entitled to assume that he had consented or if, after initial compliance, the suspect resists and is charged with assaulting an officer in the course of his duty.⁵³

The formal position remains unchanged—police officers have no right to detain and question a person in the absence of specific statutory powers allowing them to 45 See fn 93, below.

46 Home Office Statistical Bulletin 21/93; Statistical Bulletin 27/97.

47 Home Office Statistical Bulletin 21/93.

48 They were outside the remit of the Runciman Royal Commission.

49 Cm 4262-1. (1999).

50 Eg, the Consultation Paper on Terrorism, Cm 4178, 1998, which recommended the retention of counter-terrorist stop and search powers, failed to consider these matters, and made no reference to research it might have been based on.

51 Dixon, D, Coleman, C and Bottomley, K, 'Consent and the legal regulation of policing' (1990) 17 JLS 345.

52 Certain forces such as Bedfordshire use a separate consent form for voluntary searches, but such practice is by no means universal. See 'Modernising the tactic: improving the use of stop and search', Policing and Reducing Crime: Briefing Note No 2, November 1999.

do so. Of course, society considers it desirable that the police should be able to make contact with citizens in order to make general inquiries without invoking any specific powers; on the other hand, citizens do not need to reply to such inquiries. A police officer can ask a citizen to refrain from doing something, but in general, the citizen may refuse if the action is not in itself unlawful. If this were not the case, there would be little need for other specific powers; an officer could, for example, merely ask a person to submit to a search and if he refused, warn him that he could be charged with obstruction. However, some otherwise lawful behaviour, including failure to obey a police officer, may bring a citizen within the ambit of the offence of obstruction of a constable which arises under s 89(2) of the Police Act 1996 (formerly under s 51(3) of the Police Act 1964), and therefore, the way it has been interpreted determines the borderline between legitimate and illegitimate disobedience to police instructions or requests.⁵⁴ Section 89(2) creates an area of liability independent of any other substantive offence. Behaviour is criminalised in relation to police officers which would not give rise to criminal liability if directed at any other group of persons. Thus, some contacts between police officer and citizen may result in the creation of liability where otherwise, none would have existed.⁵⁵

Following Rice v Connolly,⁵⁶ three tests must be satisfied if liability for this offence is to be made out. First, it must be shown that the constable was in the execution of his or her duty. Actions outside an officer's duty would seem to include any action which is unlawful or contrary to Home Office circulars⁵⁷ or the Codes of Practice. However, some actions which may be termed unlawful may be found too trivial to take the officer outside the execution of his or her duty. In *Bentley v Brudzinski*⁵⁸ an officer laid a hand on the shoulder of the defendant in order to detain him so as to ask further questions. The court found that in trying to prevent the defendant from returning home, the officer was acting outside the execution of his duty, but considered that not all instances in which an officer used some physical restraint would be treated in the same way. Reference was made to *Donnelly v Jackman*⁵⁹ in which, on very similar facts, it was found that an officer was not outside the execution of his duty. All that can be said, then, is that all the circumstances of the case must be considered in determining whether an officer is within the execution of his duty and that the more significant the restraint used, the more likely it is that the officer will be outside it. Does it follow that any action of an officer which is not unlawful or contrary to official guidance will be within the execution of duty? It was found in *Coffin v Smith*⁶⁰ that any action within the 53 See Osman v Director of Public Prosecutions (1999) The Times, 29 September, Judgment of 1 July 1999, in which Sedley LJ indicated that an initial passive response to a search would not entitle officers to assume that the subject was consenting to it.

54 For discussion of the development of this offence see [1982] PL 558; (1983) MLR 662; [1983] Crim LR 29; [1983] Crim LR 21.

55 See further on this point [1983] Crim LR 21, p 36.

56 [1966] 2 QB 414; [1966] All ER 649; [1966] 3 WLR 17, DC.

57 In Collins v Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374; [1984] 1 WLR 1172 a police officer wrongly interpreted a Home Office circular; her actions in reliance on the incorrect interpretation were held to DC outside the execution of her duty.

58 [1982] Crim LR 825; (1982) The Times, 3 and 11 March.

59 (1970) Cr App R 229; [1970] 1 WLR 562.

officer's duty as a 'keeper of the peace' would be within his or her duty. Thus, an officer does not need to point to a specific requirement to perform a particular duty imposed by superiors, but equally, some actions which are not unlawful would seem to fall outside his duty.

Secondly, it must be shown that the defendant did an act which made it more difficult for the officer to carry out her or his duty. Physically attempting to prevent an arrest, as in Hills v Ellis,⁶¹ will satisfy this test. This is not to imply that a physical act must occur, but that the police must actually be impeded in some way. In *Lewis v Cox*⁶² a persistent inquiry as to where an arrested friend was being taken was held to amount to obstruction. The defendant opened the door of the police van, clearly preventing it from driving off, in order to make the inquiry after being told to desist. The ruling in *Ricketts v Cox*⁶³ that a refusal to answer questions accompanied by abuse was obstruction may delineate the lowest level of behaviour which may be termed obstructive. According to Rice v Connolly, a refusal to answer questions does not amount to obstruction; therefore, the abuse alone must have constituted the obstruction. This decision, which has been widely criticised,⁶⁴ is perhaps hard to reconcile with Bentley v Brudzinski and possibly interpreted the meaning of obstruction too widely.

It must, finally, be shown, following Lewis v Cox, that the defendant behaved wilfully in the sense that he acted deliberately with the knowledge and intention that he would obstruct the police officer. A defendant may be 'wilful' even though his purpose is to pursue some private objective of his own, rather than to obstruct the officer, so long as his act is deliberate and he realises that it will in fact impede the officer. This will be the case, according to Hills v Ellis, even if the purpose of the defendant is to help the officer.⁶⁵

If a person physically resists an arrest or stop in the belief that it is unlawful, he may incur liability under the offence of assault on a constable which now arises under s 89(1) of the Police Act 1996. Liability may arise even though the defendant is unaware that the person he is assaulting is a police officer.⁶⁶ This is strange, since the only justification for creating an area of liability in addition to common law assault and battery would seem to be that there is greater culpability in striking an officer rather than any other individual owing to the officer's special position as keeper of the peace. However, if the defendant believes that unlawful force is being used against him, he can avail himself of the defence of self-defence, although according to Albert v Lavin,⁶⁷ the belief in the need to act in self-defence must be based on reasonable grounds. This limitation was not accepted by the Court of Appeal in Gladstone Williams:⁶⁸ it was found that an honest belief would be sufficient.

60 (1980) Cr App R 221.

61 [1983] QB 680; [1983] 1 All ER 667.

62 (1985) Cr App R 1.

63 (1981) Cr App R 298; see commentary by Birch, D, 'Confessions and confusions under the 1984 Act' [1989] Crim LR 95; Smith, JC and Hogan, J, Criminal Law, 1988, p 394; Lidstone [1983] Crim LR 29, pp 33–35.

64 See Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 1983, p 204; Lidstone, K [1983] Crim LR 29, pp 33–35.

65 Cf Wilmott v Atack [1977] QB 498; [1976] 3 All ER 794.

66 Forbes (1865) 10 Cox CC 362; for criticism see Williams, op cit, fn 64, p 200.

67 [1982] AC 546; [1981] 3 All ER 878, HL. See (1972) 88 LQR 246 on the use of self-defence in these circumstances.

68 (1983) Cr App R 276; see commentary [1984] Crim LR 164.

However, it appears that if the honest belief is arrived at through intoxication, the facts will be considered as an objective observer would have perceived them to be.⁶⁹ Apart from the assault, the other elements will be interpreted as for obstruction.

The PACE stop and search power

There was no general power at common law to detain without the subject's consent in the absence of specific statutory authority.⁷⁰ Instead, there was a miscellany of such powers, the majority of which have been superseded.⁷¹ The Phillips Royal Commission, whose report influenced PACE,⁷² recommended the introduction of a new general power, but accepted the need to maintain a balance between the interest of society as represented by the police in crime control, and the interest of the citizen in personal liberty and privacy. This balance was sought to be achieved partly by introducing a reasonable suspicion element into the PACE powers.

Under s 1 of PACE for the first time a general power to stop⁷³ and search persons (s 1(1)) or vehicles (s 1(2))⁷⁴ was conferred on police constables. It arises if the constable forms the reasonable suspicion that stolen goods, or prohibited articles (including offensive weapons)⁷⁵ will be found by searching the suspect. It may be that the suspect appears to be in innocent possession of the goods or articles; this does not affect the power to stop, although it would affect the power to arrest; in this sense, the power to stop is broader than the arrest power. Section 4 of PACE enables the police to use their powers under the Road Traffic Act 1988⁷⁶ to set up road blocks and to stop and search any vehicle to see whether it contains a wanted person.

Under s 1(6), if an article is found which appears to be stolen or prohibited, the officer can seize it. The s 1 power may be exercised in any place to which the public or a section of it, have access (s 1(1)(a)) or in any other place 'to which people have ready access at the time when [the constable] proposes to exercise the power but which is not a dwelling' (s 1(1)(b)). Powers to enter a dwelling arise under ss 17 and 18, but an officer can search a suspect in a garden or yard or other land 'occupied with or used for the purposes of a dwelling' (assuming, of course, that the provision of s 1 as to reasonable suspicion are fulfilled) if it appears that the

69 See O'Connor [1991] Crim LR 135.

70 For a full list of the powers arising from 16 statutes see RCCP Report 1981.

71 A non-exhaustive list of current statutory stop and search powers to which Code A applies is given in Annex A to Code A (1999 version).

72 Op cit, fn 14.

73 It should be noted that the police do not need to search the suspect once he or she has been stopped; they may decide not to. Nevertheless, reasonable suspicion that stolen goods or articles are being carried must arise before the stop can be made.

74 A power to stop vehicles which is not dependent on reasonable suspicion arises under s 163 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. PACE 1984, s 4 regulates it when it is used as the basis for a general road check.

75 Under s 1(7), the articles are '(a) offensive weapons or (b) articles (i) made or adapted for use in the course of or in connection with an offence to which this sub-paragraph applies; or (ii) intended by the person having it with him for such use by him or by some other person', under s 1(8), the offences to which s 1(7)(b)(i) above applies are: '(a) burglary; (b) theft; (c) offences under s 12 of the Theft Act 1968; (d) offences under s 15 of that Act.' 'Section 1(8A) applies to [any article which falls within] s 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988'. Under s 1(9), offensive weapon means 'any article (a) made or adapted for use for causing injury to persons or (b) intended by the person having it with him for such use by him or by some other person'.

76 See fn 74 above.

person does not reside in the dwelling or have the permission of the owner to be there (s 1(4)).

This general power to stop, search and seize is balanced in two ways. First, the concept of reasonable suspicion allows it to be exercised only when quite a high level of suspicion exists. Secondly, under s 2, the police officer must provide the person to be searched with certain information. These requirements are discussed below.

Power to search for drugs

Section 23 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 provides a stop and search power which is frequently invoked. Under s 23, a constable may stop and search a person whom the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect is in possession of a controlled drug. This power may be exercised anywhere, unlike the power under s 1 of PACE; thus, persons on private premises may be searched once police officers are lawfully on the premises. The provisions as to reasonable suspicion will be interpreted in accordance with Code A. Code A and ss 2 and 3 of PACE apply to this as they do to other statutory stop and search powers unless specific exceptions are made (see below).

Reasonable suspicion

Reasonable suspicion is a flexible, broad and uncertain concept; para 1 of Code of Practice A on Stop and Search as revised in 1991, 1995, 1997 and 1999, applying to all statutory search powers dependent on reasonable suspicion, sets out to explain what it means. Paragraphs 1.6 and 1.7 provide that it is not enough for a police officer to have a hunch that a person has committed or is about to commit an offence; there must be a concrete basis for this suspicion which relates to the particular person in question and could be evaluated by an objective observer. When Code A was revised in 1997,⁷⁷ some departure from this stance was effected. Paragraph 1.6A allows an officer to take into account information that members of a particular gang habitually carry knives, other weapons or have drugs in their possession. Paragraph 1.7AA provides that if a person wears an item of clothing or other insignia suggesting that he belongs to such a gang, he may be stopped and searched. Paragraphs 1.6 and 1.7 explain the objective nature of reasonable suspicion and forbid stereotyping in arriving at such suspicion:

- 1.6 An officer will need to consider the nature of the article suspected of being carried in the context of other factors such as the time and the place and the behaviour of the person concerned or those with him. Reasonable suspicion may exist, for example, where information has been received such as a description of an article being carried or of a suspected offender; a person is seen acting covertly or warily or attempting to hide something; or a person is carrying a certain type of article at an unusual time or in a place where a number of burglaries or thefts are known to have taken place recently. But the decision to stop and search must be based on all the facts which bear on the likelihood that an article of a certain kind will be found.

- 1.7 ...a person's colour, age, hairstyle or manner of dress or the fact that he is known to have a previous conviction for possession of an unlawful article, cannot be used alone or in combination with each other as the sole basis on which to search that person. Nor may it be founded on the basis of stereotyped images of certain persons or groups as more likely to be committing offences.

The most significant change brought about when Code A was revised in 1991 was the omission of the requirement that the suspicion should be of the same level as that necessary to effect an arrest.⁷⁸ The original intention behind including this provision was to stress the high level of suspicion required before a stop and search could take place; this change, therefore, tends to remove some of that emphasis and could be taken to imply that there are two levels of suspicion, the level required under Code A being the lower. However, although this omission may convey such a message to police officers, it may not make much difference to the way the police actually operate stop and search.

In practice, there is little evidence that reasonable suspicion acts as a constraint if police officers wish to stop and search without it. Research in the area suggests that there is a tendency to view reasonable suspicion as a flexible concept which may denote a low level of suspicion.⁷⁹ Sanders and Young conclude, having reviewed the relevant research, that 'the legal understanding of reasonable suspicion plays little part in officers' thought processes or decision-making',⁸⁰ although they also suggest that PACE may be bringing about some change in 'cop culture'; young officers may be taught to act 'according to the book' as opposed to acting instinctively. The case law is meagre, but suggests that an imprecise and inconsistent standard is maintained. In Slade,⁸¹ the suspect was close to the house of a well known drug dealer; on noticing the officer, he put his hand in his pocket and smiled. This constituted reasonable suspicion. However, in Black v DPP,⁸² the fact of visiting a well known drug dealer was found to be insufficient as a basis for reasonable suspicion.

Counter-terrorist powers

The Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, as amended (PTA) and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, as amended (EPA) contained special powers providing for the detaining, questioning and searching of pedestrians and vehicles for articles of use in carrying out acts of terrorism and to prevent terrorist attacks. The powers under ss 44–47 of the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA) are based on the PTA and EPA powers and, as Chapter 8 explains, they are applied to a far wider range of people under s 1 of the TA owing to the new and broad definition of 'terrorism'.⁸³ It may be noted that under s 116(2) of the TA, the powers conferred under the Act to stop persons are deemed to include powers to stop vehicles, and it is an offence to fail to stop a vehicle. Sections 15(3) and (4) of the PTA empowered a police officer to stop and search anyone who appeared to 78 Previously contained in Annex B, para 4 of Code A.

79 See Dixon (1989) 17 Int J Soc Law 185–206.

80 Sanders and Young, p 43.

81 LEXIS CO/1678/96 (1996).

82 (1995) unreported, 11 May.

83 See Chapter 8, pp 402–03.

him to be liable for arrest under s 14 of the Act and to search him for anything which might confirm the officer's suspicions as to his involvement in terrorism. Under s 14(1)(b), in order to arrest, a constable had to have reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person was 'concerned in the preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland or any other act' of non-domestic terrorism.⁸⁴ The s 15 power was partially influenced by the reasonable suspicion requirement. It did not depend on the need to show reasonable suspicion that the suspect was carrying the items which might be searched for, but the officer had to have reasonable grounds for suspecting that the suspect was liable to arrest under s 14. These stop and search powers are reproduced, but broadened, under s 43 of the TA, which provides: 'A constable may stop and search a person whom he reasonably suspects to be a terrorist to discover whether he has in his possession anything which may constitute evidence that he is a terrorist.' 'Being a terrorist' is not in itself an offence under the TA (unless the 'terrorist' group in question is also proscribed), although some, but not all, actions falling within the definition of terrorism in s 1 of the TA are coterminous with existing offences; therefore, this power is not dependent on suspicion of commission of an offence or of carrying prohibited articles.

There were also powers in s 16 of and para 4(2) of Sched 5 to the PTA, which empowered the police and others to stop, question and search people, vehicles and unaccompanied freight, which were about to enter or leave Great Britain or Northern Ireland, to determine whether they had been concerned in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism. These powers formed part of the 'ports and border controls' contained in the PTA. They are reproduced in Sched 7 of the TA and again, they are not dependent on showing reasonable suspicion.

Under the Major Government, additional stop and search powers were added to the PTA. These powers introduce a number of significant features. Not only do they arise independently of reasonable suspicion relating to objects suspected of being carried, but they make it an offence in itself to refuse to comply with the search. It is not an offence under PACE to refuse to comply with a s 1 search, or to obstruct it, although to do so would probably amount to the offence of obstructing a constable under s 89(2) of the Police Act 1996.⁸⁵

Section 81(1) of the CJPOA 1994 amended the PTA by inserting into it a new s 13A which provides that an officer of the rank of Commander as regards the Metropolitan area or the City of London, or of the rank of Assistant Chief Constable as regards any other police area, can authorise officers to stop and search vehicles and their occupants within a particular locality if he or she considers that it is expedient to do so to prevent acts of terrorism. The authorisation must stipulate both the area to which it applies and the period, not exceeding 28 days, for which it will remain in force. Authorisations may be renewed for a further period or periods of up to 28 days at a time. If such an authorisation is in force, an officer may stop any vehicle within the specified locality in order to look for articles which could be used for the commission of acts of terrorism. Since the term 'expedient' is used, there is no requirement that the officer granting the authorisation should reasonably believe that it is necessary in order to prevent the commission of acts of terrorism. The term seems to connote a less rigorous requirement.

84 See below, p 783.

85 Reproducing the Police Act 1964, s 51(3).

The PTA was further amended by the Prevention of Terrorism (Additional Powers) Act 1996 to include a number of new stop and search powers. The government considered that introduction of the new powers was necessary because of the threat of IRA activity on the British mainland in spring 1996. These include a power under s 1, which inserted s 13B into the PTA, to stop and search citizens in designated areas without reasonable suspicion.⁸⁶ The authorisation requirements were the same as those under s 13A but for the added requirement that the authorisation must be confirmed by the Secretary of State within 48 hours. If it was not so confirmed, it ceased to have effect (s 13A(8)), but if confirmed it remained in force, and subsisted for up to 28 days. Refusing to comply with the search is an offence carrying a penalty higher than those which could be used, if necessary, under the general offence of obstructing a constable.

The powers under ss 13A and B formed the basis for the powers arising under ss 44–46 of the Terrorism Act 2000, which replaced them. Authorisations apply to a specific area and are for a maximum of 28 days (although that period may be renewed). Reproducing ss 13A(4) and 13B(3), the new provisions expressly confirm that reasonable suspicion remains irrelevant. Section 45(1)(a) provides that the powers under s 44 ‘may be exercised only for the purpose of searching for articles of a kind which could be used in connection with terrorism’ but in order to ensure that this is not interpreted as a limiting requirement, s 45(1)(b) provides that the powers ‘may be exercised whether or not the constable has grounds for suspecting the presence of articles of that kind’.

One difference between the TA and PTA powers is that vehicle stop and search authorisations, as well as pedestrian ones, will have to be confirmed by the Secretary of State within 48 hours of their being made, or they will cease to have effect. This appears to be a gesture in the direction of due process, since it rectifies the anomaly of the difference between the exercise of the powers in respect of pedestrians and those in respect of vehicles, and provides, at least theoretically, a level of oversight in relation to both. An authorisation confirmed by the Secretary of State, can be renewed at the end of 28 days under s 46(7) which provides: ‘An authorisation may be renewed in writing by the person who gave it or by a person who could have given it; and subsections (1) to (6) shall apply as if a new authorisation were given on each occasion on which the authorisation is renewed.’ Thus, theoretically, authorisations could be continually renewed, depending on the intervention of the Secretary of State. The tendency of this provision may be in practice to leave the authorisation power largely in police hands alone.

If a person fails to stop when asked by a constable acting under s 44 of the TA to do so, or wilfully obstructs the constable in exercising these powers, he or she will be liable to a fine of £5,000 or a prison sentence of six months, or both, under s 47. Thus, if someone who is not involved in terrorism resists a search in a designated area, and is, for example, found to be carrying a small amount of cannabis, he or she might in theory face a prison sentence, although the offence committed—possession of cannabis—would not usually lead to the imposition of such a sentence and might well be dealt with by way of caution.

⁸⁶ The search only authorises a constable to require a person to remove headgear, footwear, outer coat, jacket or gloves (s 4A).

Special powers to prevent anticipated local violence

Section 60 of the CJPOA 1994, as amended by s 8 of the Knives Act 1997, provides police officers with a further stop and search power which does not depend on showing reasonable suspicion of particular wrongdoing on the part of an individual. An officer of at least the rank of inspector can authorise the stop and search of any person or vehicle within a particular locality if he or she reasonably believes that incidents involving ‘serious violence’ may take place in that area and that authorisation is expedient in order to prevent their occurrence. The authorisation may apply to a period not exceeding 24 hours, but it can be renewed for a further 24 hours if such an authorisation is in force. An officer may stop anyone within the specified locality in order to look for offensive weapons or dangerous instruments whether or not there are any grounds for suspecting that such articles are being carried. In contrast to s 1 of PACE, failure to stop is an offence under s 60(8).

Section 60 was also amended by s 25 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 to provide a power under s 60(4A)(a) to demand the removal of a face covering ‘if the constable reasonably believes that person is wearing [it] wholly or mainly for the purpose of concealing his identity’. Section 25 also amended s 60 to provide a further, separate, power under s 60(4A) (b) to ‘seize any item which the constable reasonably believes any person intends to wear wholly or mainly for that purpose’. This is not, formally, a power to stop and search for face coverings. The constable must be acting under another power or the person must be carrying the covering (or item which could be used as a covering) openly. It is an arrestable⁸⁷ offence under the new s 60(8)(b) to fail to remove a face covering. These provisions have clear implications for public protest, which are discussed in Chapter 9.⁸⁸ While on their face they do not create a new power of stop and search, they may do so in practice since, once an authorisation is in force under s 60, a constable does not require reasonable suspicion that dangerous weapons or instruments will be found in order to stop and search.

Section 163 of the Road Traffic Act 1988

A very broad power to stop vehicles arises under s 163 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 (RTA). Its ambit remains unclear. Section 163 provides a constable in uniform with power to stop vehicles, which may be unqualified as to purpose⁸⁹ and does not depend upon reasonable suspicion. If s 163 is of general application, s 1(2) of PACE appears to provide a power to search a vehicle and to detain it for that purpose once it has been stopped under s 163.⁹⁰ If s 163 is concerned only with traffic offences, s 1(2) must contain an implied power to stop a vehicle in order to detain it for a search.

87 The 1998 Act, s 27(1) amends PACE 1984, s 24 for this purpose.

88 See p 430.

89 See HC Standing Committee E, Col 339, 13 December 1983.

90 This would confirm Lodwick v Sanders [1985] 1 All ER 577.

Use of the counter-terrorist, road traffic and special powers

It is notable that no judicial body is involved in the supervision of the counter-terrorist and special powers. All of them are subject to executive supervision only, either by the police themselves or, in the case of s 44 of the TA, by the Home Secretary. These powers discard a key due process safeguard and therefore might be justified only if they are likely to have real value in terms of curbing criminal or terrorist activity. In debate on the 1996 Bill, Michael Howard was asked how many arrests and convictions had followed use of the existing s 13A power to stop and search. In reply, he said that there had been 1,746 stops and 1,695 searches of vehicles, 2,373 searches of persons as occupants of vehicles in the five Metropolitan police areas and 8,142 stops and 6,854 searches of vehicles and 40 searches of persons as occupants of vehicles within the Heathrow perimeter. These had together led to two arrests under the PTA and to 66 other arrests.⁹¹ These figures are clearly telling. They suggest that stopping and searching without reasonable suspicion leads to an extremely low level of arrests and therefore may not be the most effective use of police resources. This very low level of arrests may be compared with the general level flowing from stop and search with reasonable suspicion, which is now around 10%.⁹² This figure itself is low (and may not be reliable), but nevertheless suggests that stop and search with reasonable suspicion (even though that concept may be interpreted very flexibly) is more productive on the face of it in crime control terms than stop and search without it. Howard, however, also made the point, although unsupported by specific evidence, that this does not represent the whole picture, since would-be terrorists may be diverted from their activities, information may be gathered and weapons may be found.

The figures given above also suggest that in so far as these powers do have a value, it lies partly in their (albeit low) level of apprehension of persons engaged in non-terrorist offences. If one of the objects of introducing the powers under ss 13A and 13B was in reality to curb drug trafficking, they should have been debated in Parliament on that basis. The 1999 revision of Code A introduced the requirement under para 1.16 that the ss 13A and B powers should 'not be used for stop and search for reasons unconnected with terrorism'. However, as indicated below, this provision is virtually unenforceable.

Since all these powers on their face allow for stop and search on subjective grounds, they may tend to be used disproportionately against the black community. Post-PACE research has consistently suggested that stop and search powers are used in a discriminatory fashion⁹³ and in response, a rather ambiguous anti-racism provision was introduced in the 1999 revision of Code A. Paragraph 1.16 gives an appearance of seeking to address the problem of racist stops in stating: 'officers should take particular care not to discriminate against members of ethnic minorities in the exercise of these powers.' But the paragraph continues: "There may be circumstances, however, where it is appropriate for officers to take account of a person's ethnic origin in selecting persons to be stopped in response to a specific terrorist threat.' This hazily worded provision might be interpreted as legitimising racist stops and thereby undermining the preceding words. In 1995, Note 1A of Code A was revised to add the requirement that 'the selection of those questioned or searched is based upon objective factors and not upon personal prejudice'. In the 1999 revision, this requirement became part of Note 1AA and further requirements were added regarding the use of the power under s 25 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 (introducing new s 60(4A) and (B) into the CJPOA) to provide a power to demand the removal of a face covering. Note 1 AA provides that if asking a Muslim woman to remove a covering, the officer should permit this to be done out of public view. Thus, as far as s 163 of the 1988 Act, s 60 of the CJPOA and s 44 of the TA are concerned, these requirements contained in quasi- or non-legal provisions are the only 'safeguards' against a racially stereotyped or insensitive use of these powers. As discussed below, this problem may be addressed under the HRA, while the amendments made to the Race Relations Act 1976 in 2000 by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 may have an impact on police practice since, as Chapter 16 explains,⁹⁴ discrimination on grounds of race in law enforcement is now covered by the 1976 Act.

91 HC Deb Col 211,2 April 1996.

92 Wilkins and Addicot, Home Office Statistical Bulletin 2/99, 1999.

93 See Skogan, HO Research Study No 117, 1990 p 34; Entry into the Criminal Justice System, August 1998 and Statistics on Race and the Criminal Justice System, December 1998; MacPherson Report, 1999, Cm 4262-1. According to the report, in 1999 blacks were six times more likely than whites to be stopped; in 1998, blacks were five times more likely to be stopped than whites.

This bundle of powers, which may allow near-random stopping once a designation is in force, may, as indicated, result not in arrests for terrorist offences or offences of serious violence, but for drug-related or other, more minor offences. It has often been observed that arrests may well be entirely unrelated to the reason for the original encounter with the police. These powers are therefore objectionable in the sense that they have been adopted apparently in response to near-crisis situations, whereas they may be used in situations which would not alone have justified their adoption. Since the wide powers under s 60 of the 1994 Act and s 44 of the Act of 2000 are not subject to limitation flowing from the concept of reasonable suspicion, they represent a departure from the principle that only an individual who has given rise to such suspicion due to his or her actions should suffer the infringement of liberty represented by a stop and search.

Special seizure powers

The Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP) introduced certain new seizure powers. Under s 51(1) and (2) of the CJP, if an officer already has a power of search he or she can seize property which may not be covered by that power if it is not practicable to ascertain what the item is at the time or if it is attached to something that the officer does have the power to seize. This new provision is significant since inter alia it allows the police officers to remove items from persons even where they are not certain that—apart from s 51—they have the power to do so.

This new power is 'balanced' by the provisions of ss 52–61 which provide a number of safeguards. Notice must be given to persons whose property has been seized under s 52, and under s 59 he or she can apply to the 'appropriate judicial authority' for the return of the whole or part of the seized property, on the ground that there was no power to seize it or that excluded or special procedure material or legally privileged material⁹⁵ is not comprised in other property as provided for in ss 54 and 55. Under s 60 a duty to secure the property arises which includes the obligation under s 61 to prevent inter alia copying of it. Special provisions are made for the return of excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege, which are discussed in Chapter 11.⁹⁶ The property can be retained under s 56 if it appears to have been obtained in consequence of the commission of an offence and otherwise it might be lost, damaged, altered or destroyed. The idea behind these new powers is to allow the seizure of documents or computer discs which cannot readily be examined on the street. But despite the safeguards introduced, it is not clear that the new powers, especially to seize and use legally privileged material, are compatible with the requirements of the Convention under the HRA. For example, arguments could be raised at trial that Art 8 was breached due to the seizure of confidential material; it could be argued that due to the nature of these provisions they should be afforded a strict construction, using s 3 of the HRA if necessary.

94 See p 991.

95 See Chapter 1, pp 642–43.

Procedural requirements

Under s 2(1) of PACE, the procedural safeguards it sets out, together with those under s 3, apply to the PACE power and to powers under any other statutory provisions. Statutory powers of search are also subject to the same procedural requirements under Code A as those relating to the powers under s 1 of PACE, apart—where relevant—from the Code A provisions relating to reasonable suspicion (Code A, para 1.5(b)). The special counter-terrorism powers have been subject to such requirements but, in future, will be covered by a new TA Code of Practice.⁹⁷ An element of due process is introduced into all these statutory stop and search powers by the information giving and recording requirements under ss 2 and 3 of PACE and Code of Practice A, para 1.5(c) made under PACE or, in respect of the TA powers, by the equivalent TA Code provisions. Under s 2(3) of PACE, the constable must give the suspect certain information before the search begins, including ‘his name and the name of the police station to which he is attached; the object of the proposed search; the constable’s grounds for proposing to make it’. Under s 3, he or she must make a record of the search, either on the spot if that is practicable or as soon as it is practicable. The subject of the search can obtain a copy of the search record later on from the police station. General guidance as to the conduct of the search is contained in Code A, para 3; it requires the officer to complete the search speedily, to minimise embarrassment and to seek co-operation. Code A, para 4 fleshes out the recording requirements.⁹⁸

Such requirements give the impression of due process-based control since they mean that the citizen can make a complaint and the police station will have a record of the number of stops being carried out. These procedural requirements are supposed to inject some accountability into stopping and searching, but in so far as they rely on Code A, they are effectively unenforceable, while they are entirely irrelevant to 'consensual' stops.

⁹⁶ See pp 644–45.

⁹⁷ PACE 1984, Code A was applied to the additional PTA powers introduced in 1996. The TA, ss 99 and 101 in respect of Northern Ireland and the new Code introduced under Sched 14, para 6 in respect of the UK generally will apply the TA Codes to the TA powers. Under Sched 14, para 5, ‘An officer shall perform functions conferred on him by virtue of this Act in accordance with any relevant code of practice in operation under paragraph 6’. Paragraph 6(1) provides: ‘The Secretary of State shall issue codes of practice about the exercise by officers of functions conferred on them by virtue of this Act.’

⁹⁸ Inter alia, the record must include the name, address, date of birth and ethnic origin of the person searched (unless he or she is not willing to disclose the name and address).

Voluntary searches

Code A does not, in general, affect ordinary consensual contact between police officer and citizen; officers can ask members of the public to stop and can ask them to consent to a search and, at least theoretically, the citizen can refuse. However, the voluntariness of these contacts is frequently doubtful: some people might 'consent' to a search in the sense of offering no resistance to it owing to uncertainty as to the basis or extent of the police power in question.⁹⁹ The search could then be classified as voluntary and subsequently it would be difficult, if not impossible, to determine whether such classification was justifiable. Once a search is so classified, none of the statutory or Code A safeguards need be observed. Original Code A failed to recognise this problem, although a Home Office circular issued in December 1985¹⁰⁰ did make an effort to address it in para 1:

... The co-operation of the citizen should not be taken as implying consent... Whilst it is legitimate to invite co-operation from the public in circumstances where there is no power to require it, the subject of a voluntary search should not be left under the impression that a power is being exercised. Voluntary search must not be used as a device for circumventing the safeguards established in Part I of the Act.

When the Codes were revised in 1991, the concerns articulated in the circular were given expression in new Notes for Guidance 1D(b) and 1E which created certain restrictions on voluntary searches. Under Note 1E, persons belonging to three of the vulnerable groups recognised throughout the Codes as requiring special treatment—juveniles, the mentally handicapped or mentally disordered—may not be subject to a voluntary search at all. The prohibition also applies to a range of other persons who do not appear capable of giving an informed consent to a search. This group may well include the hearing impaired or persons not proficient in English who are also recognised in the Codes as belonging to vulnerable groups,¹⁰¹ but they should have been expressly included. Persons who do not fall within the above groups may be subject to a voluntary search under Note 1D(b) as revised in 1995, but the officer should 'always make it clear that he is seeking the consent of the person concerned to the search being carried out by telling the person that he need not consent and that without his consent, he will not be searched'.

These provisions represent a step towards dealing with this problem, but they are deficient in a number of respects.¹⁰² No specific form of words need be used under Note 1D(b). A requirement that an officer issue a caution in similar terms to that used in Code B, para 4.2 in respect of searching of premises might have clarified matters, for example: 'You do not have to consent to this search but anything that is 99 For further discussion of this point, see Dixon et al., 'Consent and the legal regulation of policing' (1990) 17 JLS 245–362.

100 Circular No 88/1985.

101 See, in particular, Code C, para 3(b), Detained Persons: Special Groups.

102 See Fenwick, H, 'Searching people and places under the revised PACE Codes' (1992) Criminal Lawyer, p 1.

found may be used in evidence against you.’ Further, under the 1995 revision, these important provisions continued to appear as Notes for Guidance only, when it might have been expected that because of their specific wording and prescriptive nature, they would have become part of Code A.

Redress for breaches of the stop and search rules

If a search is conducted unlawfully, the citizen is entitled to resist and to sue for assault. But in many instances, and especially where a search is conducted under one of the provisions which do not require reasonable suspicion, the citizen has no means of knowing that the search is unlawful. A citizen who believed that there could be no grounds for a search and therefore resisted it would be taking a risk. Resistance to an authorised TA or CJPOA search, or a search under s 86 of the TA, would incur criminal liability, not only, in all probability, in respect of obstruction or assault of a constable,¹⁰³ but under the special TA or CJPOA search-related offences as well.

There is no provision under the TA, PACE or Code A to the effect that if the procedural requirements are not complied with, the search will be unlawful. As indicated, a number of due process requirements are contained only in Codes¹⁰⁴ and, therefore, their breach cannot give rise to civil liability,¹⁰⁵ although breach of certain of the statutory procedural requirements will render searches unlawful, as will breach of the statutory powers. It has been held that a failure to make a written record of the search in breach of s 3 will not render it unlawful,¹⁰⁶ whereas a failure to give the grounds for it will do so, following *Fenelley*¹⁰⁷ and Samuel v Comr of Police for the Metropolis,¹⁰⁸ as will a failure to comply with the duties to provide identification under s 2(3), following *Osman v Director of Public Prosecutions*¹⁰⁹ In Osman, proper authorisation had been given for the police to search members of the public entering a park under ss 60(4) and 60(5) of the CJPOA 1994. When the defendant was searched, police officers failed to comply with s 2; the search was resisted and the defendant charged with assaulting an officer in the execution of his duty. It was found on appeal that it was plain from the mandatory words of s 2 that any search initiated without prior compliance with the duties set out in s 2 would mean that no officer was actually assaulted in the execution of his duty, since any search of a person might be a trespass requiring proper justification in law; the breach of s 2(3) meant that the search was unlawful and therefore not in the execution of their duty. The facts that the officers were clearly local and that numbers could have been obtained from their uniforms

103 Offences arising under the Police Act 1996, s 89(1) and (2).

104 Code A made under PACE 1984, s 66 and the TA Code made under the TA, ss 96 and 98 in respect of Northern Ireland and the new Code introduced under Sched 14 in respect of the UK. See p 757 above.

105 Under PACE 1984, s 67(10). The TA Codes will have the same status as the PACE Codes; under Sched 14, para 6(2) ‘The failure by an officer to observe a provision of a code shall not of itself make him liable to criminal or civil proceedings’, but under sub-para (3) ‘A code (a) shall be admissible in evidence in criminal and civil proceedings, and (b) shall be taken into account by a court or tribunal in any case in which it appears to the court or tribunal to be relevant’.

106 Basher v DPP (1993) unreported, 2 March.

107 [1989] Crim LR 142.

108 (1999) unreported, 3 March.

109 (1999) The Times, 29 September, Judgment of 1 July 1999.

110 The Crown Court had found that there had been a breach of the 1984 Act, s 2(3)(a), but given the fact that the officers were clearly local police officers policing a local event in broad daylight, as expeditiously as possible, and because numbers could readily be obtained from the officers’ uniforms, the breach was not so serious as to render the search unlawful. These findings would clearly have undermined s 2(3).

were found to be insufficient to avoid the finding of unlawfulness.¹¹⁰ The strict interpretation of the information-giving duties evident in Fenelley and Osman was equally apparent in *Lineham v DPP*¹¹¹ in the context of a search of premises.

The PACE and TA Codes are admissible in evidence.¹¹² It may be necessary for a defendant who claims that a search was conducted improperly or unlawfully to seek the limited form of redress represented by exclusion of evidence which has been obtained as a result of a breach of PACE or Code A. A stop and search is most likely to produce physical evidence such as drugs or perhaps a weapon, but the courts are very reluctant to exclude such evidence unless there has been deliberate illegality because it is less likely to be unreliable than confession or identification evidence.¹¹³ Thus, the mechanism of exclusion of evidence as a form of redress for breach of a Code provision which has operated to underpin Codes C and D is not as appropriate in relation to Code A, although an effective sanction is clearly needed.

This weakness is further exacerbated in relation to voluntary searches because provisions relevant to such searches are contained in Notes for Guidance rather than Code A itself, and since the Notes do not have the same legal status as Code provisions, they may be more likely to be ignored. The fact that provision for voluntary searches now appears in the Notes as opposed to the circular, but not in the Code itself, suggests that while the need for an important change has been recognised, there has been a failure to carry it through fully. What would be the position if, for example, a police officer persuaded a mentally handicapped person to 'consent' to a voluntary search in breach of Note for Guidance 1E? A judge might well be minded to view breach of a Note for Guidance as of insufficient significance to lead to exclusion of the products of the search, even if prepared to depart from the general presumption that physical evidence, however obtained, is admissible.

Disciplinary action, the other form of redress for breach of a Code provision, may be even less effective in relation to Code A than Codes C, D and E, which largely govern interrogation and identification, because stop and search powers are exercised away from the police station, at a low level of visibility. Moreover, if a police officer decides that a search can be called voluntary, he need not give his name or number and therefore it will be almost impossible to bring a complaint against him. Thus, it is fair to say that in so far as the balance between police powers and individual rights is supposed to be maintained by the Code A provisions, it is largely dependent on voluntary adherence to them.

Impact of the HRA

The lack of court-based accountability in enforcing the due process safeguards, especially in respect of consensual searches, encourages resort to the HRA, and in this context there are grounds for expecting that arguments raised under the Act may lead to judicial intervention in this largely unregulated area. As Chapter 14

111 (1999) unreported, judgment of 8 October. Laws LJ found that police officers who conducted a search under PACE 1984, s 18 had not been acting in the execution of their duty because they had failed to inform the appellant so far as possible as to the reason why they intended to search the premises.

112 PACE 1984, s 67(11); TA, Sched 14, para 6(3).

113 See the pre-PAE ruling of the House of Lords in Fox [1986] AC 281; also Thomas [1990] Crim LR 269 and Khan [1996] 3 All ER 289; cf Fenelley [1989] Crim LR 142. See further Chapter 14, pp 891–92.

will argue, Art 6 could be relied upon where it was claimed at trial that a consensual search was in fact non-consensual or where breaches of Code A had occurred during the search, including breaches which might also amount to violations of Art 8.¹¹⁴ Code A, para 3.5 provides safeguards for a search of more than outer clothing which appear to be coterminous with the right to respect for privacy under Art 8. However, Note 3A provides that there is nothing to prevent officers from asking a suspect to remove more than outer clothing in public. This Note is therefore of doubtful compatibility with Art 8, since persons who complied with such a 'request', believing that they had to, would suffer an interference with their Art 8 rights, which would not be in accordance with the law.

Article 6 arguments would also be available where a breach of Art 5 is alleged which might affect the fairness of the trial, and Art 5 arguments might be raised independently in a variety of contexts.¹¹⁵ Article 5 provides a guarantee of 'liberty and security of person'. It appears that the short period of detention represented by a stop and search is sufficient to constitute a deprivation of liberty¹¹⁶ Deprivation of liberty can occur only on a basis of law¹¹⁷ and in certain specified circumstances, including, under Art 5(1)(b), the detention of a person in order to secure the fulfilment of any obligation prescribed by law and, under Art 5(1)(c), the 'lawful detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence'. Both these provisions may cover temporary detention for the purposes of a search. The provision under Art 5(1)(b) raises difficulties of interpretation and is clearly not so straightforward as the form of detention permitted under Art 5(1)(c). On its face, its broad wording appears to allow arbitrary detention with none of the requirements of reasonable suspicion or authorisation which PACE and the TA (apart from the special Northern Ireland provisions) depend upon and without intervention by a court. It might even appear to allow preventive action before violation of a legal obligation. It gives the impression of representing a scheme which affords less weight to due process than the current domestic one.

However, para 5(1)(b) has received a restrictive interpretation at Strasbourg. In Lawless,¹¹⁸ it was found that a specific and concrete obligation must be identified; once it has been, detention can in principle be used to secure its fulfilment. It is unclear that the term 'obligation' could apply to the current statutory provisions. The requirements are to submit to a search, and, apart from the power under s 163 of the Road Traffic Act, to remain under police detention for the period of time necessary to allow it to be carried out.¹¹⁹ Following this interpretation, the PACE, CJPOA and TA stop and search provisions are of doubtful compatibility with Art 114 Eg, regarding the requirements as to conduct of the search under Code A, para 3, including requirements as to removal of only outer clothing in public.

115 Most frequently in the context of a civil action for false imprisonment or assault, as Chapter 14 indicates, or at trial in respect of failing to stop, either under one of the specific offences under the relevant statute or under the Police Act 1996, s 89(1) or (2).

116 X v Austria (1979) 18 DR 154.

117 See discussion of this provision below, p 797.

118 Report of 19 December 1959, B1 (1960-61) p 64; Judgment of 1 July 1961, A 3 (1960-61); (1961) 1 EHRR 15.

119 See McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans (1981) 5 EHRR 71; the obligation imposed was a requirement to 'submit to examination'. In Reyntjens v France Appl No 16810/90 (1992) unreported, the obligation was to submit to an identity check.

120 (1981) 5 EHRR 71.

5(1)(b). In *McVeigh, O'Neill and Euans*¹²⁰ a requirement to submit to an examination on arrival in the UK was found not to violate Art 5(1)(b) since it was sufficiently specific and concrete, but the Commission emphasised that this was found on the basis that the obligation in question only arose in limited circumstances and had a limited purpose—to combat terrorism. The PACE powers, the Misuse of Drugs Act power and, arguably, the power arising under s 43 of the TA, which is a permanent power, not one adopted temporarily to meet an emergency as in McVeigh, could not readily be said to arise in limited circumstances. The CJPOA and other TA powers have more limited purposes in the sense that the place in which they can be exercised is circumscribed either by its nature (as in port or border controls) or by the authorisation given, which is based on the need for special powers. Whether any particular authorisation would be viewed as rendering the obligation in question sufficiently specific will be open to question, depending on the factual situation.¹²¹

The PACE powers, the powers under the 1971 Act and under s 43 of the TA are therefore fairly clearly of doubtful compatibility with Art 5(1)(b), while the compatibility of the other powers is uncertain. They may fall within Art 5(1)(c), which requires reasonable suspicion of the commission of an offence. This immediately calls into question s 43 of the TA, since no such suspicion is required. It also means that the exercise of the powers under PACE may, depending on the circumstances of a search, be of doubtful compatibility. Section 1 requires suspicion as to carriage of an article, not as to an offence; it is clearly aimed at gathering evidence of offences and its requirements are not fully coterminous with the relevant range of offences. Carrying certain of the articles which fall within s 1 of PACE is not an offence¹²² even if the carrier can be said to 'possess' them, although the officer also requires suspicion as to mens rea, while carriage of prohibited articles without sufficient 'possession' will clearly not constitute an offence. Code A, para 1.7A provides that where a police officer has reasonable grounds to suspect that a person is in innocent possession of a stolen or prohibited article, or other item for which he is empowered to search, the power of stop and search exists despite the absence of a power of arrest. That Code provision is clearly incompatible with Art 5(1)(c) and any stop undertaken in conformity with it would appear to be unlawful, unless in the circumstances it could be justified under Art 5(1)(b).

Article 5(1)(c) also requires that the detention should be for 'the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority'. It may be said that the powers under s 43 of the TA, the 1971 Act and PACE are exercised in order to determine whether sufficient evidence justifying an arrest is present or for general information-gathering purposes, and are therefore only indirectly aimed at the purpose Art 5 envisages. The exercise of the powers under s 60 of the CJPOA and ss 44 and 89 of TA may also be of doubtful compatibility with Art 5(1)(c). The Strasbourg Court indicated in *Murray v UK*¹²³ that the essential matter is the identification of objective grounds for suspicion in the particular instance, even where the domestic legislation allows for detention on subjective grounds. In order for stops under these provisions 121 See further Reiner, R and Leigh, I, 'Police powers', in McCrudden and Chambers, op cit, fn 1, pp 93–94; Klug, Starmer and Weir argue in op cit, fn 1, that police stop and search powers may breach Art 5: pp 250–51.

122 Under s 1(7)(b), such articles could include credit cards or keys.

123 (1994) 19 EHRR 193.

to comply with that finding, police officers would have to satisfy a requirement which is not present in the domestic legislation.

The power under s 163 of the Road Traffic Act appears to fall outside both Art 5(1)(b) and (c), since it does not depend on reasonable suspicion of an offence and is not exercised in respect of a specific obligation, as explained in McVeigh. This is a matter of interpretation, since the obligation might be viewed as confined to one inherent in the use of a vehicle on the roads. But if the obligation it depends upon is not sufficiently specific, its use can be justified only if it does not amount to a deprivation of liberty. The power probably carries with it, impliedly, the power to detain for a short period.¹²⁴ The offence under the RTA of failing to stop would probably be committed if the response to the stop was to brake and pause for an instant before driving on. The person stopped may also be given the impression that she is obliged to remain during questioning. Therefore, it is suggested that Art 5 may be engaged by the use of this power, in which case incompatibility almost certainly arises.

Article 5 also imposes further, general requirements. The detention must not be arbitrary; this is implicit in the requirement of lawfulness.¹²⁵ A detention with the real purpose of searching for drugs, which had been authorised under s 44 of the TA in respect of terrorism, might be viewed as arbitrary in the sense that it was not proportionate to the purpose of ensuring the fulfilment of an obligation prescribed by the relevant law¹²⁶—the TA. If such an argument was advanced at Strasbourg, involving, as it does, review of the proportionality of decisions taken by the State authorities, a certain margin of appreciation would be afforded to those authorities in respect of their assessment of the relevant circumstances.¹²⁷ But in the domestic courts, under the HRA, this approach would be inappropriate. Applying the notion of a discretionary area of judgment¹²⁸ would also arguably be inappropriate, since a search under terrorism legislation, but for a non-terrorist purpose, does not call for deference.

In appropriate cases, bearing in mind the recent evidence noted above of a police tendency to show racial bias in decisions to stop and search,¹²⁹ violation of Art 5(1)(b) or (c) might be found when read with the Art 14 guarantee of freedom from discrimination in the enjoyment of the Convention rights. This possibility may be of less significance given the amendments made to the Race Relations Act 1976 in 2000, allowing claimants to bring actions against the police in respect of direct or indirect discrimination in policing decisions, including decisions to stop and search. However, a defendant would also have the option of raising an Art 5 and 14 argument during the criminal process. It could be argued, for example, under Art 6(1) that if Art 14, read with Art 5, had been breached through a discriminatory search (one which would otherwise be lawful as in conformity with, for example, s 60 of the 1994 Act or s 44 of the TA), any products of the search should be excluded from evidence under s 78 of PACE, and in so far as the contact had influenced the subsequent investigation, evidence deriving from it should also be excluded. Such 124 This may be suggested by the findings in Lodwick v Sanders [1985] 1 WLR 382.

125 Winterwerp v Netherlands A 33 (1979), para 39.

126 Ibid; Bouamar v Belgium A 129 (1988), para 50.

127 Ibid, para 40.

128 See Chapter 4, p 186.

129 See fn 93, above.

an argument would of course require recognition to be given to possible racial stereotyping behind stop and search decisions, as opposed to imposing neutral explanations on them.¹³⁰

The use of force in order to carry out a stop and search is permitted under s 117 of PACE, which provides: 'the officer may use reasonable force, if necessary, in the exercise of the [PACE] power.' The TA provides an equivalent provision in s 114(2). But, under Art 3, the use of force must be strictly in proportion to the conduct of the detainee; this is discussed further in respect of forcible arrest.¹³¹ Under these provisions, the use of extreme force is permissible if necessitated by the conduct of the detainee, but if the use of such force causes death, it would appear to breach Art 2 which permits the use of lethal force to 'effect an arrest', not to effect a detention short of arrest. However, if the detainee sought to escape after being detained for the purposes of a stop and search, this might fall within the second limb of Art 2(2)(b): 'to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained'. The lawfulness of the initial detention would then have to be considered, bearing in mind the arguments above.

4 POWERS OF ARREST

Arrest may often be the first formal stage in the criminal process. It does not need to be; the process could begin with a consensual interview with the suspect, perhaps in his or her own home, followed by a summons to appear at the magistrates' court. It appears that arrests are sometimes effected unnecessarily; this contention is supported by the pre-PACE variation in practice regarding arrest between police areas,¹³² which does not seem to be explicable on the ground of necessity, but seems to be attributable to different policies in the different areas. Any arrest represents a serious curtailment of liberty; therefore, use of the arrest power requires careful regulation. An arrest, in common with the exercise of other police powers, is seen as prima facie illegal, necessitating justification under a specific legal power. If an arrest is effected where no arrest power arises, a civil action for false imprisonment will lie. Despite the need for clarity and precision, such powers were, until relatively recently, granted piecemeal, with the result that prior to PACE, they were contained in a mass of common law and statutory provisions. No consistent rationale could be discerned and there were a number of gaps and anomalies. For example, the Criminal Law Act 1967 gave a power of arrest without warrant where the offence in question arose under statute and carried a sentence of five years. Thus, no power of arrest arose in respect of common law offences carrying such a sentence. This situation was detrimental to civil liberties owing to the uncertainty of the powers, but it may also have been detrimental in crime control terms since officers may have been deterred from effecting an arrest where one was necessary. The powers are now contained largely in PACE, but common law powers remain, while some statutes create a specific power of arrest which may overlap with the PACE powers.

130 In the US context, AC Thompson argues that the tendency of the judiciary is to impose such explanations (based on the notion of police expertise in spotting criminal possibilities in neutral behaviour) on stop and 'frisk' decisions and to ignore, if possible, any racial element: 'Race and the Fourth Amendment' (1999) 74(4) New York UL Rev 956.

131 See pp 803–04.

132 Eg, in 1976 in Cleveland, 1% of persons were summonsed for an indictable offence, whereas in Derbyshire, 76% of suspects were, as were 40% of suspects in West Yorkshire and North Wales: Royal Commission Report 1981, Cmnd 8092, para 3.72. See further Bailey, SH and Gunn, MJ, Smith and Bailey on the Modern English Legal System, 1991, pp 630–32.

The due process and crime control views of arrest and detention are diametrically opposed. Under the due process model, arrest should be based on strong suspicion that the individual has committed a specific offence, since arrest and subsequent detention represent a severe infringement of individual rights. Under the crime control model, arrest and detention need not be sanctioned merely in relation to specific offences, but should be both an investigative tool and a means of asserting police authority over persons with a criminal record or of doubtful character, with a view to creating a general deterrent effect. Under this model, reasonable suspicion is viewed as a needless irrelevancy, an inhibitory rule standing in the way of an important police function.

The body of research into the use of arrest and detention powers is to an extent conflicting, one school of analysis suggesting that the procedural due process elements which were supposed to create restraints on the powers largely fail to do so in practice in a number of respects.¹³³ A partially opposed view agrees as to 'the limited effectiveness of PACE'S control mechanisms, including routinisation of supervisory controls', but suggests that 'the potential exists for [the PACE reforms] to be given more (or less) substance'.¹³⁴ It will be argued below that such potential may be realised under the impact of the HRA, but that its influence will be variable, especially as between the conventional and counter-terrorist schemes. While the conventional scheme shows a formal adherence to due process, which appears to have a subtle impact in practice, especially as regards controls on detention, the counter-terrorist scheme adheres, formally, to a lower standard, thereby providing greater leeway for departure from due process without necessarily breaching the rules.

At common law—power to arrest for breach of peace

PACE has not affected the power to arrest which arises at common law for breach of the peace. Factors present in a situation in which breach of the peace occurs may also give rise to arrest powers under PACE, but may extend further than they do owing to the wide definition of breach of the peace. The leading case is Howell,¹³⁵ in which it was found that breach of the peace will arise if violence to persons or property either actual or apprehended occurs. Threatening words are not in themselves a breach of the peace, but they may lead a police officer to apprehend that a breach will arise. A police officer or any other person may arrest if a breach of the peace is in being or apprehended,¹³⁶ but not when it has been terminated, unless there is reason to believe that it may be renewed.¹³⁷

133 See Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, 2000, Chapter 3; McConville, Sanders and Leng, op cit, fn 1, esp p 189.

134 Dixon, in Walker and Starmer, op cit, fn 5, p 67.

135 [1982] QB 416; [1981] 3 All ER 383, CA; for comment see Williams (1982) 146 JPN 199–200, 217–19.

136 Following Foulkes [1998] 3 All ER 705, the breach must be imminent.

137 For commentary on this point and on breach of the peace generally see Williams [1954] Crim LR 578. The view that there is no power to arrest once a breach of the peace is over was put forward in the Commentary on Podger [1979] Crim LR 524 and endorsed obiter in Howell [1982] QB 416; [1981] 3 All ER 383, CA. See Chapter 9, pp 494–99 for full discussion of the use of breach of the peace.

Under PACE: power of arrest without warrant

PACE contains two separate powers of arrest without warrant, one arising under s 24 and the other under s 25. In very broad terms, s 24 provides a power of arrest in respect of more serious offences while s 25 covers all offences, however trivial (including, for example, dropping litter) if—and this is the important point—certain conditions are satisfied apart from suspicion that the offence in question has been committed. Thus, s 25 operates to cover persons suspected of offences falling outside s 24. The difference between ss 24 and 25 is quite significant because once a person has been arrested under s 24, he or she is said to have been arrested for ‘an arrestable offence’ and this may have an effect on his or her treatment later on. An ‘arrestable offence’ is therefore one for which a person can be arrested if the necessary reasonable suspicion is present without the need to demonstrate that any other ingredients were present in the situation at the time of arrest.

Arrest under s 24

Section 24 applies:

- (1) (a) to offences for which the sentence is fixed by law;
- (b) to offences for which a person of 21 years of age or over (not previously convicted) may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of five years (or might be so sentenced but for the restrictions imposed by s 33 of the Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980); and
- (c) to the offences to which s 24(2) applies and in this Act ‘arrestable offence’ means any such offence.¹³⁸

A police officer can arrest for one of the offences covered by s 24 if he or she has reasonable grounds to suspect that the offence is about to be, is being or has been committed. An ordinary citizen can arrest under s 24 in the same way with the omission of the possibility of arresting where the offence is about to be committed. Offences for which a person can be arrested under s 24 may also be classified as ‘serious arrestable offences’ under s 116. This does not affect the power of arrest, but it does affect various safeguards and powers which may be exercised during detention. The s 24 offences which may also fall into this category fall into two groups as defined under s 116—first, those which are so serious (such as murder, manslaughter, and indecent assault which amounts to gross indecency) that they will always be serious arrestable offences and secondly, those which will be so classified only if their commission has led to certain specified consequences, namely, serious harm to the security of the State or public order, serious interference with the administration of justice or investigation of offences, death or serious injury, substantial financial gain or serious financial loss. This last possibility may considerably widen the category of serious arrestable offences in that whether or not a loss may be serious may need to be judged in relation to the financial consequences to the person suffering it: a loss of a small amount of money might be serious to a poor person; someone arrested on suspicion of its theft could therefore be classified as in detention for a serious arrestable offence.

138 Section 24(2) covers a miscellany of offences including offences under the Official Secrets Act 1989 and under the Theft Act 1968. It amends the Criminal Law Act 1967, s 2 and contains the powers of arrest which already existed.

Arrest under s 25

The police acquired under s 25 the general power of arrest which they had lacked previously. However, as mentioned above, this power does not merely allow an officer to arrest for any offence so long as reasonable suspicion can be shown. Such a power would have been viewed as too draconian. It is balanced by what are known as the 'general arrest conditions' which must also be fulfilled. Therefore, in order to arrest under s 25, two steps must be taken: first, there must be reasonable suspicion relating to the offence in question; secondly, there must be reasonable grounds for thinking that one of the arrest conditions is satisfied. The need for the officer to have reasonable suspicion relating to the offence in question and to the general arrest conditions was emphasised on appeal in Edwards v DPP.¹³⁹

A police constable (but not an ordinary citizen) can arrest if he or she has reasonable grounds to suspect the person of having committed or having attempted to commit the offence or of being in the course of committing or attempting to commit it. The general arrest conditions are:

- (a) that the name of the relevant person is unknown to and cannot be readily ascertained by, the constable;
- (b) that the constable has reasonable grounds for doubting whether a name furnished by the relevant person as his name is his real name;
- (c) that:
 - (i) the relevant person has failed to furnish a satisfactory address for service; or
 - (ii) the constable has reasonable grounds for doubting whether an address furnished by the relevant person is a satisfactory address for service;
- (d) that the constable has reasonable grounds for believing that arrest is necessary to prevent the relevant person:
 - (i) causing physical injury to himself or any other person;
 - (ii) suffering physical injury;
 - (iii) causing loss of or damage to property;
 - (iv) committing an offence against public decency; or
 - (v) causing an unlawful obstruction of the highway;
- (e) that the constable has reasonable grounds for believing that arrest is necessary to protect a child or other vulnerable person from the relevant person.

It can be seen that these conditions divide into two groups: those in which there is or appears to be a failure to furnish a satisfactory name or address, so that the service of a summons later on would be impracticable, and those which concern the immediate need to remove the suspect from the street, which would make it inappropriate to serve a summons later. The inclusion of these provisions implies that the infringement of civil liberties represented by an arrest should be resorted to only where no other alternative exists. In practice, however, arrest under s 25 may be resorted to quite readily; whether this will occur will depend on the interpretation given to 'reasonable grounds'. The phrase suggests that a clear, objective basis for forming the view in question should exist. However, in *G v DPP*¹⁴⁰ a belief that an address was false based on a general assumption that people who commit offences give false details was accepted as based on reasonable grounds. On this interpretation, the general arrest conditions would be unlikely to act as a limiting requirement: once an offence was suspected, it would seem that one of them would be almost automatically fulfilled. However, the decision in *Edwards v DPP*¹⁴¹ suggests that the courts appreciate the constitutional significance of upholding the requirements under the general arrest conditions. In Edwards, an officer arrested the appellant in the course of a struggle, stating that the arrest was 'for obstruction'. Since no power of arrest arises in respect of obstruction, the arrest must have been under s 25. However, it was found to be necessary to demonstrate that the officer had the general arrest conditions in mind when arresting. This might have been inferred, but the express reference to obstruction was thought to preclude an inference that he had other matters in mind.

¹³⁹ (1993) 97 Cr App R 301; (1993) The Times, 29 March.

Counter-terrorist powers

The terrorist offences under the Terrorism Act 2000 (formerly contained in the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (PTA)) are arrestable offences under s 24 of PACE. There was also a power of arrest under s 14 of the PTA itself. This power had two limbs. The first, s 14(1)(a), empowered a constable to arrest for certain specified offences under the PTA. As these offences were arrestable offences in any event, this power overlapped with that under s 24. However, if an arrest was effected under s 14 of the PTA, as opposed to s 24 of PACE, this had an effect on the length of detention. That power is reproduced in ss 41 and 40(1)(a) of the TA, which cover arrest in respect of certain TA offences.¹⁴²

Part II of the EPA contained powers of arrest which were supplementary to those in s 14 of the PTA. They were applicable only in Northern Ireland and went further than those existing in the rest of the UK. Under s 18 of the EPA, a constable could arrest without warrant anyone whom he had reasonable grounds for suspecting of committing, having committed, or being about to commit, a scheduled offence or an offence under the EPA which was not a scheduled offence. Under s 19 of the EPA, a member of the armed forces on duty could arrest and detain a person for up to four hours on suspicion that he had committed, was committing or was about to commit any offence. The soldier was not required to inform the arrested person of the grounds of the arrest; and to effect the arrest he could enter and search any premises without a warrant. These powers are reproduced in ss 82 and 83 of the TA respectively. They continue to apply only in Northern Ireland, but are based on the 142 The arrest under s 41 is in respect of reasonable suspicion of being a terrorist; under s 40(1)(a): 'In this Part "terrorist" means a person who has committed an offence under any of sections 11, 12, 15 to 18, 54, 56 to 63.' This definition is not exclusive; its other part, dependent upon s 40(1)(b), which is discussed below, covers the former s 14(1)(b) PTA arrest power.

140 [1989] Crim LR 150. For comment see [1993] Crim LR 567.

141 (1993) 97 Cr App R 301; (1993) The Times, 29 March.

much wider definition of terrorism introduced under the TA. The continued absence of the need to give the grounds for arrest clearly raises the possibility that incompatibility with Art 5 will be found; this is discussed below.

Police discretion is particularly wide where no reasonable suspicion of any particular offence of any particular offence is necessary in order to arrest. Such a power is provided by s 41 of the TA read with s 40(1)(b), which largely reproduces s 14(1)(b) of the PTA. The continuation of this power is controversial, since it was adopted in the face of an emergency situation which is no longer in being and the arrest power will in future be applicable to a far wider range of groups under s 1 of the TA. Under s 14(1)(b), a constable had to have reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person was concerned in the preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland or 'any other act of terrorism except those connected solely with the affairs of the UK or a part of the UK' in order to arrest. Under s 41 of the TA and s 40(1)(b), the qualifying words are omitted. Section 41 allows for arrest on suspicion of being a terrorist and s 40(1)(b) defines a terrorist as 'a person who is or has been concerned in the preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism'. In other words, the arrest power can now be applied to non-Irish UK domestic groups, such as environmental activists. In practice, since s 14(1)(b) did not require suspicion relating to an offence, it was used for investigation, questioning and general intelligence gathering which may be conducted, it has been said, for the purpose of 'isolating and identifying the urban guerrillas and then detaching them from the supportive or ambivalent community'.¹⁴³

The Government, in its Consultation Paper on Terrorism,¹⁴⁴ acknowledged the criticisms which s 14(1)(b) had attracted: '...if the police have proper cause to suspect that a person is actively engaged in terrorism, they must have sufficient information to justify an arrest under PACE...the absence of any requirement for reasonable suspicion of a specific offence effectively allows the police free rein to arrest whomsoever they wish without necessarily having good reason, including those who should not be arrested at all.'¹⁴⁵ However, the Government took the view that although the ordinary powers of arrest are extensive, they are insufficient to deal with the sophisticated evasion techniques of terrorists.¹⁴⁶ This claim might have been applicable to the well organised Irish groups which caused extensive and severe harm during 'the Troubles'. But in respect of the vast range of groups potentially covered by the new legislation, it is more doubtful, especially bearing in mind the wide range of TA offences, many based, as indicated in Chapters 8 and 9, on a minimal actus reus and requiring no proof of mens rea. The ordinary arrest powers under PACE or under the first power of s 41 of the TA, read with s 40(1)(a), would almost certainly cover arrests which could be undertaken under the second power covered by s 41 and s 40(1)(b). This second power is clearly aimed at allowing arrest as a stage in the investigation, not as the culmination of it, and it may therefore be said to be firmly based on the crime control model which views the purpose of

143 Lowry (1976-77) 8-9 Col Human Rights L Rev 185, p 210.

144 Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998.

145 Ibid, para 7.5.

146 Since they are 'skilled in, and dedicated to, evading detection...terrorist crime is often quite different [from serious non-terrorist crime] both in terms of the sophistication of the techniques deployed and the (potential) harm caused'. Ibid, para 7.8.

arrest as a means of furthering general investigative goals. It therefore represents a clear departure from the traditional due process view of arrest taken by Phillips in 1981 as justified only after the investigation has uncovered sufficient evidence. The power was severely criticised when used in the context of Irish terrorism; it is likely to attract further criticism when transplanted into a completely different context and afforded a far wider application.

Owing to its departure from the due process principle in failing to require arrest for a particular offence, the reproduction of s 14(1)(b) of the PTA in ss 41 and 40(1)(b) of the TA renders the new power vulnerable to a challenge under Art 5 of the Convention, which in para 5(1)(c) encapsulates that principle. This possibility was recognised by Lord Lloyd, whose 1996 Report, prepared for Michael Howard, the then Conservative Home Secretary, underlies the new counter-terrorism Act.¹⁴⁷ He suggested that, in order to circumvent Art 5, a new offence of being concerned in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism should be created. Having considered this suggestion, the Government rejected it, coming to the view, which is evaluated below, that this arrest power is compatible with Art 5(1)(c).¹⁴⁸

Other statutory powers of arrest

If a statute creates an offence which is a serious offence falling within s 24 then obviously the arrest power under s 24 is applicable. If a statute creates a more minor offence then equally, the arrest power under s 25 is applicable so long as one or more of the general arrest conditions are satisfied. Section 11 of the Public Order Act 1986 and s 51 of the Police Act 1964 provide examples of such offences. However, certain statutes expressly create specific powers of arrest which are not dependent on ss 24 or 25, such as ss 12 and 14 of the Public Order Act. In such cases, the procedure under s 28 of PACE (which is discussed below) will still apply.

Reasonable suspicion

The powers discussed depend on the concept of reasonable suspicion. The idea behind it is that an arrest should take place at quite a late stage in the investigation;¹⁴⁹ this limits the number of arrests and makes it less likely that a person will be wrongfully arrested. It seems likely that it will be interpreted in accordance with the provisions as to reasonable suspicion under Code A although, as will be discussed below, the courts have not relied on Code A in ruling on the lawfulness of arrests. However, Annex B, para 4 of original Code A stated that the level of suspicion for a stop would be 'no less' than that needed for arrest. Although this provision is omitted from the revised Code A, it would seem that in principle, the Code A provisions should be relevant to arrests if the Codes and statute are to be treated as a harmonious whole. Moreover, it would appear strange if a more rigorous test could be applied to the reasonable suspicion necessary to effect a stop than that necessary to effect an arrest. If this is correct, it would seem that certain matters, such as an individual's racial group, could never be factors which could support a finding of reasonable suspicion. It would seem that a future revision of the Codes might usefully state that the concept of reasonable suspicion in Code A applies to arrest as well; if so, it would at least outlaw the use of such factors as the basis of reasonable suspicion.

147 Cm 3420.

148 Ibid, para 7.14. A further aspect of s 40 may raise issues under Art 5. Between the First and Second Readings of the Bill, s 40 was subtly changed to include reference to persons concerned in terrorism 'whether before or after the passing of this Act. Since the definition of terrorism in s 1 is much wider than that previously used in the PTA, s 20, s 40 allows arrest of a person for activity which would not have justified arrest (either under the PTA, s 14(1)(b) or at all) at the time when it was undertaken. The coverage of pre-commencement activity is confirmed in s 40(2).

149 See the Phillips Royal Commission Report, op cit, fn 14.

The objective nature of suspicion required under Code A is echoed in various decisions on the suspicion needed for an arrest. In Dallison v Caffrey, Lord Diplock said the test was whether 'a reasonable man assumed to know the law and possessed of the information which in fact was possessed by the defendant would believe there were [reasonable grounds]'. Thus, it is not enough for a police officer to have a hunch that a person has committed or is about to commit an offence; there must be a clear basis for this suspicion which relates to the particular person in question and which would also be apparent to an objective observer. If an officer only has a hunch—mere suspicion as opposed to reasonable suspicion—he or she might continue to observe the person in question, but could not arrest until the suspicion had increased and could be termed 'reasonable suspicion'.

However, this still leaves a great deal of leeway to officers to arrest where suspicion relating to the particular person is at a low level but they want to further the investigation by gathering information. At present, the courts seem prepared to allow police officers such leeway and it should be noted that PACE endorses a reasonably low level of suspicion owing to the distinction it maintains between belief and suspicion, suspicion probably being the lower standard.¹⁵⁰ The decision in *Ward v Chief Constable of Somerset and Avon Constabulary*¹⁵¹ suggests that a high level of suspicion is not required and this might also be said of Castorina v Chief Constable of Surrey.¹⁵² Detectives were investigating a burglary of a company's premises and on reasonable grounds came to the conclusion that it was an 'inside job'. The managing director told them that a certain employee had recently been dismissed and that the documents taken would be useful to someone with a grudge. However, she also said that she would not have expected the particular employee to commit a burglary. The detectives then arrested the employee, having found that she had no previous criminal record. She was detained for nearly four hours and then released without charge. She claimed damages for false imprisonment and was awarded £4,500. The judge considered that it was necessary to find that the detectives had had 'an honest belief founded on a reasonable suspicion leading an ordinary cautious man to the conclusion that the person arrested was guilty of the offence'. However, the Court of Appeal overturned the award on the basis that the test applied by the judge had been too severe. It was held that the question of 150 Section 17(2)(a) requires belief, not suspicion, that a suspect whom an officer is seeking is on premises; similarly, powers of seizure under s 19(2) depend on belief in certain matters. The difference between belief and suspicion and the lesser force of the word 'suspect' was accepted as an important distinction by the House of Lords in Wills v Bowley [1983] 1 AC 57, p 103, HL. See also Johnson v Whitehouse [1984] RTR 38, which was to the same effect.

151 (1986) The Times, 26 June; cf Monaghan v Corbett (1983) 147 JP 545, DC (however, although this demonstrated a different approach, the restriction it imposed may not be warranted: see DPP v Wilson [1991] Crim LR 441, DC).

152 NLJ 180, transcript from LEXIS.

honest belief was irrelevant; the issue of reasonable suspicion had nothing to do with the officer's subjective state of mind. The question was whether there was reasonable cause to suspect the plaintiff of burglary. Given that certain factors could be identified, including inside knowledge of the company's affairs and the motive of the plaintiff, it appeared that there was sufficient basis for the detectives to have reasonable grounds for suspicion.

Purchas LJ also ruled that once reasonable suspicion arises, officers have discretion as to whether to arrest or do something else, such as making further inquiries, but that this discretion can be attacked on Wednesbury principles.¹⁵³ In making this ruling, Purchas J relied on the ruling of the House of Lords in Holgate-Mohammed v Duke.¹⁵⁴ The House of Lords had confirmed that in addition to showing that the relevant statutory conditions are satisfied, the exercise of statutory powers by officers must not offend against Wednesbury principles; officers must not take irrelevant factors into account or fail to have regard to relevant ones; an exercise of discretion must not be so unreasonable that no reasonable officer could have exercised it in the manner in question. Thus, an arrest will be found to be unlawful if no reasonable person looking at the circumstances could have considered that an arrest should be effected, if the decision is based on irrelevant considerations and if it is not made in good faith and for a proper purpose.¹⁵⁵ It was found in Castorina that no breach of these principles had occurred and, as reasonable grounds for making the arrest were found, the first instance judge had erred in ruling that further inquiries should have been made before arresting. Under the HRA, courts will have to consider whether the Convention rights have been adhered to; which would be expected to result in a more intensive scrutiny; this is discussed below. Thus, the need to make further inquiries would be relevant to the first stage—arriving at reasonable suspicion—but not to the second—determining whether to make an arrest. That it must be relevant to the first is axiomatic: an investigation passes through many stages, from the first, in which a vague suspicion relating to a particular person arises, up until the point when that person's guilt is established beyond reasonable doubt. At some point in that process, reasonable suspicion giving rise to a discretion as to whether to effect an arrest arises; thus, there must be a point in the early stages at which it is possible to say that more inquiries should have been made, more evidence gathered, before the arrest could lawfully take place. As the courts appear prepared to accept that arrest at quite an early stage in this process may be said to be based on reasonable grounds, and that the application of Wednesbury principles leaves little leeway for challenge to the decision to arrest, it may be said that the interest of the citizen in his or her personal liberty is not being accorded sufficient weight under the current tests.¹⁵⁶ As Sanders and Young observe, commenting on Castorina, 'The decision gives the police considerable freedom to follow crime control norms, in that it allows them to arrest on little hard evidence'.¹⁵⁷

153 Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn [1948] 1 KB 223; [1948] 2 All ER 680, CA.

154 [1984] 1 AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054, HL.

155 For discussion of police discretion in this respect see [1986] PL 285.

156 See further as to reasonable grounds for suspicion Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, 'Arrest and reasonable suspicion' (1988) Law Soc Gazette, 7 September, p 22; Dixon, D, Bottomley, K and Coleman, C, 'Reality and rules in the construction and regulation of police suspicion' (1989) 17 Int J Soc Law 185–206; Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, 1994, pp 85–98.

157 Sanders and Young, ibid, p 86.

Under s 24(4), (5) and (7) it is not always necessary to show that reasonable suspicion exists. If an arrestable offence is in fact being committed or has been committed or is about to be committed, a constable can arrest even if he or she is just acting on a hunch which luckily turns out to be justified. Of course, if an officer arrests without reasonable suspicion, he or she is taking a risk. These provisions were included because it might seem strange if a person could found an action for false imprisonment on the basis that although he was committing an offence, he should not have been arrested for it. However, if it cannot be established that the offence was committed or was about to be committed, it is not enough to show that reasonable grounds for suspicion did in fact exist although the officer did not know of them. In *Siddiqui v Swain*¹⁵⁸ the Divisional Court held that the words ‘reasonable grounds to suspect’ used in s 8(5) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 include the requirement that the officer should actually suspect. This approach was also adopted in Chapman v DPP.¹⁵⁹ In O’Hara v Chief Constable of the RUC,¹⁶⁰ a decision on s 12(1) of the Prevention of Terrorism (TP) Act 1989, the House of Lords found that a constable could form a suspicion based on what he had been informed of previously as part of a briefing by a superior officer, or otherwise. The question to be asked was whether a reasonable man would personally have formed the suspicion after receiving the relevant information. It was not enough for the arresting officer to have been instructed by a superior officer to arrest; his own personal knowledge must provide him with the necessary reasonable suspicion. In the instant case, the arresting officer had sufficient personal knowledge of matters, which it was found provided a basis for reasonable suspicion. The House of Lords stated that these findings applied to arrest powers other than the one arising under s 12.

Research into the use of arrest suggests that in practice, the concept of reasonable suspicion is interpreted very flexibly by the police, as it is in respect of stop and search powers. A wealth of academic research and analysis has established that the need for reasonable suspicion provides little protection against wrongful arrest. Very doubtful grounds often appear to be sufficient to provide reasonable grounds to justify deprivation of liberty. Further, only in exceptional instances will an officer’s use of this power be found to have been wrongful; the courts are quite ready to find that these somewhat hazy tests have been satisfied.¹⁶¹

Sanders and Young speak of appearing ‘suspicious’ as being ‘a key working rule’ in arrests and stops, and observe that association with other criminals is also often the basis for arrest even where the police are ‘entirely without reasonable suspicion’, since the object is to obtain statements against associates.¹⁶² The courts appear to be reluctant to interfere with the police interpretation and use of the arrest power. Post-PACE decisions leave a great deal of leeway to officers to arrest where suspicion relating to the particular person is at a low level, but they want to 158 [1979] RTR 454.

159 (1988) Cr App R 190; [1988] Crim LR 843.

160 [1997] 2 WLR 1; [1997] 1 All ER 129.

161 See McConville, Sanders and Leng, op cit, fn 1; Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, 1994, pp 92–98; Ryan, C and Williams, K, ‘Police discretion’ [1986] Public Law 285, and Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 156, p 22.

162 Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, 1994, p 92, based on research undertaken by Leng (Royal Commission on Criminal Justice Research Study No 10), 1993.

163 See Ward v Chief Constable of Somerset and Avon Constabulary (1986) The Times, 26 June; Castorina v Chief Constable of Surrey (1988) NLJ 180, transcript from LEXIS.

further the investigation by gathering information.¹⁶³ These powers, especially the very broad power under s 25, mean that, as a number of commentators have pointed out, arrest became under PACE avowedly no longer the culmination of the investigative process but an integral part of it.¹⁶⁴ The strong evidence founding the charge which used to be obtained, it has been suggested,¹⁶⁵ prior to arrest, thus ensuring that innocent persons were unlikely to be arrested and that the infringement of liberty of a person innocent in the eyes of the law was kept to a minimum, tended after PACE to be found in the form of a confession, after arrest. PACE also confirmed the movement away from judicial supervision of arrest, by means of the warrant procedure, which had already begun.

Power of arrest with warrant

This power does not arise under PACE. There are a large number of statutory provisions allowing an arrest warrant to be issued of which the most significant is that arising under s 1 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980.¹⁶⁶ Under this power, a warrant may be issued if a person aged at least 17 is suspected of an offence which is indictable or punishable with imprisonment or of any other offence and no satisfactory address is known allowing a summons to be served. This provision therefore limits the circumstances under which a warrant can be sought as an alternative to using the non-warrant powers under PACE and as the police now have such broad powers of arrest under ss 24 and 25, arrest in reliance on a warrant is used even less under PACE than it was previously. The result is that judicial supervision of arrests is minimised.¹⁶⁷ This tendency leaves the operation of the arrest power to the discretion of the police and is part of a general move away from the judicial supervision of police powers.

Procedural elements of a valid arrest¹⁶⁸

For an arrest to be made validly, not only must the power of arrest exist, whatever its source, but the procedural elements must be complied with. The fact that a power of arrest arises will not alone make the arrest lawful. These elements are of crucial importance owing to the consequences which may flow from a lawful arrest which will not flow from an unlawful one.¹⁶⁹ Such consequences include the right of the officer to use force in effecting it under s 117 of PACE or s 114 of the TA, if necessary, and the loss of liberty inherent in an arrest. If an arrest has not occurred, the citizen is free to go wherever she will and any attempt to prevent her doing so will be 164 Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, 1994, p 70; Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 24.

165 Ewing and Gearty, ibid, p 25.

166 See [1962] Crim LR 520, p 597 for comment on these powers.

167 See Criminal Statistics, Cm 2680, 1993, Table 8.2, p 191.

168 The term 'Valid arrest' is open to attack on the ground that there can be no such thing as an invalid arrest. However, a valid arrest may be contrasted with a purported arrest and this is the sense in which it is used in this section.

169 The question as to the difference between a valid and invalid arrest has been much debated; see Lidstone, KW [1978] Crim LR 332; Clark and Feldman [1979] Crim LR 702; Zander, M (1977) NLJ 352; Smith, JC [1977] Crim LR 293.

170 Rice v Connolly [1966] 2 QB 414; Kenlin v Gardner [1967] 2 QB 510 (see above, pp 761-62 in relation to obstruction of or assault on a police officer in the course of his duty).

unlawful.¹⁷⁰ It is therefore important to convey the fact of the arrest to the arrestee and to mark the point at which the arrest comes into being and general liberty ceases. At common law, there had to be a physical detention or a touching of the arrestee to convey the fact of detention, unless he or she made this unnecessary by submitting to it;¹⁷¹ the fact of arrest had to be made clear¹⁷² and the reason for it had to be made known.¹⁷³

The common law safeguards have been modified and strengthened by s 28 of PACE, which provides that both the fact of and the reason for the arrest must be made known at the time or as soon as practicable afterwards. However, an ordinary citizen is not under this duty if the fact of the arrest and the reason for it are obvious. Conveying the fact of the arrest does not involve using a particular form of words¹⁷⁴ but it may be that reasonable detail must be given so that the arrestee will be in a position to give a convincing denial and therefore be more speedily released from detention.¹⁷⁵ Given the infringement of liberty represented by an arrest and the need, therefore, to restore liberty as soon as possible, consistent with the needs of the investigation, it is unfortunate that s 28 did not make it clear that a reasonable degree of detail should be given.

However, the reason for the arrest need only be made known as soon as practicable. The meaning and implications of this provision were considered in DPP v Hawkins.¹⁷⁶ A police officer took hold of the defendant to arrest him, but did not give the reason. The youth struggled and was therefore later charged with assaulting an officer in the execution of his duty. The question which arose was whether the officer was in the execution of his duty since he had failed to give the reason for the arrest. If the arrest was thereby rendered invalid, he could not be in the execution of his duty, since it could not include effecting an unlawful arrest. It was determined in the Court of Appeal that the arrest became unlawful when the time came at which it was practicable to inform the defendant of the reason but he was not so informed. This occurred at the police station or perhaps in the police car, but did not occur earlier because of the defendant's behaviour. However, the arrest did not become retrospectively unlawful and therefore did not affect acts done before its unlawfulness came into being, which thus remained acts done in the execution of duty. Thus, the police have a certain leeway as to informing the arrestee; the arrest will not be affected, nor will other acts arising from it, until the time when it would be practicable to inform of the reason for it has come and gone. However, if there was nothing in the behaviour of the arrestee to make informing him or her impracticable, then the arrest will be unlawful from its inception. Following the decision in Hawkins, what can be said as to the status of the suspect before the time came and passed at which the requisite words should have been spoken? Presumably he was under arrest

171 Hart v Chief Constable of Kent [1983] RTR 484.

172 Alderson v Booth [1969] 3 QB 216.

173 Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573; [1947] 1 All ER 567, HL.

174 The Court of Appeal confirmed this in Brosch [1988] Crim LR 743. In Abassey and Others v Metropolitan Police Comr [1990] 1 WLR 385, it was found that there was no need for precise or technical language in conveying the reason for the arrest; the question whether the reason had been given was a matter for the jury. See also Nicholas v Parsonage [1987] RTR 199.

175 Murphy v Oxford, 15 February 1985, unreported, CA. This is out of line with the CA decision in Abassey [1990] 1 WLR 385, in which Murphy unfortunately was not considered.

176 [1988] 1 WLR 1166; [1988] 3 All ER 673, DC; see also Brosch [1988] Crim LR 743, CA.

at that time. Where the procedural elements are not complied with but no good reason for such failure arises (or if no power to arrest arose in the first place), the arrestee will have grounds for bringing an action for false imprisonment. Moreover, if a false arrest occurs and subsequently physical evidence is discovered or the defendant makes a confession, the defence may argue that the evidence should be excluded owing to the false arrest. This is considered below and in Chapter 14.¹⁷⁷

Consensual detainment

Apart from situations in which reasonable suspicion relating to an offence arises, there is nothing to prevent a police officer asking any person to come to the police station to answer questions. There is no legal power to do so, but equally, there is no power to prevent such a request being made. The citizen is entitled to ask whether he or she is being arrested and, if not, to refuse. However, if he or she consents, no action for false imprisonment can arise. This creates something of a grey area, since the citizen may not realise that he or she does not need to comply with the request.¹⁷⁸ The Government refused to include a provision in PACE requiring the police to inform citizens of the fact that they are not under arrest.

The requirement under s 29 that volunteers at police stations—those who are not under arrest—should be able to leave at will unless placed under arrest, does not appear to have much impact on police practice since many people may not realise that they can leave. Section 29 is backed up by para 3.15 of Code C, which requires that if a volunteer is cautioned, she must then be told that she may leave at will. However, this provision is less protective than it appears to be at first sight. A person need only be cautioned if there are grounds to suspect her of an offence. But if there are such grounds, she could probably be arrested, depending on the nature of the offence. Thus, para 3.15 would only come into play at the point when arrest could occur. It would only protect due process (assuming that it was adhered to) if it demanded cautioning on the arrival of a volunteer at a police station. Certain provisions included in Code of Practice C (see below) were intended to ensure that volunteers were not disadvantaged in comparison with arrestees.¹⁷⁹ Of course, such provisions do not affect the fact that some Volunteers' might not have gone to the police station at all had they realised at the outset that they had a choice.

Use of force¹⁸⁰

The police may use reasonable force so long as they are within one of the powers allowed under the PACE scheme. This is provided for under s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 and s 117 of PACE 1984. Section 3 is in one sense wider than s 117, since it authorises the use of force by any person, although only in relation to making an arrest or preventing crime. The prevention of crime would include resistance to 177 See pp 875–85.

178 See McKenzie, I, Morgan, R and Reiner, R, 'Helping the police with their enquiries' [1990] Crim LR 22.

179 In particular, Code C, paras 3.15 and 3.16. See p 833 below for further discussion of the position of volunteers.

180 For consideration of the use of force, see [1982] Crim LR 475; Report of Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis for 1983, Cmnd 9268; Waddington, PAJ, The Strong Arm of the Law, 1991.

an unlawful arrest. Section 117 only applies to police officers and then only in relation to provisions under PACE which do not provide that the consent of someone other than a constable is required. Force may include as a last resort the use of firearms; such use is governed by Home Office guidelines,¹⁸¹ which provide that firearms should be issued only where there is reason to suppose that a person to be apprehended is so dangerous that he could not be safely restrained otherwise. An oral warning should normally be given unless impracticable before using a firearm.¹⁸² Under the 1967 Act, the force can only be used if it is 'necessary' and the amount of force used must be 'reasonable'. 'Reasonable' is taken to mean 'reasonable in the circumstances'¹⁸³ and, therefore, allows extreme force if the suspect is also using or appears to be about to use extreme force.

It may be argued that further guidance as to the meaning of 'reasonable' should be provided in PACE. Section 117 provides that 'the officer may use reasonable force, if necessary, in the exercise of the [PACE] power'. This could be taken to mean that any force used which was not, objectively speaking, absolutely necessary will be unreasonable or it might suggest that any force used which appeared necessary at the time will be reasonable, but it is likely that the courts will adopt the latter view. As Chapter 2 demonstrated, Art 2 of the European Convention allows the use of even lethal force which is 'absolutely necessary' in order to arrest;¹⁸⁴ therefore, UK law may not be in harmony with the Convention since a reasonableness test is used. This question is pursued below.

5 DETENTION IN POLICE CUSTODY

Time limit on detention after arrest

The position under the law prior to the 1984 Act with regard to detention before charge and committal before a magistrate was very uncertain. It was governed by s 43 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, which allowed the police to detain a person in custody until such time as it was 'practicable' to bring him before a magistrate, in the case of a 'serious' offence. Since a person would be charged before being brought before the magistrate, this meant that the police had to move expeditiously in converting suspicion into evidence justifying a charge.¹⁸⁵ However, the common law had developed to the point when it could be said that detention for the purpose of questioning was recognised.¹⁸⁶ Thus, prior to PACE, the police had no clearly defined power to hold a person for questioning. The detention scheme governed by Part IV of PACE put such a power on a more certain basis in accordance with the Phillips recommendations,¹⁸⁷ that the purpose of the detention is to obtain a 181 The guidelines were reviewed in 1987 and reissued: see 109 HC Deb Cols 562–63, 3 February 1987; (1987) 151 JPN 146.

182 For comment on the use of firearms, see [1990] Crim LR 695.

183 See the ruling in Farrell v Secretary of State for Defence [1980] 1 All ER 166, HL.

184 See pp 38–41.

185 See Holmes [1981] 2 All ER 612; [1981] Crim LR 802.

186 Holgate-Mohammed v Duke [1984] AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054, HL.

187 See Phillips Royal Commission, op cit, fn 14.

confession.¹⁸⁸ This was foreshadowed in the developing common law recognition that detention was for the purpose of questioning.¹⁸⁹

Phillips did not, however, envisage the decision to arrest becoming, in effect, the decision to detain. This is reflected in the role of the custody officer under s 37 of PACE. In theory, he or she could refuse to accept the arrestee into detention. In practice this is extremely rare, if not unknown; the custody officer almost always simply rubber-stamps the arresting officer's decision that the suspect should be detained.¹⁹⁰ Thus, although s 37(3) appears to protect due process since it provides that the custody officer must be satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for the detention,¹⁹¹ in practice it does not appear to affect police working practices.

Under s 41, the detention can be for up to 24 hours, but in the case of a person in police custody for a serious arrestable offence (defined in s 116) it can extend to 96 hours. Part IV of PACE does not apply to detention under the Terrorism Act 2000 (below) or to detention by immigration officers.¹⁹² Under s 42(1), a police officer of the rank of superintendent or above can sanction detention for up to 36 hours if three conditions apply: he or she has reasonable grounds for believing that either the detention is necessary to secure or preserve evidence relating to an offence for which the detainee is under arrest or to obtain such evidence by questioning him; an offence for which the detainee is under arrest is a serious arrestable offence; and the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously. After 36 hours, detention can no longer be authorised by the police alone. Under s 43(1), the application for authorisation must be supported by information and brought before a magistrates' court, which can authorise detention under s 44 for up to 96 hours if the conditions are met as set out above. Detention must be reviewed periodically;¹⁹³ in the case of a person who has been arrested and charged, the review must be by the custody officer; in the case of a person arrested but not yet charged, by an officer of at least the rank of inspector. The detainee or his solicitor (if available) has the right to make written or oral representations.¹⁹⁴

Research suggests, however, that these reviews are not treated as genuine investigations into the grounds for continuing the detention, but as routinised procedures requiring a merely formal adherence.¹⁹⁵ Perhaps in recognition of the need for rigour in relation to reviews, a proposal made in 1999 by the Chief Constable of Kent Police that detention review should be by video link in the majority of cases was rejected in judicial review proceedings on the ground, discussed below, that it might undermine the protection for liberty they are intended to offer, taking Art 5 into account.¹⁹⁶

188 Part IV, s 37(2).

189 Mohammed-Holgate v Duke [1984] QB 209.

190 See Dixon, D et al, 'Safeguarding the rights of suspects in police custody', 1 Policing and Society 115, p 130.

191 Under s 37(2) they are: 'To secure or preserve evidence relating to an offence for which he is under arrest or to obtain such evidence by questioning him.'

192 PACE 1984, s 51.

193 Under s 40(1)(b).

194 Under s 40(12) and (13).

195 Dixon et al, op cit, fn 190, pp 130–31.

196 R v Chief Constable of Kent Constabulary ex p Kent Police Federation Joint Branch Board and Another (1999) The Times, 1 December, Judgment 18 November 1999. See further on this decision below, p 797.

However, the Government then brought forward legislation—s 73 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP)—to reverse the effect of this decision. Section 73 inserts new ss 40A and 45A into PACE to allow for the use of telephone and video links for reviews of detention. Section 40A allows for review by an officer of at least the rank of inspector by telephone where it is not reasonably practicable for the officer to be present at the station, and where the review is not one authorised to be carried out by video link under s 45A. Section 45A is an enabling section: it allows for the Secretary of State to make regulations to allow an officer to perform functions in relation to detainees when he or she is not present in the station but has access to a video link. The functions include carrying out the function of custody officer under ss 37, 38, 40 and the carrying out of a review under s 40(1)(b). The function of custody officer can only be carried out by a custody officer at a designated station (s 45A(4)). Clearly, these new provisions in relation to review of detention detract from the face to face confrontation that was originally envisaged.

The powers of detention are very significant, but they are intended to embody the principle that a detained person should normally be charged within 24 hours and then either released or brought before a magistrate. They are supposed to be balanced by all the safeguards created by Part V of PACE and Codes of Practice C and E. It may be noted that a person unlawfully detained can apply for a writ of habeas corpus in order to secure release from detention, and this remedy is preserved in s 51(d). Its usefulness in practice is, however, very limited since the courts have developed a practice of adjourning applications for 24 hours in order to allow the police to present their case. Thus, detention can continue for that time allowing the police to carry out questioning or other procedures in the meantime.

Detention under the Terrorism Act 2000

The detention scheme adopted in respect of terrorist suspects allowed for the suspect to be detained for longer periods and for a lower level of due process safeguards to be applicable during detention.¹⁹⁷ If a person was arrested under s 14 of the PTA as opposed to s 24 of PACE, whether the arrest was for an offence or on suspicion of being a terrorist, the detention provisions under PACE did not apply. The arrestee could be detained for up to 48 hours following arrest (s 14(4) of the PTA) but this period could be extended by the Secretary of State by further periods not exceeding five days in all (s 14(5) of the PTA). Thus, the whole detention could be for seven days and, in contrast to the PACE provisions, the courts were not involved in the authorising process; it occurred at a low level of visibility as an administrative decision. The similar provision under the PTA 1984 was found to be in breach of Art 5(3) in *Brogan v UK*¹⁹⁸ on the ground that holding a person for longer than four days without judicial authorisation was a violation of the requirement that persons should be brought promptly before a judicial officer. The Brogan decision clearly presented the Government with a difficulty in formulating the Terrorism Act 2000. Although the HRA continued the derogation entered in Brogan, under s 14(1)(a) 197 See below, pp 804 et seq for discussion of such safeguards.

198 (1989) 11 EHRR 117.

HRA, for a time, it was vulnerable to challenge at Strasbourg at some future point, in the light of the new settlement in Northern Ireland. The Government put forward various justifications for producing new terrorist legislation in 2000, but it recognised that it might be in difficulties in arguing that a state of emergency sufficient to support the derogation could be said to exist post-2000.¹⁹⁹ Its solution, in the TA, was to make provision for judicial authorisation of detention, rather than to decrease the length of time during which terrorist suspects could be detained, harmonising it with the PACE period. In deciding on these arrangements, including the retention of the possibility of up to seven days' detention, the Government rejected the suggestion of Lord Lloyd that once there is a lasting peace in Northern Ireland, it ought to be possible to reduce the maximum period for which a suspect could be detained under the new legislation to a total of four days—two days on the authority of the police and two days with judicial authorisation.

The maximum period of detention, applicable to a person arrested under s 41 of the TA, continues to be seven days, but para 29, Sched 8 provides that it must be under a warrant issued by a 'judicial authority'.²⁰⁰ Under para 32, the warrant may be issued if there are reasonable grounds for believing that 'the detention of the person to whom the application relates is necessary to obtain relevant evidence whether by questioning him or otherwise or to preserve relevant evidence'. The detainee or his solicitor has the right to make written or oral representations under para 33(1). Thus, authorisation may not be merely 'on the papers'. Such a possibility might not have satisfied the aim of achieving compliance with Art 5(3), despite the involvement of a judicial figure.

The police can detain a person on their own authority for 48 hours under s 41(3) which provides:

Subject to subsections (4) to (7), a person detained under this section shall (unless detained under any other power) be released not later than the end of the period of 48 hours beginning-

- (a) with the time of his arrest under this section, or
- (b) if he was being detained under Schedule 7 when he was arrested under this section, with the time when his examination under that Schedule began (emphasis added).

These provisions differ quite significantly from those under the PTA. Section 14(4) of the PTA provided that the 48 hour period is subject only to sub-s 5, which allowed for extension of detention by the Secretary of State. Section 41(4)-(7) of the TA provide three possibilities of continuing the detention beyond 48 hours, over and above the possibility of extension under judicial authorisation. These possibilities represent, depending on the interpretation they are afforded, quite notable departures from the previous scheme. Section 41(6) provides that if an application for an extension of detention is made, or under s 41(5), it is intended that it will be made, detention can continue while it is pending. This impliedly means that the police can continue to detain for more than 48 hours so long as an application is being made or is about to be made, even if it is subsequently refused. The application need not be made during the 48 hours; under Sched 8, Part III, para 30 it may be made within six hours of the end of that period.

¹⁹⁹ See op cit, fn 144, para 8.2.

²⁰⁰ Paragraph 29(4) provides: 'In this Part "judicial authority" means (a) in England and Wales, the Senior District Judge (Chief Magistrate) or his deputy, or a District Judge (Magistrates' Courts) who is designated for the purpose of this Part by the Lord Chancellor, (b) in Scotland, the sheriff, and (c) in Northern Ireland, a county court judge, or a resident magistrate who is designated for the purpose of this Part by the Lord Chancellor.'

The 48 hour period is also subject to s 41(4), which provides: 'If on a review of a person's detention under Part II of Schedule 8 the review officer does not authorise continued detention, the person shall (unless detained in accordance with subsections (5) or (6) under any other power) be released.' The reviews have to occur every 12 hours. This appears to mean that the review officer (this must be an officer of at least the rank of superintendent after the first 12 hours) can continue the detention periodically, at 12 hour intervals, so long as the review conditions (which are the same as the warrant conditions) continue to apply. No express time limit is placed on the total period which the review officer can authorise. On their face, the provisions suggest that there is a twin track system of detention, one dependent on the judicial authority and one on the police themselves. Clearly, s 41(4) should be interpreted strictly to mean that within the 48 hour period there must be periodic reviews (subject to the provisions for delaying reviews); the possibility of providing the police with a new power to extend detention beyond 48 hours under s 41(4) should be rejected, since it seems to be due to ambiguous drafting. The words 'subject to' the decision of the review officer to continue detention could be interpreted either way. The stricter interpretation appears to accord with the Government's intention as expressed in the Consultation Paper.²⁰¹ If, in practice, s 41(4) was interpreted to allow some detentions on the authority of the review officer only, beyond 48 hours, such detentions would obviously be more likely than those under the previous provisions to create breaches of Art 5(3).

As part of the port and border controls regime, Sched 5 of the PTA provided a further power of detention in allowing a person to be detained for 12 hours before examination at ports of entry into Britain or Northern Ireland. The period could be extended to 24 hours if the person was suspected of involvement in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism. These provisions are partially reproduced in Sched 7 of the TA; they are modified to take account of the abolition of the exclusion power.²⁰²

Clearly, the PACE and TA detention schemes differ quite radically in due process terms, despite the fact that many of those who will be potentially subject to the new TA scheme are likely to represent a far more divergent group than the previous one which fell within the rubric of 'terrorist'. Even within that previous group, as a number of the most famous miscarriage of justice cases imply, those who were designated terrorist suspects, such as Judith Ward,²⁰³ were often remarkably ill-suited to the draconian terrorist regime to which they were subject. The peace process presented an opportunity for the harmonisation of the PACE and counter-terrorist regimes that might have avoided the potential for future miscarriages which, it is suggested, is inherent in the TA scheme, bearing in mind the special propensity

201 Op cit, fn 144.

202 See Chapter 15, pp 967–68.

203 Ward (1992) 98 Cr App R 1.

204 See McIlkenny and Others [1992] 2 All ER 417.

evidenced in the cases of the Birmingham Six,²⁰⁴ Guildford Four,²⁰⁵ Maguire Seven,²⁰⁶ Ward,²⁰⁷ and UDR Four,²⁰⁸ of terrorist cases to miscarry.

Searches of detained persons

Detained persons may not automatically be searched, but the power to search arrestees under s 32(1) of PACE is quite wide. It arises under s 32(1) if the suspect has been arrested somewhere other than a police station and a constable has reasonable grounds to suspect that an arrestee has anything on him which might be evidence relating to an offence or might be used to help him escape from custody or that he may present a danger to himself or others. The much wider power arises under s 32(2) and allows search, again on reasonable grounds, for anything which might be evidence of an offence or could help to effect an escape from lawful custody. The nature of the search must relate to the article it is suspected may be found; if it is a large item, the search may not involve more than removal of a coat. Such searching may occur routinely, but it must be possible to point to objectively justified grounds in each case which must not go beyond those specified.²⁰⁹ A power of search also arises under s 54, as amended, allowing search to ascertain property the detainee has with him or her, which will apply if someone has been arrested at the police station or brought there after being arrested elsewhere. The custody officer must determine whether it is necessary to conduct a search for this purpose.

Impact of the HRA on arrest and detention

As discussed above in relation to detention short of arrest, Art 5(1) of the Convention provides a right to liberty subject to certain exceptions which must have a basis in law. Not only must an exception apply, the requirements under Art 5(2), (3) and (4) must also be met. The current domestic arrest and detention scheme for non-terrorist suspects is, as one would expect, largely coterminous, formally speaking, with these provisions, and in some respects may afford a higher—or, at least, clearer—value to due process. But the use of Art 5 as an interpretative tool may lead to a more rigorous judicial approach to the detention scheme. Breaches of Art 5 may be most likely to be established in respect of the special counter-terrorist arrest and detention powers available under the TA.

As discussed in Chapter 14, Art 5 arguments could be raised within the trial process, by means of a civil action or under the police complaints provisions. Judicial review, on Art 5 principles, of decisions within the police complaints process, or in respect of judicial authorisations within the PACE or TA schemes, or of proposals relating to detention practice would also be available under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA.

205 See May, Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances surrounding the Convictions Arising out of the Bomb Attacks at Guildford and Woolwich in 1974, Final Report, 1993–94 HC 449, Chapter 17.

206 See Maguire [1992] 2 All ER 433.

207 Ward (1992) 98 Cr App R 1.

208 See [1988] 11 NIJB 1.

209 Eet [1983] Crim LR 806.

Detention in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law

The first and most essential requirement of Art 5 is that a person's detention is in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. This means that the procedure should be in accordance with national law and with recognised Convention standards, including Convention principles, and is not arbitrary.²¹⁰ Thus, where one of the Art 5(1) exceptions applies to a person's detention, this requirement will also have to be satisfied. The procedure covers the arrest provisions²¹¹ and the procedure adopted by a court in authorisations of detention.²¹² The requirement that the detention should be in accordance with the law was given a robust interpretation based on due process norms in one of the first domestic decisions in the pre-HRA period to place a heavy reliance on Art 5. In Chief Constable of Kent Constabulary ex p Kent Police Federation Joint Branch Board and Another,²¹³ the court had to consider an application by Kent Police Federation Joint Branch Board, representing all ranks of the Kent Constabulary, for judicial review of the proposal by the Chief Constable of Kent that the conduct of reviews of police detention under s 40(1)(b) of the 1984 Act should be, in the majority of cases, by video link.

Lord Bingham referred to Art 5 and said that, although not yet part of domestic law, it embodied important and basic rights recognised and protected by English law. If citizens were to be deprived of their liberty, such deprivation had to be in accordance with the law. He found that the court was dealing with an area of extreme sensitivity, namely the circumstances in which, and the conditions on which, a citizen not convicted or even charged with crime might be deprived of his or her liberty. The Act and the Codes giving it effect represented, he said, a complex and careful balance between the obviously important duty of the police to investigate crime and apprehend criminals on the one hand and the rights of the private citizen on the other. Under s 37(5), a written record of the grounds of detention had to be made by the review officer 'in the presence of the person whose detention is under review'. He found that that condition was not met if the review officer was in one place and the person whose detention was under review was in another. Section 37(5) did not refer to physical presence, but 'presence' in ordinary parlance meant physical presence.

Lord Bingham concluded that Parliament had provided for a face to face confrontation between the review officer and the suspect and, if important rights enacted to protect the subject were to be modified, it was for Parliament after appropriate consultation so to rule and not for the courts. This decision indicated a determination to give real efficacy to Art 5, where a contrary interpretation, impliedly supported by a guiding note,²¹⁴ was readily available. Review by video link would have meant the intrusion of technology, controlled by the police, into the review process, leading arguably to a depersonalised confrontation and possibly to a further impression of tokenism.

210 Winterwerp v Netherlands A 33 (1979), para 39.

211 Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK A 182 (1990); 13 EHRR 157.

212 Weston v UK 3 EHRR 402; Van der Leer v Netherlands A 170-A (1990).

213 (1999) The Times, 1 December, Judgment 18 November 1999.

214 He found that the provisions of Code C do not provide conclusive support for either construction. Note for guidance 15C permits review by telephone so long as the requirements of s 40 are met, but Lord Bingham had difficulty in seeing how a review conducted over the telephone could ever comply with those requirements, as that Note appeared to envisage.

The exception under Art 5(1)(c)

In considering the exceptional circumstances in which liberty can be taken away, the requirements connoted by the general provision that they must have a basis in law under Art 5(1) are also implied into the 'prescribed by law' rubric of each subparagraph.²¹⁵ Article 5(1)(c) of the Convention sets out one of the circumstances in which an individual can be detained. It permits the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence, or where it is reasonably considered that an arrest is necessary to prevent the person in question from committing an offence or fleeing after having done so. In requiring arrest only for specific offences and not for general crime control purposes, Art 5(1)(c) adheres closely to the due process model of arrest indicated above. Sections 24 and 25 of PACE and s 41 of the TA (in so far as it relates to certain specific terrorist offences under s 40(1)(a)) may prima facie comply with these provisions owing to their requirements of reasonable suspicion.

As indicated above, in what is usually regarded as the leading post-PAEC case on the meaning of that requirement, Castorina v Chief Constable of Surrey,²¹⁶ the grounds for suspicion regarding a burglary of a firm were that the suspect was a former employee who appeared to have a grudge and the burglary appeared to be an 'inside job'. But, the suspect was not considered by the victim to be likely to commit burglary and she had no criminal record. Nevertheless, the court found that reasonable suspicion had been established. Clayton and Tomlinson criticised the decision in these terms: 'if the police are justified in arresting a middle-aged woman of good character on such flimsy grounds without even questioning her as to her alibi or possible motives, then the law provides very scant protection for those suspected of crimes.'²¹⁷ Castorina may be compared with the findings of the Strasbourg Court in *Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK*²¹⁸ The applicants had been arrested in accordance with s 11 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 which required only suspicion, not reasonable suspicion. The only evidence put forward by the Government for the presence of reasonable suspicion was that the applicants had convictions for terrorist offences and that when arrested, they were asked about particular terrorist acts. The Government said that further evidence could not be disclosed for fear of endangering life. The Court found that although allowance could be made for the difficulties of evidence-gathering in an emergency situation, reasonable suspicion which 'arises from facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned may have committed the offence'²¹⁹ had not been established. Moreover, 'the exigencies of dealing with terrorist crime cannot justify stretching the notion of reasonableness to the point where the essence of the safeguard secured by Art 5(1)(c) is impaired'.²²⁰ The arrests in question could not, therefore, be justified. In Murray v UK,²²¹ this test 215 Winterwerp v Netherlands A 33 (1979), para 39.

216 (1988) 138 NLJ 180.

217 (1988) Law Soc Gazette, 7 September, p 26.

218 A 182 (1990); 13 EHRR 157.

219 Ibid, para 32.

220 Ibid, para 32.

was viewed as a lower standard for reasonable suspicion, applicable in terrorist cases, but it was again emphasised that an objective standard of reasonable suspicion was required,²²² although the information grounding the suspicion might acceptably remain confidential in the exigencies of a situation such as that pertaining at the time of the arrest in question, in Northern Ireland.²²³ It is debatable whether the UK courts are in general applying a test of reasonable suspicion under PACE or the PTA which reaches the standards which the European Court had in mind, especially where terrorism is not in question. The departure which the HRA brings about is to encourage stricter judicial scrutiny of decisions to arrest.

The purpose of the arrest should also be in compliance with Art 5(1)(c), even where reasonable suspicion is established, in that it should be effected in order to 'bring [the suspect] before the competent legal authority', although this does not mean that every arrest must lead to a charge.²²⁴ In the individual circumstances of a case, a breach of Art 5(1)(c) might be found where, although reasonable suspicion was present on the facts, the arrest discretion was not exercised in accordance with Art 5(1)(c) since the purpose of the arrest was in reality for general information-gathering ends. This might occur where, although there were, objectively, reasonable grounds for suspicion, the police had no belief in the guilt of the suspect. In such an instance, the arrest would be unlawful under s 6 of the HRA, not merely Wednesbury unreasonable. A breach might also be established where the arrest was unnecessary in order to further the purpose in question. For example, if the suspect was co-operative, there would appear to be no need to arrest her since the purpose under Art 5(1)(c) could be served by interviewing her in her own home. That purpose would not appear to cover an arrest undertaken merely for the purpose of interviewing such a suspect in the police station.²²⁵ It was found, however, in Chalkley and Jeffries,²²⁶ that the existence of a collateral motive for an arrest would not necessarily render it unlawful. Under the HRA, a domestic court would have to consider whether Art 5 would be satisfied by an arrest with a 'mixed' purpose.

The test under Art 5(1)(c) relies on reasonable suspicion regarding an offence and therefore, as indicated above, calls into question s 41 of the TA, in so far as it relates to suspicion that a person is a terrorist in the sense of (under s 40(1)(b)) being concerned in the commission, preparation, or instigation of an act of terrorism. Section 41 therefore allows for arrest without reasonable suspicion that a particular offence has been committed. The compatibility of s 41 and Art 5(1)(c) depends on the interpretation afforded to Brogan and Others v UK.²²⁷ The case concerned the EPA provision which was largely reproduced in s 41, read with s 40(1)(b). The Court applied two tests to the basis for the arrests in finding that the power of arrest was justified within Art 5(1)(c). First, the definition of acts of terrorism was 'well in keeping with the idea of an offence'.²²⁸ Secondly, after arrest, the applicants were asked about specific offences. Thus, 'the Court decided the point on the basis that

221 [1994] EHRR 193.

222 Paragraph 50.

223 Paragraphs 58–59.

224 K-F v Germany (1997) 26 EHRR 390.

225 Cf Holgate-Mohammed v Duke [1984] AC 437.

226 [1998] 2 All ER 155.

227 Judgment of 29 November 1988 (1989) Series A 145-B (1989) 11 EHRR 117.

228 Paragraph 51.

involvement in “acts of terrorism” indirectly meant the commission of specific criminal offences under Northern Irish law, which would appear to be the better approach on the facts’.²²⁹

On either test, arrests under s 41 read with s 40(1)(b) might be in a more doubtful position. The definition of terrorism relevant in Brogan was identical to the s 20 PTA definition—the use of violence for political ends. The current definition under s 1 of the TA is far wider: it covers the use or threat, ‘for the purpose of advancing a political, religious or ideological cause’, of action, designed to influence the government or intimidate the public, which involves serious violence against any person or serious damage to property, or is designed to seriously disrupt an electronic system, or endangers life, or creates a serious risk to health or safety. Unlike the previous one, this definition may cover matters, such as threatening to hack into a computer system, or to destroy genetically modified crops, which do not clearly correspond to existing offences and therefore might not be viewed so readily as ‘in keeping with the idea of an offence’. The application of the second test would partly depend in practice on the particular instance which arose before a domestic court. If a person was arrested under s 41 as part of an investigation and was not asked about specific offences on arrest, the connection with the basis of the arrest, bearing in mind the width of the s 1 TA definition, might be viewed as too tenuous to be termed an arrest on reasonable suspicion of an offence. Moreover, the purpose of such an arrest would not appear to be in accordance with the Art 5 requirement, since it would not be to ‘bring [the suspect] before the competent legal authority’.

Article 5(1)(c) also calls into question the provision under s 24 of PACE allowing for arrest without reasonable suspicion so long as a ‘hunch’ turns out to be justified (s 24(4)(a), (5)(a) and (7)(a)). Sanders and Young call this possibility a ‘classic crime control norm since the ends are regarded as justifying the means’.²³⁰ Such an arrest would appear to be unlawful under s 6 of the HRA where effected by a police constable since no exception under Art 5 appears to allow for it.

Article 5(2)

Article 5(2), which provides that a person must be informed promptly of the reason for arrest, corresponds to s 28 of PACE. In *Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK*²³¹ the applicants, who were arrested on suspicion of terrorist offences, were not informed of the reason for the arrest at the time of it, but were told that they were being arrested under a particular statutory provision. Clearly, this could not convey the reason to them at that time. At a later point, during interrogation, they were asked about specific criminal offences. The European Court of Human Rights found that Art 5(2) was not satisfied at the time of the arrest, but that this breach was healed by the later indications made during interrogation of the offences for which they had been arrested. In Murray v UK,²³² soldiers occupied a woman’s house, thus clearly taking her into detention, but did not inform her of the fact of arrest for half an hour. The House of Lords had found that the delay in giving the requisite

229 Harris, D, O’Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of The European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 116.

230 Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, 1994, p 76.

231 (1990) A 182; 13 EHRR 157.

232 Murray v UK (1994) 19 EHRR 193.

information was acceptable because of the alarm which the fact of arrest, if known, might have aroused in the particular circumstances—the unsettled situation in Northern Ireland.²³³ The European Court of Human Rights found no breach of Art 5(2); Mrs Murray was eventually informed during interrogation of the reason for the arrest and, in the circumstances, it was found acceptable to allow an interval of a few hours between the arrest and the point when she was informed of the reason for it. The claim also made, that Art 8 had been breached, was dismissed. The violation of privacy fell within the exception under Art 8(2) in respect of the prevention of crime and was found to be necessary and proportionate to the aims of that exception.

The decisions in both Fox and Murray were influenced by the terrorist context in which they occurred, and provide examples of the Court's tenderness to claims of a threat to national security made by governments of Member States. In both, a very wide margin of appreciation was allowed. Probably as a result, both were influenced by the crime control consideration of allowing leeway to the police to resort to doubtful practices in relation to terrorist suspects and both exhibit a lack of rigorousness in relation to due process. Such lack of rigour might be acceptable if there was a real connection between a failure to give information to suspects and an advantage to be gained in an emergency situation, since proportionality might be satisfied. However, in Mrs Murray's case, once she was in detention, and her house in effect sealed off from the outside world, it is unclear that telling her of the fact of the arrest could create or exacerbate an unsettled situation. Giving the requisite information would not have raised an alarm which had not already been raised when the soldiers entered the house. Following these judgments it seems that, where special circumstances may be said to obtain, an arrest which does not comply with all the procedural requirements will still be an arrest, for a period of time, as far as all the consequences arising from it are concerned, under Art 5(2).

Under s 28 of PACE, the police also have a certain leeway as to informing the arrestee; the arrest will not be affected, nor will other acts arising from it, until the time when it would be practicable to inform of the reason for it has come and gone. However, if there is nothing in the behaviour of the arrestee or in the general situation to make informing him or her impracticable, then the arrest will be unlawful from its inception. If the word 'practicable' in s 28 is interpreted in accordance with the interpretation of Art 5(3) in both Murray and Fox it seems that, depending on the circumstances, a certain amount of leeway is created in respect of informing the arrestee. An arrest which fails to comply with the procedural requirements will be in a more precarious position than an arrest which, from its inception, complies with them, because it will cease to be an arrest at an uncertain point. On somewhat doubtful grounds, the Convention has allowed some departure from the principle that there should be a clear demarcation between the point at which the citizen is at liberty and the point at which her liberty is restrained. Sanders and Young observe, commenting on the House of Lords' decision in Murray, 'Even where the legislature, as in s 28 of PACE, appears to be creating strong inhibitory rules, the judiciary still manages to draw their due process sting by rendering them largely presentational'.²³⁴

233 Murray v Ministry of Defence [1988] All ER 521, HL; for comment see Williams (1991) 54 MLR 408.

234 Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, 1994, p 103.

This might also be said of the decision of the European Court. A domestic court in the post-HRA era might, however, be prepared to take a more activist approach to the application of Art 5(2), especially where a s 41 TA arrest, accompanied by delay in informing of the reason owing (apparently) to the terrorist context, occurred in circumstances which could not be compared in terms of volatility to the situation in Northern Ireland when Murray was decided.

As noted above, the temporary provision under s 83 of the TA allowing members of the armed forces to effect arrests, applicable only to Northern Ireland, does not provide that the grounds must be given. Section 83(2) provides: 'A person making an arrest under this section complies with any rule of law requiring him to state the ground of arrest if he states that he is making the arrest as a member of Her Majesty's forces'. Section 83(6) then appears to accept that s 83(2) will lead to findings that Art 5(3) has been breached in providing: 'The reference to a rule of law... does not include a rule of law which has effect only by virtue of the HRA.' If a judge is confronted with an arrest under s 83 in which the arrestee merely stated that he was effecting it as a member of Her Majesty's forces, it would appear that the arrest would be likely to be found unlawful, unless in the circumstances, Murray could be applied. But the application of Murray might be viewed as inappropriate, given the influence of the margin of appreciation doctrine on the judgment.

Article 5(3)

Article 5(3) confers a right to be brought promptly before the judicial authorities; in other words, not to be held for long periods without a hearing. It covers both arrest and detention. There will be some allowable delay in both situations; the question is therefore what is meant by 'promptly'. Its meaning was considered in *Brogan v UK*²³⁵ in relation to the arrest and detention of the applicants considered above, arising by virtue of the special powers under s 12 of the PTA. The UK had entered a derogation under Art 15 against the applicability of Art 5(3) to Northern Ireland, but withdrew that derogation in August 1984. Two months later, the Brogan case was filed. The applicants complained inter alia of the length of time they were held in detention without coming before a judge, on the basis that it could not be termed prompt. The Court took into account the need for special measures to combat terrorism; such measures had to be balanced against individual rights. However, it found that detention for four days and six hours was too long. The Court did not specify how long was acceptable; previously, the Commission had seen four days as the limit. The Government made no move to comply with this decision; instead, it entered a derogation under Art 15 to Art 5(3).

This derogation was challenged unsuccessfully in *Brannigan and McBride v UK*²³⁶ as invalid. The European Court of Human Rights found that it was justified since the state of public emergency in Northern Ireland warranted exceptional measures. The Court found: 'a wide margin of appreciation [on the question] of the presence of an emergency... and on the nature and scope of derogations necessary to avert it [should be allowed].'²³⁷ Among the government contentions uncritically accepted by the Court was one to the effect that in the particular situation, the judiciary should not be permitted a role in protecting the liberty of detainees. As Judge Walsh pointed out in his dissenting opinion, this was precisely a role which the public would expect a judge to have. Brannigan might appear a doubtful decision because the derogation was entered after the decision in Brogan, although it might also be said that States should not be encouraged to enter derogations too readily on 'insurance' grounds in order to pre-empt claims. Arguably, although there was a state of emergency in 1989, the UK had chosen not to enter a derogation even though one would have been warranted. Whatever the merits of this argument in the particular situation, it is questionable whether the exigencies of the situation did require detention of six days without recourse to independent review. Possibly it was assumed on insufficient grounds that such review would prejudice the legitimate purpose of the investigation.

235 Judgment of 29 November 1988; (1989) 11 EHRR 117; A 145.

236 Series A, 258-B (1993); (1993) 17 EHRR 594.

237 Paragraph 207.

In requiring judicial authorisation for detention for up to seven days under s 41 and Sched 7 of the TA, the Government has sought to ensure, as indicated above, that the new detention provisions comply with Art 5(3) as interpreted in Brogan and Brannigan, meaning that it became possible to withdraw the derogation and, once this was accomplished, the HRA was accordingly amended.²³⁸ One question which will probably be raised eventually in the domestic courts or at Strasbourg will be whether allowing a detention for seven days, even with judicial authorisation, is in accordance with Art 5. Further, it appears that the new arrangements could allow for detention for longer than 48 hours with authorisation only by the police themselves. If, for example, towards the end of 54 hours in detention (a possibility under the TA, as indicated above) the police decided to apply for an extension of detention, they would have the power under s 41(5) to continue the detention while the application was being made and then under s 41(6) while the hearing was occurring. There is also the highly controversial possibility of continued 12-hourly extensions of detention on review by a superintendent under s 41(4); while it is unlikely that s 41(4) would be interpreted as allowing much leeway to continue to detain beyond 48 hours, the provision appears to detract from the certainty of the 48 hour deadline. Both these possibilities do not appear to accord with Brogan and Brannigan since neither provides for any possibility of judicial authorisation of detention. Bearing in mind the wide margin of appreciation allowed in Brannigan, a domestic court taking a more activist stance might be prepared to find a breach of Art 5(3) in respect of a s 41 detention, depending on its length, in the particular circumstances before it. One clear possibility would be to limit the application of s 41(4) in accordance with the Government's intention that the new detention regime should comply with Art 5(3) which allowed for the withdrawal of the derogation.

Article 2 and forcible arrest

Article 2 of the European Convention allows the use of force which is 'absolutely necessary' in order to arrest. The Convention requirements refer to the amount of force to be used, not to the question whether to use any force at all. But the Convention jurisprudence suggests that standards may differ in terms of planning operations²³⁹ and executing them in the immediate situation.²⁴⁰ Section 117 of PACE and s 114 of the TA allow for the use of 'reasonable force', if necessary, in the exercise of the powers they provide. This wording could be taken to mean that any force used which was not, objectively speaking, necessary would be unreasonable, or it might suggest that any force used which appeared, subjectively, necessary at the time would be reasonable. Article 2 suggests that the latter test should be used.²⁴¹ Where lethal force has been used it is arguable that, under s 3 of the HRA, the term 'absolutely' should be implied into the domestic provisions.

238 See further Chapter 2, p 55.

239 McCann, Farrell and Savage v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 97, A 324, Council of Europe Report. For further discussion of this issue see above, pp 42–43.

Article 3, which provides a guarantee against torture or inhuman or degrading treatment,²⁴² may also be relevant where physical force is used in the course of an arrest and detention. In *Ribbitsch v Austria*²⁴³ the Court said: 'any recourse to physical force which has not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminishes human dignity and is in principle an infringement of the right set forth in Article.3'²⁴⁴ Force may only be used where it is strictly required to restrain the detainee and the force used must go no further, in terms of causing injury or humiliation, than is strictly necessary to achieve the purpose of restraint. Thus, a strict proportionality test is applied and force outside the limits it sets will infringe Art 3. A fortiori, this must be the case under Art 2, where lethal force is used.²⁴⁵

6 SAFEGUARDS FOR DETAINEES

The role of the custody officer

The general use of custody officers provided for under s 36 is a key feature of the scheme for detention, treatment and questioning created under Parts IV and V of PACE. The custody officer's role is to underpin the other safeguards by ensuring that the suspect is treated in accordance with PACE and the Codes and by generally overseeing all aspects of his or her treatment.²⁴⁶ Use of custody officers was intended 240 Andronicou and Constantinou v Cyprus (1996) 22 EHRR CD 18.84. See above, p 39.

241 See Kelly v UK (1985) 8 EHRR 45.

242 Article 3 treatment may be justifiable where its object is to satisfy the demands of Art 2, the right to life: Herczegfalvy v Austria A 244 (1992).

243 (1996) 21 EHRR 573.

244 See p 26. See Selmoumi v France (2000) 29 EHRR 403 for an example of treatment in police custody found to amount to torture.

245 Article 2 therefore calls into question the recent cases of death caused by restraint during arrest. In 'Deaths in police custody: learning the lessons', Police Research Series Paper 26, 1998, Leigh, Johnson and Ingram found, in section 6, 13 cases of death in which police restraint may have been a factor. They found six cases where restraint may have led to 'postural' or 'positional asphyxia', leading to death. In two others, death was due to a neck-hold; in a further two, to force applied with a baton. They viewed these cases as having implications for training. The Butler Report, 1998, also considered a number of death in custody cases. In one of these, that of O'Brien, the arrestee, after being handcuffed, was held face down on the ground by at least four officers, one of whom knelt on his back, and one on his legs. The evidence was conflicting, but his family and a bystander stated that he was saying that he could not breathe. The post mortem found that he had died due to postural asphyxia and he had bruising to his head, shoulders and right arm. See Chapter 14, p 923 in relation to criticism of decisions of the CPS in relation to this case. It is suggested that prima facie, the force used went well beyond that which was absolutely necessary, and therefore it was not in accord with Art 2.

246 For discussion of judicial interpretation of the PACE provisions, see Feldman [1990] Crim LR 452.

to ensure that somebody independent of the investigating officer could keep a check on what was occurring. The scheme was not a new idea; in certain police stations an officer was already fulfilling this role, but PACE clarifies the duties of custody officers and ensures that most stations have one. Thus, best practice was placed on a statutory basis.

However, the efficacy of the custody officer scheme may be called into question. It may not always be in operation: in non-designated police stations, there must simply be someone who can act as custody officer if the need arises and in designated police stations, there need not always be a custody officer on duty. The ruling in *Vince and Another v Chief Constable of Dorset*²⁴⁷ made it clear that s 36 does not require that a custody officer must always be present. The plaintiffs (acting for members of the joint branch board of the Police Federation of England and Wales of the Dorset Police) sought a declaration that by virtue of s 36(1) of PACE a custody officer should normally be available in a police station. However, it was found that s 36(1) clearly provided that the Chief Constable had a duty to appoint one custody officer for each designated police station and a power to appoint more in his discretion which had to be reasonably exercised. It was found that there had been no breach by the Chief Constable, implying that a decision that a custody officer need not always be on duty is a reasonable one. It may be argued that this case exposes a weakness in one of the central safeguards provided under PACE. This was referred to by Steyn LJ, who commented that the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure²⁴⁸ might wish to consider this loophole in the PACE provisions. As indicated above, s 45A of PACE, inserted by s 73 of the CJP 2001, allows for a custody officer at a designated police station to act as a custody officer for the purposes of ss 37, 38 and 40(1)(b) of PACE by video link.

The custody officer may not always be able to take a stance independent of that of the investigating officer.²⁴⁹ This weakness in the scheme arises from the lowly rank of the custody officer; under s 38(3), the officer need only be of the rank of sergeant and may therefore be of a lower rank than the investigating officer, making it very difficult to take an independent line on the treatment of the suspect. If the two disagree, the custody officer must refer up the line of authority (s 39(6)); there is no provision allowing the custody officer to overrule the investigating officer. Thus, there is a danger that the custody officer will merely rubber-stamp the decisions of the investigating officer; whether this occurs in practice may largely depend on the attitude of the superior officers in a particular force to the provisions of the PACE scheme.

Caution and notification of rights

When the detainee arrives at the police station, he or she will be 'booked in'. The crucial nature of this stage in the proceedings is made clear below in relation to the discussion of the legal advice provisions. Under para 3 of Code C, a person must be informed orally and by written notice of four rights on arrival at the police station after arrest: the right, arising under s 65 of PACE, to have someone informed of his detention;²⁵⁰ the right to consult a solicitor and the fact that independent legal advice is available free of charge; the right to consult Code C and the other Codes of Practice, and the right to silence as embodied in the caution. The caution is in the following terms: 'You do not have to say anything. But it may harm your defence if you do not mention when questioned something which you later rely on in court. Anything you do say may be given in evidence.'²⁵¹ Minor deviations do not constitute a breach of this requirement, provided that the sense of the caution is preserved. The caution must be repeated during the interview if there is any doubt as to whether the detainee realises that it still applies. If a juvenile or a person who is mentally disordered or mentally handicapped is cautioned in the absence of the appropriate adult, the caution must be repeated in the adult's presence.²⁵² The change to the caution which occurred to reflect s 34 of the CJPOA 1994, discussed further below, means that the suspect is warned that refusing to answer questions may lead to the drawing of adverse inferences in court.

247 (1992) The Times, 7 September.

248 Set up in 1992 after the miscarriage of justice which occurred in the case of the Birmingham Six. See p 755, fn 18 above.

249 See Sanders and Young, 2000, Chapter 4, p 189.

The right of access to legal advice

There is general agreement that the most significant protection introduced for the first time by PACE²⁵³ for due process was access to legal advice.²⁵⁴ But this right is far from absolute. Interviews outside the police station continue to be unaffected by it, in the sense that notification of the right is reserved for the police station, thus disadvantaging the inexperienced suspect who is not already aware of it. The very significant reform of notification of legal advice on caution was omitted from all the Code C revisions, including the 1999 one, despite the fact of curtailment of the right to silence and of the strong possibility that questioning accompanied by the risk of drawing adverse inferences from silence without access to legal advice breaches Art 6(1).²⁵⁵ The right is also subject to a number of formal exceptions, which are broader in terrorist cases, and is dependent on a formal request to exercise it. Encouragement to the police to seek to ensure that the suspect has access to legal advice was recently provided by s 58 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence 250 Under para 5.1, if the person cannot be contacted, the person in charge of detention or of the investigation has discretion to allow further attempts until the information has been conveyed (see Notes 5C and 5D).

251 Paragraph 10.4. Modification to the caution occurred in order to reflect the CJPOA 1994, s 34. See further below, p 843.

252 Paragraph 10.6.

253 The Criminal Law Act 1977, s 62 declared a narrow entitlement to have one reasonably named person informed of the arrest. It did not provide that the arrestee must be informed of this right, nor did it provide any sanction for non-compliance by a police officer. That statutory form of this right gave it no greater force than the non-statutory Judges' Rules (rules of practice for the guidance of the police: see Practice Note [1984] 1 All ER 237; 1 WLR 152). The Judges' Rules upheld the right of the suspect/arrestee in the police station to communicate with/consult a solicitor, but permitted the withholding of such access 'lest unreasonable delay or hindrance is caused to the process of investigation or the administration of justice'. Any officer, in relation to a person detained for any offence, could deny access to legal advice on these broad grounds; see Lemsatef [1977] 1 WLR 812; [1977] 2 All ER 835.

254 See Dixon, Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, p 67. The research studies mentioned in this chapter do not question the value of the legal right of access, although they do question its quality and the responses of the police.

255 See further below, pp 855–57.

Act 1999. Section 58 inserted s 34(2A) into the CJPOA to provide that an adverse inference cannot be drawn from the suspect's silence unless he has had an opportunity to consult a solicitor before being questioned. This is a significant provision, but it can have a direct impact only on suspects who have not had such an opportunity, who then remain silent, are charged and plead not guilty. Nevertheless, it may have a general effect on police adherence to the legal advice scheme since the impact it may have in any particular instance will not normally be apparent at the relevant points in detention.

Both PACE and the TA entitle a suspect to consult an advisor privately²⁵⁶ under a publicly funded scheme,²⁵⁷ to be informed of this right,²⁵⁸ given, if necessary, the name of the duty solicitor,²⁵⁹ and be permitted to have the solicitor present during questioning.²⁶⁰ In cases involving 'serious arrestable offences', however, there are certain saving provisions²⁶¹ allowing an officer of at least the rank of superintendent to authorise delay, and a further power to delay access arises under Code C.²⁶² The exceptions are, however, narrowly drawn and, as indicated below, have received a narrow interpretation. However, the factor which previously motivated the police to delay (or refuse) access to legal advice remains unchanged: the suspect still has the right to remain silent and the legal advisor may advise him or her to exercise it in the particular circumstances of the case, despite the risk that adverse inferences may be drawn later at court. Even if the solicitor does not advise silence, the police may think that they are more likely to obtain incriminating admissions from detainees in the absence of a solicitor and therefore at times may deny the access to one envisaged by s 58. Quite a large body of research suggests that the police continue to prefer to interview suspects who have not had advice and without an advisor present.²⁶³ Research confirms that the possibility of formally delaying access to legal advice is almost certainly not as significant as the more informal police influence on the notification and delivery of advice and on securing the presence of the advisor.²⁶⁴ This may be due in part to the determination shown by the Court of Appeal to protect this due process right by restrictive interpretation of the formal exceptions under s 58(8) of PACE in a key decision.²⁶⁵ A number of formal and informal methods of evading the scheme are available and five such methods are identified below.

256 PACE, s 58(1): 'A person in police detention shall be entitled, if he so requests, to consult a solicitor privately at any time.' For TA suspects, this right also arises under the TA, Sched 8, para 7.

257 See the Legal Aid Act 1988, Sched 6.

258 Code C, para 3.1(ii).

259 Code C, Note 6B. The duty solicitor arrangements are governed by the Legal Aid Board Duty Solicitor Arrangements (1994).

260 Code C, para 6.8.

261 Under s 58(8).

262 Code C, para 6.3(b)(ii). Where a solicitor has agreed to attend, awaiting his arrival would cause unreasonable delay to the process of the investigation. See also Annex B.

263 The research undertaken by Sanders et al, Advice and Assistance at Police Stations, November 1989; Brown, PACE Ten Years On: A Review of the Research, Home Office Research Study 155, 1997, p 77.

264 The research undertaken by Sanders et al, ibid, put the figure at around 2%. In comparison, Brown found that approximately 35% of suspects may have been influenced against advice by the police. The government's Consultation Paper on Terrorism (1998) stated that it was not aware of any formal denial in terrorist cases over the last two years in Britain (para 8.31).

265 R v Samuel [1988] 2 All ER 135; [1988] 2 WLR 920.

(1) Delaying access

The most direct method of delaying legal advice involves invoking one of the s 58(8) exceptions. The exceptions come into operation if the suspect is in police detention for a serious arrestable offence²⁶⁶ and the decision to invoke them must be taken by an officer of at least the rank of superintendent. If both these conditions are fulfilled, access, if requested, can be delayed for up to 36 hours Under s 58(8): 'An officer may only authorise delay where he has reasonable grounds for believing that the exercise of the right... (a) will lead to interference with or harm to evidence connected with a serious arrestable offence or interference with or physical injury to other persons; or (b) will lead to the alerting of other persons suspected of having committed such an offence but not yet arrested for it; or (c) will hinder the recovery of any property obtained as a result of such an offence.' Under sub-s (8A), delay can also be authorised 'where the serious arrestable offence is a drug trafficking offence and the officer has reasonable grounds for believing (a) that the detained person has benefited from drug trafficking and (b) that the recovery of the value of that person's proceeds of drug trafficking will be hindered by the exercise of the right...'. In other words, the officer must believe on reasonable grounds that exercise of the right at the time when the person in police detention desires to exercise it will lead to the solicitor acting as a channel of communication between the detainee and others—alerting them or hindering the recovery of stolen property or the products of drug trafficking.

The leading case determining the scope of the s 58 exceptions is Samuel.²⁶⁷ The appellant was arrested on suspicion of armed robbery and, after questioning at the police station, asked to see a solicitor. The request was refused, apparently on the grounds that other suspects might be warned²⁶⁸ and that recovery of the outstanding stolen money might thereby be hindered.²⁶⁹ The appellant subsequently confessed to the robbery and was later convicted. On appeal, the defence argued that the refusal of access was not justifiable under s 58(8) and that therefore, the confession obtained should not have been admitted into evidence as it had been obtained through impropriety. The Court of Appeal considered the use of the word 'will' in s 58(8), which suggests that the police officer must be virtually certain that a solicitor, if contacted, will thereafter either commit a criminal offence or unwittingly pass on a coded message to criminals. It must be asked, first, whether he did believe this and secondly, whether he believed it on reasonable grounds. The court considered that only in the remote contingency that evidence could be produced as to the corruption of a particular solicitor would a police officer be able to assert a reasonable belief that a solicitor would commit a criminal offence. They went on to hold that showing a reasonable belief that a solicitor would inadvertently alert other criminals would also be a formidable task; such a belief could only reasonably be held if the suspect in question was a particularly resourceful and sophisticated criminal or if there was evidence that the solicitor sought to be consulted was particularly inexperienced or naive. It was found that as no evidence as to the naivety or 266 Defined in s 116. The Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 99 extends these exceptions to drug trafficking offences.

267 [1988] QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 135; [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA.

268 Section 58(8)(b).

269 Section 58(8)(c).

corruption of the solicitor in question had been advanced it could not be accepted that the necessary reasonable belief had existed. The police had made no attempt to consider the real likelihood that the solicitor in question would be utilised in this way; in fact, it was apparent that the true motive behind the denial of access was a desire to gain a further opportunity to break down the detainee's silence. It should be noted that Code C²⁷⁰ expressly disallows denial of access to a solicitor on the ground that he or she will advise the suspect to remain silent.²⁷¹

This interpretation of s 58(8) greatly narrowed its scope, since it means that the police will not be able to make a general, unsubstantiated assertion that it was thought that others might be alerted if a solicitor was contacted. The authorising officer will have to show, on very specific grounds, why this was thought to be the case (the question of exclusion of the confession through this impropriety is considered below).²⁷² This decision may have prevented mere refusals to allow access to advice in some instances. However, there are a number of loopholes in the legal advice scheme which may allow for less formal methods of evading its provisions and it may be that the suspects who are thereby most disadvantaged are those most in need of legal advice. Further powers to interview the suspect without his having had legal advice arise under Code C.²⁷³ All these provisions apply to all arrestees, but in terrorist cases there were further exceptions to the general right arising under Code C: the right could be delayed if a superintendent reasonably believed that communication with an advisor 'will lead to interference with the gathering of information about the commission, preparation, or instigation of acts of terrorism' or make it more difficult 'to prevent an act of terrorism or apprehend and prosecute the perpetrators of any such act'.²⁷⁴

Under the TA 2000, the access can be delayed for up to 48 hours (see Sched 8, para 8(2)) on the grounds for delay mentioned above, with additional ones relating to the recovery of the proceeds of crime, set out in Sched 8, para 8(4). The TA harmonises the arrangements for delay in Northern Ireland with those in England and Wales, in that once access has been granted, it will not then be withheld.²⁷⁵ The arrangements in Scotland under the TA allow for delay under Sched 8, para 16(7) if, under para 17(3) delay is 'in the interests of the investigation or prevention of crime, or in recovering property criminally obtained, or in confiscating the proceeds of an offence, or of the apprehension, prosecution or conviction of offenders'. In all 270 In Delaney (1989) 88 Cr App R 338; (1988) The Times, 20 August, CA, the status of the Codes was considered. It was held that the mere fact that there had been a breach of the Codes of Practice did not of itself mean that evidence had to be rejected. Section 67(11) of the Act provides that '...if any provision of such Code appears to the court... to be relevant to any question arising in the proceedings, it shall be taken into account in determining that question'.

271 Annex B, para 2.

272 See p 484.

273 Code C, para 6.5, 6.6 and Annex B. The para 6 provisions are not dependent on the offence in question being a serious arrestable one. Under para 6, a power to proceed with the interview, although the suspect has not had advice, arises if there are reasonable grounds for believing that delay would cause harm to persons or serious harm to property, or, where a solicitor has agreed to attend, awaiting his arrival would cause unreasonable delay to the process of the investigation, or the solicitor is unavailable.

274 Code C, Annex B. This applied to detention under the PTA, but will apply to the equivalent TA provisions. This provision is likely to appear in the new TA Code.

275 Under the EPA and its Codes, the powers to delay access were broadly the same as under the PTA, but also, once the police had allowed access, further delays could be imposed and there was no right to have advisors present in interviews. This right is not contained in the TA, but may appear in its accompanying Code, when promulgated.

three jurisdictions, when a review officer authorises continued detention under Sched 8 of the TA he must remind the detainee of his rights to contact a friend or relative and to consult a solicitor²⁷⁶ and, if applicable, of the fact of their being delayed. The officer must also consider whether the reason or reasons for which the delay was authorised continue to subsist, and if not, he must inform the officer who authorised the delay of his opinion. However, there is no provision allowing the review officer to override the view of the officer who originally authorised delay. The TA provisions largely continue the old regime, and therefore do not address the concerns of those who view confessions obtained after 24 hours in detention as inherently fallible,²⁷⁷ particularly where the detainee has also been held incommunicado.

Under this scheme, the power of delay in Scotland is wider and is less dependent than in the other jurisdictions on the interests of preventing or detecting acts of terrorism. This seems to be anomalous given that one of the aims of the TA is to harmonise the position of terrorist suspects throughout the UK. The changes under the TA also provide further grounds for delay in obtaining access to legal advice which also apply to a far wider group of persons than those covered by the PTA and EPA since, potentially, a far larger group may become 'terrorist' suspects in future. Within that group are persons who signally fail to fit the stereotype of the 'terrorist', and are therefore more in need of legal advice. The wider possibilities of delaying access under the TA in relation to the terrorist, as opposed to the conventional suspect, are therefore open to question under Art 6, as discussed below.

(2) Subverting notification

Notification of the right of access to legal advice under para 3.1 of Code C is still reserved for arrival at the police station, thus disadvantaging certain suspects not already aware of it at the point when admissions may be made.²⁷⁸ It is probably fair to assume, first, that many suspects, including those who are criminally experienced,²⁷⁹ are aware of the right to legal advice and, secondly, that the group who are not so aware would tend to include some of the more vulnerable members of society. It has already been noted above that there is leeway in the interviewing scheme to allow admissions to be made before notification of advice during 'booking in' at the police station. At the point of notification, the suspect not already aware of the right to advice is in a very vulnerable position since he is dependent for information on the very persons who have an interest in withholding it or misleading him. Research conducted by Sanders²⁸⁰ has demonstrated that notification can be subverted by various methods, most commonly by ensuring that suspects never really take in what is on offer.²⁸¹ When Code C was revised in 1991 and in 1995, this problem was recognised and an attempt was made to address it. The requirement 276 Under para 27. These rights arise under paras 6 and 7 of Sched 8.

277 See, eg, Walker, op cit, fn 2, p 18.

278 Softley's research into the issue indicated that when suspects were informed of this right, requests for advice were three times as high as when they were not so informed (Softley, Police Interrogations, 1980).

279 The Sanders research, above, supports this suggestion; out of 60 suspects who knew that they had a right to legal advice, only 23.3% did not know this before informed of it by the police; p 46.

280 Op cit, fn 264.

281 Sanders found that the most popular ploy (used in 42.9% of the instances observed) was to read the rights too quickly or incomprehensibly or incompletely; op cit, fn 262, p 59.

of notification under para 3.1 was backed up by new para 6.3, requiring that police stations display a prominent poster (under new Note 6H with ethnic translations if appropriate) advertising the right to have advice. However, it must be questioned whether the provision of posters will make much difference. The 'booking in' stage is likely to be one of the more traumatic points in the process, especially for the suspect who is inexperienced or in some way vulnerable. Whether he is likely to notice and take in a message conveyed in this way which is not specifically directed at him is open to question. If he remains silent in the face of a rapid notification, his silence can be taken as a waiver of advice when in actuality it merely denotes incomprehension. The requirement introduced in 1995 under para 6.5 that the suspect should be asked his reason for declining legal advice, and that this should be noted on the custody record, may go some way towards ensuring that suspects understand what is on offer and may curb 'ploys' (see below), as may the requirement to point out that the suspect may speak on the telephone with a solicitor. Nevertheless, the possibility of manipulation of the custody record remains, since the whole process of making the record remains in the hands of the custody officer.²⁸² Research conducted after the 1991 revision of Code C found that a higher proportion of suspects were being informed of the right to legal advice,²⁸³ but that the information was given in a quarter of cases in an unclear or unduly rapid fashion.

(3) Encouragement to defer the decision

If the suspect does take in what is being offered, he may be encouraged not to exercise the right straight away. In fact, the Sanders research suggested that encouraging a suspect to defer the decision to have advice was quite popular.²⁸⁴ The 1991 revision of Code C did address this problem. Paragraph 3.1 now provides that it is a 'continuing right which may be exercised at any stage' and under para 11.2, a suspect must now be reminded of the right before each interview in the police station. Although this change is to be welcomed, it should not obscure the value of having advice before any interviewing at all takes place.²⁸⁵ It is therefore unfortunate that para 3.1 does not make this clear and could even be said to encourage the suspect to defer the decision. However, Note 3G seems designed to dissuade some suspects from deferring it by providing that a request for advice from a mentally disordered or handicapped person or a juvenile should be pursued straight away without waiting for the appropriate adult to arrive. It appears intended to prevent police officers playing off adult against suspect by telling the suspect to 282 It has been suggested (by Wolchover and Heaton-Armstrong (1990) 140 NLJ 320–21) that a requirement of an own hand declaration of waiver of advice would have represented an effective means of addressing the problem because it would have forced the custody officer to ensure that the suspect understood what was being offered and would require positive action on the suspect's part to refuse it.

283 Brown, Ellis and Lancombe, Changing the Code: Police Detention under the revised PACE Codes of Practice (research conducted for the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure), 1993, Home Office Research Study 129. It found that 73% of suspects, as opposed to 66% prior to April 1991, received notification.

284 This 'ploy' was used in 8.2% of the cases observed. In a further 1.8% of cases, it was suggested that the suspect waited until after his transfer to another station before having advice and in a further 2.7% of cases that he waited until he got out of the police station; Sanders, op cit, fn 262, p 59.

285 Sanders found that suspects had often made admissions in the absence of the solicitor and that therefore 'the potential impact of the solicitor was neutralised in advance by the police'; op cit, fn 262, p 143. This finding arose in the context of informal questioning, but could be equally applicable to instances where the suspect defers the decision to have advice.

defer making a decision about advice until the adult arrives,²⁸⁶ and then giving the adult the impression that the juvenile has waived advice or does not need it.²⁸⁷ It appears that this provision has not had much impact,²⁸⁸ which might be because it is contained in a Note and not in the Code itself. Provision aimed at preventing this ploy could have been taken further by including a requirement that even where a suspect had waived advice, suspect and adult should be left alone together for a few minutes after re-notification of the right.

(4) Encouragement to forgo advice

Suspects who are thinking of asking for legal advice straight away may still be persuaded out of doing so by various methods and the Sanders research found that such methods—termed ‘ploys’—were most successful against least experienced suspects.²⁸⁹ However, there has been some attempt to combat the use of such ploys. For example, suspects were supposed to be given a leaflet under original Note 3E explaining the arrangements for obtaining advice, including the fact that it was free, but in practice a number of suspects did not receive it or did not understand it, thereby enabling police officers to mislead them.²⁹⁰ Under para 3.1(ii), the suspect must now be informed that advice is free²⁹¹ (although the posters need not carry this information). Further, general discouragement of ploys is articulated in new para 6.4, which provides that no attempt should be made to dissuade the suspect from having advice. The detainee who has decided to have advice can nevertheless change his or her mind; this is provided for by sub-para 6.6(d), if the consent is given in writing or on tape. However, there is some leeway allowing police officers to engineer a change of heart. No limitations were placed on the reasons for giving such consent, thus creating a serious flaw in the legal advice provisions. In particular, if the consent is based on a police misrepresentation, ought it to be treated as genuine? This question arises in part due to the lack of certainty as to the relationship between sub-para 6.6(d) and (c). Sub-paragraph 6.6(c) provides that the detainee can be interviewed without legal advice if the nominated solicitor is unavailable and notification of the duty solicitor scheme is given but the duty solicitor is unavailable or not required. The provisions under sub-paras 6.6(c) and (d) appear to be expressed as alternatives, but the drafter’s intention must surely be that the police cannot obtain the detainee’s consent to be interviewed merely by failing to inform him or her of the scheme.

The first instance decision in *Vernon*²⁹² suggested that the consent must be genuine; in other words, it must not be based on misleading information given by the police. The defendant consented to be interviewed under the misapprehension that if her 286 This ploy was used in 5.4% of instances observed; op cit, fn 262, p 59.

287 This ploy was used in 2.4% of instances observed; op cit, fn 262, p 59.

288 Brown et al, op cit, fn 283; apart from this propensity, particular problems were found with the notification of this right to juveniles, with a wide variation in the number of juveniles requesting advice in the different stations: 7% to 58%.

289 The take-up rate for advice among suspects with no previous convictions ‘declined sharply as more ploys were used’. This was contrasted with the smaller correlation between the use of ploys and take up rate among all suspects; op cit, fn 262, pp 57 and 61.

290 This ploy was used in less than 1.5% of the instances observed; op cit, p 59.

291 The research by Brown et al shows a dramatic improvement in the number of suspects informed that advice is free after the revision of the Codes: 73% compared with 5%.

292 [1988] Crim LR 445.

own solicitor was unavailable, there was no alternative means of obtaining advice; the confession so obtained was excluded. Andrew J held that as her consent to the interview was given under the misapprehension that otherwise, the interview would be delayed till the morning, this could not be termed true consent: had she known of the availability of the duty solicitor, she would have withheld her consent. Thus, the exception under sub-para 6.3(d) (now para 6.6(d)) was not fulfilled: para 6.3 had been breached. This ruling suggests that although the exceptions under sub-paras 6.6(c) and (d) are expressed disjunctively, they should be read together; if a detainee has fallen within sub-para 6.6(c) by nominating a solicitor and being disappointed, he or she should then be informed of the alternative. It would not seem to accord with the drafter's intention to treat the consent of such a person in the same way as that of a detainee who has decided against having a solicitor at all.

The ruling of the Court of Appeal in Hughes,²⁹³ however, suggested that if the police misled the suspect without bad faith, a resultant consent would be treated as genuine. The appellant, disappointed of obtaining advice from his own solicitor, inquired about the duty solicitor scheme but was informed, erroneously (but in good faith), that no solicitor was available. Under this misapprehension, he gave consent to be interviewed and the Court of Appeal took the view that his consent was not thereby vitiated. Sub-paragraphs 6.3(c) and (d) (now 6.6(c) and (d)) were to be treated as alternatives and the fact that the detainee was within (c) did not vitiate his consent under (d). Thus, no breach had occurred. The court did not advert to the difficulty that there can be no difference in principle between failing to inform a detainee of the scheme and informing him or her of it but stating wrongly that no solicitor is available. This ruling opens the possibility that the consent given in Vernon will in future be treated as true consent. The only distinction between the cases is that in Hughes, the misrepresentation was apparently made innocently, while in Vernon, the failure to give the information was deliberate: Vernon demonstrates a willingness to interpret Code C restrictively against the police if bad faith is demonstrated. The view was taken in Hughes that if the misrepresentation had been made negligently or deliberately, a different conclusion would have been reached. This seems to confuse the para 6.3(d) issue and the issue of fairness under s 78 (which will be considered fully below);²⁹⁴ the judgment would have been clearer if the court had considered first whether a breach of para 6.3 had occurred and, secondly, whether the breach in the circumstances would have an adverse effect on the fairness of the trial. Innocence or bad faith on the part of the police has been determined to be relevant when considering s 78,²⁹⁵ but there is nothing in Code C to suggest that these matters are relevant in relation to the narrow question of failure to fulfil a Code provision. Generally, consent to forgo a right should be treated with caution when the parties are on an unequal footing; and the possible unfairness is exacerbated when the party who will obtain an advantage from the consent gives false information in obtaining it. Had the Court of Appeal found itself able to hold that such consent is not true consent, the onus would have been placed on the police to ensure that administrative practice in relation to the duty solicitor scheme was tightened up. As it is, moves towards obtaining consent in similar circumstances may become more marked and it is likely to be the more suggestible detainee who suffers.

293 [1988] Crim LR 519, CA, transcript from LEXIS.

294 See Chapter 14, pp 880–83.

295 See Alladice (1988) 87 Cr App R 380, CA; [1988] Crim LR 608. See below, p 884.

Under the 1991 revision, once the suspect has changed his mind about having advice, the interview can proceed subject to the need to obtain the permission of an officer of the rank of inspector or above. This was the main change from the original Code and was obviously not a full safeguard against the possibility of pressure from the police considered above. Inclusion of a provision that a consent based on erroneous information given by the police could not be treated as true consent might have encouraged the police to tighten up administrative practices and perhaps avoided a recurrence of the Hughes type of situation. A provision included in the 1991 Home Office circular,²⁹⁶ requiring a note to be made in the custody record of the reason for the suspect's change of heart, may allow a court to determine whether the consent was based on misleading information. This circular provision, in the form of a requirement to record the reason for the change of mind and repeat it on tape, became part of para 6.5 under the 1995 revision to Code C. This provision may allow a court to determine whether the consent was based on misleading information, but it leaves open the possibility of treating the consent as valid so long as such information was apparently given in good faith.

(5) Debarring solicitors' clerks

As already noted, s 58(1) entitles the detainee to consult a solicitor at any time. This provision does not extend to solicitors' clerks but, under Code C, para 6.9 (now para 6.12), if the solicitor who has been contacted decides to send a clerk, he or she should be admitted to the police station. After the decision in Samuel,²⁹⁷ access to a solicitor can be delayed only in very specific circumstances. These exceptions do not apply to clerks but, since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Chief Constable of Avon ex p Robinson,²⁹⁸ access to a clerk can be denied in a much wider range of circumstances. The Chief Constable had issued instructions that the character and antecedents of certain unqualified clerks employed by the applicant—a solicitor—were such as to make their presence at police interviews with suspects undesirable. The Chief Constable left the final decision on access to the officer in question, but gave his opinion that it would only rarely be appropriate to allow these particular clerks access to a suspect. The applicant sought judicial review of the instructions, contending that they were in breach of para 6.9.

The Court of Appeal considered the scope of the express exception to para 6.9: '...the clerk shall be admitted unless an officer of the rank of inspector or above considers that such a visit will hinder the investigation of crime.' (Similar wording is now used in para 6.12.) It was held that the investigating officers had been entitled in each instance to invoke the exception because they had known of the criminal activities of the clerks. They had been informed of such activities by the Chief Constable, but he had not imposed a blanket ban on the clerks; the discretion to debar the clerks had been left with the officers concerned. Accordingly, there had been no breach of para 6.9 and the application would therefore be refused. May LJ, in a lengthy dictum, also considered that there was an implied requirement under para 6.9 that a clerk be capable of giving advice on behalf of the solicitor and therefore a police officer would be entitled to exclude a clerk if he appeared incapable of giving advice owing to his age, appearance, mental capacity or known background.

296 When the revised PACE Codes came into force in April 1991, a Home Office circular was issued in conjunction with them by F2 Division, Home Office.

297 [1988] QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 135; [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA.

298 [1989] All ER 15; [1989] 1 WLR 793.

The concern as to the possible effects of employing these untrained clerks was understandable, but the result of this decision was to confer a very wide power on the police to exclude clerks, which potentially has unfortunate consequences. If a detainee asks for legal advice and a clerk arrives but is not admitted to the police station on one of the grounds considered above, or if he or she is not allowed to remain in the interview, the police, under Code C, para 6.14, must give the original solicitor the opportunity of making other arrangements. The Code is silent as to what should happen if the solicitor is unable to do so, although under para 6.10, if a solicitor is excluded from the station, the police must give the suspect an opportunity to consult another solicitor. Paragraph 6.12 now provides that para 6.10 applies to clerks and, therefore, in the circumstances described, the police as a last resort presumably ought to inform the detainee of the duty solicitor scheme. It is probably regrettable that the Court of Appeal suggested such wide grounds on which to exclude clerks. If the police take advantage of their width to exclude clerks rather too readily, some detainees may be likely to experience substantial delay in obtaining advice. There is always the danger when advice is delayed that a detainee will succumb to pressure to get the interview over with quickly and will consent to be interviewed without advice. The 1995 revision addressed this possibility to some extent: para 6.12 restricts the grounds for exclusion as far as clerks or other accredited representatives of solicitors are concerned, since it defines such persons as 'solicitors'. This means that the trainee, clerk or legal executive is 'accredited in accordance with the Law Society's scheme for accreditation'. Therefore, the more restrictive provisions relating to exclusion from the interview of solicitors, paras 6.9, 6.10 and 6.11, will apply. Under para 6.9, the solicitor may be excluded from the interview if his or her conduct is such that the investigating officer is unable properly to question the suspect. Under para 6.12, a non-accredited or probationary representative may be excluded from the police station if an officer of the rank of inspector or above considers that the visit would hinder the investigation of crime and directs otherwise. The factors influencing the discretion to exclude such advisors from the police station are set out in paras 6.12 and 6.13 and include taking account of 'any matters set out in any written letter of authorisation provided by the solicitor'. It is unclear that this discretion is markedly narrower than that indicated in Robinson and, therefore, it will be hard ever to challenge a decision to exclude such persons, leaving open the possibility that officers may at times exercise this power rather too readily. Once advice is delayed, a detainee may succumb to pressure to forgo it in order to speed matters up.

Value of legal advice and relationship with the right to silence

Access to legal advice has an impact in upholding due process which encompasses, but goes beyond, advising on making 'no comment' answers. How far it has such an impact in practice is debatable. The impact varies, depending on the contact with the suspect. The Sanders research in 1989 found that telephone advice alone had little impact on suspects: 50% of those who received telephone advice made admissions, as opposed to 59.6% of those who received no advice.²⁹⁹ The research criticised the great variation in practice between advisors, and considered that too many duty solicitors gave telephone advice only, thereby depriving the client of most of the benefits of legal advice.³⁰⁰ Subsequent research suggests that in 23% of cases when advice is requested, telephone advice only continues to be given, and only around 12–14% of suspects in police interviews have an advisor present.³⁰¹

The relationship between access to legal advice and the right to silence is complex,³⁰² particularly in view of the curtailment of the right to silence under ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA 1994, which is discussed below. The available research lends some support to the following propositions. The suspect will probably be aware, if he has had advice, that he can keep silent and also that this may be a risky course of action. It was, however, clear, even prior to 1994, that advisors did not advise silence routinely.³⁰³ Dixon found in 1991 that solicitors were likely to advise silence at least temporarily if the client was in a confused or emotional state³⁰⁴ or had been bullied or deceived, or where the police had refused to disclose at least some of the evidence against the client to the advisor.³⁰⁵

The legal advisor may help the suspect to maintain silence where advice alone might not be enough. It should be recognised, however, that the key question is not whether the presence of a legal advisor means that the detainee remains silent, but whether it means that he is unlikely to make an unreliable confession. Further, assuming for the moment an inverse correlation between a legal advisor's presence and an unreliable confession, what contribution to it, if any, is made by the right to silence in its current modified form? Obviously, the detainee will not make such a confession if he remains silent, but this is a rather crude and, in any event, ineffective³⁰⁶ way of tackling the risk of such confessions; the real concern here is with the question whether the legal advisor will enable the detainee to maintain a selective silence or refuse to depart from his version of events at key points in the interview.

Clearly, the curtailment of the right to silence discussed below is tending to affect 300 The Sanders research found that only 50% of solicitors attended the police station: 25% gave advice over the telephone and 25% gave no advice. Even attendances at the police station were not always followed by attendance at the interview. A few solicitors merely put the police case to the suspect; op cit, fn 262, p 150. It appeared that some advisors who did attend the interview disadvantaged the client by seeming to give their imprimatur to improper police behaviour.

301 Brown, op cit, fn 263, pp 94–95.

302 The relationship is a matter of some controversy; the Home Office, Working Group on the Right to Silence (C Division, Home Office, London, 13 July 1989; see [1989] Crim LR 855 for comment) considered that there was a causal relationship between legal advice and silence, but this finding has been doubted by Dixon, D, 'Solicitors, suspects, runners, police' [1991] PL 233, p 251. However, the Sanders research (op cit, fn 262) found that suspects confess less often when they have advice: 35.8% of those whose solicitor was present at the interrogation confessed, as opposed to 59.6% of those who did not receive advice; op cit, fn 262, p 136). Confirmed by Bucke et al, The Right of Silence: The Impact of the CJPOA 1994, Home Office Research Study No 199, 2000.

303 See the research undertaken by Sanders et al, p 129, which found that out of 24 suspects, only two were advised to remain silent. Dixon's findings, op cit, p 243 were to the same effect.

304 See Dixon, D, 'Common sense, legal advice and the right to silence' [1991] PL 233, p 244.

305 Ibid, pp 246 and 247.

306 The Sanders research found that only 2.4% of suspects exercised their right to silence as against 54.1% who made admissions (the others denied the offence) (op cit, fn 262, p 136).

the nature of custodial legal advice. It has affected the role of the legal advisor in the police station; that role was already, it seemed, interpreted in a variety of ways by advisors, but in circumstances where silence would previously have been advised by most of them it seems possible that, at present, it may not be.³⁰⁷ Possibly the difficulty of advising the client as to when to remain silent and when not to take the risk of so doing may mean that some advisors tend to adopt the role of referee or counsellor rather than that of legal advisor. More experienced advisors will, however, be of great value to the client, since they will be able to advise on the risks of staying silent, which may be much greater in response to certain questions than to others.³⁰⁸ The main studies in this area³⁰⁹ recognised that interviews may be a means of constructing or creating truth rather than discovering it, but their concern was more with the causal relationship between the presence of a legal advisor and exercise of the right to silence than with the relationship between such presence and the making of an unreliable confession. This issue was touched on in the study by Dixon,³¹⁰ which found that legal advisors were more likely to advise silence at least temporarily if the client was in a confused or emotional state³¹¹ or had been bullied or deceived.³¹² A further study, conducted for the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice³¹³ found, not surprisingly, that the relationship between legal advice and the right to silence was affected by the quality of the advice given. The research found that many legal advisors' are clerks, secretaries and former police officers with no legal education or training in the provision of custodial legal advice. Such persons, it was found, often had little or no grasp of the case in question and little apparent understanding of the need, at times, for the client to maintain a selective silence. According to the research, 78% of the advisors counselled the client to co-operate with the police. Some recent research echoes these findings as to the quality of advice and suggests that advisors adopt a passive stance in interviews, failing to intervene where intervention is clearly called for.³¹⁴ Professor McConville found that the presence of some legal advisors in interviews may have had a detrimental impact on suspects: 'Lacking any clear understanding of their role in the process, some advisors simply become part of the machine which confronts the suspect.'³¹⁵ The suggestions that advisors are reluctant to adopt an adversarial stance were given credence by the two post-PACE cases of oppression which arose in respect of tape recorded interviews with an advisor present.³¹⁶ The advisors must operate on police territory and may, as Dixon puts it, deal with the resultant pressures by making 'some positive adaptation'.³¹⁷ However, more recent research has pointed out that 307 See Bucke et al, op cit, fn 302.

308 For further discussion see Fenwick, H [1995] Crim LR 132; Jackson, M [1995] Crim LR 587.

309 The Sanders research, op cit, fn 262, the Home Office Study by Brown, op cit, fn 301 and the study by Bucke et al, op cit, fn 302.

310 Op cit, fn 304

311 Op cit, fn 304, p 244.

312 Op cit, fn 304, pp 246 and 247.

313 The study by Hodgson and McConville took place over an eight month period during which the researchers followed suspects and advisors into 180 interrogations; see (1993) 143 NLJ 659.

314 The Role of Legal Representatives at Police Stations, HMSO 1992 Research Study No 3, summarised at [1993] Crim LR 161. The approach of the research has been criticised: see Roberts [1993] Crim LR 368, with reply by Baldwin, p 371.

315 McConville, M and Hodgson, J, Custodial Legal Advice and the Right to Silence, Royal Commission Study No 13.

316 R v Paris (1993) 97 Cr App R 99; Heron (1993) unreported, judgment of Mitchell J, 1 November 1993.

317 Dixon, op cit, fn 304, pp 236–37.

intervention is not called for in around one-quarter of interviews, that advisors usually intervene when it is called for but, in half of such cases, do not do so as often as is needed.³¹⁸

Thus, despite the general perception that legal advice reduces the likelihood that unreliable confessions will be made, the available empirical evidence relating specifically to the issue allows only the tentative suggestion that the advisor may ensure that the client is aware of the right to silence and may sometimes advise that he exercises it, despite the risks, especially where the client does not seem able to cope with the interview.³¹⁹ In this context, it is worth bearing in mind that it tends to be a feature of cases in which a miscarriage of justice has occurred that the confessions were uttered in the absence of a legal advisor.³²⁰ This has not invariably been the case; the confessions gained by oppression in the case of the Cardiff Three were obtained in the presence of a solicitor.³²¹ Of course, if an unreliable confession is made in the presence of a legal advisor, this may say much more about the quality of the advice given than it does about the principle of having legal advice. The presence of a solicitor can affect the reliability of the confession in other ways. The suspect may feel generally reassured by the presence of a person independent of the police who is undaunted by the interview process.

Moreover, his or her presence may sometimes be a potent factor discouraging use of improper tactics,³²² and may help to alter the balance of power between interviewer and interviewee, thus tending to create a climate in which an unreliable confession is less likely to be uttered. Reassurance deriving from the presence of a solicitor is not merely valuable in terms of the reliability of the confession; it may serve to make the whole experience of police detention less traumatic and daunting. In theory, the solicitor will intervene if the interview is conducted in an intimidatory fashion or if other improper tactics are used. Although it seems clear that the quality of legal advice improved over the 1990s, the availability of legal advice may not always have such effects, as indicated above. In other words, the mere fact that a person labelled a legal advisor' turns up at the police station and may be present at the interview may have little impact in terms of evening up the balance of power between suspect and police officer. Indeed, the presence of such a person may sometimes be to the disadvantage of the suspect, as it may offer a reassurance which it does not warrant.

318 Bridges, L and Choongh, S, Improving Police Station Legal Advice, 1998.

319 It is worth noting that the Court of Appeal has accepted as a general rule that most suspects, unless clearly experienced and independently minded, are less likely to make any confession in the presence of a solicitor (Samuel [1988] 1 QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 135; [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA; Dunford (1990) 140 NLJ 517, CA).

320 Eg, the Confait case, see the Report of an Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher (1977) HC 90; the case of the Birmingham Six (1991) The Times, 28 March; Silcott (1991) The Times, 8 December.

321 Paris (1993) 97 Cr App R 99; [1994] Crim LR 361, CA. This also occurred in Heron (1993) unreported, judgment of Mitchell J, 1 November 1993; the judge, Mitchell J, drew attention to the fact that only a legal executive was present during oppressive questioning and said that this was unacceptable.

322 One of the conclusions of the Sanders research, op cit, fn 262, p 150, was that suspects who did not receive advice or whose solicitors did not attend the interrogation would have been greatly assisted had the solicitor been present. Two examples are given, pp 138 and 139, of forceful or threatening questioning which produced a possibly unreliable confession from an easily intimidated suspect in the absence of a solicitor. This finding received some support from Dixon's study (op cit, fn 304). See also Bucke, op cit, fn 302.

Conclusions: improving the legal advice scheme

This discussion has suggested that the revisions of Code C in 1991 and 1995 tinkered with the problem of informal subversion of the right, but no radical change was undertaken. The 1999 revision signalled an abandonment of attempts to improve the scheme, despite the fact that after 1995, commentators had continued to point out its defects.³²³ The fundamental problem is that the process of delivering advice remains in the hands of a body which has an interest in withholding it, while many suspects continue to need disinterested advice regarding the decision whether to have advice.³²⁴

The result is that the introduction of new provisions aimed at curbing informal subversion are unlikely to have much impact and police working practices of subverting the new provisions themselves will tend to develop. It has been found that 'in around 28% of cases prior to the 1991 revisions but in 35% afterwards suspects may have been influenced against seeking advice by the police'.³²⁵ The percentage of suspects who receive advice remains relatively low and the research suggests that this continues to be due in part to subversion of notification and the responses of the police to requests for advice.³²⁶ It is too early to predict the effect of s 34(2A) of the CJPOA (inserted by s 58 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999), although it would appear to be likely to encourage the police to afford access to legal advice. Whether it does so in practice will depend on the interpretation of the term given to the provision. It provides essentially that adverse inferences shall not be drawn from a suspect's silence under caution before or after charge at an authorised place of detention if he has not been allowed an 'opportunity' to consult a solicitor before that point (emphasis added). Clearly, the term 'opportunity' may be taken to mean that, formally, an opportunity had been offered, but the suspect had not availed himself of it. This would not curb the use of ploys as discussed above. The provision also excludes questioning under caution at somewhere other than an authorised place of detention. As explained below, Code C allows for informal interviews outside the police station. Theoretically, then, such an interview, in which a suspect had remained silent and clearly would not have had an opportunity to consult a solicitor, could be adduced in evidence and s 34(2A) would not prevent the drawing of adverse inferences. Such a possibility would not appear to accord with Art 6 jurisprudence, discussed below. But, at present, it may be argued that the reform effected by s 34(2A) is flawed and incomplete.

Exclusion of admissions obtained after a breach of the legal advice provisions may encourage police officers to adhere to the scheme. However, most of the methods of evading the legal advice provisions considered here tend to consist of rule evasion as opposed to rule breaking. Courts tend to prefer the defence to point to a specific breach of a Code provision before deciding whether to invoke s 78 to exclude admissions.³²⁷ However, the disapproval of persuading an inexperienced 323 See Brown, op cit, fn 263; Sanders, 'Access to justice in the police station: an elusive dream?', in Access to Justice, 1996.

324 The Sanders research found that suspects quite often asked officers whether or not they should have advice: op cit, fn 262, p 65.

325 Brown et al, op cit, fn 283.

326 Brown, op cit, fn 263, pp 94-95; Bucke, op cit, fn 302.

327 See, eg, Keenan [1989] 3 WLR 1193.

suspect to forgo advice expressed in *Beycan*³²⁸ suggests that there may be a willingness on the part of the judiciary to consider rule evasion in this context. Where it seems that such evasion has occurred, it could be characterised as general subversion of the legal advice scheme or perhaps as a breach of the para 6.4 provision that no attempt must be made to persuade the suspect to waive advice. There would be scope for such argument where, for example, a suspect who made admissions in an interview after he had waived his entitlement to advice stated that something an officer said (such as an overstatement of the time needed to contact a solicitor) or failed to say to him, persuaded him to that decision.

Although para 6.4 seems to be aimed at preventing such improper persuasion at the “booking in” stage, it might also apply if it appeared that police officers had pressurised or misled a suspect into reversing the decision to have advice. For example, an untrue representation (even though made in good faith) that the duty solicitor was unavailable which had the effect of persuading the detainee to reverse the decision to have advice might be brought within para 6.4. If no reason for such a reversal was recorded as required by the 1991 Home Office circular, that might lend weight to the argument that the suspect was improperly persuaded to forgo advice. It is clear that although para 6.4 has not so far received much attention, it does open up a number of possibilities. This point will be returned to in Chapter 14 when exclusion of evidence as a form of redress for a breach of PACE is considered. However, it should be noted here that even if methods of evading the legal advice scheme could be given the character of a breach of PACE, exclusion of evidence would not inevitably follow. Thus, this ‘sanction’ remains extremely weak and is, of course, inapplicable to a suspect who is improperly denied advice or encouraged to forgo it, but later pleads guilty.

Various suggestions for reform of the legal advice scheme have already been made above which could bring about significant improvement without necessitating a radical change. There are other possibilities: ploys could be discouraged and untrue allegations by suspects of lack of notification of advice precluded if the ‘booking in’ stage were video or audio taped.³²⁹ Such an innovation could be used in conjunction with the para 6.4 prohibition of attempts to dissuade the suspect to forgo advice. Inadequate notification of advice could be characterised as an attempt at persuasion to forgo it on the ground that it was intended to and did have that effect. Finally, and very importantly, notification of legal advice could take place on arrest or even on caution, thereby harmonising the position of all suspects. Clearly, such changes would not ensure that all suspects who needed it received advice.

Further, improvement in the quality and delivery of advice can be brought about only by an increase in funding for the scheme. It may be argued that only specially trained solicitors should offer advice, but until better funding is available, solicitors will delegate this function. The Royal Commission, in its 1993 report, proposed that the performance of solicitors should be monitored and that the police should receive training in the role solicitors are expected to play.³³⁰ In a response to the

328 [1990] Crim LR 185.

329 The suggestion of video taping was made by Fordham J (1991) 141 NLJ 677. He suggested that it could take place by means of a fixed camera focused on the ‘booking in’ desk. The Royal Commission Report 1993 also proposed (Proposal 57) that a waiver of advice at this point should be video taped.

330 Proposals 64–69.

available research and recommendations of the Runciman Royal Commission,³³¹ the Law Society undertook a programme of training with a view to ensuring that clerks or other non-solicitor advisors are accredited in accordance with the Law Society's scheme for accreditation.³³² Thus, when non-solicitors give advice, they are normally accredited,³³³ although it has been pointed out that firms can use untrained paralegals who are not trained and then replace them after six months with another untrained trainee.³³⁴ But the quality of advice, although improving, remains variable: around 26% of those giving custodial legal advice are non-solicitors³³⁵ and where an 'own' as opposed to a duty solicitor gives advice, there is no requirement that he or she should have specialist training in this area.

However, it may be that more radical action is necessary to address this problem. There are various possibilities; for example, suspects could routinely be offered the chance at booking in to speak to a duty solicitor on the phone regarding the question of having legal advice. More radically, and expensively, legal advisors (who might be trainee solicitors and should at least have some legal education) could be employed on a temporary basis to attend all interviews in police stations except where the suspect requested his own solicitor or a duty solicitor or specifically required that a legal advisor should not be present. Such advisors could receive some special training concerned specifically with advising the suspect in the police station.³³⁶ Apart from such advisors, persons other than solicitors should not attend the suspect during interviews. Such a scheme would not only address most of the difficulties outlined here, but also the problems caused by the reluctance of solicitors to attend the police station³³⁷ and the variation in the quality of the response of solicitors to the request for advice.³³⁸

Vulnerable groups

Throughout Code C, recognition is given to the special needs of certain vulnerable groups: juveniles, the mentally disordered or handicapped, those not proficient in English, the hearing impaired or the visually handicapped. Juveniles and the mentally handicapped or disordered should be attended by an 'appropriate adult'. Under para 1, the 'appropriate' adult in the case of a juvenile will be the parent or guardian, a social worker or another adult who is not a police officer. The suspect should be informed by the custody officer that the appropriate adult is there to assist and advise him and can be consulted with privately (para 3.12). However, research suggests that this requirement is not always observed and that in any event, appropriate adults often seem unclear as to the role they are supposed to 331 Runciman Report Recommendations 61–68. In response to the McConville study, reported at (1993) 143 NLJ 659, the Law Society and Legal Aid Board announced that from October 1993, legal aid would not be available for police station work unless advisors had been through a training course and passed a Law Society test.

332 See Shepherd, Becoming Skilled.

333 See further Cape, E, Defending Suspects at Police Stations, 1999.

334 Bridges and Choongh, op cit, fn 318.

335 Brown, op cit, fn 263, p 108.

336 Eg, the College of Law course: 'Advising the suspect at the police station'.

337 The Sanders research found that 25.6% of solicitors gave telephone advice only, which was less valuable for the suspect; op cit, fn 262, p 104.

338 The Sanders research found an enormous variation in the quality of service offered in this context, op cit, fn 262, pp 112–17.

play.³³⁹ Under the revision of Code C in 1991 and 1995, the estranged parent of a juvenile can no longer be the appropriate adult,³⁴⁰ if the juvenile 'expressly and specifically objects to his presence'. Previously this was possible and, in such instances, the parent was likely to collude with the police or generally show hostility to the juvenile rather than look after his or her interests.³⁴¹

This change was probably prompted by the decision in *DPP v Blake*³⁴² that a confession obtained from a juvenile in the presence of an estranged parent acting as the appropriate adult may be excluded from evidence. Compliance with the original Note 13C (now sub-para 11.16), which indicated the respects in which the appropriate adult should look after the interests of the juvenile, could not be ensured if an estranged parent was present; now Note 1C may go some way towards ensuring that sub-para 11.16 can be given full effect. Under Note 1F, the solicitor should not be the appropriate adult; this provision was included in response to some evidence that the police had been treating the solicitor as the appropriate adult, thereby producing a conflict of interests.³⁴³ It was thought that the roles of legal advisor and appropriate adult differed; the same person could not therefore fulfil both. It should be noted that the juvenile can be interviewed without the presence of an appropriate adult if an officer of the rank of superintendent or above considers that delay will involve an immediate risk of harm to persons or serious loss of or serious damage to property.³⁴⁴ At various points to be discussed, the particular vulnerability of juveniles is recognised, but although this is to be welcomed, research suggests that the treatment of juveniles, particularly during interviews, is still at times unsatisfactory.³⁴⁵

In the case of a mentally disordered or handicapped detainee, the appropriate adult under para 1 will be a relative, guardian, other person responsible for his or her welfare or an adult who is not a police officer.³⁴⁶ The custody officer must as soon as practicable inform the appropriate adult of the grounds for the person's detention and ask the adult to come to the police station to see him or her. If a person appears mentally ill, the custody officer must immediately call the police surgeon or, in urgent cases, send the person to hospital or call the nearest available medical practitioner.³⁴⁷ The notification of rights must be given in the presence of the adult,³⁴⁸ which may mean repeating the notification, but if the suspect wants legal advice, this should not be delayed until the adult arrives.³⁴⁹ The appropriate adult who is present at an interview should be informed that he or she is not expected to act simply as an observer; and also that the purposes of being present are, first, to advise the person being interviewed and to observe whether or not the interview

339 Brown, Ellis and Larcombe, op cit, fn 283.

340 Note 1C.

341 See Softley, 'Police interrogation: an observational study in four police stations' (1985) Policing Today 119.

342 [1989] 1 WLR 432, CA; this problem also arose recently at first instance in Morse [1991] Crim LR 195.

343 LAG Bulletin, November 1989.

344 See Annex C: urgent interviews.

345 Evans, R, 'The conduct of police interviews with juveniles' (1993) Home Office Research Study No 8. On the treatment of juveniles generally, see Dixon, D, 'Juvenile suspects and PACE', in Freestone, D (ed), Children and the Law, 1990, pp 107-29.

346 Paragraph 1.7(b).

347 Paragraph 9.2.

348 Paragraph 3.11.

349 Note 3G and Annex E, Note E2.

is being conducted properly and fairly and, secondly, to facilitate communication with the person being interviewed.³⁵⁰

The Runciman Royal Commission Report 1993 recommended review of the role of appropriate adults with a view to considering their training and availability and the criteria employed by the police in order to determine when an adult was needed.³⁵¹ In response, the Home Office set up a review group which, in June 1995, made a number of recommendations. They included entitling appropriate adults to a confidential interview with the suspect, defining the role of appropriate adults in Code C, providing guidance for professionals and others likely to act in this role and setting up local appropriate adult panels.³⁵²

It will be found, in discussion in Chapter 14 of unreliable confessions, that mentally handicapped or disordered persons are very likely to make an untrue or exaggerated confession and therefore it is particularly important that all the safeguards available should be in place when such a person is interviewed. However, there is provision for urgent interviewing of such persons without the appropriate adult if an officer of the rank of superintendent or above considers that delay will involve an immediate risk of harm to persons or serious loss of or serious damage to, property.³⁵³ The main defect in the provisions relating to the mentally handicapped or disordered is that they rely on the ability of officers who will have had little or no training in the field to make the judgment that a person is mentally disordered.³⁵⁴ It would seem essential that custody officers at least should have special training in this regard. Various provisions are available for the protection of members of the other vulnerable groups mentioned. A blind or visually handicapped person must have independent help in reading documentation.³⁵⁵ A deaf or speech-handicapped person, or someone who has difficulty understanding English, must only be interviewed in the presence of an interpreter,³⁵⁶ but this may be waived in the case of urgent interviewing under Annex C.

Physical treatment

Physical treatment of detainees is governed by para 8 of Code C and it is intended that they should be provided with basic physical care. Paragraph 8 embodies the principle that the detainee's physical safety should be ensured and his physical needs met. It does, however, allow more than one detainee to be placed in the same cell if it is impracticable to do otherwise and although a juvenile must not be placed in a cell with an adult, it does not make clear provision for frequent checks on juveniles in police cells. It provides that cells should be adequately heated, cleaned, lit and ventilated and that three meals should be offered in any 24 hour 350 See para 11.16.

351 Proposal 72. For further discussion see Hodgson J [1997] Crim LR 785.

352 The Report is available from the Chairman of the Review Group: Mr Stephen Wells, F2 Division, Home Office.

353 See para 11.14 and Annex C.

354 Annex E, para 1 provides that if an officer 'has any suspicion or is told in good faith that a person of any age, whether or not in custody, may be suffering from medical disorder or is mentally handicapped or cannot understand the significance of questions put to him or his replies, then he shall be treated as a mentally disordered or mentally handicapped person'.

355 Paragraph 3.14.

356 Paragraph 13.

period. A juvenile will only be placed in a police cell if no other secure accommodation is available and the custody officer considers that it is not practicable to supervise him if he is not placed in a cell. Persons detained should be visited every hour but, where possible, juveniles should be visited 'more frequently',³⁵⁷ those who are drunk should be visited every half hour. No additional restraints should be used within a locked cell unless absolutely necessary and then only suitable handcuffs. Reasonable force may be used if necessary (para 8.9), but only to secure compliance with reasonable instructions and to prevent escape, injury, damage to property or the destruction of evidence. Under para 9, if a person appears mentally or physically ill or injured, or does not respond normally to questions or conversation (other than through drunkenness alone) or otherwise appears to need medical attention, the custody officer must immediately call the police surgeon (or, in urgent cases, send the person to hospital or call the nearest available medical practitioner).

Intimate searches

Under s 55, an intimate search can only be ordered if an officer of the rank of superintendent or above has reasonable grounds for believing that an article which could cause physical injury to a detained person or others at the police station has been concealed or that the person has concealed a Class A drug which he intends to supply to another or to export. Even if such suspicion arises, the search should not be carried out unless there is no other means of removing the object. Before it can be carried out, the reasons for undertaking it must be explained to the suspect and a reminder given of the entitlement to legal advice.³⁵⁸ An intimate search at a police station may only be carried out by a registered medical practitioner or registered nurse unless the authorising officer considers, in the case of a concealed object which could cause injury, that it is not practicable to wait, in which case a police officer of the same sex as the suspect can carry it out. An intimate search at a police station of a juvenile or a mentally disordered or mentally handicapped person must take place only in the presence of the appropriate adult of the same sex unless the suspect requests otherwise.³⁵⁹

7 QUESTIONING OF SUSPECTS

Introduction

In crime control terms, the police interview occupies a central position in the criminal justice system; it represents an effective use of resources, since if a confession becomes available, the criminal process is likely to be accelerated.³⁶⁰ In particular,

357 Note 8A.

358 See Code C, para 4.1 and Annex A.

359 Under Annex A, para 5 in the case of a juvenile, the search may take place in the absence of the appropriate adult only if the juvenile signifies in the presence of the appropriate adult that he prefers the search to be done in his absence and the appropriate adult agrees.

360 See McConville, M (1993) RCCJ Research Study No 13,1993; Baldwin (1993) 33 Br J Criminology 325.

since mens rea is a requirement of most offences, admissions provide the most readily available means of establishing the state of mind of the suspect at the relevant time. The interview may, in effect, replace the trial, since its results may play a key part in the pre-trial balancing and negotiating process in which the suspect decides whether to plead guilty. Clearly, the stronger the risk of a conviction which would be unaccompanied by a sentence discount, the less likely it is that he or she will plead not guilty.³⁶¹ If the suspect has confessed or made some admissions, he may feel that there is no point in pleading not guilty even if the admissions are false, exaggerated or misleading. The interview may also frequently play a part in general criminal intelligence gathering.³⁶² The crime control advantages of the interview are readily apparent.

From a due process perspective, on the other hand, the police interview is largely unjustifiable, since its raison d'être is to secure admissions which probably would not otherwise be secured; it therefore undermines the privilege against self-incrimination. This due process norm traditionally underpinned criminal justice practice,³⁶³ but it was gradually abandoned until it became accepted in the pre-PACE years that the purpose of the interrogation was to obtain admissions.³⁶⁴ The precarious position of the interview from this perspective explains, it is suggested, why it seemed necessary, when PACE placed police interrogations on a formal basis, to infuse due process elements into them. Such elements are intended to detract from any impression that the confession is involuntary. The police, however, remain the gatekeepers to these safeguards, which run counter to their crime control concerns, and therefore they may not be observed or, more subtly, the weaknesses and loopholes in the interviewing scheme will be discovered and explored.

PACE strongly reflects this uneasy compromise between crime control and due process: the detainee can be detained for the purposes of obtaining a confession under s 37(2), but a number of safeguards were created which are influenced by due process concerns to lessen the coerciveness of the interview and to ensure its integrity and reliability so that it can be used as evidence. The extensive and complex rules of Code C which appear to surround police interviews with a range of safeguards, including access to legal advice, afford the interview a due process appearance. A number of flaws, however, in due process terms, were built into the scheme when it was first introduced. Most significantly, there are no sanctions for breach of the interviewing rules, including those arising under PACE itself, apart from the possibility of disciplinary action;³⁶⁵ virtually no guidance is given as to the acceptable limits of 'persuasive' interviewing; there is scope for interviewing away from the police station, thereby evading the most significant safeguards, the tape of exchanges between suspect and police will not record all exchanges between them at the police station and there is uncertainty as to when an exchange with police becomes an interview so as to attract all the safeguards.

361 See Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1,2000, Chapter 7, Part 2.

362 Maguire and Morris, RCCJ Research Study No 5,1992.

363 The 1912 Judges' Rules did not allow police interrogation, although the police could invite and receive voluntary statements.

364 Holgate-Mohammed v Duke [1984] 1 AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054.

365 This possibility became even more remote when PACE, s 67(8), rendering breach of the Codes automatically a breach of the police Disciplinary Code, was repealed in 1994 by the Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994, s 37 and Sched 9.

The original interviewing scheme under Code C was revised in 1991 and improved by the introduction of tape recording under Code E. That revision, was, it is suggested, concerned wholly with improving the scheme's due process elements, albeit in a manner best described as superficial: the rules became more complex in order to deal with police evasion of them, but their fundamental flaws were hardly addressed. Despite the relationship a number of commentators had observed to exist between coerced confessions and miscarriages of justice,³⁶⁶ the recommendations made by the 1993 Runciman Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, which might, minor as they were, have continued the improvements undertaken in 1991, were largely ignored.³⁶⁷ Under the Major Government, the disciplinary sanction for breaching the Codes was removed under s 37(f) of the Police and Magistrates Court Act 1994, and the right to silence was curtailed under ss 34–37 of the CJPOA 1994. Largely as a consequence of the changes introduced under the CJPOA, the PACE Codes were revised once again in 1995; this revision, unlike the previous one, appeared to have a dual aim: it seemed to be intended to have some weak due process impact in eradicating loopholes, but it also introduced various provisions in order to give effect to the curtailment of the right to silence. These changes indicated a move away from the rather ineffectual attempts previously undertaken to protect the due process elements in the interviewing process.

Codes C and E were issued in revised versions which came into effect in 1999, but no radical change from the 1995 version was made. The opportunity presented by the 1999 revision of taking forward the improvements made in 1991 was therefore lost, as was the possibility of addressing some of the more fundamental flaws of Code C, in the light of the inception of the HRA. The failures to provide any sanction for breach of the Codes, to address the uncertainty as to the status of the Notes, which continue to contain significant protections for due process, to reduce the scope for out of station interviews and afford such interviews greater due process protection, or to remove provisions which themselves allow for breaches of the Convention rights, are all continued in the 1999 revision. These flaws, and their implications, are discussed at the relevant points, below.

The interviewing scheme had, from its inception, created a twin-track system under PACE, the counter-terrorist legislation and the Codes, that is, one in which terrorist suspects were exposed to a regime adhering to a lower level of due process than that applicable in respect of 'ordinary' suspects. This regime afforded the coercive elements of the scheme greater rein both formally and informally. Most obviously, as explained above, terrorist suspects could be exposed to a longer period of detention, which allowed greater scope for prolonged pressure during interrogation. The interviewing regime for such suspects was also less protective. The counter-terrorist scheme introduced by the Labour Government under the TA 2000, its Codes of Practice and the 1999 revision of Codes C and E not only confirms and extends the twin track system, but applies it to a much wider and more diverse 366 See Walker, op cit, fn 5, p 54.

367 Eg, the Runciman Report Chapter 4, para 23 put forward a recommendation to retain the right to silence, in the context of improved safeguards for suspects, taking into account recommendations intended to lead to improvement in the quality of custodial legal advice. The Report made other proposals for improvement of the interviewing scheme including the video taping of a waiver of legal advice (Proposal 57) and a special warning to juries regarding uncorroborated confessions (Chapter 4, paras 56–87).

range of suspects. The only concession to due process introduced under the TA is the possible extension of audio recording, already occurring on a voluntary basis, to interviews with terrorist suspects. The acceptance of the primacy of crime control values as underpinning police interviewing, reflected in the changes undertaken in the CJPOA, marked a turning point in criminal justice policies which was unaffected by the change of government in 1997.

This section does not concentrate only on questioning of suspects inside the police station because contact between police and suspect takes place a long time before the police station is reached, and this has been recognised in the provisions of Part V of PACE and Code of Practice C, which govern treatment of suspects and interviewing, but have some application outside as well as inside the police station. It should be noted that many of the key provisions relating to interviewing are contained in Code C rather than in PACE itself. The most crucial events during a person's contact with police will probably be the interviews and therefore, this section will concentrate on the safeguards available which are intended to ensure that interviews are fairly conducted and are properly recorded wherever they take place. Having considered the key features of both the terrorist and the conventional schemes, the discussion will go on to consider the influence that the HRA may have on them. The effect of flaws in the pre-trial procedures discussed here on the fairness of the trial is considered in Chapter 14.

This section examines the key aspects of the interviewing scheme in the following manner:

- (a) identification of the points at which the various safeguards must be in place;
- (b) the conduct of the interview;
- (c) the means of recording the interview;
- (d) the curtailed right to silence;
- (e) relationship with the legal advice scheme.

The interviewing scheme: bringing the safeguards into play

Under the pre-PACE rules, safeguards for the interview were governed largely by the Judges' Rules and Administrative Directions to the Police³⁶⁸ and s 62 of the Criminal Law Act 1977. The latter provided for access to a solicitor (although it was frequently ignored). The former provided, inter alia, for the issuing of cautions when a person was charged (not necessarily when he was arrested) and for the exclusion in evidence of statements and confessions which were not Voluntary' (see below). Under PACE, those rules were replaced by new rules contained either in the Act itself or in Codes of Practice C or E. The interviewing rules form the most detailed and complex part of the whole scheme.

It might be expected that the distribution of the provisions governing the interviewing scheme would give some recognition to theoretical differences in status between PACE, the Codes, the Notes for Guidance and Home Office circulars, the most fundamental provisions being contained in the Act and so on. In fact, this is not the case: although the Act contains the right to legal advice, the other important features of the interviewing scheme, including the right to silence,³⁶⁹ are governed by non-statutory provisions. Just as it cannot be assumed that Code provisions are less weighty than statutory ones, equally the Notes for Guidance and even the circulars³⁷⁰ do not invariably contain less crucial provisions than the Codes. In other words, the distribution of provisions between the four tiers does not follow a consistent pattern: the source of a provision may possibly have an effect on the likelihood that it will be complied with, but does not necessarily say much about its significance.

368 Eg, Home Office Circular 89/1978, Appendices A and B.
369 As contained in the caution: Code C, para 10.4.

The most significant safeguards available for interviews include contemporaneous noting down of the interview or tape recording, the ability to verify and sign the notes of the interview as a correct record, the legal advice provisions and, where appropriate, the presence of an adult. One of the most important issues in relation to these safeguards and reflected in the 1991 (and, to an extent, the 1995) revision of Code C, is the question when they come into play. There may be a number of stages in a particular investigation beginning with first contact between police and suspect and perhaps ending with the charge. At various points the safeguards mentioned have to come into play and two factors can be identified which decide which safeguards should be in place at a particular time. First, it must be asked whether an exchange between police and suspect can be termed an interview and secondly, whether it took place inside the police station or was lawfully conducted outside it.

*Interviews and non-interviews*³⁷¹

The correct interpretation of the term 'interview' under the original Code C scheme was highly significant because the relevant safeguards were unavailable unless an exchange³⁷² between police officer and suspect was designated an interview. The term therefore tended to be given a wide interpretation³⁷³ and eventually the definition given to it by the Court of Appeal in *Matthews*³⁷⁴—'any discussion or talk between suspect and police officer'—brought within its ambit many exchanges far removed from formal interviews. It also covered many interviewees, as it spoke in terms of 'suspects' not arrestees. However, it was qualified by the ruling in *Scott*³⁷⁵ that unsolicited admissions cannot amount to 'interviews' and by the ruling in *Marsh*³⁷⁶ to the same effect as regards 'genuine requests' from the police for information. In Marsh, police officers investigating a burglary suddenly came across wraps of papers and asked the appellant about them; the questions and answers 370 Eg, a provision in the 1991 circular required that where a suspect had changed his mind after requesting legal advice, a note should be made in the custody record of the reason for the change. The provision was presumably included with a view to discouraging police officers from providing misleading information which might induce the suspect to forgo legal advice.

371 See further Fenwick, H, 'Confessions, recording rules and miscarriages of justice' [1993] Crim LR 174–84.

372 'Exchange' will be used throughout this section to denote any verbal interaction between suspect and police officer, including unsolicited admissions.

373 The Court of Appeal in Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App R 332 defined it as 'a series of questions directed by the police to a suspect with a view to obtaining admissions'. This definition was quite wide in that it obviously included informal questioning.

374 [1990] Cr App R 43; [1990] Crim LR 190, CA, transcript from LEXIS.

375 [1991] Crim LR 56, CA. See also Younis [1990] Crim LR 425, CA.

376 [1991] Crim LR 455.

were admissible although no caution had been given because until that point, the officers had had no reason to suspect her of any drug-related offence. The ruling in Marsh bears some resemblance to that in *Maguire*³⁷⁷ which pre-dated Matthews. It was determined that questioning an arrestee near the scene of the crime apparently in order to elicit an innocent explanation did not constitute an interview. Thus, the original interpretation of an interview created some leeway—but not much—for gathering (or apparently gathering) admissions in informal situations before any safeguards were in place.

In one respect, distinguishing between interviews and non-interviews will not be as crucial under the current scheme as it was previously: under para 11.13 as revised, any comments relevant to the offence made by a suspected person outside the context of an interview must be accurately recorded³⁷⁸ and then verified and signed by the suspect. However, making such a distinction will still be highly significant, because it remains the first step towards bringing the other safeguards into play.

A definition of the term ‘interview’ is now contained in para 11.1 A Code C which reads:

An interview is the questioning of a person regarding his involvement or suspected involvement in a criminal offence or offences which by virtue of Para 10.1 of Code C is required to be carried out under caution.

Paragraph 10.1 reads:

A person whom there are grounds to suspect of an offence must be cautioned before any questions about it (or further questions if it is his answers to previous questions which provide the grounds for suspicion) are put to him regarding his involvement or suspected involvement in that offence if his answers or his silence (ie failure or refusal to answer a question or to answer satisfactorily) may be given in evidence to a court in a prosecution. He therefore need not be cautioned if questions are put to him for other purposes, for example, solely to establish his identity or his ownership of any vehicle or to obtain any information in accordance with any relevant statutory requirement...or in furtherance of the proper and effective conduct of a search.

It may be noted that the list of examples of instances under para 10.1 in which no caution would be necessary is not exhaustive. No such definition appeared in the original Code, but Note 12A read: ‘The purpose of any interview is to obtain from the person concerned his explanation of the facts and not necessarily to obtain an admission.’ The new definition obviously differs from this considerably and differs even more from the definition of an interview contained in Matthews.³⁷⁹ It echoes the rulings of the Court of Appeal in *Maguire*³⁸⁰ and *Marsh*³⁸¹ in attempting to draw a distinction between questioning a person regarding suspected involvement in an offence and questioning for other purposes. It appears that cautioning would not be required if the information obtained is in fact relevant to the offence, but the questioning was not directed towards uncovering such information. Such an 378 It may be noted that the weight actually given to this provision may depend on the question of whether its breach may be described as substantial and significant (see below, p 882); in this respect it is disturbing to note a first instance decision in which it was found that it should not be so described: Oransaye [1993] Crim LR 772.

377 (1990) 90 Cr App R 115; [1989] Crim LR 815, CA.

379 [1990] Crim LR 190.

380 (1990) 90 Cr App R 115; [1989] Crim LR 815.

381 [1991] Crim LR 455.

interpretation would be in conformity with the ruling in Marsh that the level of suspicion excited in police officers present at the scene determines when an exchange becomes an interview. This approach is readily justifiable. However, para 11.1A combined with para 10.1 does not make it sufficiently clear that where an explanation of the facts does relate to suspected involvement in an offence and is either perceived to do so by the officer concerned or would be by the ordinary reasonable officer,³⁸² an interview will take place.

Thus, para 11.1 A might on occasion act as an invitation to police officers to play down the level of suspicion excited by the circumstances in order to demonstrate that no interview took place. Such tactics might amount to a self-fulfilling prophecy in the sense that the officer concerned would have an interest in viewing the exchange as a non-interview requiring only accurate rather than contemporaneous recording; such recording would create more scope for giving the exchanges the character of a non-interview and it would therefore appear for future purposes that a non-interview did indeed take place. The only person able to impede this process would be the suspect, who must be asked to verify and sign the record of the exchanges; it is unlikely, however, that he would appreciate the implications of what had occurred.

The para 11.1 A test must be qualified by the ruling of the Court of Appeal in Weekes.³⁸³ Once an exchange becomes an interview, that fact will have a retrospective effect on earlier exchanges; if safeguards applicable to an interview were not available in respect of such exchanges, they will be excluded from evidence. It will not be possible to sever them from the 'interview'. This ruling seems to be in conflict with Marsh. However, as the Weekes ruling concerned a juvenile, it may be confined to such instances.

Where the level of suspicion clearly falls within para 10.1 as, of course, it will do after arrest, the use of the term 'questioning' in para 11.1 A nevertheless impliedly excludes instances where nothing definable as questioning has taken place. This is the correct interpretation where the police have apparently merely recorded what was said, according to the Court of Appeal in Menard.³⁸⁴ Paragraph 11.1 A may also exclude chats or discussions between suspect and police officer or statements or commands which happen to elicit an incriminating response.³⁸⁵ This interpretation seems to lead to a conflict between para 11.1 A and the ruling from *Matthews*³⁸⁶ which could be resolved by arguing that rulings of the Court of Appeal will prevail over a provision contained only in a Code provision.³⁸⁷ This would be the more satisfactory result, as more likely to curtail opportunities for 'verballing' (concocting

382 This qualification must be introduced to take account of the situation which arose in Sparks [1991] Crim LR 128; the officer who questioned the appellant apparently did not recognise the significance of the admissions made and therefore did not consider it necessary to caution him.

383 [1993] Crim LR 222; (1992) The Times, 15 May, CA.

384 [1995] Cr App R 306.

385 See Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App R 332.

386 If statements or commands eliciting a response from the suspect could be said to fall outside the Matthews ([1990] Crim LR 190) definition of an interview, which is unlikely, they could still constitute an interview according to the ruling in Absolam, ibid.

387 The Codes of Practice brought in by a resolution of both Houses of Parliament do not have statutory authority. It has, however, been held by the Court of Appeal that they can prevail over rules derived from case law (McCay [1990] Crim LR 338) although commentators have thought that the Court of Appeal was mistaken in this view (Birch, D [1990] Crim LR 340).

admissions). However, a possible response might be that the definition from Matthews is now enshrined in para 11.13 and is not therefore inconsistent with para 11.1 A. In other words, the Matthews definition applies to most exchanges between suspect and police officer, but para 11.1 A applies to certain particularly important ones labelled 'interviews'. This interpretation is to an extent supported by the wording of para 11.13: 'a written record shall also be made of any comments made by a suspected person, including unsolicited comments which are outside the context of an interview but which might be relevant to the offence ...', thus implying that comments relevant to the offence other than unsolicited comments will not invariably be part of an interview. It also receives some support from the ruling in Williams,³⁸⁸ which seems to have accepted impliedly that 'social visits' by police to suspects in the cells involving conversations relevant to the offence in question do not constitute interviews, although they are to be discouraged. This interpretation would mean that a number of exchanges which would previously have been interviews will no longer be so labelled and this is especially of concern owing to evidence that police officers tend to favour the informal chat in the police station.³⁸⁹

The improvement in the position of some suspects should not be allowed to obscure the fact that certain safeguards may now be triggered off only in a confined group of situations. Whether this will be the effect of para 11.1 A is still unclear, but in Cox,³⁹⁰ the Court of Appeal adopted what might be termed a 'purposive approach' to Note 11A (which previously contained the definition of an interview, under the 1991 revision) in finding that the intention of the 1991 revision was to increase rather than decrease protection for suspects and therefore, Note 11A should be interpreted in the light of previous decisions such as Matthews which broadened the definition of an interview. This was followed in Oransaye,³⁹¹ which suggested that the emphasis should not be placed on the form of the exchange—on whether or not questions were asked—but on whether what was said went to 'the heart of the matter'. If so, the exchange should be termed an interview.³⁹²

Interviews inside and outside the police station

Once an exchange could be called an interview, the safeguards applying to it under the original provisions differed quite markedly depending on where it took place. Those available inside the police station included contemporaneous recording³⁹³ or tape recording,³⁹⁴ the ability to read over, verify and sign the notes of the interview as a correct record,³⁹⁵ notification of legal advice,³⁹⁶ the right to have advice before 388 (1992) The Times, 6 February, CA.

389 See Holdaway, S, Inside the British Police, 1985; Sanders [1990] Crim LR 494, referring to his research on access to legal advice in police stations (research undertaken by Sanders, Bridges, Mulvaney and Crozier, entitled Advice and Assistance at Police Stations, November 1989) found that such practices were still continuing post-PACE.

390 [1993] Crim LR 382; see also Goddard [1994] Crim LR 46.

391 [1993] Crim LR 772.

392 For discussion of the meaning of 'interview' see Field, 13(2) LS 254.

393 Original para 11.3 provided that if the interview took place in the police station or at other premises, 'the record must be made during the course of the interview unless in the investigating officer's view this would not be practicable or would interfere with the conduct of the interview'.

394 Under original para 11.3.

395 Under Code E, para 3.

396 Under original para 12.12.

questioning³⁹⁷ and, where appropriate, the presence of an adult.³⁹⁸ If the interview took place on 'other premises', the same safeguards would apply apart from the requirements to *inform*³⁹⁹ of the right to legal advice and to allow the suspect to verify and sign the record of the interview.

In the street, however, it was only necessary to ensure that an accurate record of the interview was made⁴⁰⁰ and, where appropriate, an adult was present.⁴⁰¹ Thus originally, a minimum level of protection only was available creating scope for impropriety, including fabrication of confessions. In particular, it meant that only the experienced suspect interviewed outside the police station would be aware of the right to legal advice. Thus, however widely the term 'interview' was interpreted, it was of little use to suspects who made (or allegedly made) admissions outside the police station.

The 1991 revision reduced the significance of this factor to some extent. Provision for giving the suspect the record of the interview to verify and sign was moved out of para 12, applying only to interviews in the police station and into para 11,⁴⁰² which is headed 'Interviews general',⁴⁰³ although this change was made less significant by the provisions of para 11.13. The verifying and signing rules were supplemented in 1995 by the requirement, imposed, however, only in a Note for Guidance, Note 11D, that the suspect should declare in his or her own hand on the interview record that it is correct. Such a provision clearly has more value than the requirement only to obtain a signature. Under para 11.5, the interview must be recorded contemporaneously wherever it takes place, unless this would not be practicable.

However, the unseasoned suspect interviewed outside the police station will still be unaware of the right to legal advice⁴⁰⁴ and it is also at present unlikely that the interview would be tape recorded: Code E does not envisage tape recording taking place anywhere but inside the police station.⁴⁰⁵ In some circumstances suspects will not, however, be disadvantaged by these differences, thanks to the provisions of para 11.1, introduced by the 1991 revision, which reads:

Following a decision to arrest a suspect he must not be interviewed about the relevant offence except at a police station [except in certain instances specified in 11.1(a),

397 Under para 3.1.

398 The Court of Appeal in Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App R 332 determined that no questioning could take place inside the police station before the suspect had been notified of the right to legal advice; answers allegedly made to questions put before such notification were thereby rendered inadmissible.

399 Under original para 13.

400 Section 58, governing the right of access to legal advice, is expressed to apply to persons in police detention but para 3.1, governing the right to be notified of the s 58 entitlement was (and is) expressed to apply only to those in the police station. However, volunteers under caution in the police station or on other premises had the right to be informed of the entitlement to legal advice under original para 10.2.

401 Original para 13 did not state expressly that an adult must be present during any interview whether conducted in or out of the police station when a juvenile was interviewed. However, this could be implied; the ruling in Fogah [1989] Crim LR 141 confirmed that this was the correct interpretation.

402 Paragraph 11.10.

403 The Court of Appeal determined in Brezenau and Francis [1989] Crim LR 650 that these provisions could only apply inside the police station; departure from the clear words of para 12 was not warranted.

404 This is governed by para 3.1, which is expressed to apply only to persons in the police station.

405 Code E, para 3.1 states: '...tape recording shall be used at police stations for any interview...' Some police forces have experimented with hand held tape recorders used outside the police station, but at present this is by no means common practice.

(b) and (c) which call for urgent interviewing]. For the definition of an interview see Note 11 A.

Paragraph 11.1 could merely have read: 'A suspect must not be interviewed about the relevant offence except at a police station...'. Clearly, it was designed to allow some interviewing outside the police station owing to its requirement of a higher level of suspicion than that denoted by para 11.1 A and para 10.1. It implies that a police officer should categorise someone either as possibly involved in an offence or as on the verge of arrest; so long as the first category is applicable, questioning can continue. This category was presumably intended to include persons under caution, because a caution must be given 'when there are grounds to suspect (him) of an offence'.⁴⁰⁶ Obviously, these categories will tend to merge into each other. However, it will be difficult to be certain in retrospect as to which applied, although the police may find it difficult where there are very strong grounds for suspicion to support a claim that interviewing could continue because the decision to arrest had not been taken. It is clear that the problems associated with exchanges between suspect and officer still remain and it is evident that a significant number of suspects are still interviewed outside the police station.⁴⁰⁷ The Runciman Royal Commission proposed that admissions made outside the police station should be seen as needing some form of corroboration such as their acceptance by the suspect on tape at the police station,⁴⁰⁸ and this was implemented under the 1995 revision in para 11.2A. However, crucially, para 11.2A does not provide that admissions or silences made outside the police station will be inadmissible if not accepted on tape by the suspect at the police station. Therefore, presumably, if no breaches of Code C have occurred, they would be admissible even though uncorroborated, subject to the possibility of excluding them under ss 76 or 78 of PACE, as discussed in Chapter 14.

Original para 10.2 provided that a volunteer who was questioned under caution on 'other premises' had to be told of his right to legal advice. This placed such persons in a better position than arrestees and, therefore, tended to be evaded by bringing forward the moment of arrest. Current para 10.2 removes the special requirement for volunteers. However, in removing one loophole, another has been created: volunteers under caution outside the police station are disadvantaged because they can be questioned without notification of the right to legal advice, whereas once the decision to arrest has been made, a suspect should not normally be questioned before arrival at the police station, where he will be informed of the right. In other words, in the context of the current provision under para 11.1, the old requirement under para 10.2 would have had some value; had it been retained and extended to all volunteers under caution, it would have removed some of the incentive which now exists to delay, or apparently delay, the decision to arrest in order to interview outside the police station. Clearly, this would have been a radical move, but it might have been welcome as harmonising the position of such suspects with that of arrestees.

406 Paragraph 10.1.

407 Brown, Ellis and Larcombe, Home Office Research Study No 129. The study showed that questioning and/or unsolicited comments occurred in 24% of cases. Questioning occurred in 10% of cases.

408 Royal Commission Report 1993, Proposal 40.

Even more significantly, since suspects not at the police station can be interviewed, without having had an opportunity to consult a solicitor, they are not protected by the provision of s 34(2A) of the CJPOA: adverse inferences could be drawn if they remain silent. Further, s 34(2A) does not affect the position of suspects who make admissions despite not having had that opportunity.

Where the level of suspicion would obviously justify an arrest, a police officer who is eager to keep a suspect out of the police station for the time being might be able to invoke one of the more broadly worded exceptions allowing urgent interviewing in order to avert certain specified risks. The first exception under para 11.1 (a), allowing interviewing to take place at once where delay might lead to interference with evidence, could be interpreted very broadly and could apply whenever there was some likelihood that evidence connected with any offence but not immediately obtainable was in existence. Even if there were no others involved in the offence who had not been apprehended, it could be argued that the evidence was at risk from the moment of arrest because news of the arrest might become known to persons with a motive for concealing it. This argument could also apply to the exception under (c) with the proviso that it will apply to a narrower range of offences. Once the arrest has occurred, s 30(1) of PACE provides that the suspect must be taken to the police station by the constable as soon as practicable. Under s 30(1)), the police can delay doing so if the suspect is needed elsewhere to carry out investigations which it is reasonable to carry out immediately. Thus, further leeway for informal interviewing after arrest is created.

Once the suspect is inside the police station under arrest or under caution,⁴⁰⁹ any interview⁴¹⁰ (using this term to connote an exchange which falls within para 11.1 A) should be tape recorded, but there are exceptions in respect of terrorist suspects, which are considered below.

Varying levels of protection for exchanges

It is now possible to identify the points at which the safeguards will be brought to bear and it is apparent that there are four levels of protection available:

- (1) Inside or outside the police station, if the exchange cannot be (or at times is not) labelled an interview, even though it may be relevant to the offence, it seems that the level of protection provided by para 11.13 only will apply. This will be the case even where the suspect is an arrestee or a volunteer under caution.
- (2) If an interview takes place outside the police station and falls outside the para 11.1 prohibition or within the leeway created by s 30(1), the verifying and recording provisions under paras 11.10 and 11.5 will apply with the proviso that contemporaneous recording is likely to be viewed as impracticable.⁴¹¹ What is impracticable does not connote something that is extremely difficult, but 409 Under para 3.4 of Code E, once a volunteer becomes a suspect (ie, at the point when he should be cautioned) the rest of the interview should be tape recorded.

410 Under para 3.1(a), an interview with a person suspected of an offence triable only summarily need not be taped.

411 The mere fact that an interview is conducted in the street may not be enough to support an assertion that it could not be contemporaneously recorded. This seems to follow from the decision in Fogah [1989] CrimLR 141.

must involve more than mere inconvenience.⁴¹² Where appropriate, an adult must be present.⁴¹³ Notification of the right of access to legal advice will not occur, although adverse inferences could be drawn if the suspect remains silent.

- (3) Inside the police station, if the person in question is an arrestee or a volunteer under caution⁴¹⁴ and the exchange is an interview, all the available safeguards, including access to legal advice and tape recording, will apply.⁴¹⁵
- (4) If the conditions under (3) are satisfied but the person is suspected of involvement in terrorism under para 3.2 (or falls within one of the other exemptions from tape recording),⁴¹⁶ all the available safeguards except tape recording will apply.

Thus, wide but uncertain scope still remains for interviewing outside the police station and for gathering admissions outside the context of an interview. The main objection to this scheme, apart from its complexity,⁴¹⁷ is that the degree of protection available is too dependent on factors irrelevant to the level of suspicion in question. It may be pure chance, or something more sinister, which dictates whether a volunteer under caution is interviewed inside or outside the police station or whether or not an exchange with an arrestee can successfully be characterised or disguised as a non-interview. Bearing in mind that unreliable confessions may be most likely to emerge from informal exchanges, it is argued that the mechanisms triggering off the main safeguards—para 11.1 A and para 11.1—are deficient both in creating large areas of uncertainty as to the level of protection called for at various points and in allowing the minimal level of protection under para 11.13 to operate in too many contexts.

Conclusions

Street interviewing remains at quite a high level,⁴¹⁸ while the key due process safeguards of access to legal advice and audio recording continue to be reserved for formal interviews within the police station. The caution which, as suggested below, serves both crime control and due process purposes, can be, and in most instances should be, used outside the police station, with the result that the suspect is warned of the dangers of failing to speak before the key safeguards can be in 412 Parchment [1989] Crim LR 290. Note-taking while the suspect was dressing and showing the officers round his flat was held to be impracticable.

413 Paragraph 11.14.

414 Under para 3.15, which largely reproduces original para 3.9, volunteers under caution have the right to be told that they may obtain legal advice. The other important Code C safeguards are contained in paras 11 and 12 and apply to arrestees and volunteers under caution. Under Code E, tape recording must be used for interviews with persons under caution in the police station (E 3.1 (a)).

415 Unless under Code E, para 3.3, it would not be reasonably practicable to tape the interview owing to failure of the recording equipment or non-availability of an interview room or recorder. Note 3K of Code E provides that if necessary, an officer must be able to justify the decision not to delay the interview.

416 See fn 415, above.

417 The need to adopt a commonsense approach to the rules was expressed in Marsh [1991] Crim LR 455 by Bingham LJ in relation to the original scheme. However, the current scheme does not lend itself readily to a simple interpretation. See especially the comments of McCullough J in Cox [1993] Crim LR 382 regarding Note 11A.

418 See Brown, Ellis and Larcombe, op cit, fn 283; the study showed that questioning or unsolicited comment occurred outside the station in 24% of cases. The Runciman Royal Commission found that around 10% of interviews took place outside the police station: RCCJ Report, Cm 2263, 1993; see Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1,2000, pp 272–73A.

place. Due process protection outside the police station is minimal; it consists only of contemporaneous note-taking under caution if an interview is occurring or accurate non-contemporaneous note-taking if the exchange is not an interview. Relevant non-interview exchanges with juveniles and mentally disordered persons may be admissible in evidence even though no adult is present.

Not only, therefore, is due process virtually abandoned in relation to out of police station exchanges and interviews, they may also have a structural formative influence on formal interviews and ultimately on the outcome of the process,⁴¹⁹ thereby undermining the protection available for such interviews. Suspects may feel, rightly or wrongly, that they have already prejudiced their position too far during informal exchanges to attempt to retrieve it in a formal taped interview; therefore, any confession made in such an interview—or any ill-considered silence—may not be truly voluntary. Thus, it is extremely important to determine how far the scheme leaves scope for exchanges to occur before the police station is reached.

From both a due process and a crime control perspective, it would not be appropriate to address the leeway in the scheme for informal interviewing by requiring that, where sufficient suspicion is present, suspects should always be arrested and taken to the police station before any exchange occurs. In crime control terms, this might not represent an efficient use of resources since some unnecessary arrests would be made. In due process terms, there are some disadvantages in police station interviewing: the element of detention is coercive and the fact of detention may lead suspects to make admissions in order to leave it. Rather, the due process 'deficit' in street exchanges may be addressed, to an extent, by applying stronger safeguards to such interviewing⁴²⁰ and, as discussed in Chapter 14, by giving careful consideration, under Art 6, to the admission of such exchanges as evidence.

Interviewing techniques and recording methods

Audio recording

Section 60 of PACE allowed for the issuing of a Code of Practice in connection with tape recording of interviews, and this was accomplished by means of Code of Practice E. Once the suspect is inside the police station under arrest or under caution,⁴²¹ any interview (that is, an exchange which falls within para 11.1 A of Code C) with a person who has been cautioned in respect of an indictable or 'either way' offence⁴²² should be audio recorded under Code of Practice E. Initial resistance by the police gave way to a recognition of the advantages of audio recording, which seems to be generally accepted⁴²³ as reflecting a truer picture of an interview than 419 See James [1996] Crim LR 650.

420 Using hand-held tape recorders and notifying the suspect of the right of access to legal advice as part of the caution.

421 Under para 3.4 of Code E (1999 version), once a volunteer becomes a suspect (ie, at the point when he should be cautioned) the rest of the interview should be tape recorded.

422 Under para 3.1 (a), an interview with a person suspected of an offence triable only summarily need not be audio taped, although under Note 3A it can be recorded at police discretion.

note-taking⁴²⁴ and, thanks to recent developments, the jury are in one sense even better placed than they would have been had they been present at the interview because they may be allowed to take the tape recordings into the jury room⁴²⁵ to replay as necessary⁴²⁶

However, exchanges may occur between formal interviews, when the tape is switched off, which affect the formal interview and although they should be recorded in writing under para 11.13, the record may not cover everything that was said and the facts recorded by the police officers may be disputed by the suspects. In other words, leeway for falsely imputing admissions to the suspect is created.⁴²⁷

Audio recording was not initially used in terrorist cases, under Code E, para 3.2, or in cases of espionage under s 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1989. This provision was clarified under Note for Guidance 3G of Code E; interviews with those suspected of terrorism solely connected with the affairs of the UK or any part of the UK other than Northern Ireland should be tape recorded. A written contemporaneous record could still be made of interviews which fell within Code E, para 3.2. This exemption was included because it was feared that the contents of tapes might become available to terrorist organisations. The Home Office reviewed it in 1990,⁴²⁸ and although it did not introduce mandatory audio recording, police in Britain undertook it in terrorist cases on a voluntary basis. Since, under s 1 of the TA, terrorism is defined much more widely to include those covered by Note G, and the problem of Irish terrorism has diminished, the obvious step is to make audio recording of interviews with terrorist suspects mandatory. Under the original version of the Bill, this was accomplished by Sched 7, para 9 of the TA, which provided for the audio recording of any interview by a constable of a person detained under s 41 and Sched 7 of the TA, once a new Code of Practice had been introduced. This step would not have changed current practice, apart from that in Northern Ireland, but it would have afforded formal recognition to this due process safeguard. The current position is left unclear, since audio recording is to be dealt with by a Code of Practice to be issued by the Secretary of State and different provision may be made for different parts of the UK.⁴²⁹

423 See Wills, Mcleod and Nash, The Tape recording of Police Interviews with Suspects, 2nd Interim Report, Home Office Research Study No 97, 1988. The study found that police officers and prosecutors generally welcomed taping, since it is a faster recording method and renders them less vulnerable to allegations of Verballing'.

424 Research conducted by Baldwin and Bedward of the Institute of Judicial Administration, University of Birmingham, on summaries made of tape recorded interviews found that the summaries were often of a very poor quality and presented a distorted picture of what occurred during the interview. However, they also found that the police were aware of this problem and were beginning to address it. See [1991] Crim LR 671.

425 Emmerson [1991] Crim LR 194. In Riaz and Burke [1991] Crim LR 366, the Court of Appeal held (in instances where the jury had not already heard the tapes) that better practice would be to reassemble the court and play the tapes in open court.

426 This permission was expressed to extend only to those parts of the tapes which had been heard in open court; other material would have to be edited out.

427 See Dunn (1990) 91 Cr App Rep 237.

428 HC Deb Vol 168 Col 273, 1 March 1990.

429 Schedule 8, para 3(1) and (7).

Video recording

The recording of police interviews is one of the most rapidly developing areas of policing. The possibility that the introduction of tape recording,⁴³⁰ replacing contemporaneous note-taking,⁴³¹ would eventually be overtaken by video taping has been under consideration for some time.⁴³² Video taping of police interviews was until recently at the experimental stage and the Home Office made it clear in 1991 that it supported its introduction⁴³³ as a step in the direction of preventing miscarriages of justice. Section 60 of PACE has now been amended by s 76 of the CJP 2001 to insert s 60A, which provides the Secretary of State with the power to issue a new Code of Practice for the Visual recording of interviews'. Commentators have given video taped interviews a cautious welcome;⁴³⁴ criticism has largely been directed towards the difficulty of ensuring that they are not subverted by 'informal' contacts between police and suspect,⁴³⁵ rather than at the quality of the recordings.⁴³⁶ Arguably, such difficulties are endemic in the interviewing scheme as currently conceived, regardless of the recording technique used.

Interviewing techniques

There seems to be a tendency in some quarters to see developments in recording techniques as going a long way towards solving the problem of unreliable confessions.⁴³⁷ However, there is a danger that other relevant issues will be obscured. It is important not to overemphasise the value of recording techniques at the expense of provisions which may have a more direct effect on their reliability. This danger was perhaps most readily apparent in the juxtaposition in the remit of the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure of the possibility of introducing video taping with that of abolishing the right to silence.⁴³⁸ In this connection, it is instructive to compare the enthusiasm for video taping of interviews⁴³⁹ with the decision to abolish the right to silence.⁴⁴⁰ Probably video taping is to be welcomed, but arguably its 430 Governed by Code of Practice E, which came into force on 29 July 1988.

431 Originally governed by Code C, para 11.3 and under revised Code C by para 11.5. Tape recording has not entirely replaced contemporaneous note-taking, first because it does not apply to all interviews (see Code E, para 3) and secondly, because contemporaneous note-taking applies to interviews outside the police station where practicable, whereas tape recording is at present only required inside it (Code E, para 3.1).

432 Video taping of interviews as opposed to audio taping was one of the possibilities considered by Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure chaired by Lord Runciman. See (1991) 141 NLJ 1512 for a brief interim report by John Baldwin of a study of video taping experiments currently taking place in four police stations. For some time, the police have been able to video tape a confession if they first obtained the consent of the accused: Li Shu-Ling [1989] Crim LR 58, PC. The Runciman Royal Commission proposed that further research into the use of video taping for interviews should be carried out (Proposal 70). However, the Home Office issued a circular on video recording of interviews which advised against moving quickly to introduce video recording owing to the cost of so doing (Circular 6/1993).

433 In response to a request from Sir John Fair MP for video taping of all police interviews in order to prevent miscarriages of justice, John Patten, men Secretary of State for the Home Office, indicated that this course would be considered after the results of a pilot project conducted for the Association of Chief Police Officers in conjunction with the Home Office were known. HC Deb Vol 200 Col 391, 5 December 1991.

434 See, eg, Barnes, M, 'One experience of video recorded interviews' [1993] Crim LR 444.

435 See McConville, M, 'Video taping interrogations: police behaviour on and off camera' [1992] Crim LR 532.

436 However, quality has been questioned: see John Baldwin's interim report of experiments with video taping of interviews, which found that there were fairly serious or very serious problems with video taping in over 20% of the recordings. These included poor picture or sound quality or camera malfunction. Op cit, fn 432.

437 When Kenneth Baker, the then Home Secretary, announced the inception of the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, he suggested that recent improvements in the provision for recording of police interviews would prevent miscarriages of justice in future: HC Deb Vol 187 Col 1109, 14 March 1991.

value should not be over-stressed. Video taping might faithfully reflect the interview during which a confession was made,⁴⁴¹ but fail to affect the pressure likely to make it unreliable flowing from the suspect's perception that he must speak. The fact that it was video taped might give the confession a spurious credibility. This is not an argument against video taping in general, but against its use as part of the justification for failing to reverse the modification of the right to silence. It might be argued that unreliable confessions would be almost eliminated by the use of such advanced recording techniques, thereby providing a justification for increasing the pressure on the suspect to speak.

Improvement in the recording provisions is not aimed directly at promoting the reliability of a confession, but at allowing a court to consider an accurate record of it and to assess what occurred when it was made. There is clearly a difference between the reliability of admissions and the reliability of the record of them.⁴⁴² In contrast to the success of the scheme in this direction, there has been little development in the area of provisions able to affect what occurred; PACE does not attempt to regulate the conduct of the interview except in so far as such regulation can be implied from the provision of s 76 that confessions obtained by oppression⁴⁴³ or in circumstances likely to render them unreliable will be inadmissible. Code C of PACE forbids oppressive interviewing in para 11.3⁴⁴⁴ and gives some very general guidance as to interviewing mentally disordered or handicapped suspects in Code C, Note 11B, which is largely repeated in Note E3. Obviously, the provisions governing detention and the physical comfort of the detainee⁴⁴⁵ have relevance in this context; they provide the setting for the interrogation and remove from the situation some of the reasons why a suspect might make an unreliable confession. But, once their limits have been set, they cannot influence what occurs next and it seems that the use of intimidation, haranguing and indirect threats is still quite common, especially in interviews with juveniles.⁴⁴⁶ The Runciman Royal Commission, which reported on 6 June 1993, proposed that the role of the appropriate adult should be reviewed⁴⁴⁷ and 438 In announcing the Royal Commission (see fn 437, above) the Home Secretary stated that part of its remit was to consider 'the extent to which the courts might draw proper inferences from any failure (on the part of the suspect) to take advantage of opportunities to state his position', at Col 1115. On 5 December 1991, John Patten, then Secretary of State for the Home Office, made it clear that the Royal Commission would be considering video taping of police interviews: op cit, fn 433.

439 See fns 432 and 433, above; see also Campbell, 'Videos of interviews "would help police"' (1991) The Guardian, 9 December.

440 The Home Office set up a working group in 1989 to consider the right to silence: see fn 302, above, after the right had already been modified in Northern Ireland by the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988. The group's recommendations assumed that abolition was necessary. For criticism see Greer, S (1990) 53 MLR 709 and Zuckerman [1989] Crim LR 855. Kenneth Baker signalled that interest in this possibility was still very much alive when announcing the remit of the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure: op cit, fn 25. The Home Secretary announced in October 1993 that the right to silence would be abolished and this was brought about under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, ss 34, 36 and 37.

441 But see John Baldwin's findings, op cit, fn 432.

442 See the discussion of Paris (1993) 97 CR App R 99 in Chapter 14, p 876.

443 Misleading statements made during an interview distorting the state of the evidence against the defendant or hectoring and bullying may well lead to exclusion of any confession obtained under either s 76 or s 78. See Mason [1987] Crim LR 119; [1987] 3 All ER 481, CA; Beales [1991] Crim LR 118; Blake [1991] Crim LR 119; Heron (1993) unreported, discussed in Chapter 14.

444 Code C, para 11.3 provides: 'No police officer may try to obtain answers to questions or to elicit a statement by the use of oppression.'

445 Paragraphs 8 and 9 of Code C; para 12.4 regulates the physical conditions in the interview room.

that officers should receive training in the role a solicitor would be expected to play,⁴⁴⁸ but did not make general proposals as to outlawing or regulating use of certain interviewing techniques.⁴⁴⁹ Such proposals would be particularly relevant after the evidence of use of bullying techniques in interrogations which arose from the post-PACE case of Paris, Abdullah and Miller (the Cardiff Three).⁴⁵⁰ In fact, such techniques may be in the process of being replaced by a more subtle 'investigative approach',⁴⁵¹ but this is no substitute for specific guidance under Code C as to improper techniques.

The right to silence

Introduction

There is general academic agreement that, as Sanders and Young have put it, 'it is over the right of silence that due process and crime control principles clash most fundamentally'.⁴⁵² The right to silence, in the sense of the immunity of an accused person from having adverse inferences drawn from failure to answer questions during police questioning, is central to the due process model. In contrast, adherence to crime control principles logically demands not only that such inferences should be drawn, but that in some or all circumstances, refusal to answer police questions should be an offence in itself, on the ground that innocent persons would not thereby be disadvantaged and the burden on the prosecution would be eased.

Within the due process camp, retention of the right to silence has been advocated on the grounds of its value in protecting suspects and also on the basis that it symbolises the presumption of innocence. One group of abolitionists departs from a classic crime control stance in arguing for an 'exchange' or trade-off between the PACE suspects' rights and the right to silence.⁴⁵³ Since the inception of PACE, which adopted the due process stance,⁴⁵⁴ there has been a clear movement towards the crime control position, on the basis of exchanging enhanced suspects' rights for curtailment of the right to silence. The influence of the HRA on the position now reached in relation to the right is complex and is considered in a separate section, below.⁴⁵⁵

The right to silence was abrogated in 1988 in Northern Ireland in terms of allowing adverse inferences to be drawn from silence at trial.⁴⁵⁶ But, post-PACE, the right was retained for most suspects, including terrorist suspects, in England and Wales 446 See Evans, 'The Conduct of Police Interviews with Juveniles', Home Office Research Study No 8, 1993. See (1994) 144 NLJ 120 and (1994) 144 NLJ 203 for criticism of a variety of interview techniques.

447 Proposal 72.

448 Proposal 64.

449 See Baldwin (1993) 143 NLJ 1194 for criticism of the failure of the Royal Commission in this respect. See also Reiner [1993] Crim LR 808.

450 (1993) 97 Cr App R 99.

451 Baldwin notes ((1993) 143 NLJ 1195 and 1197) that 1993 training manuals for police interviewers advocate this approach. It is advocated in the Interviewer's Rule Book.

452 Criminal Justice, 1st edn, 1994, p 191.

453 See Greer, op cit, fn 440.

454 The only recognition given to this right in PACE was in Code C, in the wording of the caution, para 10.4.

until it was curtailed or undermined, although not abolished, under ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA 1994. The right, in the sense of an immunity from criminal sanctions due to a refusal to answer questions under suspicion, still exists as far as the majority of suspects are concerned.⁴⁵⁷

The majority of the Runciman Royal Commission agreed with the Phillips Commission in recommending that the right to silence should be retained, although it considered that provision to deal with so called ‘ambush’ defences (defences sprung on the prosecution at the last minute by a defendant who has hitherto remained silent as to his or her defence) should be introduced.⁴⁵⁸ The Commission’s recommendation was based not on a ‘symbolic’ but an ‘instrumental retentionist’ approach,⁴⁵⁹ it arose from a concern that otherwise, a risk of miscarriages of justice might arise.⁴⁶⁰ Given that the Commission was convened in the wake of a number of miscarriages of justice, it might have been expected that the Government would give these findings some weight.

The Home Secretary, however, took what could be termed an exchange abolitionist approach⁴⁶¹—suspects have greater rights than they did in pre-PACE days and therefore do not need the right to silence. Since curtailment of the right was unlikely to have any effect at all on the crime rate, it seems most likely that it was undertaken not in order to gain genuine crime control advantage, but in order to give the impression that such advantage might be gained. The conviction rate was unaffected since the change had an impact only on the small number of criminals who are detected and who would otherwise have remained silent. While it may have had some influence on decisions to plead guilty, its main effect has probably been on that tiny percentage of cases which come to court⁴⁶² in which the defendant has remained silent and has pleaded not guilty. The academic consensus is that the advantages in terms of crime control are very doubtful, whereas the risk of miscarriages of justice has been increased.⁴⁶³ At the same time it was acknowledged, prior to curtailment, that ‘the reality of the right to silence is much closer [in practice] to the crime control model than it might first appear’,⁴⁶⁴ partly due to informal inference drawing by juries and magistrates.⁴⁶⁵

Thus, it is fair to say that prior to the CJPOA changes, the right to silence did not necessarily have a significant impact on the conduct of the interview or ensure that a suspect had a bulwark against giving in to pressure to speak. In fact, few suspects

455 See pp 854–57.

456 Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order SI 1988/1987 NI 20 1988.

457 See below p 858 for a number of statutory provisions which penalise silence.

458 RCCJ Report p 84, para 2. The proposal found effect in the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996, which imposes a duty of defence disclosure in most Crown Court cases. Michael Zander, a member of the RCCJ, considered that such disclosure would undermine the presumption of innocence (Zander, RCCJ Report, A Note of Dissent, p 22, paras 8 and 11). It may be found that the provisions of the 1996 Act are not fully in compliance with Art 6(2) of the Convention which guarantees the presumption of innocence. See below, pp 901–02.

459 See Greer, op cit, fn 440.

460 Runciman, RCCJ Report, p 55.

461 Greer, op cit, fn 440, p 719.

462 Over 90% of defendants to be tried in magistrates’ courts plead guilty; for Crown Court defendants the figure is 65%. See further Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1,2000, Chapter 7.

463 See Zander, op cit, fn 1, pp 303–23; Fenwick, op cit, fn 308; Jackson, op cit, fn 308; Pattenden [1995] Crim LR 602–11.

refused to answer questions⁴⁶⁶ and, as discussed above, silence is not routinely advised by solicitors. One of the key reasons for retaining the right to silence is that the suspect may be under stress and unable to assess the situation clearly; he or she may have a number of reasons for reluctance to speak, including fear of incriminating another and uncertainty as to the legal significance of various facts. It may also be argued that the right should be reinstated in full in order to guard against the possibility that the suspect will concoct a confession in order to escape the pressure of the interrogation. A juvenile suspect in the Silcott case,⁴⁶⁷ questioned about the murder of police officer Blakelock by a riotous mob, made up a detailed confession based on suggestions put to him by police officers, although it was later found that he could not have been present at the scene. This suspect made the confession despite his right to exercise silence, suggesting that the right to silence alone will not benefit such suggestible detainees. However, as argued above, the right to silence in conjunction with advice from an experienced solicitor would seem to provide a surer safeguard against false confessions than either silence or legal advice alone. In other words, the pressure on the suspect in police interviews was already high and did not appear to be compensated for by other factors such as tape recording and access to legal advice. Thus, the large body of writing on the right to silence generally came down on the side of its retention.⁴⁶⁸

Drawing adverse inferences from silence

Section 34(1) of the CJPOA 1994 provides: 'where...evidence is given that the accused...(a) on being questioned under caution by a constable trying to discover whether or by whom the offence had been committed, failed to mention any fact relied on in his defence...or (b) on being charged...or on officially being informed that he might be prosecuted...failed to mention any such fact, being a fact which in the circumstances existing at the time the accused could reasonably have been expected to mention when so questioned, charged or informed...sub-ss(2) below applies'. Under s 34(2)(d), the court or jury 'in determining whether the accused is guilty of the offence charged may draw such inferences as appear proper'. The difference between sub-ss (1)(a) and (1)(b) is of interest. It is notable that sub-ss(1)(b) makes no mention of cautioning or of questioning. It implies that an inference of guilt may be drawn from the failure of the accused to volunteer information. Since it is not confined to the point at which the suspect is charged, it could, theoretically, apply at any point during the arrest and detention. Sections 36 and 37 of the 1994 Act provide that adverse inferences may be drawn from a failure to account for possession of substances or objects, or presence at a particular place. Under all 464 Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1,1994, p 193.

465 Zander and Henderson, Crown Court Study, RCCJ Research Study No 19, 1993.

466 See Leng, The Right to Silence in Police Interrogation, Home Office Research Study No 10, 1993. Only 4.5% of suspects exercised their right to silence.

467 (1991) The Times, 9 December.

468 See Report of the Home Office Working Group on the Right to Silence, 1989 (in favour of modification of the right). For criticism of the report, see Zuckerman, op cit, fn 440. For review of the debate see Greer, op cit, fn 440; Coldrey (1991) 20 Anglo-Am L Rev 27. In favour of modification of the right see Williams (1987) 137 NLJ 1107; editorial (1988) Police Review, 29 April.

these provisions, there is still a right to remain silent so long as the accused is prepared to take the risk that so doing may have an adverse impact on his defence, if the case comes to trial. The caution under para 10.4 Code C was accordingly revised in 1995 to read: 'You do not have to say anything, but it may harm your defence if you do not mention when questioned something which you later rely on in court. Anything you do say may be given in evidence.' In contrast to the old caution, the new one has a dual and contradictory effect: it can no longer be seen simply as a safeguard; it must also be seen as part of the coerciveness inherent in the police interviewing and detention powers. Further special cautions were adopted under para 10.5A and B of Code C in order to take account, respectively, of the provisions of ss 36 and 37 of the 1994 Act.

As indicated above, s 34(2A) was inserted into the CJPOA by s 58 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999. The amendments provide that if the defendant was at an authorised place of detention and had not had an opportunity of consulting a solicitor at the time of the failure to mention the fact in question, inferences cannot be drawn. This is a very significant change to the interviewing scheme, which was introduced as a direct response to the findings of the European Court of Human Rights in Murray v UK.⁴⁶⁹ The implications of this change are considered in relation to the custodial right of access to legal advice, below.⁴⁷⁰

It is implicit in all three sections that inferences may only be drawn if a sound explanation for the silence is not put forward. Although staying silent carries risks, it may be, depending on the circumstances, less risky than making ill-considered admissions since silence, unlike admissions, must be corroborated.⁴⁷¹ However, as the Runciman Commission pointed out, the caution is likely to put most pressure on vulnerable suspects.⁴⁷² The suspect most likely to be unable to evaluate the riskiness of silence is precisely the type of suspect who needs the protection originally afforded by the right. Vulnerable persons interviewed outside the police station may be confused by the caution and without the benefit of legal advice may be pressurised into making inaccurate and ill-considered admissions and perhaps into mentioning matters they have not been questioned about.⁴⁷³ Thus, although it may be argued that in a number of circumstances it may not be 'proper' for a jury to be directed to draw adverse inferences from silence or that it was not reasonable in the circumstances existing at the time to expect the suspect to speak, this will not benefit the suspect who does in fact speak in response to the current caution. Ironically, it is probably the seasoned criminal who understands the operation of s 34 of the CJPOA and may be able to predict that silence may not be a more risky strategy than it was previously, who has not been disadvantaged by the change.⁴⁷⁴

469 (1996) 22 EHRR 29. See below, pp 855–56.

470 See pp 856–57.

471 CJPOA 1994, s 38(3).

472 RCCJ Report, para 4.50.

473 It was found in Nicholson [1999] Crim LR 61 that if the police have not asked about facts, adverse inferences should not be drawn against the defendant if he does not state those facts.

474 See Moston, S and Williamson, T, 'The extent of silence in police stations', in Greer and Morgan (eds), The Right to Silence Debate, 1990.

The emerging case law on s 34 of the CJPOA suggests that the courts are not on the whole taking a restrictive approach, although it has been made clear that where the prosecution do not seek to rely on a silence, the judge should direct the jury positively not to draw inferences.⁴⁷⁵ In Murray v DPP,⁴⁷⁶ which was decided on the 1988 Northern Ireland Order, but is clearly applicable to s 34, the House of Lords found that silence allows the drawing not only of specific inferences from failure to mention particular facts, but also of the inference that the defendant is guilty. The decision in *Condron and Another*⁴⁷⁷ also favoured a broad application of the provisions. The appellants were to be questioned by police at the police station on suspicion of being involved in the supply and possession of heroin. The police surgeon found that they were fit to be interviewed, but their solicitor considered that they were unfit, since they were suffering withdrawal symptoms, and so advised them not to answer any questions. They relied on that advice during the interview and remained silent. At trial, the defence involved reliance on facts which had not been mentioned in the course of the interview and thus potentially fell within s 34 of the CJPOA. The judge held a voir dire and rejected argument under s 78 that the no comment interview should be excluded as unfair because they were unfit to be interviewed. Argument that it would be improper to allow an inference to be drawn under s 34 because in making no comment they had only followed the bona fide advice of their solicitor was also rejected. The interviews were admitted and the prosecution then argued that they could reasonably have been expected to mention at interview the facts they now relied on in their defence; they were cross-examined on their failure to mention such facts. They gave the explanation that they had relied on the solicitor's advice. In summing up, the judge directed the jury that they must determine whether any adverse inferences should be drawn from the failure of the defendants to mention the facts in question during the police interview. The judge did not explain that the inferences could only be drawn if, despite the explanation, the jury concluded that the silence could only sensibly be attributed to the defendants having no satisfactory explanation to give. Thus, it is possible that the jury may have drawn adverse inferences despite accepting the defendants' explanations.

The appellants were convicted and argued on appeal that the jury should not have been directed that they could draw adverse inferences from the refusal to answer questions since they had followed the advice of their solicitor in so refusing. The Court of Appeal took into account an earlier case, Cowan and Others,⁴⁷⁸ which concerned the position of defendants failing to testify in court under s 35, and applied the principles enunciated to police questioning. The principles were as follows. A jury cannot infer guilt from silence alone (s 38(3)), so that the jury should only consider drawing inferences if a prima facie case to answer has been made out by the prosecution. Also, the burden of proof remains throughout on the prosecution to prove their case; in effect, a silence will be only one factor which can be used to make out the case. Inferences can be drawn if the only sensible explanation of silence was that the suspect had no explanation, or none that would

475 R v McGarry [1998] 3 All ER 805.

476 [1994] 1 WLR 1.

477 [1997] 1 Cr App R 185.

478 [1996] QB 373; [1995] 4 All ER 939.

stand up to cross-examination. The judge's direction was criticised in that it did not make this clear. The court then considered the procedure to be followed in relation to s 34, where silence is on legal advice. The jury may draw an adverse inference from the failure unless the accused gives the reason for the advice being given. The reason for the advice is legally privileged, since it is part of a communication between solicitor and client, but once the client gives evidence of the nature of the advice, that will probably amount to a waiver of privilege so that the solicitor and/or client can then be asked about the reasons for the advice in court. The court found that if an accused gives as the reason for not answering questions in a police interview that he has been advised not to do so, this assertion without more will not amount to a sufficient reason for not mentioning relevant matters which may later be relied on in defence. The convictions were upheld on the basis of the overwhelming evidence of drug supply, despite the flaw in the summing up.

It was made clear in *Bowden*⁴⁷⁹ that explaining the grounds for the advice will amount to a waiver of privilege. Therefore, the prosecution can cross-examine the advisor on what was said to the suspect with a view to discovering discrepancies between the grounds put forward at trial and those discussed in the police station. The effect of these two decisions is to place the defendant and advisor in an invidious position. The advisor may be reluctant to advise silence even where there seem to be good reasons for doing so.⁴⁸⁰ If the advisor advises silence, it may well appear to the defendant that that in itself is a sound reason for remaining silent. But that reason will not be accepted by a court. The advisor can either refuse to waive legal privilege and accept that adverse inferences will be drawn from the silence, or he can waive it and hope that the reasons given for the advice will be accepted in order to discourage the drawing of inferences. There may also be other confidential matters which the advisor does not wish to be asked about. It has been pointed out that solicitors may breach their professional Code of Conduct if they act for a client when they may be a material witness in the court case.⁴⁸¹ But if there is an arguably sound reason for advising silence, the jury should be directed, following the findings of the Court of Appeal in Condron, that if they view the reason as sound, they should not draw adverse inferences.

In Argent,⁴⁸² the Court of Appeal found that when considering whether, in the circumstances existing at the time, the defendant could reasonably have been expected to mention the fact he now relies on, the court should take into account matters such as the defendant's age, health, experience, mental capacity, sobriety, tiredness, personality and legal advice. It is a matter for the jury to resolve whether, bearing these matters in mind, the defendant could have been expected to mention the fact in question, although the judge may give them guidance. Any restrictive impact of these findings is doubtful; in *R v Friend*⁴⁸³ adverse inferences were drawn under s 35 against a defendant aged 14, with a mental age of 9.

Under the Blair Government, the CJPOA provisions were retained and further 479 (1999) The Times, 25 February.

480 See, as to the difficulties facing advisors, Cape, E, 'Advising on silence' (1999) LAG, 14 June.

481 Tregilgas-Davey, M, 'Adverse inferences and the no-comment interview' [1997] 141 SJ 500. The Guide to the Professional Conduct of Solicitors, 1996, para 21.12.

482 [1997] 2 Cr App R 27; (1996) The Times, 19 December. See Broome, K, 'An inference of guilt' (1997) 141 SJ 202.

483 [1997] 1 WLR 1433.

provisions curtailing the right to silence in terrorist cases were introduced. Section 1 of the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 inserted a new provision, s 2A, into the PTA, making further provision for the drawing of inferences from the suspect's silence. These provisions were reproduced in s 109 of the TA 2000, but applied only to Northern Ireland.⁴⁸⁴ Section 109(2) of the 2000 Act (previously s 2A(5) of the PTA as inserted) provides that an inference that the suspect belongs to a proscribed organisation may be drawn at trial if the accused fails to mention, on being questioned by a constable under caution and before charge, a fact which is material to the offence and which he could reasonably be expected to mention. Under s 109(3) (previously s 2A(6)), an inference of guilt may be drawn at trial if the accused failed to mention, on being charged or informed by a constable that he might be prosecuted for the offence under s 11, a fact which is material to the offence and which he could reasonably be expected to mention. Theoretically, s 109(3) could apply even before a caution has been given, so long as the provisions in s 109 allowing access to legal advice are satisfied. Presumably, however, if no caution had been given, it could not be said that the accused could reasonably have been expected to mention the information in question.

These provisions are additional to the provision under the CJPOA for drawing adverse inferences from silence and it may be noted that s 34 of the CJPOA is narrower than s 109, since it refers only to matters which are later relied on in defence. As indicated, case law on s 34 of the CJPOA already establishes that inferences may only be drawn if a sound explanation for silence is not put forward. Applying this to s 109, it would appear that it cannot be inferred that the reason for silence was the need to concoct a false explanation of factors suggesting membership of a proscribed organisation if the real and innocent reason for silence is put forward. Following Argent, the jury should only consider drawing inferences under s 34 if there is a prima facie case to answer made out by the prosecution. Under s 38(4), the conviction cannot be based on silence alone; the position is the same under the TA, under s 109(4). Under s 109, the burden of proof remains throughout on the prosecution to prove its case; in effect, a silence will be only one factor which can be used to make out the case. However, s 109 leaves open the possibility that the conviction or committal for trial could be based on an inference of guilt from silence together with the opinion of a police officer (admissible in evidence under s 108). Moreover, the possibility may also be open of combining inferences drawn in reliance on ss 34, 35, 36 or 37 of the CJPOA with an inference or an opinion under ss 108 and 109 of the TA. Therefore, for example, the possibility is not ruled out of combining silence when questioned as to presence at a particular place (which is, or is near to, a meeting place of a proscribed organisation) with silence on being informed of the possibility of prosecution under s 109.

Penalising silence

Prior to the inception of the CJPOA, the right to silence was abolished in certain specific circumstances under a number of provisions which made failing to answer questions an offence. The provisions included: s 172 of the Road Traffic Act 1988; s 484 Under the transitional provisions of the TA 2000, Part VII, ss 108 and 109.

2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987; ss 177 and 178 of the Financial Services Act 1986; ss 236 and 433 of the Insolvency Act 1986; s 437 of the Companies Act 1985; the Banking Act 1987 and the Friendly Societies Act 1992. These provisions, apart from s 172 of the RTA, were amended in 1999, as explained below. Thus, in a number of instances, the right to silence had already been eroded until it reached the point where it could be said to have virtually disappeared.⁴⁸⁵ If, for example, inquiries were made into a failed business, its owner could receive a 's 2 notice' from the Serious Fraud Office issued under the Criminal Justice Act 1987 which meant that a criminal offence would be committed if he or she did not attend for interview and answer questions (Director of the Serious Fraud Office ex p Smith).⁴⁸⁶ Also, if the company was being investigated, a refusal to answer questions under s 432(2) of the Companies Act 1985 attracted criminal liability.

While the Conservative governments of 1989–97 were responsible for the shift towards the crime control position which occurred under these provisions and under the CJPOA 1994, the Blair Government was responsible for a further marked shift in that direction. The TA 2000 abolished the right to silence—in the sense of making it an offence to refuse to answer questions in defined circumstances—at certain points in the investigation of such cases. The Government raised the possibility of creating such an offence in the Consultation Paper on Terrorism in 1998. It noted that the recent Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 'extends the provisions by allowing inferences to be drawn in connection with membership of a specified proscribed organisation; but even there that is insufficient in itself to secure a conviction'. The intention was to take this provision further by creating an additional offence of refusing to answer questions, modelled on the power currently given to investigators in a range of cases such as serious fraud investigations, and customs and licensing inquiries. The Government recognised that there were what it termed 'serious ECHR constraints on this option'⁴⁸⁷ and that, in order to circumvent these constraints, the resulting evidence, whether answers or silence, could not be used in a subsequent case against the individual concerned. The Government clearly had in mind the case of Saunders v UK,⁴⁸⁸ which is considered below.

These considerations led to the inclusion of paras 13, 14 and 16 in Sched 5 of the 2000 Act. The provisions relate to terrorism generally, not merely to proscription, but their relatively limited nature indicates the influence the Convention is already having in tempering legislation in attempts to ensure that it is compatible with the Convention. The Government clearly did not wish to risk the political embarrassment which it would have incurred had it included provision allowing coerced statements to be included as evidence, provision which would have necessitated issuing with the Act a statement of incompatibility under s 19 of the HRA.

The provisions as they stand are, however, of doubtful compatibility. The requirements of para 13 represent a further infringement of the rights of the suspect, albeit of a relatively limited nature and subject to judicial authorisation. Under para 13 of Sched 5: 'a constable may apply to a circuit judge for an order...requiring 485 See Re London United Investments [1992] 2 All ER 842; Ex p Nadir (1990) The Times, 5 November; Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd v Maxwell [1992] 2 All ER 856, CA.

486 [1993] AC 1; [1992] 3 WLR 66; see also AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523, HL.

487 Op cit, fn 6, para 14.3.

488 (1997) 23 EHRR 313. See below, p 855.

any person specified in the order to provide an explanation of any material—(a) seized in pursuance of a warrant under paragraph 1 or 11, or (b) produced or made available to a constable under paragraph 5'. This does not affect material protected by legal privilege, but under para 13(3) a lawyer may be required to provide the name and address of her client. Under para 13(5), para 10 applies to such orders: they will have effect as if they were orders of the Crown Court. Thus, a person who refused to comply could incur liability for contempt. But, any statement obtained cannot be used in evidence except on a prosecution for an offence under para 14. Paragraph 14(1) provides: 'a person commits an offence if, in purported compliance with an order under paragraph 13, he makes a statement which he knows to be false or misleading in a material particular', or recklessly makes such a statement. This offence is punishable by a maximum prison sentence of two years. Paragraph 16 is even more controversial; it provides a further possibility, untrammelled by judicial intervention, of punishing persons for failing to give explanations, or giving misleading ones. Paragraph 16(1) provides: 'if a police officer of at least the rank of superintendent has reasonable grounds for believing that the case is one of great emergency he may by a written notice signed by him require any person specified in the notice to provide an explanation of any material seized in pursuance of an order under paragraph 15.' Under para 16(3), in contrast to para 13, the suspect will commit an offence carrying a maximum prison term of six months if he fails to comply with a notice under the paragraph.

Both paras 13 and 16 allow for the admissibility of coerced statements, although in respect of the para 14 offence only. Thus, courts will have to consider whether admitting such statements in respect of that offence would be compatible with Art 6. Further, the paragraphs do not refer to silences which may be admissible in respect of other offences, as may evidence from the statement against another person. Also, the evidence from any statements made, while not directly available to the court, may nevertheless underpin the other prosecution evidence, thereby arguably undermining the right to freedom from self-incrimination (see below).⁴⁸⁹

The transitional provisions applying to Northern Ireland create a further erosion of the right to silence. Under s 89(2) of the TA it is an offence punishable by a fine not to stop when required to do so by an officer; it is also an offence to refuse to answer a question asked during the stop or to answer it inadequately, failing to answer 'to the best of his knowledge and ability'.

8 IDENTIFICATION OF SUSPECTS

Evidence obtained from the suspect himself or from witnesses can identify the suspect as the person who committed the offence in question, or can demonstrate that he is innocent of it. The identification procedure is largely governed by the provisions of Code D which has as its overall aim the creation of safeguards against wrongful identification, bearing in mind that mistaken identification can be a very significant cause of wrongful convictions.⁴⁹⁰ It also contains provisions which are intended to safeguard vulnerable groups and to ensure that the invasion of privacy represented by some methods of identification is kept to a minimum consistent with the Code's overall aim. Many of the procedures will only take place with the suspect's consent, although if consent is not forthcoming, this may be used in evidence against him or her. In the case of a mentally handicapped or disordered person, consent given out of the presence of the 'appropriate adult' will not be treated as true consent while the consent of a juvenile alone will not be treated as valid if the adult does not also consent.⁴⁹¹ Identification can take place by various means which include by witness, by fingerprints and by the taking of samples from the body of the suspect.⁴⁹²

489 See pp 854–55.

Witness identification

Methods

If identification is to be by witness, Code D, para 2.1 provides that the following methods may be used: a parade; a group identification; a video film; or a confrontation. A group identification consists of allowing the witness an opportunity of seeing the suspect in a group of people and it should, if practicable, be held in a place other than a police station (for example, in an underground station or shopping centre). The suspect will be asked to consent to a group identification, but where consent is refused, the identification officer has the discretion to proceed with a group identification if practicable. Under para 2.13, if neither a parade nor a video identification nor a group identification procedure is arranged, the suspect may be confronted by the witness and such a confrontation does not require the suspect's consent, but it may not take place if any of the other procedures are practicable.

Practicability

A parade must be used if the defendant requests it and it is practicable. A parade may also be held if the officer in charge of the investigation considers that it would be useful and the suspect consents. The aim is to use the best means of identification available; therefore, if it is impracticable to use a parade, the police may move on to a group identification; they cannot merely move straight to the last possible method—a confrontation.⁴⁹³ However, there is uncertainty as to when it could legitimately be said to be impracticable to hold an identification parade. In Ladlow, Moss, Green and Jackson,⁴⁹⁴ 20 suspects had been arrested and the confrontation method of identification was used, as otherwise it would allegedly have been necessary to hold 221 separate parades. Despite this, it was ruled that evidence derived from the parades would be excluded. However, in *Penny*⁴⁹⁵ the police wrongly thought it impracticable to hold a parade, but the trial judge admitted the evidence and the Court of Appeal refused to interfere with the decision. It is 490 The Criminal Law Revision Committee 1972 considered that wrongful identification was the greatest cause of wrongful convictions (para 196).

491 Paragraph 1.11.

492 Identification can also be by photographs under Code D, Annex D.

493 Ladlow, Moss, Green and Jackson [1989] Crim LR 219.

494 Ibid.

495 (1991) The Times, 17 October.

unfortunate that the opportunity of clarifying the position was not taken when Code D was revised in 1991, especially as the uncertainty also affects the term 'practicable' used in para 2 with respect to video and group identification. However, where it is genuinely hard to assemble sufficient persons resembling the defendant to take part in the parade, owing perhaps to alienation of the particular group from the police,⁴⁹⁶ video identification may provide a means of obtaining acceptable evidence. If group identification takes place in the street, the area in question may be relevant; if the defendant is of a certain race, a mixed race area should be chosen in order to increase the chances that someone of the same race might pass by.⁴⁹⁷

Safeguards

The officer in charge of the identification ('the identification officer') must not be below the rank of inspector and must not be involved with the investigation. No officer involved with the investigation of the case against the suspect may take any part in the procedures.⁴⁹⁸ It is also important that witnesses should not be able to confer before the identification; if they do so confer, the identification may be excluded from evidence.⁴⁹⁹

When Code D was revised, various new safeguards for witness identification were introduced: under new para 2.15, the suspect must be reminded that free legal advice is available before taking part in the identification procedure and, under new para 2.16, the identification procedure and the consequences, if consent to taking part is not forthcoming, must be explained in a written notice which the suspect must be given reasonable time to read.

Under para 2.15, before the means of identification is arranged, the identification officer must explain a number of matters to the suspect orally and in writing: the fact that he is entitled to free legal advice and can have the advisor present; the fact that he does not have to take part in a parade or co-operate in a group identification or with the making of a video film and, if it is proposed to hold a group identification or video identification, his entitlement to a parade if this can practicably be arranged. However, he must also be told that if he does not consent to take part in a parade or co-operate in a group identification or with the making of a video film, his refusal may be given in evidence in any subsequent trial and police may proceed covertly without his consent or make other arrangements to determine whether a witness identifies him.

Identification by fingerprints or bodily samples

Under para 3 of Code D, a person over the age of 10 may be identified by fingerprints if he or she consents or without consent under ss 27 and 61 of PACE, which also allow the use of force. Section 61 was amended by s 78 of the CJP 2001 to insert s 61 (3A) to allow for the re-taking of fingerprints without consent.

496 See Campbell and Another [1993] Crim LR 47, CA; the police had arranged a confrontation because they had not found sufficient Rastafarians to take part in a parade. Lack of co-operation between the police and the Rastafarian community was condemned by the Court of Appeal.

497 Jamel [1993] Crim LR 52.

498 Gall (1990) 90 Cr App R 64; Jones [1992] Crim LR 365.

499 Finley [1993] Crim LR 50, CA.

A person may also be identified by bodily samples, swabs and impressions, but only if the offence is a serious arrestable offence, the officer has reasonable grounds to believe that such an impression or sample will tend to confirm or disprove the suspect's involvement in the offence and with the suspect's written consent.⁵⁰⁰ However, the Royal Commission proposed that these provisions should also apply in the case of all offences.⁵⁰¹ A juvenile has the right to have the appropriate adult present unless he or she requests otherwise in the presence of the adult.⁵⁰² The suspect will be warned that a refusal may be treated, in any proceedings against him, as corroborating relevant prosecution evidence.⁵⁰³ The warning is set out in Code D, Note 5A. He must also be reminded of his entitlement to have free legal advice and the reminder must be noted in the custody record. Intimate samples⁵⁰⁴ may only be taken under ss 62 and 63 PACE, as amended by s 80 Criminal Justice and Police Act (2001) (CJP) by a registered medical or dental practitioner or registered nurse, whereas non-intimate samples⁵⁰⁵ may be taken by a police officer. They may be taken without consent if an officer of the rank of inspector or above has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the offence in connection with which the suspect is detained is a serious arrestable offence and for believing that the sample will tend to confirm or disprove his involvement in it.

9 IMPACT OF THE HRA

Introduction

As Chapter 14 will demonstrate, arrest and detention and, where relevant, treatment within that period may be considered under Art 6, whether or not a breach of Art 5 or any other Article is established.⁵⁰⁶ Under Art 6, the Court has developed the concept of the fairness of the trial 'as a whole', allowing for consideration of custodial treatment in a broad sense. In *Saïdi v France*⁵⁰⁷ the Court said that its role was to determine 'whether the proceedings in their entirety...were fair'.⁵⁰⁸ In Barbéra, Messegué and Jabardo,⁵⁰⁹ the trial taken as a whole could not be said to be fair. This was partly due to features of the treatment of the defendants pre-trial, taken cumulatively. They were held for a substantial period of time incommunicado and when they confessed to the police they did not have legal assistance. Nevertheless, their confessions were significant in later questioning by examining judges. The unfair pre-trial treatment clearly had a tendency to render the trial unfair, although it is improbable that such a tendency would have been found without the unfairness 500 Under para 5.

501 Proposal 19.

502 Paragraph 5.12.

503 PACE 1984, s 62 (10).

504 'Blood, semen or any other tissue fluid, urine, saliva or pubic hair or a swab taken from a person's body orifice' (PACE, s 65).

505 Including hair other than pubic hair or a sample taken from a nail or from under a nail or a skin impression (PACE, s 65, as amended by CJPOA 1994, s 80(5)(b)).

506 See pp 901-03.

507 (1994) 17 EHRR 251.

508 Paragraph 43.

509 A 14 6(2) (1989).

at the hearing itself.⁵¹⁰ Nevertheless, the findings in Barbéra are significant, since they emphasise the need to consider the whole criminal process, including any custodial period, in determining fairness. It might be appropriate where the pre-trial custodial treatment, including the manner of questioning, had a cumulatively harsh effect, to stay the prosecution for abuse of process. In other circumstances, exclusion of evidence obtained during or as a result of a course of harsh or adverse treatment might be appropriate in order to satisfy Art 6. Civil actions may be brought against the police, including claims for damages in respect of breaches of the rights. These possibilities are discussed further in Chapter 14.⁵¹¹

Article 3 treatment in detention

Article 3 treatment may arise in respect of a number of aspects of detention. Failure to obtain medical treatment after a forcible arrest was found to infringe Art 3 in Hurtado v Switzerland.⁵¹² In the Greek case,⁵¹³ the conditions of detention were found to amount to inhuman treatment owing to inadequate food, sleeping arrangements, heating and sanitary facilities combined with overcrowding and inadequate provision for external contacts. It was also found that conduct which grossly humiliates may amount to degrading treatment contrary to Art 3. Such treatment may include racially discriminatory and, probably, sexually discriminatory arrests and treatment in detention;⁵¹⁴ it might be found to fall more readily within Art 3 in a non-terrorist context.⁵¹⁵ Where discrimination is a factor, Art 14 would also be engaged.

The substantive criminal law would not be applicable in certain of these instances of Art 3 treatment. Art 3, therefore, provides guarantees against various forms of maltreatment in police detention, which are not currently duplicated in domestic statutory provisions, although the guarantees are limited since Art 3 demands that such maltreatment should be of a high level of severity. In so far as certain conditions of detention are relevant, domestic law currently reflects its guarantees in Code C alone. For example, the conduct of intimate searches is governed by s 55 of PACE, but its provisions are fleshed out in Annex A of Code C. Strip searches, as opposed to intimate searches, are covered only by part B of Annex A to Code C. The use of force to conduct them is authorised by s 117 of PACE.⁵¹⁶ The provisions governing the conditions of detention mentioned in the Greek case arise only in Code C, paras 8 and 9. Provisions in Code C, para 8 regarding the use of restraints, including handcuffs, in cells might be viewed as intended to ensure that Art 3 is not infringed.

510 There were 'unexpected changes' in the membership of the court, the hearing was brief; most importantly, there was a failure to adduce and discuss evidence orally in the accused's presence.

511 See pp 909–14.

512 A 280-A (1994) Com Rep.

513 12 YB 1 (1969) Com Rep.

514 East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76. See also Lustig-Prean and Beckett v UK (1999) 29 EHRR 548, and Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493, which suggested that grossly humiliating, intrusive interrogation could, if of an extreme and prolonged nature, amount to a breach of Art 3 (discussed below, pp 853–54).

515 In McFeeley v UK (1980) 20 DR 44, intimate body searches in a terrorist context did not give rise to a breach of Art 3, but it has been suggested (see Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op cit, fn 229, p 83) that this finding might not apply in a non-terrorist context.

516 Clearly, criminal law applicable to indecent assault would not be applicable where the search was properly authorised.

Bearing in mind the quasi-legal status of the Codes, such provisions might be afforded, indirectly, a higher status because of their role in relation to Art 3, under s 6 of the HRA.⁵¹⁷

Assuming that the treatment arguably falls within Art 3, the burden of proof on the detainee is affected, following the decisions in *Tomasi v France*⁵¹⁸ and Aksoy v Turkey.⁵¹⁹ Once the detainee has shown that he was free of the injury or harm in question before arrest, the State will then bear the burden of providing a plausible explanation for it which is consistent with the evidence. If it does not do so, the domestic court should assume that the injuries in question were caused in the manner alleged by the complainant. It may be noted in this context that allegations of ill-treatment in police custody have recently raised grave concerns⁵²⁰ which may now be addressed by the use of Art 3 in actions directly against the police under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA.

Oppressive and intrusive questioning

As indicated above, PACE and the TA make no provisions as regards interviewing techniques, and Code C of PACE hardly touches on this matter, except to forbid oppressive interviewing in para 11.3 and to give some very general guidance as to interviewing mentally disordered or handicapped suspects. No such provisions are duplicated in PACE itself although, as indicated above, oppression is defined under s 76(8) as including Art 3 treatment, and under s 76(2)(a) a confession obtained by oppression is subject to an absolute exclusionary rule. On its face, the Convention does not bear upon this issue, except in so far as Art 3 covers oppressive interviewing. But, as indicated above, the general requirements of fairness under Art 6 will allow consideration of interviewing techniques as part of the fairness of the criminal process as a whole. Arguments could also be raised regarding unethical, intrusive interviewing techniques under Arts 3,8 and 14.

Articles 3, 8 and 14 might be engaged where the interrogation itself was of an especially intrusive nature, particularly where it could also be said to be discriminatory. Grossly humiliating treatment may breach Art 3, and this might include very intrusive, prolonged questioning. Where such questioning was accompanied by racist, sexist⁵²¹ or homophobic abuse, a breach might be found of Art 3 read with Art 14. Article 8 could also be considered where the questioning dealt, for example, with sexual matters. These possibilities were considered in Lustig-Prean and Beckett v UK and *Smith and Grady v UK*⁵²² in the context of an investigation by service police concerning their homosexuality, but by analogy, the findings of 517 See above, pp 757–58.

518 A241-A(1992).

519 (1996) 23 EHRR 553. These decisions should also be taken into account where treatment in police custody results in death, engaging Art 2. See Chapter 14, p 923.

520 See the Report of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, based on a visit carried out from 8–17 September 1999. See also the Butler Report, 1998. Inter alia, the Report covers the case of Derek Treadaway (pp 37–38). He alleged that he had suffered ill-treatment, possibly amounting to torture, in police custody, and successfully sought judicial review (31 July 1997) of the decision of the CPS not to prosecute the officers involved. For relevant Convention jurisprudence, see above, Chapter 2, pp 44–45.

521 East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76.

522 (1999) 29 EHRR 548, and (2000) 29 EHRR 493.

the court would appear to be applicable to police interviewing in certain circumstances. The Court considered the investigations, and in particular the interviews of the applicants, to have been exceptionally intrusive and to constitute especially grave interferences with their private lives, which could not be justified within the meaning of Art 8(2). It considered that treatment grounded upon a predisposed homophobic bias, as in the present case, could, in principle, fall within the scope of Art 3 and that the investigations were undoubtedly distressing and humiliating, but that in the circumstances of the case, the treatment did not reach the minimum level of severity which would bring it within the scope of Art 3. Having found a breach of Art 8, the court did not go on to consider Art 14 as a separate issue.

The failure to regulate interviewing techniques is a significant gap in the PACE and TA schemes, bearing in mind the established likelihood of a link between coercive questioning and unreliable confessions.⁵²³ Although there has been a movement from such questioning towards so called ethical techniques,⁵²⁴ it cannot be assumed that interviewing will not at times verge on the oppressive and abusive. Use of Art 8 as in Lustig-Prean may encourage a movement towards ethical interviewing and provide an avenue by which to challenge humiliating, discriminatory questioning under the HRA. As discussed above, the Race Relations Act 1976, after amendment in 2000, provides a means of redress in respect of racial abuse or racially discriminatory treatment by police, which will also cover interviewing. But, this possibility does not exist in respect of other forms of discriminatory treatment, including treatment which is gender-related or homophobic.⁵²⁵

Freedom from self-incrimination and the presumption of innocence

Article 6 of the Convention contrasts with Art 14(3) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and with Art 34(1) of the South African Bill of Rights in that it does not expressly forbid using compulsion to obtain confessions.⁵²⁶ The expectation under Art 6(2) that the State bears the burden of establishing guilt impliedly requires that the accused should not be expected to provide involuntary assistance by way of a confession. Thus, the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2) is closely linked to the right to freedom from self-incrimination which the Court has found to be covered by the right to a fair hearing under Art 6(1).⁵²⁷

Article 6(2) further impliedly requires that when carrying out their duties, members of a court should not start with the preconceived idea that the accused has committed the offence charged; the burden of proof is on the prosecution, and any doubt should benefit the accused. These matters are at issue when silence under 523 See Justice, Unreliable Evidence? Confessions and the Safety of Convictions, 1994.

524 Home Office Central Planning and Training Unit, The Interviewer's Rule Book, 1992; Home Office Circular 7/1993 'Investigative interviewing'.

525 The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 has not been amended in the same way as the Race Relations Act (under the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000) and therefore will not cover the actions of public authorities except in the contexts covered by s 6 of the Act. At present, no statute forbids discriminatory treatment on grounds of sexual orientation. Bearing in mind the 'dualist' impact of international law in the UK, this means that Protocol 12 (see Chapter 2, p 85) may not provide a remedy for such treatment domestically, even if it is received into domestic law under the HRA. See further Chapter 16, p 985.

526 It may be noted that the UN Human Rights Committee has already expressed concerns regarding the compatibility of the CJPOA 1994, ss 34, 36 and 37 with Art 14(3).

527 Funke v France (1993) 16 EHRR 297.

interrogation by law enforcement bodies is penalised by a formal penalty or by drawing adverse inferences from it. The Court has drawn a distinction between these matters, although it recognised in *Murray (John) v UK*⁵²⁸ that they were not entirely distinct, since adverse inference-drawing is clearly a form of penalty; it was termed 'indirect compulsion'.

It is possible that curtailment of the right to silence under ss 34, 36 or 37 of the CJPOA 1994 may, depending on the particular circumstances of a case, lead to a breach of Art 6 on the basis that it infringes the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2) and the right to freedom from self-incrimination.⁵²⁹ Consideration of the judgments in *Saunders v UK*⁵³⁰ and Murray (John) v UK reveals that it is only where a penalty formally attaches to silence, and the interview may then be used in evidence, that a breach of Art 6 is almost bound to be established, but that where adverse inferences can be drawn from the silence at trial, a breach may be established, taking into account the question whether the suspect has had access to legal advice. Saunders v UK concerned the sanction for refusing to answer questions in serious fraud investigations under s 437 of the Companies Act 1985. Acting under s 437, Inspectors of the Department of Trade and Industry had interviewed Saunders regarding allegations of fraud. He was forced to answer the questions put to him and therefore lost his privilege against self-incrimination, which he argued was unfair and amounted to an abuse of process. The interviews were admitted in evidence under s 431(5) of the Companies Act and he was convicted.⁵³¹ The Strasbourg Court found that the applicant's right to freedom from self-incrimination under Art 6(1) had been infringed due to the threatened imposition of a penalty for remaining silent and the subsequent admission of the interviews into evidence. This finding was based on the special compulsive regime applicable to Department of Trade and Industry inspections, but the key issue was the use made of the material obtained in court.

The decision in *Murray (John) v UK*⁵³² may be contrasted with that in Saunders since it suggests that, depending on the circumstances of a case, Art 6 takes a different stance towards imposing a formal penalty on silence and drawing adverse inferences from it. Murray was arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 and taken to the police station. A detective superintendent, pursuant to the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987, decided to delay access to a solicitor for 48 hours. While being interviewed, Murray repeatedly stated that he had 'nothing to say'. After he had seen his solicitor, he stated that he had been advised not to answer the questions. As indicated above, the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988 enables a court in any criminal trial to exercise discretion to draw adverse inferences from an accused's failure to mention a fact during police questioning. Such inferences were drawn from Murray's silence in the police interviews once the prosecution had established a prima facie case against him, and he was convicted. The Strasbourg Court emphasised that its decision was 528 (1996) 22 EHRR 29. For comment, see Munday [1996] Crim LR 370.

529 See the comments of the Court of Appeal in Birchall [1999] Crim LR 311; see also the study by Bucke, op cit, fn 302.

530 (1997) 23 EHRR 313; Appl No 19187/91, Com Rep, paras 69–75.

531 His appeal on grounds of abuse of process and on the basis that the interviews should not have been admitted into evidence under s 78 was rejected: R v Saunders and Others [1996] 1 Cr App R 463.

532 (1996) 22 EHRR 29.

confined to the particular facts of the case in finding that no breach of Art 6(1) or (2) had occurred where adverse inferences had been drawn at trial from the applicant's refusal to give evidence, taking into account the degree of compulsion exerted on the applicant and the weight of the evidence against him. The Court placed emphasis on the fact that he had been able to remain silent; also, given the strength of the evidence against him, the matter of drawing inferences was one of common sense which could not be regarded as unfair.⁵³³ But, crucially, the Court did find that Art 6(1) and (3)(c) had been breached by the denial of custodial access to a lawyer for 48 hours since it found that such access was essential where there was a likelihood that adverse inferences would be drawn from silence. In effect, therefore, the Court adopted something close to an exchange abolitionist approach.⁵³⁴ The distinction it drew, impliedly, between direct and indirect compulsion flowing from the risk of adverse inference drawing and criminal penalties respectively was not explicated and rests, it is suggested, on doubtful premises.

The regime under the 1988 Order is, in essentials, the same as that under s 34 of the CJPOA, which may therefore be vulnerable to challenge under the HRA. As indicated, the findings in Murray were carefully confined to the particular facts of the case, and therefore must be treated with caution. But it is clear that the right to freedom from self-incrimination cannot be viewed as absolute. Drawing adverse inferences from silence in police interviewing does not necessarily breach Art 6(2), but the greater the reliance placed on such inferences at the trial, the greater the likelihood that a breach will occur. The Court said that it would be incompatible with Art 6(1) and (2) 'to base a conviction solely or mainly on the accused's silence or refusal to answer questions'. Under s 38(3) of the CJPOA, a conviction cannot be based 'solely' on silence. Art 6(1) and (2) might therefore be found to be breached in circumstances differing from those applicable in Murray, including those in which the evidence against the defendant was less overwhelming. A domestic judge would not satisfy Art 6 if he directed a jury that the drawing of adverse inferences could play a major part in a conviction. Further, in Murray, there was no jury: the case was decided by a 'Diplock' court. Therefore, the evidence was weighed up by a professional who had the expertise to determine how much weight to give to aspects of it, including the 'no comment' interviews.

Murray makes it clear that drawing adverse inferences from silence when the defendant had not had access to legal advice prior to the failure to reply to questioning will breach Art 6. As indicated above, s 58 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act addressed that finding by inserting s 34(2A) into the CJPOA. But it need not be assumed, conversely, that Art 6 will necessarily be satisfied where a defendant has had such access prior to that point. Cases such as Condrón or Bowden (above), where the defendants had had legal advice and had acted on it in remaining silent, should be considered on their particular facts, in relation to the Art 6 requirements. Such cases differ from Murray on the issue of the relationship between silence and legal advice. In Condrón the defendants acted on legal advice in refusing to answer questions; in Murray a breach of Art 6(1) was found on the basis of inference-drawing in the absence of legal advice (not on the basis of inference-drawing per se). In Condrón, the fact of having legal advice was not to the defendants' advantage, possibly the reverse, since in a sense they may have been misled into remaining silent. It is arguable that allowing adverse inferences to be drawn in that context—where the innocent explanation for silence was that it was on legal advice—could in certain circumstances be viewed as a breach of Art 6(1). For example, this might be argued where the advisor had failed to point out that adverse inferences might be drawn despite the advice and/or where the defendant could not be expected—due to his or her low intelligence, youth or other vulnerability—to decide to speak despite the advice. To hold otherwise might be viewed as undermining the value attached in Murray to granting access to legal advice where adverse inferences would be drawn from silence.⁵³⁵ The principle from Murray clearly rests impliedly on the value of such advice, which the domestic decision in Condrón appears to undermine. The possibility, therefore, arises that even where a suspect has had access to legal advice before taking a decision to remain silent, there may be circumstances, such as those arising in Condrón, in which the jury should be directed that no adverse inferences should be drawn, or the interview should be excluded from evidence under s 78 if Art 6 is not to be breached.

533 Paragraph 54.

534 See Greer, op cit, fn 440.

It was found at Strasbourg that the applicants in *Condrón v UK*⁵³⁶ had failed to receive a fair trial under Art 6 on the basis that the appeal court should not have found that the conviction was safe, despite the erroneous direction of the judge to the jury. Since the Court could not know what part the drawing of adverse inferences played in the jury's decision, it should have allowed the appeal. That decision impliedly confirms that juries should be directed that they should not draw adverse inferences where they consider that there was a sound reason for advising silence. The decision affects the role of the Court of Appeal; it does not give guidance on, inter alia, the question when a no comment interview, based on legal advice, should be excluded from evidence, or as to the reasons which might be viewed as sound for advising a suspect to remain silent.

At present, therefore, the circumstances in which adverse inference drawing will amount to a breach of Art 6 remain uncertain,⁵³⁷ except in the instance in which access to legal advice is also denied. In that instance under s 34(2A) of the CJPOA, no inferences may be drawn from silence. It is notable that s 34(2A) does not provide that such a silence will be inadmissible. Informal inference drawing, which appeared to occur prior to the introduction of ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA, could therefore still occur. Further, s 34(2A) of the CJPOA does not cover the defendant who has not had legal advice but makes admissions in response to the new caution or (prima facie) the defendant who fails to obtain advice, although no formal denial occurs. These very significant matters are discussed further below.

As *Saunders v UK*⁵³⁸ establishes, the use of formal coercion to obtain statements from persons will clearly be incompatible with Art 6 if the statement is then used against him or her in criminal proceedings. In *R v Staines; R v Morrisey*⁵³⁹ the Court 535 It may be noted that such a finding would involve a departure from the current position under UK law as set out in Condrón [1997] 1 Cr App R 185 and confirmed in Bowden (1999) The Times, 25 February.

536 [2001] 31 EHRR 1, Appl No 35718/97; [2000] Crim LR 679.

537 See further Birch, D, 'Suffering in silence: a cost-benefit analysis of s 34 of the CJPOA' [1999] Crim LR 769.

538 (1997) 23 EHRR 313; Appl No 19187/91, Com Rep, paras 69–75.

539 [1997] 2 Cr App R 426.

of Appeal refused, despite the judgment in Saunders, to overturn a conviction although the trial judge had refused to exclude evidence under s 78 of PACE obtained in a similar manner to that adopted in Saunders. In the post-HRA era, such a response would not appear to satisfy the duty of the court under s 6 of the HRA or the interpretative obligation of the judiciary under s 3. As indicated above, a large number of statutes contain provisions broadly equivalent to the provisions of the Companies Act 1985 which were at issue in Saunders. The Attorney General has issued guidance to prosecutors with a view to ensuring that evidence gained under a number of those provisions should not be used in criminal proceedings. This issue may not, therefore, arise at present under certain of these statutory provisions—a significant instance in which primary legislation was rendered nugatory even before the HRA was in force. This matter was placed on a statutory basis in s 59 and Sched 3 of the 1999 Act. Schedule 3 lists the statutory provisions mentioned above,⁵⁴⁰ apart from s 172 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, and provides that the coerced statements will be inadmissible.

Nevertheless, the Government appears to envisage that certain very significant statutory provisions allowing for coercion, including a number arising under the Terrorism Act 2000, will be used in the post-HRA era. Section 172 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 makes it an offence for motorists not to tell police who was driving their vehicle at the time of an alleged offence. The coerced statement can then be used in evidence at trial for the RTA offence in question. The provision clearly contravenes the right against self-incrimination, and this was found to be the case in Scotland in *Stott v Brown*⁵⁴¹ during the period of time when the Convention was in force in Scotland, but not in England.⁵⁴² The defendant encountered the police officers after parking her car and was suspected of driving while intoxicated; she was asked under s 172 to reveal the name of the person driving the car at the relevant time. On pain of the penalty under s 172 she did so, revealing that she had been driving, and was convicted of driving while intoxicated, after the coerced statement was admitted into evidence. Her conviction was overturned on appeal owing to the finding that s 172 contravened Art 6. The ruling of the Edinburgh High Court is of interest since the court rendered s 172, effectively, nugatory. This stance was taken on the basis of the requirements of the Scotland Act, which differ from those of s 6 of the HRA since they do not include the possibility envisaged under s 6(2)(b) that the authority was 'acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions [of incompatible primary legislation]'.⁵⁴³

As Chapter 4 explained, the ruling of the Edinburgh High Court was overturned by the Privy Council: Brown v Stott.⁵⁴³ The Privy Council did not find it necessary to declare that s 172 is incompatible with Art 6(1) or (2). They reached the decision that the two were compatible, despite the findings in Saunders v UK, on the basis that the requirements of Art 6 admit of implied restriction. The restriction, Lord Hope said, must have a legitimate aim in the public interest. It was found that this was the case, bearing in mind the need to promote road safety. If so, he went on to

540 See pp 846–47.

541 2000 SLT 379; see [2000] J CIV LIB 193.

542 The Convention rights were brought into force in Scotland under the Scotland Act 1998, s 57(2).

543 [2001] 2 WLR 817. See Chapter 4, pp 144–45.

544 See, above, p 144.

ask, 'is there a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised?'⁵⁴⁴ He found that the answer to the question, in terms of limiting the right not to incriminate oneself under Art 6(1), was in the affirmative since the section demands a response to a single question, and does not allow prolonged questioning, as in Saunders.

The decision in Brown rested on the finding that coercing a statement from the defendant was not a disproportionate response to the legitimate aim of seeking to address the problem of road safety. However, it is arguable that it re-opens the whole question of the compatibility of penalising silence in other contexts. If it can be argued that the requirement of s 172 is in proportion to the problem it seeks to address, it might be argued equally that where the legitimate aim in question is even more pressing, as in the case of combating terrorism, a more intrusive provision, allowing for more prolonged questioning, could be viewed as a proportionate legislative response.

Therefore, it can no longer be said with certainty that the decision in Saunders v UK calls into question the provisions allowing a limited use of coerced statements in evidence in terrorist investigations under Sched 5, paras 13 and 16 of the TA. Such statements may be admitted into evidence in order to convict of the offence under para 14 of making a statement which the defendant knows to be false or misleading in a material particular, or as to which he is reckless, in purported compliance with an order under para 13. Clearly, a misleading statement might not be made but for the pressure flowing from the penalties which para 13 and, to a greater extent, para 16, carry. Nevertheless, it is now debatable whether the possibility of admitting the statement is incompatible with the right against self-incrimination.

Further, despite the evident attempt in paras 13 and 16 to achieve Convention compliance, bearing Saunders in mind, the possibility of incompatibility remains, taking into account the broader implications of fairness in the trial as a whole under Art 6(1). If someone other than the person who had made the coerced statement was on trial and the prosecution wished to admit the statement in evidence, argument could be raised as to the fairness of so doing, bearing in mind the fact that the statement could not be used against its maker.⁵⁴⁵ The issue of the fairness of the trial as a whole⁵⁴⁶ could also be raised where the statement had influenced the prosecution or enabled the police to obtain evidence, since it could be argued that the statement had had an indirect impact in undermining the right against self-incrimination. Admittedly, there are precedents in current UK law for basing a prosecution on evidence uncovered in reliance on information from statements which are themselves inadmissible.⁵⁴⁷ However, each of those precedents will need to be tested against Art 6 standards, taking into account all the circumstances applicable in an individual case.

The further question is whether Art 6 might be breached in an instance in which 545 Analogy might be drawn with Rowe and Davis v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 1, in which statements made by accomplices were used against the accused, although the statements had been extracted on the basis of promise of immunity from prosecution and financial reward. These matters, which did not come to light at the trial, owing to the use of PII certificates, led the Court to find that the accused had not had a fair trial, in breach of Art 6.

546 The concept of the fairness of the trial taken as a whole was developed in Barbéra, Messegué and Jabardo, A 14 6(2)(1989).

547 PACE 1984, s 76(4). Impliedly under the Interception of Communications Act 1985, s 9.

a silence in response to the threat of penalties under the paragraphs in question was admitted in respect of one of the other offences under Sched 5, or indeed any other offence. Brown and Saunders do not expressly address the question whether the admission into evidence of a no-comment interview (as opposed to admissions) in response to formal coercion would breach Art 6. Obviously, a situation can be envisaged in which the accused might decide to risk the imposition of the penalty in question. The prosecution might then put forward the interview in evidence for the purpose of drawing adverse inferences from it. On one view, the case for drawing such inferences might be strengthened on the argument that if the accused is prepared to risk the imposition of the penalty in question, he must have something very significant to hide. But equally, it might be argued that a vulnerable defendant who did not have legal advice (as a result of factors other than its formal denial) had made no comment, perhaps due to fear of retaliation from the real perpetrator of the offence. Such situations appear to fall more within the ruling from Murray than within that from Saunders; therefore, the factors identified here as relevant to arguments based on Murray would be applicable.

Section 89(2) of the TA, applicable only in Northern Ireland, raises similar issues. Section 89(2) provides that it is an offence punishable by a fine to refuse to answer a question asked during a stop or to answer it inadequately, failing to answer 'to the best of his knowledge and ability'. Evidence obtained under s 89 can be used to convict of the s 89 offence itself; further, the TA does not expressly provide that it cannot be used in respect of other TA offences, although in practice it would be unlikely that it would be so used, owing to the incompatibility of so doing with Art 6(1) and (2).

It may be noted that the PACE Code C provisions, paras 10.1 and 10.5C, which envisage the possibility of coercion under the statutory provisions mentioned, and make provision for it, may also be incompatible with Art 6. Paragraph 10.1 provides that there is no need to caution if information is to be obtained under a 'relevant statutory requirement', while para 10.5C provides that the suspect should be informed of the consequences of failing to co-operate in the interview, regardless of the caution, where a statutory requirement to provide information applies and may render him liable to conviction for an offence or arrest. These provisions should therefore have been omitted or modified in the 1999 revision of the Codes. As they stand, the relevant parts of the paragraphs appear to amount to incompatible subordinate legislation which can simply be rendered invalid, if necessary, under the HRA since, although they reflect primary legislation, it cannot be said that such legislation 'prevents the removal of the incompatibility'.⁵⁴⁸

Custodial access to legal advice

Article 6(3)(c) provides that everyone charged with a criminal offence has the right to defend himself through legal assistance of his own choosing.⁵⁴⁹ Access to legal advice in pre-trial questioning, as opposed to such access for the purposes of the trial, is not expressly provided for in Art 6. However, some protection for such 548 See HRA 1998, s 3(2)(c).

549 See Chapter 2, pp 63–64.

access can be implied into Art 6(1) and 6(3)(c). Where a violation of Art 6 is claimed in respect of a lack of access to legal advice in pre-trial questioning, a breach of both paras (1) and (3) will be in question.

The judgment in *Imbrioscia v Switzerland*⁵⁵⁰ suggests that if either the accused or his lawyer requests that the latter should be present in pre-trial questioning, this should be allowed if the answers to questions would be likely to prejudice the defence; the ruling may be applicable to police interviews. As explained above, the Court went further than this in *Murray (John) v UK*⁵⁵¹ in finding that Art 6(1) and (3)(c) had been breached by the denial of custodial access to a lawyer for 48 hours, since such access was essential where there was a likelihood that adverse inferences would be drawn from silence. It found that Art 6 would normally require that the accused should be allowed to benefit from the assistance of a lawyer in the initial stages of police interrogation, although that right might be subject to restrictions for good cause.

In Averill v UK,⁵⁵² the applicant was denied access to a solicitor during the first 24 hours of interrogation; he was then allowed to consult a solicitor, but the solicitor was not allowed to be present during subsequent interviews. The provisions governing access to a solicitor were contained in s 45 of the EPA 1991. Adverse inferences were drawn from his silence at trial under Art 3 of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988. The Court found that no breach of Art 6(1) had occurred; he had been subject to ‘indirect compulsion’, but that in itself was not decisive.⁵⁵³ The drawing of adverse inferences, it was found, did not render the trial unfair since the presence of incriminating fibres found on his clothing called for an explanation from him. Further, the drawing of adverse inferences was only one factor in the finding that the charges were proved. However, the Court did find a breach of Art 6(3)(c) read with Art 6(1) on the basis—which it noted in Murray—that, bearing in mind the scheme contained in the 1998 Order, it is of ‘paramount importance for the rights of the defence that an accused has access to a lawyer at the initial stages of police interrogation’.⁵⁵⁴ This is because, under the scheme, the accused is confronted with a dilemma from the outset. If he remains silent, adverse inferences may be drawn. If he breaks his silence, his defence may be prejudiced. In order to deal with this dilemma, legal advice is needed at the initial stages of the interrogation.

Bearing in mind the scheme under ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA, which is similar to the scheme under the 1988 Order, the findings in Murray and Averill cover most or all police interviews under caution, since once the caution has been given, it is clear that adverse inferences may be drawn from silence. Thus, a right of access to legal advice in custodial questioning may be implied into Art 6(3)(c) when read with Art 6(1) where the drawing of adverse inferences is a relevant issue.

Such a right is already catered for, under s 58 of PACE and Sched 8, para 7 of the TA, but the formal and informal loopholes in the access discussed above appear not to accord with the requirements of Art 6(3)(c) in conjunction with Art 6(1) as 550 (1993) 17 EHRR 441; A 275 (1993).

551 (1996) 22 EHRR 29.

552 (2001) 31 EHRR 36; (2000) The Times, 20 June. See also Magee v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 35; (2000) The Times, 20 June.

553 Paragraph 48.

554 Paragraph 59.

interpreted in Murray and Averill. Clearly, s 34(2A) of the CJPOA, which was introduced in response to Murray, caters for this situation, but only to an extent.

Where access to legal advice has formally been delayed, and the suspect has stayed silent, s 34(2A) will not allow the drawing of adverse inferences. In such an instance, there would be no need to rely on arguments raised under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA. But, where access to legal advice has formally been delayed, particularly in the case of terrorist suspects, who can be denied access for up to 48 hours, and the suspect has not stayed silent, the grounds for denial will have to be subjected to strict scrutiny in the light of the requirements of Art 6. In particular, the good cause for the delay in obtaining advice required by Murray may not be satisfied by the grounds for proceeding with the interview, although advice has not been obtained under Code C, para 6, which includes the vague and broad test: where 'awaiting [the arrival of the solicitor] would cause unreasonable delay to the process of the investigation'.

A further, separate issue arises in situations in which the suspect does not receive legal advice, but in which s 34(2A) would seem to allow the drawing of adverse inferences. Section 34(2A) does not apply to silences occurring in out of police station interviews (which will be prior to the point of notification of the availability of legal advice). It is suggested that the objections, based on Murray and Averill, to the drawing of adverse inferences from such silences cannot be fully met by the provision of para 11.2A of Code C to the effect that any significant silence or statement outside the police station should be put to the suspect at the beginning of an interview at the police station. In such out of station interviews, the dilemma mentioned by the Court of Human Rights arises since the suspect should be under caution and therefore formally aware of the dangers of remaining silent. Street interviews or exchanges, of necessity without advice, may have an impact on later interviews even where para 11.2A is adhered to. In the light of these comments, it is perhaps surprising that the revision of Code C in 1999 did not respond to Murray by modifying paras 11.1, 11.1 A, 11.13 and 3.1 which provide leeway for interviews to occur outside the police station without notification that access to legal advice is available.

A further significant question is whether Art 6 might be breached where legal advice is not formally denied to the defendant for a period of time, as in Murray, although he has not in fact received advice before being interviewed. This argument might be raised where a suspect has been influenced by police ploys in failing to obtain advice (whether due to inadequacies in the informing procedure or to direct or more subtle persuasion). The admission of a subsequent interview might be viewed as affecting the fairness of the trial, following Murray. This argument would be strongest where other adverse factors were also present, including a confession made after 24 hours or more in detention, or where the inexperienced, young, emotionally unstable or educationally sub-normal suspect could not be expected to make his or her own assessment as to the value of having legal advice and was therefore very vulnerable to police suggestions.

If Art 6 is concerned with the objective reliability of the interview in influencing the integrity and fairness of the trial, it can be argued that, unless the defendant made a clear, positive (albeit possibly misguided) decision not to have custodial advice, the admission into evidence of an interview under caution without such advice, whatever the reason for the failure, might affect the fairness of the trial. It is unclear that the fact that a vulnerable defendant (for example, on the verge of mental handicap) had waived advice or had received brief telephone advice only, would be relevant where it could be said that the trial, objectively speaking, might be rendered unfair by the admission of the interview. Similar arguments could perhaps also be raised where the advisor attends the station but the advice obtained is clearly inadequate. When the Strasbourg Court spoke of the need for legal advice where adverse inferences were to be drawn from silence, it may be suggested that it had in mind—taking into account the general need for the rights to be genuinely efficacious, not illusory—the notion of sound, adversarial advice.

It may finally be pointed out that there seems to be no reason in principle to confine the findings in Murray and Averill to a circumstance where the defendant in fact stayed silent. Rather, as the Court implied, it may be that the suspect who fails to remain silent is most in need of legal advice.⁵⁵⁵

Clearly, there will be uncertainty for a time as to the extent of the application of Murray to police interviews without advice, but the central point is clear: under the current domestic provisions there are instances when suspects will be interviewed in the knowledge that adverse inferences may be drawn from silence, but access to legal advice will not be available, although not formally denied. As Chapter 14 will point out, the Court in *Teixeira de Castro v Portugal*⁵⁵⁶ found that certain pre-trial procedures render a fair trial almost impossible and therefore curb the discretion of the court in its response.⁵⁵⁷ This finding was not made in the context of custodial legal advice but, together with the findings in Murray, could be applied to s 78 of PACE, in support of an argument that the exclusionary discretion embodied under the section may be narrowed almost to vanishing point where no access to legal advice was made available before or during the police interview which is proffered in evidence (possibly even if the lack of access was not due to a clear breach of statutory or Code provisions), although the suspect was aware that adverse inferences might be drawn from silence.⁵⁵⁸ There would be a strong argument that such an interview should be excluded from evidence under s 78, following Murray, since otherwise Art 6 would not appear to be satisfied. Failing to do so would appear to breach the duty of the judiciary under s 6 of the HRA to abide by Art 6 and would arguably also fail to render s 78 compatible with Art 6(1) and 3(c).

An argument similar to this one did not receive much encouragement in one of the early decisions on the HRA, from Scotland.⁵⁵⁹ In Paton v Procurator Fiscal,⁵⁶⁰ the appellant was to be interviewed about attempted theft and at the police station he indicated that he wanted a solicitor to be informed of his detention. When he was 555 See further on this point Bucke, op cit, fn 302.

556 (1998) 28 EHHR 101.

557 Ibid, pp 904–06.

558 Under PACE 1984, Code C, this would include all interviews since, as indicated above, under para 11.1. A the definition of an interview is an exchange regarding involvement in criminal activity which is required to be under caution.

559 By virtue of the Scotland Act 1998, s 57(2), a Scottish court is required, inter alia, to take into account the various rights enshrined in the Convention. At the time, the Human Rights Act itself was not fully in force in Scotland.

560 Judgment of 24 November 1999 (unreported).

561 He was charged with attempting to break into premises with intent to steal and, in the alternative, that he was found at premises without lawful authority, the inference being that he might commit theft contrary to the Civil Government (Scotland) Act 1982, s 57(1).

interviewed, his solicitor was not present and he was not told that the police had a discretion to allow his solicitor to be present during the interview if he so wished. After caution, the appellant admitted that he was trying to break into the premises in question. When the charges were recited,⁵⁶¹ the appellant said that he had been merely passing by when the police chased him. The appellant argued that Art 6(1) and 6(3)(c) of the Convention had been contravened. The court took into account the fact that the appellant had not made a request for his solicitor to be present and that neither Scottish law nor the Convention required that in all cases a detained person should be afforded the opportunity to have a solicitor present. The court found that the question whether a fair trial could be achieved depended not simply upon what happened during the preliminary investigation, but on the whole proceedings, and a number of safeguards were accorded to the accused during the investigation and the trial process; on this basis, the appeal was refused and the case was remitted to the sheriff to proceed to trial. These findings do not appear to encourage the notion that certain rights, such as access to custodial legal advice, are of especial constitutional significance; they encourage a broad brush approach which appears to assume that a breach of suspects' rights may be cured by affording other rights. However, these findings may be based on the lack of a right to have a solicitor present in interview in Scotland and, it is suggested, on a doubtful, minimalist interpretation of Art 6.

It is notable that s 109 of the TA (formerly ss 2A(4)(b) and 2A(5)(b) of the PTA) constitutes a response to the findings in Murray similar to that under s 58 of the 1999 Act, since consultation with a legal advisor is essential if adverse inferences are to be drawn from silence. These two instances in which Convention compliance has been ensured by Parliament might encourage the courts to consider exclusion of the interview where a suspect who had not had legal advice had remained silent, or to make a finding that no adverse inferences should be drawn from the silence. Apart from the duty of courts under s 6, a further route to such a finding would mean interpreting the term 'circumstances' in ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA strictly to include a failure to have access to legal advice. The phrase 'had not been allowed to consult a solicitor' in s 58 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 could also be construed broadly to cover informal denials or even informal encouragement to forgo advice. This would depend on how flexible judges and magistrates are prepared to be in respect of their interpretative obligation under s 3 of the HRA.

It is clear that the courts have the opportunity, if they are prepared to take an activist line in giving a wide interpretation to Murray, to curb the formally allowed and informally developed police discretion in affording access to legal advice which this chapter has discussed. Eventually, Code C may have to be revised to allow for notification of advice on caution, to clarify the provisions allowing for delays in access and to require a positive decision to refuse advice. Further moves towards improving the quality of advice may have to be undertaken.

REDRESS FOR POLICE MALPRACTICE

1 INTRODUCTION¹

Chapter 13 was concerned with the question of the balance to be struck between the exercise of powers by the police in conducting an investigation on the one hand and safeguards for the suspect against abuse of power on the other. As we have seen, the statutory rules, including in particular those under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 (CJPOA), the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP) and the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA) contain, on the one hand, provisions intended to secure suspects' rights, such as s 58 of PACE and Sched 8, para 7 of the TA, while on the other they create or extend a statutory basis for the exercise of police powers, which frequently enhances those powers.² Thus, the rules can be viewed as reflecting two different models—those of crime control and due process—and since the approach and aims of those models is conflicting, the statutes in question and their application in practice reflect the resulting inevitable tension. This may be said even of new provisions which appear to be intended, fairly obviously, to enhance police powers, such as ss 50 and 51 of the CJP. These provisions provide, as Chapters 11 and 13 indicated, new powers of seizure during searches of people or of premises. But they are 'balanced' by the provisions of ss 52–61 which, while affording new powers of retention of property seized a clear statutory basis, also provide for notice to persons whose property has been seized, and safeguard its use by various provisions.³ It is not suggested that the balance struck is satisfactory, but it is clear that, although these CJP provisions are very much orientated towards crime control, they are limited by provisions reflecting due process concerns.

Thus, the relevant statutory provisions declare that certain standards for the conduct of criminal and terrorist investigations must be maintained; a complex, not to say cumbersome, domestic scheme is currently in place, part of it post-dating the Human Rights Act (HRA), creating such standards. Under the European Convention on Human Rights, another scheme setting standards for criminal justice is apparent. Clearly, the two schemes are very different. Not only is the domestic scheme far more detailed, they have different starting points. One—the domestic scheme—essentially sets out police powers and then provides for restrictions on them. The other—the Convention—sets out fundamental rights and then, in the case of the right to liberty under Art 5, the guarantees of a fair trial under Art 6 and the right to be free of torture, inhuman or degrading treatment under Art 3, leaves them unqualified or not materially qualified. Only Art 5 could be said to create exceptions which correspond to aspects of domestic police powers. Nevertheless, it can be said at a high level of generality that both schemes set standards for administering criminal justice. As explored in Chapter 13, the standards of the domestic scheme and those recognised under the Convention are not necessarily the same. Each scheme does two things—it sets certain standards for crime control and for suspects' rights; it then provides that there should be a means of redress if the standards are breached. The domestic scheme goes on to prescribe the remedies that should then be offered. In other words, it makes—as of course it has to—substantive choices, while as far as remedies are concerned, the international scheme confines itself to a procedural account.

1 Reading: Maher, G, A Theory of Criminal Process, 2000; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1st edn, 1993, Chapters 5 and 9; Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 2nd edn, 2000; McConville, M, Sanders, A and Leng, R, The Case for the Prosecution, 1991; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 4th edn, 1995, Chapter 2; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 3rd edn, 1995; Lidstone, K and Palmer, C, The Investigation of Crime, 2nd edn, 1996; Reiner, R and Leigh, I, 'Police powers', in McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds), Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994; Klug, F, Starmer, K and Weir, S, The Three Pillars of Liberty: Political Rights and Freedoms in the UK, 1996; Sharpe, S, Judicial Discretion and Criminal Investigations, 1998; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2000, Chapter 11. See also Nobles, R and Schiff, D, Criminal Appeals and the HRA.

2 Such as PACE 1984, s 25 and TA, s 41.

3 Including the duty to secure the property arising under s 61 by preventing, inter alia, copying of it.

The HRA brings the two schemes into juxtaposition, or perhaps confrontation, and demands under s 3(1) that, in so far as the domestic scheme is statute-based, it should, if interpretation will so allow, be compatible with the requirements of the other. The HRA also demands, under s 6, that each person or body administering the domestic scheme should, unless primary legislation using very clear words provides otherwise, abide by the Convention rights. It is not enough, it is contended, if the police do not adhere to the Convention but their mistakes (unlawful actions) are men 'rectified' in court so that in their entirety the pre-trial and trial process ultimately so adheres. Each actor in it should (since all are public authorities) adhere to the Convention in their own actions and decisions. Thus, although in practice a court may use the methods available to it to seek to ensure that despite such mistakes, the proceedings as a whole comply with Art 6, a remedy should still be available in respect of the failure of the police.

It may be said, then, that the HRA provides mechanisms for asking, first, whether the standards expressed by the domestic scheme are in conformity with the Convention rights. This was the question addressed by Chapter 13. Secondly, it ensures that the question is asked whether the means of redress provided are in conformity with what the Convention demands in terms of an effective remedy. This question is addressed in this chapter. This latter question has two facets. It asks (a) if the domestic standards themselves are not in conformity, what can be done to rectify that by reliance on the Convention and the HRA, and (b) whether or not the standards are in conformity, if the police do not abide by the standards set out in the domestic scheme, does the Convention add anything to what can be done under the domestic provisions to provide redress? I will suggest that this latter question is the more interesting, since it is in respect of redress that the domestic scheme is the most lacking.

As this chapter will explain, there are five domestic methods of providing redress: complaints about the police; prosecutions of the police; civil actions, appeals and trial remedies; exclusion of evidence; and stays for abuse of process. However, police complaints and exclusion of evidence have not been found to provide an effective remedy for breaches of the Convention rights at Strasbourg.⁴ Civil actions (outwith s 7(1)(a) of the HRA) will provide such a remedy, but are not applicable to many breaches of the scheme. Stays for abuse of process are rarely used and would not be used in respect of some breaches of Convention rights—a matter that is explored below. Prosecutions are very rare and can only indirectly protect Convention rights.⁵ Typically, the question of redress may arise as follows: an investigation may not, at certain points, reach the standards set by the statutory scheme and it may at the same time breach one or more of the Convention rights. The police may sometimes feel hampered by all the PACE and Code provisions; they may feel, for example, that they are close to obtaining a confession from a detainee, but that in order to obtain it, they need to bend the interviewing rules a little. Similarly, police officers may purport to act within a power, such as the power to arrest or search premises, where no power to do so arises.

4 In Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310, paras 44–47.

In such circumstances, certain remedies are available: a civil action leading to an award of damages, if successful, or a complaint leading to disciplinary action against the officers involved, if upheld. However, as already noted, civil actions are not available for breach of the Codes and will be inapplicable to some breaches of PACE itself, such as improper denial of access to legal advice. Police disciplinary action is applicable to breaches of both PACE itself and the Codes, but at present it does not represent an effective remedy. Apart from these two remedies, a further means of redress exists, represented by the use of exclusion of evidence, and it is in this context that many breaches of PACE and the Codes have in fact been considered. Therefore, argument raised under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA is most likely to be raised in respect of exclusion of evidence. But, not only is such exclusion irrelevant in the vast majority of cases since the suspect will plead guilty, it too cannot be viewed as an effective remedy for breaches of Convention rights for reasons to be considered below, even where the case does come to trial. Possibly, it could be viewed as an effective remedy for breaches of the statutory and Code-based scheme itself that are not coterminous with breaches of the Convention.

Thus, s 7(1)(a) of the HRA fills a clear gap, since a remedy in damages for breach of Convention rights in the criminal justice system pre-trial is now available. If aspects of the domestic scheme, including Code provisions, are coterminous with the Convention rights, they have now received for the first time a remedial underpinning. However, that remedy may not be available in respect of some breaches of Art 6, including failures of access to custodial legal advice, since it might be assumed that the remedy would be provided in the trial itself.

The basis for this argument is that since Art 6 is concerned with the fairness of the trial, it only makes sense to consider the effect of a failure of such access within the context of the trial. It will be suggested below that this argument is flawed. But, assuming that it prevails, which is, in the author's view, likely, it can be said that even under the HRA there is no effective remedy domestically for breach of certain rights within the criminal justice system. This is a very serious matter, since the HRA should provide at least the same protection for rights as Strasbourg would.

The key contention of this chapter will therefore be that no sufficient or effective means of redress are available in respect of police abuse of power, although the 5 Since no criminal liability is created under the HRA 1998.

HRA will enhance the remedial scheme to an extent. Therefore, the safeguards considered in Chapter 13 are not fully underpinned by such a scheme. Clearly, even if such a scheme were available in the form, for example, of a fully independent police disciplinary system, police internal practices and culture would still have an impact on the delivery of the safeguards. But, as Chapter 13 argued, externally imposed rules can affect that culture.⁶ If the enforcement of those rules is weak, as this chapter contends, this impact on institutional practices is likely to be lessened.

This reading of the domestic and Convention provisions addresses significant matters, and is the main concern of this chapter, but alone it would be, it is suggested, inadequate. At the end of the chapter it will be possible to discern that the Convention under the HRA is quite likely, depending on the attitude of the judiciary, to have at least some impact in terms of reviving and reaffirming a concern for due process which has gradually been eroded. In other words, a return to those values expressed quite strongly by PACE and less so in the later legislation might become apparent in the HRA era. But such an account would not be influenced by a victim-orientated or feminist perspective. By concentrating only on due process concerns, such perspectives would be ignored. The implication would be that where a choice had to be made legislatively, judicially or executively (and the latter term, of course, includes the police themselves), the demands of due process and crime control would provide the parameters of the debate. But, adoption of such a gender-neutral stance would ignore the gendered impact of the decision which would then be made, as well as the impact on victims. Thus, this chapter will argue for a more developed conception of the criminal justice system, one that recognises the values of privacy and equality as well as those of due process.

2 EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE

Introduction: conflicting values

An example may illustrate the effect of exclusion of evidence. Assume that the police have arrested a man on suspicion of theft. They are fairly certain that he is guilty and think that they have a good chance of getting him to confess. However, he asks for legal advice. The police think that a solicitor may advise him not to answer some questions or may at least help him to withstand certain questioning techniques and so they tell him (untruthfully) that the duty solicitor is unavailable and that they might as well get on with the interview rather than prolong the process. They then question him for four hours without a break. Eventually, he succumbs to the pressure and makes a full confession to theft.

The police have breached PACE and Code C (s 58, paras 6.6 and 12.7); arguably, they have also breached a Convention right: Art 6(3)(c).⁷ The suspect does have a means of redress. He could seek to bring an action against the police under s 7(1)(a). He can also make a complaint, but whether he pursues these remedies or not, the flawed interrogation may continue to produce consequences for him: it may lead to a trial, a conviction and possibly imprisonment. He may, of course, decide to plead guilty. But if he pleads not guilty, his counsel may ask the judge at the trial not to admit the confession in evidence on the basis that the interrogation which produced it was conducted unfairly. The trial judge could then ensure that the original abuse of power on the part of the police produced no more consequences for the detainee. It may not lead to a conviction and imprisonment if the judge refuses to admit the confession in evidence (depending on any other evidence against the defendant). The judge can hold a voir dire (a trial within a trial) by sending out the jury and then hearing defence and prosecution submissions on admitting the confession. If it is not admitted, the jury will never know of its existence and will determine the case on the basis of any other available evidence. The judge is in a difficult position. On the one hand, it is apparent that the police have abused their powers; the judge does not want to condone such behaviour by admitting evidence gained thereby. On the other, the prosecution case may collapse and a possibly guilty man walk free from the court if the confession is excluded.

6 See above, p 754.

7 See Chapter 13, pp 860 et seq.

If the defendant did commit the theft, it might be said that the end in view—the conviction—justifies the means used to obtain it, but should the judge ignore the fact that the confession might not be before the court at all had the police complied with PACE and Code C? Should the judge merely consider the fate of one defendant in isolation? If the confession is admitted, the judge is in effect making a public declaration that the courts will not use their powers to uphold standards for police investigations. The result may be that in future, PACE standards are not adhered to and that occasionally, an innocent citizen is convicted after a false confession has been coerced from him. The multiplicity of issues raised by examples of this nature have provoked a long running debate among academics and lawyers as to the purpose of excluding evidence which has been obtained improperly, and a number of schools of thought have arisen advocating different principles on which evidence should be excluded. All are affected by the inception of the HRA, as indicated below.

The crime control position is that evidence should be excluded only if it appears to be unreliable, that is, in the case of a confession, false or inaccurately recorded.⁸ Taken to its logical conclusion, this would mean that if a true confession has been extracted by torture, it should nevertheless be admitted. This is argued on the basis that the function of a criminal court is to determine the truth of the charges against the accused, not to inquire into alleged improprieties on the part of the police. It is not equipped to conduct such an inquiry; therefore, if evidence is excluded on the basis that impropriety occurred in the investigation, the reputation of the police officer in question will be damaged after a less than full investigation into his conduct. Also, even if impropriety did occur in the investigation, this should not allow an obviously guilty defendant to walk freely from the court. On this argument, the court in admitting evidence obtained by improper methods is not condoning them. It is acknowledging that it is not within its function to inquire into them.

It is suggested that in so far as this position reflects the current approach of domestic courts,⁹ it has been called into question by the HRA. It implies, inter alia, that despite its duty under s 6 of the HRA, the court will simply ignore a breach of 8 See Wigmore, JH, Treatise on Evidence, 3rd edn, 1940, and Andrews [1963] Crim LR 15, p 77.

9 See Chalkley [1998] 2 Cr App R 79, discussed below, p 892.

Convention rights which has occurred in the pre-trial or custodial procedures and which has been instrumental in obtaining evidence. In respect of non-confession evidence, this is the current approach of the domestic courts. There is in fact an argument, considered below, that this position is sustainable to an extent under the HRA, but clearly it has now been placed under pressure.

From a due process stance, it has been argued that a court cannot merely inquire into the truth of the charges against a particular defendant: it must also play a part in maintaining standards in criminal investigations.¹⁰ The court has one particular part to play in the processing of the defendant through the criminal justice system: it should not play its brief part and ignore what has gone before. If the courts are prepared to accept evidence obtained by improper methods, the police may be encouraged to abuse their powers to the detriment of the citizen. Exclusion of evidence should be used to punish the police by depriving them of the fruits of their impropriety and to deter them from using such practices. This principle—the disciplinary principle—may encompass either a deterrent or a punitive role for exclusion of evidence, although it is recognised that no clear-cut relationship between police behaviour and rejection of evidence should be envisaged.¹¹

The use of exclusion of evidence to punish the police has come to be viewed by most commentators as a clumsy and possibly ineffective means of protecting due process, and this has led Ashworth to suggest a somewhat different principle, which he terms protective.¹² He contends that once a legal system has declared a certain standard for the conduct of investigations, the citizen obtains corresponding rights to be treated in a certain manner. If such rights are denied and evidence gained as a result, the court can wipe out the disadvantage to the defendant flowing from the denial by rejecting the evidence in question. If, for example, it appears that the defendant made the confession because the police failed to caution him or her, the judge could recreate the situation for the jury's benefit as it would have been had the caution been given, by excluding the confession. In the eyes of the jury, the position would be as if the right had never been denied; the judge would therefore have succeeded in protecting the defendant's right to silence in the interrogation. It must be pointed out that use of this argument in practice became more problematic when the caution became a warning that silence may be commented on adversely in court. If the new-style caution is not given, it might be argued that such a failure could not be causally related to the confession, since the defendant would have confessed in any event. This point will be returned to below.

An alternative but allied argument, also founded on due process values, may be termed the 'reputation' or 'integrity' principle. It can be argued that admitting the confession causes the trial to appear unfair because the court thereby appears to condone or lend itself to the original unfairness. The imprimatur of the court is necessary in order to allow the impropriety to bear fruit. If the trial is viewed, not as a separate entity, but as the culmination of a process in which the court and the police both play their part as emanations of the State, it can be argued that the court should refuse to lend itself to the unfairness which has gone before in order to ensure that the State does not profit from its own wrong. It cannot wipe out the unfairness, but it can wipe out its consequences, thereby ensuring that the reputation of the criminal justice system is not tarnished. But it need concern itself with the police unfairness only if that unfairness did have consequences. If it concerned itself with an inconsequential breach, the reputation of the criminal justice system would also suffer since the detriment caused to society in allowing someone who has perpetrated a serious crime to walk free from the court would be perceived as entirely outweighing the detriment to the defendant caused by the breach.¹³ Ashworth has found, after surveying the position in a number of jurisdictions, that where the police have breached a convention right, evidence thereby obtained should be excluded partly to vindicate the right and partly to preserve the integrity of the criminal justice system.¹⁴

10 Eg Cross, R (Sir), Cross on Evidence, 5th edn, 1979, pp 318–28.

11 Ibid., p 328.

12 See Ashworth, A [1979] CrimLR 723.

It might appear that the inception of the HRA lends force to arguments based on the protective principle since the citizen obtains rights not merely as an extrapolation from the standards declared in the statutory scheme, including that under PACE, but also under the Convention, on the basis that is unlawful for the public authority in question—the police—to breach them, under s 6 of the HRA. It might also be said that by giving further effect to the Convention rights, and placing a duty on the courts to uphold them, the HRA implies that the integrity of the criminal justice system would be compromised where evidence is admitted in breach of a right. However, although there are suggestions from the case law that the approach of the courts in the early post-PACE years bore a resemblance to this argument, that approach was hardly evident in the immediate pre-HRA period and the inception of the HRA did not affect that position.

The position in other common law jurisdictions

The US Supreme Court has taken the disciplinary and protective principles into account in determining that evidence obtained by improper methods should be excluded. For example, in Mapp v Ohio,¹⁵ the police conducted an illegal search of Mrs Mapp's boarding house and seized certain obscene materials. The Supreme Court held that the evidence obtained in the course of the illegal search was inadmissible. The majority opinion gave two main reasons for reaching this conclusion: first, that the police should be discouraged from conducting illegal searches, and secondly, that the defendant's entitlement to freedom from such search and seizure should be recognised by excluding the evidence obtained thereby. The Mapp rule on searches was mirrored by the Miranda rule, that improperly obtained confessions would be inadmissible in evidence.¹⁶ However, there has been some retreat recently from Mapp and Miranda, seen in decisions such as that in Moran v Burbine,¹⁷ which have brought America somewhat closer to the position adopted under UK common law.¹⁸

13 This argument was put forward in the second edition of this book.

14 See Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 1, p 1465.

15 (1961) 367 US 643.

16 Deriving from Miranda v Arizona (1966) 384 US 436.

17 (1986) 475 US 412.

18 See Stuntz, W, 'The American exclusionary rule and defendants' changing rights' [1989] Crim LR 117.

19 R v Butcher [1992] 2 NZLR 257; R v Te Kira [1993] 3 NZLR 257; Simpson v AG [1994] 3 NZLR 703.

The argument that evidence should be excluded if obtained through impropriety consisting of a fundamental breach of a constitutionally recognised right, has been accepted in New Zealand,¹⁹ and receives explicit recognition under the Canadian Charter.²⁰ In Australia, evidence may be admitted although obtained by trickery and it has been found that the trial may still be viewed as fair.²¹ In other words, by making a determination that admission of such evidence does not impair fairness, the finding was avoided that evidence was being admitted in breach of a fundamental right. However, it has been found that evidence obtained by secret recording will be excluded where unfairness has been caused to the accused.²²

Requirements of the Convention

Article 6(1) is silent as to the admissibility of improperly obtained evidence. The Strasbourg Court has emphasised that the assessment of evidence is for the domestic courts²³ and that Art 6 does not require any particular rules of evidence. Thus, it has allowed the national authorities a wide margin of appreciation in this respect. In *Schenk v Switzerland*²⁴ the Court found no breach of Art 6(1) when an illegally obtained incriminating tape recording was admitted in evidence, and made it clear that unlawfully obtained evidence is not necessarily inadmissible. The Court found: 'While Article 6 guarantees the right to a fair trial it does not lay down any rules as to admissibility of evidence as such, which is therefore primarily a matter of regulation under national law'. The test is to ask whether the trial as a whole would be rendered unfair if the 'tainted' evidence was admitted.²⁵

In the late 1990s, a change in the Court's stance occurred, although the principle deriving from Schenk remained unaffected. A much more interventionist approach was adopted in a number of judgments, including that in Teixeira de Castro v Portugal.²⁶ The applicant, who had no criminal record and was previously unknown to the police, was introduced by a third party to two undercover police officers who told him that they wished to buy 20 grams of heroin. He bought the drugs on their behalf at a price allowing him to take a profit. He was then tried and convicted on the evidence of the officers of drug dealing and sentenced to six years' imprisonment. The Court found, by 8 votes to 1, that the entrapment by the police officers in order to secure evidence had made a fair trial impossible: 'right from the outset the applicant was definitively deprived of a fair trial.'²⁷

It might have been expected that where pre-trial impropriety consisted of a fundamental breach of another Convention right, the Teixeira approach would have 20 Section 24(2). In Feeney [1997] 2 SCR 13, the Canadian Supreme Court said that admission of evidence obtained through a serious breach of the appellant's Charter rights would be more damaging to the reputation of the criminal justice system than would its exclusion. (See also Burlingham [1995] 2 SCR 206.) A more technical breach has not been found, however, to demand exclusion since to do so would cause greater affront to the system than its inclusion: Belnavis [1997] 3 SCR 341.

21 Ridgeway v the Queen (1995) 129 ALR 41.

22 Swaffield, Pavic v R (1998) 151 ALR 98.

23 Edwards v UK A 247-B (1992).

24 (1988) 13 EHRR 242.

25 A 140 (1988), para 46. This test was also used in Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310; see further below, pp 902–07.

26 (1998) 28 EHRR 101; [1998] Crim LR 751. See also Van Mechelen v Netherlands (1998) 25 EHRR 647; the findings of the Commission and Court in Rowe and Davis (2000) 30 EHRR 1; Condrón v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 1.

27 Ibid, para 39.

been followed. However, a Chamber of the Court did not adopt this stance in its important decision on admission of evidence under Art 6 in Khan v UK,²⁸ despite finding a breach of Art 8. A fundamental breach of Art 8 (secret recording which was not in accordance with the law)²⁹ had occurred in obtaining the only evidence against the defendant, but, following *Schenk*³⁰ no breach of Art 6 was found, owing to the admission of the evidence. The Court said that it was not its role to determine whether unlawfully obtained evidence should be admissible. Thus, the Court appears to adhere to two, partly conflicting views. First, if the pre-trial behaviour is such that the trial is almost bound to be unfair, a breach of Art 6 will be found. The Court has not characterised this issue as one relating to exclusion of evidence. Secondly, where pre-trial practices, although consisting of a breach of another Convention right, are viewed as creating less unfairness to the accused, and the question of a breach of Art 6 arises in the form of a question of admissibility, the Court leaves the matter to the national courts. Possibly, the difference between these two positions is justifiable, but the Court has made little attempt to explain what those justifications are. These questions are returned to below.³¹

The traditional domestic stance

Thus, little guidance is available to domestic courts seeking to apply the Strasbourg jurisprudence under s 2 of the HRA unless the matter can be characterised as one falling within the ruling in Teixeira. It may therefore be argued that the domestic courts could look to other jurisdictions for guidance as to the requirements of Art 6. The counter-argument is that the HRA does not require them to do so, that other jurisdictions have developed their own rules, in accordance with their own traditions, for the assessment of evidence, as has Britain, and that therefore the domestic common law tradition should prevail in the HRA era. It is suggested that the early HRA cases demonstrate that this is the approach which will continue to be adhered to. Therefore, the discussion below will concentrate on the established domestic position.

The common law pre-PACE went some way towards endorsing the crime control 'reliability' principle. Illegally obtained evidence other than 'involuntary' confessions was admissible in a criminal trial. Involuntary confessions were inadmissible on the ground that if a defendant was in some way induced to confess during a police interrogation, his confession might be unreliable. A confession would be involuntary if it was obtained by oppression³² or 'by fear of prejudice or hope of advantage exercised or held out by a person in authority'.³³ According to the Court of Appeal in Isequilla,³⁴ 'oppression' denoted some impropriety on the part of the police, but the House of Lords in *Ping Lin*³⁵ doubted whether such impropriety was necessary if the real issue was the reliability of the confession. Uncertainty as to the 28 (2000) 8 BHRC 310; Commission decision: (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58.

29 See Chapter 11, pp 710–11.

30 (1988) 13 EHRR 242.

31 See pp 904–07.

32 Prager [1972] 1 All ER 1114, CA.

33 Ibrahim [1914] AC 599.

34 [1975] All ER 77.

35 [1976] AC 574.

need for impropriety on the part of the police and as to the kind of impropriety which could amount to oppression, allowed cases such as the Confait case³⁶ to slip through the net. In that case, three young boys, one of them mentally handicapped, confessed to involvement in a murder they could not have committed after they had been denied both legal advice and the presence of an adult during the police interrogation. The confessions were admitted in evidence and led to the conviction of all three. They were finally exonerated seven years later.

The concept of fear of prejudice or hope of advantage was at one time interpreted strictly against the police and very mild inducements were held to render a confession involuntary. In Zaveckas,³⁷ for example, the Court of Appeal held that a confession had been rendered involuntary because the defendant had asked the police officer whether he could have bail if he made a statement. However, in the case of *Rennie*³⁸ Lord Lane held that a confession need not be excluded simply because it had been prompted in part by some hope of advantage. This case paved the way for the relaxation of this rule which can be found in the PACE scheme on exclusion of evidence.

Physical evidence discovered as a result of an inadmissible confession was admissible;³⁹ the police witness would have to state at the trial that after interviewing the defendant, the evidence in question was discovered—in the hope that the jury would see the connection. Illegally or improperly obtained non-confession evidence, such as fingerprints, was admissible at common law unless the evidence had been tricked out of the detainee,⁴⁰ in which case there would be a discretion to exclude it. However, the House of Lords in *Sang*⁴¹ re-affirmed the rule that non-confession evidence, however obtained, is admissible and there is no general discretion to exclude it.

Exclusion of evidence was largely placed on a statutory basis under PACE.⁴² PACE contains four separate tests which can be applied to a confession to determine whether it is admissible in evidence. In theory, all four tests could be applied to a particular confession, although in practice it may not be necessary to consider all of them. The four are the ‘oppression’ test under s 76(2)(a), the ‘reliability’ test under s 76(2)(b), the ‘fairness’ test under s 78 and the residual common law discretion to exclude evidence, preserved by s 82(3). It will become apparent that there is a large area of overlap between all four tests. Section 78 could cover unreliable evidence and also evidence obtained by the use of improper methods, whether amounting to oppression or not. Equally, certain types of improper behaviour could be termed oppressive, thus falling within s 76(2)(a), but they could also be viewed as circumstances likely to render a confession unreliable, falling therefore within s 76(2)(b). The courts have gone some of the way towards creating a distinct role for each test, but not all the way.⁴³ In some circumstances, a confession will obviously 36 See Price, C and Caplan, J, The Confait Confessions, 1976; Report of the Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher, HC 90 (1977–79).

37 (1970) 54 Cr App R 202, CA.

38 [1982] 1 All ER 385, CA.

39 Sang [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

40 Callis v Gunn [1964] 1QB 495.

41 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

42 For general commentary see Birch, D, ‘Confessions and confusions under the 1984 Act’ [1989] Crim LR 95; Feldman, D [1990] Crim LR 452.

43 See Birch, ibid.

fail one of the tests under s 76 and there will be no need to consider the other three. In other circumstances, it may be worth considering all four tests. The scheme in respect of non-confession evidence is less complex: only ss 78 and 82(3) are applicable. Significantly, physical evidence which is discovered as a result of an inadmissible confession will be admissible under s 76(4)(a).

Section 76(2)(a) of PACE: the ‘oppression’ test

Section 76(2)(a) provides that where:

...it is represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained by oppression of the person who made it...the court shall not allow the confession to be given in evidence against him except in so far as the prosecution proves to the court beyond reasonable doubt that the confession (notwithstanding that it may be true) was not obtained as aforesaid.

This test derives from the rule as it was at common law: if the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that the police did not behave oppressively, the confession produced is inadmissible. The judge has no discretion in the matter. The idea behind this is that threats of violence or other oppressive behaviour are so abhorrent that no further question as to the reliability of a confession obtained by such methods should be asked. This rule appears to have the dual function of removing any incentive to the police to behave improperly and of protecting the detainee from the consequences of impropriety if it has occurred. Under this head, once the defence has advanced a reasonable argument (Liverpool Juvenile Court ex p R)⁴⁴ that the confession was obtained by oppression, it will not be admitted in evidence unless the prosecution can prove that it was not so obtained. The reliability of a confession obtained by oppression is irrelevant: it matters not whether the effect of the oppression is to frighten the detainee into telling the truth or alternatively into lying in order to get out of the situation.

The only evidence given in the Act as to the meaning of oppression is the non-exhaustive definition contained in s 76(8): ‘In this section “oppression” includes torture, inhuman or degrading treatment and the use or threat of violence (whether or not amounting to torture).’ The word ‘includes’ ought to be given its literal meaning according to the Court of Appeal in *Fulling*⁴⁵. Therefore, it appeared that the concept of oppression might be fairly wide: the question was whether it encompassed the old common law rulings on its width. In Fulling, the Court of Appeal held that PACE is a codifying Act and that therefore, a court should examine the statutory language uninfluenced by pre-Act decisions. The court then proffered its own definition of oppression: ‘...the exercise of authority or power in a burdensome, harsh or wrongful manner; unjust or cruel treatment of subjects, inferiors, etc; the imposition of unreasonable or unjust burdens.’ It thought that oppression would almost invariably entail impropriety on the part of the interrogator.

However, the terms ‘wrongful’ and ‘improper’ used in this test could cover any unlawful action on the part of the police. This could have been taken to mean that any breach of the Act or Codes could constitute oppression. This wide possibility was pursued at first instance,⁴⁶ but has been abandoned. The Court of Appeal in *Hughes*⁴⁷ held that a denial of legal advice, owing not to bad faith on the part of the police, but to a misunderstanding, could not amount to oppression. In *Alladice*⁴⁸ the Court of Appeal also took this view in suggesting, obiter, that an improper denial of legal advice, if accompanied by bad faith on the part of the police, would certainly amount to 'unfairness' under s 78 and probably also to oppression. In Beales,⁴⁹ rather heavy-handed questioning accompanied by misleading suggestions, although not on the face of it a very serious impropriety, was termed oppressive because it was obviously employed as a deliberate tactic. In Paris,⁵⁰ the case of the Cardiff Three, confessions made by one of the defendants after some 13 hours of highly pressured and hostile questioning were excluded on the ground of oppression. He was a man of limited intelligence, but the Court of Appeal thought that the questioning would have been oppressive even with a suspect of normal intelligence.

⁴⁴ [1987] All ER 688.

⁴⁵ [1987] QB 426; [1987] 2 All ER 65, CA.

This emphasis on bad faith may be criticised because from the point of view of the detainee, it matters little if mistreatment occurs because of an administrative mix-up, an innocent misconstruction of powers or malice. Looking to the state of mind of the suspect rather than that of the oppressor would enable account to be taken of the very great difference in impact of certain conduct on a young, inexperienced suspect and on a hardened, sophisticated criminal. However, at present the courts have not shown much desire to import a subjective assessment of oppression into s 76(2)(a), although at common law such an assessment would have been warranted.⁵¹

On the other hand, it cannot be said that the Court of Appeal has consistently invoked s 76(2)(a) rather than s 78 when the police have deliberately misused their powers in obtaining a confession; in Mason,⁵² for example, a trick played deliberately on the appellant's solicitor led to exclusion of the confession under s 78. In Blake,⁵³ misleading statements made to the detainee, presumably in bad faith, led to exclusion of the confession under s 76(2)(b) or s 78. Thus, apart from the requirement of bad faith, it also seems necessary to show that the improper behaviour has reached a certain level of seriousness in order to show oppression.⁵⁴ However, the case law does not yet clearly indicate the level of seriousness needed. All that can be said with some certainty is that the impropriety should be of a serious nature and that bad faith appears to be a necessary, but not sufficient condition for the operation of s 76(2)(a), whereas it will probably automatically render a confession inadmissible under s 78.⁵⁵

Improper treatment falling outside s 76(8) and unaccompanied by bad faith could fall within s 76(2)(b) if the confession was likely to have been rendered unreliable thereby. The emphasis on bad faith or the lack of it at least gives an indication as to 46 In Davison [1988] Crim LR 442.

47 [1988] Crim LR 519.

48 (1988) 87 Cr App R 380, CA.

49 [1991] Crim LR 118. See to the same effect Heron (1993) unreported; forceful questioning was accompanied by lies as to the identification evidence.

50 (1993) 97 Cr AppR 99; [1994] Crim LR 361, CA.

51 Priestley (1966) 50 Cr App R 183, CA.

52 [1987] Crim LR 119; [1987] 3 All ER 481, CA.

53 [1991] All ER 481, CA.

54 See L [1994] Crim LR 839.

55 For discussion of the effect of bad faith under s 78, see below, p 883.

when improper behaviour on the part of the police will lead to automatic exclusion of the confession under s 76(2)(a) and when it will merely suggest the likelihood of unreliability under s 76(2)(b). But, since the operation of s 76(2)(a) is unpredictable and since confessions will rarely be excluded under the sub-section, its ability to protect due process is very limited.

Section 76(2)(b): the ‘reliability’ test

Section 76(2)(b) provides that where a confession was or may have been obtained:

...in consequence of anything said or done which was likely in the circumstances existing at the time, to render unreliable any confession which might be made by him in consequence thereof, the court shall not allow the confession to be given in evidence against him except in so far as the prosecution proves to the court beyond reasonable doubt that the confession (notwithstanding that it may be true) was not obtained as aforesaid.

The ‘reliability’ test derives from the rule as stated in *Ibrahim*⁵⁶ on inducements to confess. However, as will be seen below, it represents a relaxation of that rule as it was applied in Ibrahim. It also works certain changes in the emphasis of the test. The test does not reflect the full rigour of the reliability principle, which requires that a confession extracted by torture but determined to be true should be admitted in evidence.⁵⁷ Instead it is concerned with objective reliability: the judge must consider the situation at the time the confession was made and ask whether the confession would be likely to be unreliable, not whether it is unreliable.

It must be borne in mind that if an offer of some kind is made to the detainee in response to an inquiry from him, this will not render the subsequent confession unreliable,⁵⁸ thus explicitly rejecting the Zaveckas approach. It is not necessary, under this section, to show that there has been any misconduct on the part of the police. In Harvey,⁵⁹ a mentally ill woman of low intelligence may have been induced to confess to murder by hearing her lover’s confession. Her confession was excluded as being likely to be unreliable. In Harvey, the ‘something said or done’ (the first limb of the test under s 76(2)(a)) was the confession of the lover while the ‘circumstances’ (the second limb) were the defendant’s emotional state, low intelligence and mental illness. The ‘something said or done’ cannot consist of the defendant’s own mental or physical state, according to Goldberg.⁶⁰ In that case, the defendant was a heroin addict who confessed because he was desperate to leave the police station and obtain a ‘fix’. The contention of the defence counsel that the defendant’s decision to confess prompted by his addiction amounted to ‘something said or done’ was not accepted by the court.

In many instances, the ‘something said or done’ will consist of some impropriety on the part of the police and in such instances, a court will go on to consider whether any circumstances existed which rendered the impropriety particularly significant. The ‘circumstances’ could include the particularly vulnerable state of the detainee.

56 [1914] AC 599; see fn 33, above.

57 As advocated by Andrews, op cit, fn 8, p 77; see p 869 above.

58 CodeC, para 11.3.

59 [1988] Crim LR 241.

60 [1988] Crim LR 678.

In Mathias,⁶¹ the defendant was particularly vulnerable because he had not been afforded legal advice although an offer of immunity from prosecution had been made to him. The Court of Appeal held that the offer had placed him in great difficulty and that this was a situation in which the police should have ensured that he had legal advice. From the judgment, it appears that if an inducement to confess is offered to the detainee, the police should ensure that he or she can discuss it with a solicitor, even if the police are entitled to deny access to legal advice, on the ground that the detainee falls within s 58(8) (see above). Thus the 'circumstances' will be the lack of legal advice and the 'something said or done', the inducement.

The vulnerability may relate to a physical or mental state. In *Trussler*⁶² the defendant, who was a drug addict, had been in custody 18 hours, had been denied legal advice and had not been afforded the rest period guaranteed by Code C para 12. His confession was excluded as likely to be unreliable. In *Delaney*⁶³ the defendant was 17, had an IQ of 80 and, according to an educational psychologist, was subject to emotional arousal which would lead him to wish to bring a police interview to an end as quickly as possible. These were circumstances in which it was important to ensure that the interrogation was conducted with all propriety. In fact, the officers offered some inducement to the defendant to confess by playing down the gravity of the offence and by suggesting that if he confessed, he would get the psychiatric help he needed. They also failed to make an accurate, contemporaneous record of the interview in breach of Code C, para 11.3. Failing to make the proper record was of indirect relevance to the question of reliability since it meant that the court could not assess the full extent of the suggestions held out to the defendant. Thus, in the circumstances existing at the time (the mental state of the defendant), the police impropriety did have the special significance necessary under s 76(2)(b). The decision in *Marshall*⁶⁴ was to similar effect, although it did not identify a specific breach of Code C: the defendant was on the borderline of sub-normality and therefore, after an interview accompanied by his solicitor, he should not have been re-interviewed unaccompanied about the same matters.

From the above it appears that the 'circumstances existing at the time' may be circumstances created by the police (as in Mathias) or may be inherent in the defendant (as in Delaney). Impropriety on the part of the police can go to either limb of the test, but a state inherent in the detainee (such as mental illness) can go only to the 'circumstances' limb. Thus, a single breach of the interviewing rules such as a denial of legal advice in ordinary circumstances would not appear, as far as the current interpretation of s 76(2)(b) is concerned, to satisfy both limbs of the test. On the other hand, a doubtful breach or perhaps no breach but, rather, behaviour of doubtful propriety, such as misleading the suspect as to the need to have legal advice, might satisfy the 'something said or done' test where special circumstances were also present.

So far, the courts have considered instances where something is said or done, in particularly significant circumstances, which increases the likelihood that a confession will be unreliable. However, it is arguable that s 76 might exceptionally be applicable

61 (1989) The Times, 24 August.

62 [1988] CrimLR 446.

63 (1989) 8 Cr App R 338; (1988) The Times, 20 August, CA.

64 (1992) The Times, 28 December.

where something is said or done which might affect a subsequent confession, but the circumstances are normal. The example was given above of a detainee who was deprived of sleep as a result of an administrative mix-up. Deprivation of sleep would be likely to render a confession unreliable, but which ‘circumstances’ could be pointed to as existing at the time—as required by the second limb of s 76(2)(b)? The answer could be that the ordinary police methods of interrogation, applied to a detainee who had been deprived of sleep, would amount to ‘circumstances’ falling within s 76(2)(b). Thus, this would be an impropriety which could go to both limbs of the test. Such instances of breaches of Code C could also fall within s 78, as will be seen below. However, defence counsel would be expected to argue the point first under s 76(2)(b) as the prosecution would then have the onus of proving beyond reasonable doubt that the deprivation of sleep did not take place.

It must now be apparent that s 76(2)(b) could be used to exclude all confessions obtained by oppression. It may then be wondered why s 76(2)(a) exists at all. The principle lying behind the two heads of s 76 appears to be that some types of impropriety on the part of the police are so unacceptable that it would be abhorrent in a court to go on to consider the reliability of a confession gained by such methods. In other words, s 76(2)(a) can speed up a process which could be carried out under s 76(2)(b).

Causation and the two heads of s 76

The words of s 76(2): ‘[if] it is represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained’ (by oppression or something conducive to unreliability) appear to import a causal link between the police behaviour (the ‘something said or done’ or the oppression) and the confession. Thus, if the police threaten the suspect with violence after he has confessed, this will clearly be irrelevant to admission of the confession. However, it is possible that under s 76(2)(a), the causal link will not be much scrutinised so long as the oppression precedes the confession. This receives some support from dicta in Alladice:⁶⁵ the Court of Appeal determined that the improper denial of legal advice had not caused the detainee to confess but still found that, had it been accompanied by bad faith, exclusion of the confession under s 76 might have been undertaken. The general rule appears, then, to be that where the causal link in question clearly does not exist, s 76(2)(a) cannot be invoked, but in all other instances the fact that the confession was made subsequent to the oppression may be sufficient.

The question of causation under s 76(2)(b) appears, on the face of it, complex. From the wording of the sub-section it appears to be necessary to adopt a two stage test, asking first whether something was said or done, likely in the circumstances to render any confession made unreliable—an objective test—and secondly, whether that something caused the detainee to confess—a subjective test.

The relationship between ss 76 and 78

In general, the s 76 tests for admissibility of confessions could work to the detriment of inexperienced and more vulnerable detainees. In Canale,⁶⁶ the police breached the recording provisions and allegedly played a trick on the appellant in order to obtain the confession. Ruling that the confession should have been excluded under s 78, the Court of Appeal took into account the fact that the appellant could not be said to be weak minded; it was therefore thought inappropriate to invoke s 76(2)(b).⁶⁷ Thus, the need to identify special factors in the situation in order to invoke either head of s 76 means that breaches of the interviewing rules unaccompanied by any such factor are usually considered under s 78. Furthermore, allegedly fabricated confessions cannot fall within s 76(2) owing to its requirement that something has happened to the defendant which caused him to confess; its terms are not therefore fulfilled if the defence alleges that no confession made by the defendant exists.

65 (1988) 87 Cr App R 380, CA.

66 [1990] All ER 187, CA.

In practice, confessions are rarely excluded under either head of s 76, presumably because the judges strongly wish to retain a discretion as to admissibility. As indicated above, even where a confession is excluded, physical evidence found as a result of information given in it need not be, under s 76(4).⁶⁸ Therefore, it may be said that s 76 has had little impact in upholding due process and there is no reason to imagine that this stance will change under the HRA. Thus, s 78 has operated as a catch-all section, bringing within its boundaries many confessions which pass the tests contained in either head of s 76.

Section 78 is also likely to be invoked where police questioning meets with a no comment response from a defendant. Such an interview cannot be considered within s 76 because of the use of the word 'confession' within that section. It would seem to be straining statutory language too greatly to use the term 'confession' to cover a silence. If a silence is excluded from evidence under s 78, adverse inferences obviously cannot be drawn from it (unless the jury or magistrate becomes aware of it in the course of hearing other evidence) and therefore argument on this issue has arisen, although so far the courts have shown themselves reluctant to exclude no comment interviews.⁶⁹

Section 78: the 'fairness' test⁷⁰

Section 78 provides:

In any proceedings the court may refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution proposes to rely to be given if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it.

⁶⁷ Section 76(2)(a) was not invoked, although apparently the police deliberately breached the recording provisions. Presumably, breaches of the interviewing rules were not seen as behaviour serious enough to be termed 'oppression'. However, if the defence makes a—contested—allegation that the police made threats or deliberately tricked the detainee into confessing, the prosecution might not be able to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the police had in fact behaved properly owing to the breach of the recording provisions. This alternative line of argument could have been considered in Canale [1990] All ER 187, CA.

⁶⁸ See further Mirfield, P, Silence, Confessions and Improperly Obtained Evidence, 1997; Mirfield, P, 'Successive confessions and the poisonous tree' [1996] Crim LR 554; Sharpe, Judicial Discretion and Criminal Investigation, 1998.

⁶⁹ See Condron [1997] 1 WLR 827.

⁷⁰ For discussion of the operation of s 78 see Allen [1990] CLJ 80; Gelowitz (1990) 106 LQR 327; May [1988] Crim LR 722; Stone (1995) 3 Web JCL 1; Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 11, Part 5; Choo, AL-T and Nash, S, 'What's the matter with s 78?' [1999] Crim LR 929–40.

Section 78 confers an exclusionary discretion on a judge and appears to have been conceived to cover the very narrow function of the old common law discretion⁷¹ to exclude improperly obtained non-confession evidence. Until the ruling in Mason,⁷² it was uncertain whether s 78 also covered confessions. Section 78 can be used to exclude evidence if admitting it would render the trial unfair. In adopting this formula, it was clear that the Government did not wish to import into this country a USA-type exclusionary rule. The Home Secretary informed the House of Commons⁷³ that the function of exclusion of evidence after police misconduct must not be disciplinary, but must be to safeguard the fairness of the trial. The idea behind this was that non-confession evidence obtained by improper means could still be admitted on the basis that police misconduct could be dealt with by internal disciplinary procedures. Similarly, confessions obtained improperly in circumstances falling outside s 76 could nevertheless be admissible in evidence with the proviso that the trial should not thereby be rendered unfair. In fact, as will be seen, the courts have managed to create a role for s 78 which, as far as confessions are concerned, is probably rather far removed from the Government's original intention. The approach adopted to confessions tends to reflect the protective and integrity principles.

Section 78: excluding confessions

The courts have been very reluctant to lay down general rules for the application of s 78,⁷⁴ but the attempt will be made here, albeit tentatively, to identify some of the factors which tend to be taken into account. It may be noted that s 78 is not explicit as to who bears the burden of proof where a breach of the rules is alleged, but in *Vel v Owen*⁷⁵ the Divisional Court ruled that the defence should make good its objection. In Anderson,⁷⁶ however, the court said that it was not entirely clear where the burden of proof lay. If it is found that admission of an interview would render the trial unfair, then not only the interview affected, but possibly any interviews subsequent to that one⁷⁷ may be excluded from evidence under s 78.

The PACE interviewing scheme may be infringed or undermined in a variety of ways. In the paradigm case, there may be a clear failure to put in place one of the safeguards such as access to legal advice or tape recording. However, it is not always possible to identify such a clear breach of the rules. The failure to do so may have contributed to the decision in Hughes:⁷⁸ the misrepresentation as regards unavailability of legal advice made to the appellant did not involve breach of a specific Code provision and therefore, may have led to reluctance to exclude the confession. Similarly, in *Khan*⁷⁹ it was found that while s 30(1) of PACE allowed 71 See Sang [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

72 [1987] Crim LR 119; [1987] All ER 481, CA.

73 1983–84, HC Deb Col 1012, 29 October 1984.

74 See the comments of Auld J in Katz (1990) 90 Cr App R 456, CA.

75 (1987) JP 510.

76 [1993] Crim LR 447.

77 Ismail [1990] Crim LR 109, CA; cf Gillard and Barrett (1991) 155 JP Rep 352 and Y v DPP [1991] Crim LR 917. Later interviews may be found to have been contaminated by earlier breaches if those breaches are of a fundamental and continuing character and the accused has not had sufficient opportunity of retracting what was said earlier: Neill [1994] Crim LR 441, CA.

officers to keep a suspect out of the police station for a time in order to make investigations, including a search, questioning during that time should be limited, since otherwise the provisions of the interviewing scheme would be subverted. Some of the questions which had in fact been asked went beyond what was needed for the search; however, they should not have been excluded, as the matter was 'a question of degree', although officers did not have carte blanche to interview suspects in such circumstances.

In contrast to this approach, there has been some willingness at first instance to consider situations where the PACE scheme seemed to have been infringed, although it was impossible to point to a clear breach.⁸⁰ The interviewing scheme lends itself to many methods of infringement, some of which may occur at a low level of visibility, but which may nevertheless be of significance. For example, there may be breach of a rule contained in an instrument other than PACE itself or Code C,⁸¹ there may be evasion or bending of a rule, as opposed to breaking it and instances where the interviewing scheme itself leaves it unclear whether or not a particular safeguard should have been in place at a given stage in the process.⁸² Of course, a court may never have an opportunity to hear such argument. Infringement of this type is difficult to detect; for example, a suspect who is persuaded to forgo legal advice at the 'booking in' stage may be unaware that something has occurred to his disadvantage, unlike the suspect who has been straightforwardly refused advice. Even assuming that the suspect pleads not guilty, defence counsel may be reluctant to argue for exclusion of a confession if unable to point to a clear breach of the rules.

In Keenan,⁸³ the Court of Appeal ruled that once a breach of the rules can be identified, it will be asked whether it is substantial or significant. It found that a combination of breaches of the recording provisions satisfied this test. In contrast, a breach of para 10.2 requiring a police officer to inform a suspect that he is not under arrest, is free to go and may obtain legal advice has been held to be insubstantial.⁸⁴ This view of para 10.2 also seems to have been implicit in the ruling of the Court of Appeal in Joseph,⁸⁵ although a breach of para 10.5 in contrast was clearly found to be substantial and significant in order to merit exclusion of the confession. In Walsh,⁸⁶ the Court of Appeal held that what was significant and substantial would be determined by reference to the nature of the breach except in instances where the police had acted in bad faith: '...although bad faith may make substantial or significant that which might not otherwise be so, the contrary does 78 [1988] Crim LR 519. See Chapter 13, p 813 for discussion of the decision.

79 [1993] Crim LR 54, CA.

80 See, eg, Vernon [1988] Crim LR 445; Woodall and Others [1989] Crim LR 288.

81 The Notes for Guidance, which are not part of the Codes (see Code C, para 1.3—the provision to the same effect is the first paragraph of each Code) and therefore may in effect be said to form part of a separate instrument; Home Office circulars; Force Standing Orders.

82 This may be said in particular of Code C, para 11.1 A and para 10.1 which determine when the safeguards surrounding interviews should be in place. See above, pp 828–31 (discussed in Fenwick, 'Confessions, recording rules and miscarriages of justice' [1993] Crim LR 174).

83 [1989] 3 WLR 1193; [1989] All ER 598, CA.

84 Rajakuruna [1991] Crim LR 458.

85 [1993] Crim LR 206, CA.

86 [1989] Crim LR 822; (1989) 19 Cr AppR 161.

not follow. Breaches which are themselves significant and substantial are not rendered otherwise by the good faith of the officers concerned.’

This test has so far been applied only to Code provisions. It seems likely that breach of rules contained in Notes for Guidance or Home Office circulars would fail it—assuming that a court was prepared to consider such breaches at all—but this hypothesis has not yet been tested because the courts have been reluctant to take such rules into account in the context of exclusion of evidence or, as far as the Notes are concerned, in any other context. This was the approach taken in DPP v Billington;⁸⁷ the Court of Appeal preferred not to consider Note 6C of Code C despite its relevance to the question before it. However, there are some signs that the judiciary are beginning to react to the Notes differently, perhaps owing to a perception that their legitimacy derives from their nature as opposed to their source. In *DPP v Blake*⁸⁸ the Divisional Court impliedly accepted that a Note for Guidance will be considered if it can be argued that it amplifies a particular Code provision and can therefore be of assistance in determining whether breach of such a provision has occurred. The question arose whether an estranged parent could be the appropriate adult at the interview of a juvenile under Code C, para 13.1,⁸⁹ that provision was interpreted in accordance with Note 13C, which describes the adult’s expected role,⁹⁰ and it was then found that para 13.1 had been breached.⁹¹ A variation on this view of the Notes, which nevertheless supports the argument that they are unlikely to be considered in their own right, has been expressed recently by the Court of Appeal in relation to one of the most significant Notes, Note 11 A. It was taken into account on the basis that it could be seen as part of para 11.1 and could thereby acquire the status of a paragraph.⁹²

Once a court has identified a significant and substantial breach of the interviewing rules, it may then take some account of the function of the rule in question. Rules governing access to legal advice and the right to silence provide rights which are valuable in themselves, since they tend to place the suspect on a more even footing with police officers during the interview. These rights are also reflected in the Convention in Art 6(2) and 6(3)(c).⁹³ An innocent detainee who is confused and upset by the interrogation may be less likely to make false admissions if a legal adviser is present at the interview.⁹⁴ In contrast, the verifying and recording rules may be said to be concerned mainly with the evidential integrity of the evidence rather than with providing rights valuable in themselves. Categorising the interviewing rules in this way—by means of their dominant function—may be 87 (1988) Cr App R 68; [1988] 1 All ER 435. The court had to consider whether a desire to consult a solicitor first could properly found a refusal to furnish a specimen of breath under the Road Traffic Act 1972, s 8(7). Para 6 of Code C provides that a person who has requested legal advice may not be interviewed until he has received it. Note 6C provides that the s 8 procedure does not constitute an interview, but Lloyd LJ preferred not to take it into account while reaching a conclusion which was nevertheless in accordance with it. Thus, the issue which fell to be determined did not concern the question of exclusion of evidence, but has a bearing upon the general question whether courts are prepared to place any reliance upon the Notes.

88 [1989] 1 WLR 432, CA.

89 Now para 11.14 under the revised Code.

90 This role is now described in para 11.16; this provision has therefore been elevated in status, indicating its importance. The decision in DPP v Blake found recognition in Note for Guidance 1C.

91 This decision was followed in the first instance decision of Morse [1991] Crim LR 195; see also DPP v Rouse and DPP v Davis (1992) 94 Cr App R 185.

92 Cox (1993) 96 Cr App R 464; [1993] Crim LR 382; (1992) The Times, 2 December.

93 See Chapter 13, pp 854–64.

useful as a means of determining the type of unfairness which may flow from their breach. However, occasionally, what may be termed the subordinate function of a rule may be relevant to the question of fairness with the result that, for example, breach of a recording rule could be treated in the same way as breach of the legal advice provisions.

In Samuel,⁹⁵ the Court of Appeal found that the confession should have been excluded under s 78 because it was causally linked to the police impropriety—a failure to allow the appellant access to legal advice. In order to establish this point, the solicitor in question gave evidence that had he been present, he would have advised his client to remain silent in the last interview, whereas in fact Samuel made damaging admissions in that interview which formed the basis of the case against him. It could not be said with certainty that he would have confessed in any event: he was not, it was determined, a sophisticated criminal who was capable of judging for himself when to speak and when to remain silent. Thus—although this was not made explicit—the Court of Appeal was prepared to make the judgment that a trial would be rendered unfair if a court associated itself with a breach of the PACE interrogation procedure. The Court of Appeal in Alladice,⁹⁶ also faced with a breach of s 58, accepted that the key factor in exercising discretion under s 78 after a breach of the interrogation procedure was the causal relationship between breach and confession (and, by implication, between breach and fairness at the trial). On the basis of this factor, it was determined that the confession had been rightly admitted despite the breach of s 58 because no causal relationship between the two could be established. This finding was based partly on the defendant's evaluation of the situation (that he only wanted the solicitor to see fair play and did not require legal advice) and partly on the fact that he had exercised his right to silence at certain points. Therefore, it was determined that he would have made the incriminating admissions in any event—even with the benefit of legal advice. Possibly this was surprising in view of the fact that the appellant, as the court itself accepted, was an unsophisticated criminal who did in fact make admissions in the absence of a solicitor which formed the basis of the case against him.⁹⁷

In the early post-PACE years, there was a tendency for judges to move rather rapidly from a finding that the police had breached Code C to a determination that s 78 should be invoked, without explicitly considering whether a causal relationship between the breach and the confession existed.⁹⁸ Such a tendency can be discerned in the case of *Absolam*⁹⁹ in which the Court of Appeal, in finding that 'the prosecution would not have been in receipt of these admissions if the appropriate procedures had been followed', seemed to assume that the causal relationship between the 94 As pointed out at a number of points in Chapter 13, the evidence as to the advantage to the detainee of having the advisor present at the interview is of a rather mixed nature; see, eg, comment on the solicitor's role at [1993] Crim LR 368.

95 [1988] QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 315; [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA.

96 (1988) 87 Cr App R 380. The Court of Appeal appeared to have a similar test in mind in relation to a failure to caution in Weerdesteijn (1995) 1 Cr App R 405; [1995] Crim LR 239, CA.

97 See also Dunford (1990) 91 Cr App R 150; (1990) 140 NLJ 517, CA: the Court of Appeal determined that the criminally experienced appellant had made his own assessment of the situation in deciding to make certain admissions and legal advice would not have affected his decision; the failure to allow legal advice was not therefore causally linked to the confession.

impropriety¹⁰⁰ and the admissions did exist. The chain of causation would have been fairly long—had the detainee been informed of his right to legal advice, he would have exercised it; had he exercised it, he would not have made the incriminating admissions—but the Court of Appeal did not make much attempt to scrutinise its links.¹⁰¹ However, in Walsh,¹⁰² the Court of Appeal reaffirmed the need to identify the causal relationship between the breach in question and the confession.

Deciding that an impropriety is causally linked to the confession does not of itself explain why admission of the confession will render the trial unfair, although it is perhaps reasonable to conclude that admission of a confession which is not so linked will not render the trial unfair. The necessary unfairness must arise through admission of the confession, in other words after its admission; the unfairness in the interrogation cannot therefore without more satisfy this requirement; instead, the unfairly obtained confession must be the agent which somehow creates unfairness at the trial. It has to be said that at present, the courts have not addressed this question. In Samuel, for example, the Court of Appeal merely stated:

...the appellant was denied improperly one of the most important and fundamental rights of the citizen...if [the trial judge] had found a breach of s 58 he would have determined that admission of evidence as to the final interview would have 'such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings' that he ought not to admit it.¹⁰³

Broadly, it could be argued that if the court refuses to take the opportunity afforded by s 78 to put right what has occurred earlier in the process, this will give an appearance of unfairness to the trial. This argument is based on the 'protective principle':¹⁰⁴ if admissions gained in consequence of denial of a right (in the broad sense of an entitlement) are excluded, the particular right is being protected in the sense that the defendant is being placed at trial—as far as the jury is concerned—in the position he or she would have been in had the right not been denied. If s 78 is, at least in part, concerned with ensuring fairness to the defence, it is arguable that the court should take the opportunity offered to it of upholding the standards of fairness declared by PACE. However, following an argument based on the reputation or integrity principles, if the police unfairness has had no consequences for the defendant, the court need not exclude the confession since to do so would place him in a more favourable position than he would have been in had the proper standard of fairness been observed.

Admittedly, both these arguments assume that the court will appear to be associating itself unfairly with the prosecution, rather than dealing even-handedly, 98 See Williams [1989] Crim LR 66 and Mary Quayson [1989] Crim LR 218.

99 (1989) Cr App R 332.

100 A failure to inform Absalom of his right to legal advice in breach of Code C para 3.1(ii).

101 Possibly, this may have arisen because the defendant had denied making the admissions in question; the court was therefore placed in the position of accepting the word of the police officer against that of the defendant—precisely the problem which Code C was designed to prevent. The Court of Appeal, while speaking in the language of causation, may simply have had a doubt as to whether the admissions were made at all.

102 [1989] Crim LR 822.

103 [1988] 2 WLR 920, p 934.

104 See Ashworth, op cit, fn 12.

if it admits the evidence in question and that therefore, the court should refuse to do so. They therefore seem to beg the very question to which s 78 demands an answer. If admitting the confession despite the breach could be seen as fair, the court would not be associating itself with unfairness and could not be seen as lacking even-handedness. But bearing in mind the balance PACE is supposed to create between increased police powers and safeguards for suspects, it can perhaps be argued that to accept evidence deriving from an interview in which the police were able to use their powers to the full, but the defendant was unable to take advantage of an important safeguard, would not be perceived by most reasonable people as fair. The findings of the Privy Council in *Mohammed (Allie) v State*¹⁰⁵ in respect of a denial of custodial access to legal advice adopted this stance: 'The stamp of constitutionality on a citizen's rights is not meaningless: it is clear testimony that added value is attached to the protection of the right... Not every breach will result in a confession being excluded. But their Lordships make clear that the fact that there has been a breach of a constitutional right is a cogent factor militating in favour of the exclusion of the confession. In this way the constitutional character of the infringed right is respected and accorded a high value...' This stance receives clear, albeit indirect support from Strasbourg, as will be indicated below.¹⁰⁶

In this context, the curtailment of the right to silence under the CJPOA is particularly significant. One result of its curtailment may be that it becomes harder to establish that an improper denial of access to legal advice should lead to exclusion of evidence under s 78. This is because the main basis for excluding confessions gained after denial of legal advice may disappear. The courts have been excluding them mainly on the ground that had the legal adviser been present, he or she would probably have advised the client to remain silent, but if this cannot be contended, the causal relationship between breach and confession is destroyed. Whether this will happen depends, of course, on the general readiness of legal advisers to advise their clients to remain silent in the face of the knowledge that such silence may be commented on in court. At present, it is unclear that legal advisers are less disposed than they were previously to advise silence.¹⁰⁷ However, if such a tendency did become apparent, a number of consequences might follow. The police may have been encouraged to afford access to a legal adviser but, on the other hand, any disincentive to deny access—the result of such decisions as Samuel and Absolam—has been undermined. The balance still comes down in favour of discouraging, delaying or denying access.¹⁰⁸ If, on a voir dire, a court has to consider such a denial, it may be harder to contend confidently that the legal adviser would have advised the client to remain silent, with the result that in future, the courts will find themselves less able to uphold this particular safeguard for the suspect. Of course it might be said, in the light of a large amount of research,¹⁰⁹ that it was, even prior to the inception of the CJPOA, already becoming difficult to contend confidently

105 [1999] 2 WLR 552 (Trinidad and Tobago); judgment delivered by Lord Steyn on 8 December 1998.

106 See also Chapter 13, pp 860–64.

107 See Chapter 13, pp 816–18.

108 See Chapter 13, pp 810–13.

109 See, eg, McConville, M and Hodgson, J, Custodial Legal Advice and the Right to Silence, 1993, Royal Commission Study No 16. See further Chapter 13, pp 816–19.

that a legal adviser would have advised silence, except perhaps in cases where the client was under very obvious pressure.¹¹⁰ However, that problem could be addressed by means of better training in the provision of custodial legal advice. The effect of curtailment of the right to silence, however, will probably be in the long run to undermine the main prop holding up the legal advice scheme.

Breach of rules aimed at ensuring that the record of an interview can be relied on at trial need not be considered under s 78 in terms of their impact on the defendant. Once such a breach, of a substantial nature, has been identified, a court will be likely to react by excluding the confession on the basis that it is impossible to be sure of its reliability¹¹¹ and therefore its prejudicial quality may outweigh its probative value. In other words, a jury may place reliance on an inaccurate record or believe a fabricated confession which clearly has no evidential value at all. An obvious example of such a breach is a failure to make contemporaneous notes of the interview in breach of Code C, para 11.5, allowing a challenge to the interview record by the defence on the basis that the police have fabricated all or part of it. The court then has no means of knowing which version of what was said is true, precisely the situation which Code C was designed to prevent. In such a situation, a judge may well exclude the interview record on the basis that it would be unfair to allow evidence of doubtful reliability to go before the jury. If, however, as in Dunn,¹¹² the defence has an independent witness to what occurred—usually a solicitor or solicitor’s clerk—the judge may admit the confession as the defence now has a proper basis from which to challenge the police evidence.

It is fairly clear that allowing a confession which may have been fabricated to go before the jury may render a trial unfair: on the one hand, the jury may rely on a confession which may be entirely untrue, while on the other, if the defendant alleges that the police fabricated the confession, the prosecution can then put his character in issue and the jury may hear of his previous convictions. The jury may then tend to rely on his convictions in deciding that his guilt is established on this occasion. In both circumstances, the defendant is placed at a clear disadvantage.

When a breach of Code C has occurred which casts doubt on the accuracy of the interview record, the defence may not necessarily submit that the police have fabricated admissions; the judge may merely have to determine whether the trial will be rendered unfair if a possibly inaccurate record of an interview is admitted in evidence. There is authority to suggest that a judge in such circumstances will exclude the record,¹¹³ presumably owing to the chance of a risk that the jury will rely on fabricated admissions.

As noted above, identifying the dominant function of the interviewing rule in question need not circumscribe the inquiry into the unfairness caused by its breach. Although identifying the dominant function of a rule may simplify this task in most circumstances, it is suggested that a court may sometimes focus on its subordinate function. For example, a breach of the recording provisions would be

110 See Dixon’s findings in this respect: [1991] PL 233, p 244: ‘...silence may be advised...when the suspect is confused or highly emotional...several solicitors stressed that their clients are under great pressure.’

111 See, eg, Keenan [1989] 3 WLR 1193; [1989] 3 All ER 598, CA.

112 (1990) 91 Cr App R 237; [1990] Crim LR 572, CA. See also Heslop [1996] Crim LR 730.

113 Foster [1987] Crim LR 821; Keenan [1989] 3 All ER 598.

directly relevant to placing the suspect in a disadvantageous position at interview where there was no dispute between defence and prosecution as to the admissions made (although the defence may be alleging that they are untrue), but there was an allegation that the breach had allowed some impropriety to occur which had pressurised the suspect into making admissions. It may now be impossible to determine whether the defence or prosecution version of events during the interview is correct because of the defective record. Equally, access to legal advice can affect the evidential integrity of a confession: the legal adviser can give evidence in court as to what occurred during the interview and, if the interview record is defective, can support the defendant's version of what was said, thus lending support to the argument that the interview should be admitted. Conversely, if in such circumstances legal advice had been improperly denied, but the defendant was able to cope without advice, the unfairness would arise out of the inability of the defence to challenge the defective interview record rather than to the adverse effect of lack of advice.¹¹⁴ In such instances, the subordinate function of the rule should determine the test to be applied. Thus, in the first example given, the only question would be whether the causal relationship between impropriety and confession could be established, assuming that it was impossible to determine the truth or otherwise of the allegation of impropriety.

In the cases considered above, it was not clear that the police had deliberately failed to comply with the rules; the failures in question may have arisen out of a mistake as to the application of PACE or because of an administrative error. It seems that if the police have acted deliberately, the exercise under s 78 will be far less complex. Lord Lane CJ in *Alladice*¹¹⁵ stated that he would not have hesitated to hold that the confession should have been excluded had it been demonstrated that the police had acted in bad faith in breaching s 58. The lack of emphasis he thought should in general be placed on the causal relationship in question, if bad faith on the part of the police could be demonstrated, was the most striking feature of this decision. His approach appears to involve asking only whether a breach was accompanied by bad faith. If so, that would appear to be the end of the matter: exclusion of the confession would follow almost automatically. If the breach occurred in good faith, however, a close scrutiny of the causal relationship should follow.

Using the questions of bad faith and causation as alternatives to keep a check on a too ready exclusion of confessions can be criticised because it is hard to see why an instance of bad faith on the part of the police which is not causally linked to the confession should be considered in relation to its admissibility. Deliberate denial of rights certainly gives a greater appearance of unfairness to the interrogation than an innocent denial, but if the detainee is unaffected by it, why should it affect the trial? It cannot be said that the court is associating itself with or condoning the bad faith displayed by the police in the interrogation because the link between the two—the admissions arising from the denial of rights—is missing. If, in future, the situation which arose in Alladice recurs, but with the added ingredient of bad faith, it is hard 114 This occurred in Dunn (1990) 91 Cr App R 237; [1990] Crim LR 572, CA. Ironically, the confession was admitted into evidence owing to the fact that the defendant's legal adviser had been present and could support his assertion that it had been fabricated; the jury presumably disbelieved her and convicted on that basis.

115 (1988) 87 Cr App R 380.

to see why the consequences for the future defendant should differ so greatly. The only justification appears to be that the police are ‘punished’ for their deliberate impropriety, but the disciplinary approach has been explicitly repudiated, in *Delaney*¹¹⁶ and *Chalkley*¹¹⁷ on the basis that it is not part of the proper purpose of a criminal trial to inquire into wrongdoing on the part of the police. Nevertheless, at present, deliberate breaches of Code C will almost certainly lead to exclusion of evidence under s 78 whether the breaches were linked to the confession or not. The Court of Appeal in *Walsh*¹¹⁸ confirmed that this was the correct approach and suggested that it would be followed even if the breach was of a trivial nature. In fact, the dearth of cases on this point suggests that courts are reluctant to accept that a breach of PACE may have been perpetrated deliberately.

It may be noted that a judge may exceptionally admit the confession after deciding to exclude it because some particular feature of the trial proceedings makes it necessary to do so in order to maintain the balance of fairness between prosecution and defence.¹¹⁹ In other words, if it was clear that in some way the prosecution is at a disadvantage which could be seen as equal to that experienced by the defendant, the judge might allow the confession to be admitted. This flows from the concern of s 78 with the fairness of the proceedings rather than simply fairness to the defence. Reconsidering the decision to admit the confession could not occur under s 78, since it only operates before evidence is admitted (although s 82(3) might be invoked—see below).

Section 78: exclusion of non-confession evidence¹²⁰

The arguments above have concentrated on exclusion of admissions, but it must be borne in mind that non-confession evidence can also be excluded under s 78 (or s 82(3)), although not under s 76. Where non-confession evidence is concerned, the courts have taken a stance which differs strongly from that taken to admissions obtained in police interviews which breach PACE. The general stance taken is that improperly obtained evidence is admissible in a criminal trial subject to a discretion to exclude it. Except in one instance—that of identification evidence—the discretion is viewed as very narrow, although where the impropriety consists of some forms of trickery, it may be wider. The courts have shown little inclination to take a different stance where the impropriety consists of a breach of a Convention right,¹²¹ although that approach might change under the HRA.

116 (1989) 88 Cr App R 339; (1988) The Times, 20 August, CA.

117 [1998] 2 All ER 155.

118 [1989] Crim LR 822.

119 See Allen [1992] Crim LR 297: having decided to exclude a conversation between police officers and the defendant because of breaches of the recording provisions, the judge reconsidered when the nature of the defence case became apparent; it placed prosecution witnesses at an unfair disadvantage if they were unable to refer to the excluded conversation. Thus, it appears that in such circumstances the original unfairness caused to the defendant may be outweighed by unfairness to the prosecution if the confession is not admitted.

120 For discussion see Gelowitz, op cit, fn 70; Choo (1989) 9(3) LS 261; Allen, op cit, fn 70; Choo (1993) Journal of Crim Law 195; Choo and Nash, op cit, fn 70; Sharpe, (1998) Chapter 2.

121 See the judgment of the House of Lords in Khan [1997] AC 558.

Identification evidence

Identification evidence has been seen as particularly vulnerable and may therefore be treated in the same way as a confession obtained in breach of PACE. Arguments can be raised as to the reliability of identification evidence and also as to police impropriety in conducting identification. For example, if no reminder as to the availability of legal advice were given (para 2.15(ii)) before an identification was arranged, it could be argued that the form of the identification used prejudiced the position of the defendant, who would have asked for a different form had he had advice. It could be argued that no identification would have been made had the other form been used and that therefore, the failure to remind of the right to advice was causally linked to the identification evidence obtained. If some doubt is raised as to the reliability of the identification owing to delay¹²² or to a failure to hold an identification parade where one was practicable,¹²³ the identification evidence is likely to be excluded. However, in the leading decision on identification evidence, Forbes,¹²⁴ the House of Lords found that despite a breach of Code D, para 2.3, there had been no need to exclude the evidence.

Thus, following this decision, each case must turn on its own facts except where bad faith is shown in conducting the identification procedure. In such an instance, it seems that the courts will react to it as they would in relation to confessions.¹²⁵ It will mean that no causal relationship between the breach and the evidence obtained need be shown and, possibly, that the breach need not be substantial and significant. It may be argued that there is a stronger case than that considered above in relation to confessions for treating bad faith shown during the identification process with particular stringency owing to the appearance of unfairness created to the defendant who may think that there has been collusion between witnesses and the police.

Other non-confession evidence

On due process grounds, the argument accepted in *Samuel*¹²⁶ as to the causal relationship between an impropriety and a confession (where bad faith is not shown) should be applied to non-confession evidence, such as a weapon or drugs found on the suspect or his premises during an improper or unlawful search. However, where such evidence is in question, the discretion under s 78 is applied narrowly. The first instance decision in *Fennelly*¹²⁷ in which a failure to give the reason for a stop and search led to exclusion of the heroin found is out of line with the later decisions. Indeed, even if the principles developed under s 78 with respect to confession evidence were generally applied to other evidence, Fennelly would still be a doubtful decision since, on the facts, no causal relationship could exist between the impropriety in question and the evidence obtained.

122 Quinn [1990] Crim LR 581, CA; (1990) The Times, 31 March.

123 Ladlow [1989] Crim LR 219.

124 [2001] Crim LR 649.

125 Finley [1993] Crim LR 50, CA.

126 [1988] QB 615.

127 [1989] Crim LR 142.

According to *Thomas*¹²⁸ and Quinn,¹²⁹ physical evidence will be excluded only if obtained with deliberate illegality; the pre-PACE ruling of the House of Lords in *Fox*¹³⁰ would also lend support to this contention. In Fox, the police made a bona fide mistake as to their powers in effecting an unlawful arrest and the House of Lords, in determining that the physical evidence obtained was admissible, considered that the unlawful arrest was merely part of the history of the case and not the concern of the court. This stance is in accord with that taken in *Sang*¹³¹ and confirmed as correct in Khan (Sultan).¹³² It appears to be in accord with the general PACE scheme, since evidence obtained as a result of an inadmissible confession will be admissible under s 76(4).

Zander has pointed out,¹³³ citing, inter alia, Sharpe v DPP,¹³⁴ that the courts have rejected the 'real evidence of intoxication in certain drink-driving cases under s 78 owing to the way in which the evidence was obtained, even where bad faith may not have been present. Zander views the Divisional Court decision in Sharpe, along with the decisions in cases such as Samuel and *Gall*¹³⁵ (on identification evidence) as affirming an abandonment of 'the amoral common law tradition of receiving non-confession evidence regardless of how it was obtained'.¹³⁶ However, it may now be said with some certainty that the amoral common law tradition will continue to prevail.

The position as regards unlawfully obtained evidence, which reflects a crime control stance, is as stated by the House of Lords in Khan (Sultan),¹³⁷ now the leading case on s 78. It suggests that a narrow exclusionary discretion only is available under s 78, save where a confession may be said to be involuntary (in which case it would be excluded under s 76). A bugging device had been secretly installed on the outside of a house which Khan was visiting. Khan was suspected of involvement in the importation of prohibited drugs and the tape recording obtained from the listening device clearly showed that he was so involved. The case against him rested wholly on the tape recording. The defence argued, first, that the recording was inadmissible as evidence because the police had no statutory authority to place listening devices on private property and that therefore, such placement was a trespass and, further, that admission of the recording would breach Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, which protects the right to privacy. Secondly, it was argued that even if the recording was admissible, it should be excluded from evidence under s 78 because of the unfairness of admitting the evidence so. It was accepted in the Court of Appeal that trespass to the building had occurred as well as some damage to it and that there had been an invasion of privacy. However, the Court of Appeal found,¹³⁸ supporting the trial judge, that 128 [1990] Crim LR 269. See to the same effect Wright [1994] Crim LR 55.

129 [1990] Crim LR 581, CA.

130 [1986] AC 281; see to the same effect DPP v Wilson [1991] Crim LR 441. On similar facts, in Matto v Wolverhampton Crown Court [1987] RTR 337, physical evidence was excluded since the police had acted with mala fides.

131 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

132 [1997] AC 558; [1996] 3 All ER 289.

133 Zander, op cit, fn 1, pp 236–37.

134 (1993) JP 595.

135 (1990)90Cr App R 64.

136 Zander, op cit, in 1, p 236.

137 [1996] 3 All ER 289; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024. For comment see Carter (1997) 113 LQR 468.

138 Khan [1996] 3 All ER 289; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024, HL; [1995] QB 27, CA.

these factors were of slight significance and therefore were readily outweighed by the fact that the police had largely complied with the Home Office guidelines and that the offences involved were serious. The court found that since the Convention is not part of UK law, it was of only persuasive assistance.

The House of Lords upheld the Court of Appeal. The Lords relied on the decision in *Sang*¹³⁹ to the effect that improperly obtained evidence other than 'involuntary' confessions is admissible in a criminal trial. Involuntary confessions were inadmissible on the ground that if a defendant was in some way induced to confess during a police interrogation, his confession might be unreliable. It was argued for the appellant that the recording fell within the category of involuntary confessions and therefore was outside the rule from Sang. The House of Lords disagreed and went on to find that Sang would be inapplicable only if there were a right to privacy in UK law and breach of such a right could be treated as a form of impropriety different in kind from that covered by Sang and so serious that it would render evidence thereby obtained inadmissible. Neither of these two new principles was accepted; therefore, the recording was admissible.

Should the recording have been excluded under s 78, taking Art 8 into account? The House of Lords found that although a judge in exercising discretion under s 78 might take Art 8 into account; or any relevant foreign law, an apparent breach of Art 8 would not necessarily lead him or her to conclude that the evidence in question should be excluded. The key question would be the effect of the breach upon the fairness of the proceedings. The House of Lords concluded that the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, even if they involved a breach of Art 8, were not such as to require exclusion of the evidence.

This decision confirms that, apart from admissions falling within s 76 of PACE (which has partly replaced the common law concept of involuntariness), improperly obtained evidence is admissible in criminal trials subject to a discretion to exclude it. Thus, it fails to take a stance which protects due process. The House of Lords was only prepared to find that the Convention would be 'relevant' to the exercise of discretion under s 78 and further found that where a breach of the Convention was found, this would not necessarily lead a judge to conclude that evidence should be excluded.

In Chalkley,¹⁴⁰ the same stance was taken. The evidence consisted of incriminating statements made by the accused which were secretly recorded by the police. Despite the impropriety of the police actions, it was found that the evidence was rightly admitted. This stance did not change with the inception of the HRA. In AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999),¹⁴¹ a rape case, DNA evidence against the suspect should have been destroyed but had not been, in breach of s 64 of PACE. The evidence was not admitted under s 78 and the defendant was acquitted. On a reference of the Attorney General, it was found by the House of Lords, following the Sang principle, that the evidence could have been admitted, despite the breach of PACE. It was not found that Art 6 affected the position, since the Court has left the assessment of evidence to the national courts.

139 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222.

140 [1998] 2 Cr App R 79.

141 [2001] 2 WLR 56.

Thus, it may be said that the common law, post-HRA, continues to adhere to the crime control values implicit in the reliability principle. Khan may be consistent with the decisions on evidence obtained in breach of the interviewing or identification rules since, in such instances, it may be said that the evidence is unreliable.¹⁴² Thus, it seems that improperly obtained non-confession evidence, apart from identification evidence, will be admissible subject to a very narrow discretion to exclude it. This stance seems to afford encouragement to police officers to disregard suspects' rights in the pursuit of such evidence and amounts to a declaration by the courts that a conviction may be based on evidence which would not be before a court had police officers not acted unlawfully. In due process terms, a principled justification for creating a distinction between improperly obtained, but probably reliable, confession evidence and improperly obtained physical evidence is not apparent. The due process argument, to the effect that certain types of impropriety should lead almost automatically to exclusion of the evidence affected by them, has so far been rejected. However, the courts have not yet been faced, post-HRA, with non-confession evidence obtained through a breach of a Convention right. There are indications in Khan that in such circumstances, it might be excluded, on the basis of the integrity principle.

*Evidence obtained by tricks and undercover work*¹⁴³

As indicated, *Sang*¹⁴⁴ stated the general rule that improperly obtained evidence other than 'involuntary' confessions is admissible in a criminal trial subject to a very narrow discretion to exclude it. The fact that the police have acted as agents provocateurs, entrapping the defendant into a crime he would not otherwise have committed, was not found in Sang to mean that the evidence gained thereby should be excluded. The current position as regards tricks or undercover work by police was stated by the Court of Appeal in Smurthwaite.¹⁴⁵ The mere fact that the evidence has been obtained in the course of an undercover operation, of necessity involving deceit, does not of itself require a judge to exclude it. Everything will depend on the particular circumstances in question. For example, how active or passive was the officer's role in obtaining the evidence? What is the nature of the evidence and is it unassailable? If the officer's role is active, the evidence will be viewed as having been obtained by entrapment or by an agent provocateur and will probably be excluded. Smurthwaite suggests that the discretion to exclude 'unfair' evidence is of a somewhat wider scope than that indicated in Sang.

However, in the majority of cases, evidence obtained by a deception has been admitted,¹⁴⁶ but where the deception 'creates' the evidence and it is not possible to say that the defendant has applied himself to the ruse, the courts will tend to exclude 142 See the comments of the Court of Appeal in Bray (1998) 31 July, unreported, to the effect that where the impropriety does not affect the quality of the evidence, it should be admitted.

143 For discussion see Sharpe [1994] Crim LR 793; Robertson, Crim LR 805; Heydon [1980] Crim LR 129; Birch (1994) CLP 73.

144 [1980] AC 402; [1979] All ER 1222, HL.

145 [1994] All ER 898; (1994) 98 Cr App R 437, CA.

146 See, eg, Maclean and Kosten [1993] Crim LR 687; Gill and Ranuana [1991] Crim LR 358; Edwards [1991] Crim LR 45, CA.

147 See Colin Stagg (1994) unreported, but see national newspapers 15 September 1994; H [1987] Crim LR 47.

it.¹⁴⁷ In Williams and O'Hare v DPP,¹⁴⁸ police officers set up a 'Virtue-testing' operation in order to see who might succumb to temptation. An insecure vehicle apparently loaded with cigarettes was left in a high crime area in order to catch would-be thieves. The resultant evidence was not excluded, since it was not found that it had been obtained by means of entrapment. The stance taken in Smurthwaite was confirmed by the House of Lords in *Shannon*¹⁴⁹ although the Lords took, it is suggested, a narrower view of practices amounting to entrapment. Reporters rather than undercover officers carried out a 'sting' operation in which evidence of drug dealing was obtained. Although it was arguable that the accused had, to an extent, been enticed into incriminating himself, the Lords found that the evidence thereby gained could rightly be viewed as admissible. It is suggested below that this stance is not fully in accord with that taken at Strasbourg.

In Mason,¹⁵⁰ the defendant had been tricked into confessing to damaging his neighbour's car by the police, who had falsely informed him and his solicitor that his fingerprints had been found on incriminating evidence. The Court of Appeal held that the confession should have been excluded under s 78: the trial judge had erred in omitting to take into account the deception practised on D's solicitor. The court appeared to view the deliberate deception practised by the police as the most significant factor without making it clear why the trial would be rendered unfair by admission of the confession gained thereby. It might have been better to have shown explicitly that the confession should be excluded on the basis that the police had acted improperly in deceiving the solicitor; the deception of the solicitor had resulted in receipt of the confession and the failure to exclude it meant that the court of first instance had, in effect, condoned the impropriety involved.

However, although deliberate impropriety may lead to the exclusion of evidence, it must, of course, be determined whether certain techniques will be designated improper. This issue has arisen particularly in the context of undercover police operations and secretly taped conversations. In Bailey,¹⁵¹ investigating officers and the custody officer put on a charade intended to convince the suspects who had been charged that they did not wish to place them both in the same cell, which was bugged. This fooled the suspects who made incriminating admissions. It was submitted that the admissions should not have been admissible as undermining the spirit of Code C and especially the right to silence, since the men could not have been questioned by police at that point. However, the Court of Appeal rejected this argument on the basis that the evidence was reliable and that the conversation between the suspects could not be equated with a police interview. In other words, although there was a deception, and therefore the police could be viewed as passively recording a conversation that would have occurred anyway, that fact had no influence on the decision.

In Christou,¹⁵² undercover police set up a jeweller's shop purporting to be willing to deal in stolen property and transactions with customers were recorded by means

148 [1993] CrimLR 775.

149 [2001] 1 WLR 51.

150 [1987] Crim LR 119; [1987] 3 All ER 481, CA; see also Woodall and Others [1989] Crim LR 288 in which the 'trick' consisted of allowing the detainee to think that an off-the-record interview could take place in the police station.

151 (1993) The Times, 22 March; [1993] 3 All ER 513.

of recording equipment hidden in the shop. The police officers engaged in conversation with the defendants who came to sell recently stolen jewellery and asked them questions. They also asked the defendants to sign receipts for the jewellery. The defendants were convicted of handling stolen goods and appealed on the basis that all the evidence against them gained through the undercover operation should have been excluded either at common law under the principles enunciated in *Sang*¹⁵³ or under s 78 as obtained by deception: they would not have entered the shop had they known its true nature. This submission was rejected on the basis that the appellants had not been tricked, but had voluntarily applied themselves to the trick; although specific deception had occurred, such as the request to sign the receipts, that was to be treated as part of the general deceit concerning the dishonest jeweller's shop. Therefore, the trick had not resulted in unfairness. The test for unfairness was the same at common law and under s 78.

It was also submitted that the conversations were an interview within the purview of Code of Practice C; the provisions applying to interviews should, therefore, have been followed. This submission was rejected on the basis that the Code provisions were intended to apply only where police officer and suspect were on an unequal footing because the officer was perceived to be in a position of authority. However, this was not to be taken as encouragement to officers to use undercover operations as a method of circumventing the Code provisions. In saying this, the court clearly recognised the danger that this ruling might encourage plain clothes police officers to operate secretly using hidden tape recorders to tape admissions, in preference to arresting openly and administering a caution. However, their remarks left open the possibility that such action, if cleverly enough disguised as a genuinely necessary undercover operation, could lead to circumvention of Code C and consequent erosion of the privilege against self-incrimination.

In Bryce,¹⁵⁴ the Court of Appeal was clearly fully alive to this danger. An undercover police officer posed as the buyer of a stolen car and, in conversation with the appellant, asked him questions designed to show that the car in question was stolen. The appellant allegedly gave incriminating replies. He was then arrested, refused to comment during the tape recorded interview, but allegedly made further admissions after the tape recorder had been turned off. He appealed against conviction on the ground that the evidence of the conversations and the interview was inadmissible under s 78. On the issue as to the admissibility of the conversation with the undercover officer, it was determined that the case differed from that of Christou on the following grounds: first, the questions asked went directly to the issue of dishonesty and were not necessary to the undercover operation; secondly, the possibility of concoction arose, whereas in Christou the conversations were taped. As to the unrecorded interview, the possibility of concoction clearly arose, owing to the suspicious willingness of the appellant to make admissions after refusing to do so during the recorded interview. Therefore, the judge at trial should have exercised discretion to exclude both the conversation and the unrecorded interview.

152 [1992] QB 979; [1992] 4 All ER 559, CA. See also Williams and O'Hare v DPP [1993] Crim LR 775; Smurthwaite [1994] 1 All ER 898, CA.

153 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

154 [1992] 4 All ER 567; (1992) Cr App R 230; (1992) 142 NLJ 1161, CA.

Difficulty will arise after these two cases where it appears possible that a purported undercover operation has been used to circumvent the provisions of Code C, especially the need to caution, but the possibility of concoction does not arise, owing to the use of a hidden tape recorder. A court may have to draw a very fine line between questions asked going directly to the issue of guilt and those touching obliquely on it.

The common theme running through the cases considered is the use of a deception of one sort or another. The courts have had to draw fine lines between degrees of deception in determining whether or not admission of the evidence obtained would render the trial unfair. A rather different stance is taken, as indicated above, towards instances of secret recording in which no positive deception occurs, those in which it may be said that the role of the police is confined only to recording a conversation which would have taken place in any event. In such instances, it cannot be said that the police deception is instrumental in obtaining the evidence except in the hypothetical sense: had the defendant applied his mind to the possibility of secret recording, he might not have made the admissions in question. Passive secret recording may thus be contrasted with instances in which the police, or someone acting on their behalf, have created a situation which makes it likely that admissions will be made where otherwise they would not have been. This distinction may have led the courts to accept evidence derived from secret recordings¹⁵⁵ (except in the case of telephone tapping, where special rules apply)¹⁵⁶ more readily than evidence deriving from a 'positive' deception, since in comparison with other forms of deception, secret recording seems to be at the lower end of the scale. Moreover, although evidence obtained from secret recordings may have the same inculpatory effect as a confession made in police custody, the courts seem to view the two methods of obtaining admissions differently. The tendency, which reflects the reliability principle, is to view secretly recorded evidence as unaffected by the manner of its acquisition, unlike admissions made to the police in an interview conducted in breach of PACE. However, although secret recording may be regarded as less improper than the use of a positive deception, it may involve other forms of impropriety. Thus, in focusing only or mainly on the reliability of evidence obtained, the courts have demonstrated a clear preference for crime control over due process.

Section 82(3): the common law discretion

Section 82(3) provides:

Nothing in this part of the Act shall prejudice any power of a court to exclude evidence (whether by preventing questions from being put or otherwise) at its discretion.

This provision presumably preserves the whole of the common law discretion to exclude evidence, thanks to inclusion in it of the words 'or otherwise'. In practice, its role as regards exclusion of evidence is likely to be insignificant, owing to the width of s 78. However, a distinct function for s 82(3) was suggested in Sat-Bhambra,¹⁵⁷ it was held that ss 76 and 78 only operate before the evidence is led before the jury, but that s 82(3) can be invoked after that point. Similarly, Zander¹⁵⁸ argues that the common law discretion to exclude evidence is covered by both s 78 and s 82(3). Thus at present, s 82(3) may have a significant role to play only in preserving the judicial function of the judge in protecting witnesses or asking the jury to disregard evidence. The judge can at any point direct the jury to disregard evidence which has already been admitted and which may be unreliable.

155 See, eg, Shaukat Ali (1991) The Times, 19 February; Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police ex p Govell (1994) transcript from LEXIS; Effick (1992) 95 Cr App R 427, CA; [1994] 3 All ER 458, HL; Roberts (1997) 1 Cr App R 217.

156 See Preston [1993] 4 All ER 638; (1994) 98 Cr App R 405, HL. See now the scheme under RIPA 2000, s 17; discussed in Chapter 11, pp 684–88.

In O'Leary,¹⁵⁹ May CJ expressed the view that s 82(3) rather than s 78 preserves the common law discretion to exclude unreliable evidence (presumably in circumstances falling outside s 76(2)(b)). However, it is hard to see how to separate the questions of the admissibility of unreliable evidence and of unfairness at the trial. Admission of unreliable evidence will always affect the trial. In Parris,¹⁶⁰ evidence which may have been fabricated by the police was excluded under s 78, not s 82(3). It appears likely that s 78 will continue to be used as a means of excluding unreliable evidence if s 76(2)(b) cannot be invoked.

Mentally handicapped defendants: special rules

As noted above, the confession of a suspect who is mentally disordered or of low intelligence may be rendered inadmissible under s 76(2)(b) if the interrogation is not conducted with particular propriety.¹⁶¹ However, special rules will apply in the case of some mentally handicapped defendants. The confession of a mentally retarded defendant must be treated with particular caution. Under s 77, in such an instance, if the confession was not made in the presence of an independent person and if the case depends largely on the confession, the jury must be warned to exercise particular caution before convicting. (This does not apply to the mentally ill although the Royal Commission has recommended that it should be extended to cover all categories of mentally disordered suspects.)¹⁶²

In some such instances, s 77 need not be invoked because the judge should withdraw the case from the jury. In *McKenzie*¹⁶³ the appellant, who was of subnormal intelligence and had sexual problems, was arrested and questioned about arson offences and about the killing of two elderly women. He made detailed admissions as to the arson offences and the two killings in a series of interviews. He also admitted to 10 other killings which he had not committed. He appealed against his conviction for manslaughter and arson and it was held on appeal that where the prosecution case depends wholly on confession evidence, the defendant is significantly mentally handicapped and the confessions are unconvincing, the judge should withdraw the case from the jury. When these three tests were applied in the instant case in respect of the confessions to the killings, it was found that they were 158 Zander, op cit, fn 1, p 210. Case law has not identified a distinction between the functions of the two sections (see, eg, Christou [1992] 4 All ER 559).

157 (1988) JP Rep 365; (1988) Cr App R 55.

159 [1988] CrimLR 827, CA.

160 (1989) 9 Cr App R 68, CA.

161 See above, p 878.

162 Report Proposal 85.

163 [1993] 1 WLR 453; (1992) 142 NLJ 1162, CA.

satisfied, the third largely by the doubt cast on the appellant's credibility owing to his confessions to killings he could not have committed. However, the first test was not satisfied in respect of the convictions for arson. Those convictions could therefore stand, but those for manslaughter were quashed. These rules are clearly of value as a means of affording protection to a group of persons who are least able to withstand pressure from the police and most likely to make a false confession. However, it is suggested that the second test could usefully be broadened so that it includes all those suffering from significant mental impairment at the time when the offences took place.

Abuse of process

If malpractice by police or prosecutors reaches a certain level of seriousness, the trial can halted on the basis that to do otherwise would be an abuse of process. The House of Lords found in *Latif*¹⁶⁴ that in considering whether to stay the proceedings for abuse of process, the judge should weigh the public interest in ensuring that those accused of serious crimes are brought to trial against the public interest in avoiding giving the impression, based on classic crime control norms, that courts are prepared to find that the end justifies the means. This balancing of interests may be termed the 'Latif test'. The stance taken in Latif may be compared with that taken in *Mullen*¹⁶⁵ in which the Court of Appeal said: 'the need to discourage [blatant and very serious malpractice]...is a matter of public policy to which...very considerable weight should be attached'. However, these remarks do not suggest that an absolute test is in contemplation and in so far as there is a difference between the approaches of Mullen and Latif it is probable that the Latif test will prevail, since it derives from a House of Lords decision and is more in harmony with the approach taken to improperly obtained evidence under s 78, as indicated above.

In Chalkley,¹⁶⁶ Auld LJ stated that the issue of exclusion of evidence is distinct from the question whether the prosecution should be stayed for abuse of process. He said that while the discretion to declare an abuse of process would be governed by the balancing test referred to above, the discretion under s 78 would be governed almost entirely by the question whether the impropriety of the police or prosecutor had affected the reliability of the evidence. In other words, in exceptional circumstances, the trial might be halted to mark the court's disapproval of pre-trial malpractice; he considered that this would virtually never occur in respect of exclusion of evidence, except in the case of confessions.

3 TRIAL REMEDIES: EFFECTS OF THE HRA

Duties of the courts

Theoretically, a defendant could be convicted after a trial which failed to meet Art 6 standards, where the unfairness was due to incompatible domestic legislation.

164 [1996] 1 All ER 353.

165 [1999] 2 Cr App R 143, p 157.

166 [1998] 2 Cr App R 79.

This is allowed for under s 6(2)(b), as Chapter 4 points out.¹⁶⁷ If so, the conviction would have to stand and therefore, in general, there would appear to be no benefit in appealing to a higher court which could issue a declaration of incompatibility. But, there would be an incentive to appeal where there was leeway for the higher court to take a different view on incompatibility by finding a way of reconciling the domestic legislation with Art 6¹⁶⁸ or if there were grounds for expecting the higher court, once it had made the declaration, to award a lower sentence. In practice, however, it is likely that the domestic courts will be determined to avoid convicting and perhaps imprisoning a defendant under legislation which breaches the Convention, by declaring an abuse of process.¹⁶⁹

The domestic courts will, save for the s 6(2) HRA proviso concerning incompatible legislation, fail to satisfy s 6 of the HRA if they act incompatibly with the Convention rights, since they are themselves public authorities. The position appears to be that wherever a court has a discretion in the course of criminal procedure, a decision regarding its use of that discretion will amount to an 'act' within the meaning s 6 of the HRA.¹⁷⁰ If a court does violate the rights in taking decisions as to, inter alia, exclusion of evidence or abuse of process, ss 7 and 8 of the HRA will be relevant. As Chapter 4 explains, s 7 allows a victim of an alleged violation, or proposed violation, of a Convention guarantee to rely on the right in litigation, and to argue in particular that he would be a victim of an unlawful act if the act proposed is undertaken. Section 8 allows courts to grant such remedies as seem to them just and convenient for such violations.

The view might be taken that breaches of Convention rights by courts should be remedied through the appeal process and that s 6 alone, rather than ss 7 and 8, is therefore relevant during the trial process. This view would not accord, however, with the stance of the House of Lords in the leading pre-HRA decision, R v DPP ex p Kebilene and Others.¹⁷¹ In considering Art 6, the House of Lords pointed out, the domestic court is not, of necessity, in the same position as the Strasbourg court: 'it was inevitable that the European Court would conduct a retrospective review of [whether a trial was fair or unfair in Art 6(1) terms] in the national court', but that in the domestic court, this matter could be considered before completion of a trial. In other words, the Strasbourg Court could consider the whole pre-trial and trial process and come to a determination as to its fairness under Art 6(1). The domestic court would have to consider, during pre-trial hearings, the trial process, or on appeal, not only whether an actual or potential breach had occurred, but also whether Art 6 would be breached owing to its own regulation of the process. Ex p Kebilene suggests that appeals will not provide the only means of enforcing the Convention against courts. The better view, therefore, is that all three sections may be relied upon during the trial as well as on appeal.

The defendant might, for example, raise the argument that if the court failed to exclude evidence, Art 6(1) would be breached and that therefore, ss 7 and 8 require that the evidence should be excluded in order to avoid the breach. Section 8, as

167 See p 156.

168 Brown v Stott [2001] 2 WLR 817.

169 See the judgment of Lord Steyn in Ex p Kebilene [1999] 4 All ER 801.

170 This is the stance of the Strasbourg Court: see Z v Finland (1997) 25 EHRR 371.

171 [1999] 3 WLR 972.

indicated, appears to afford some discretion to a court as to awarding the remedy, but it is almost inconceivable that a court during a trial would accept the argument that it was about to act unlawfully, within s 6, but then, although it found leeway to do so and was not therefore affected by s 6(2), fail to provide a remedy by resiling from the threatened unlawfulness. A court might, of course, find, erroneously, that its particular decision during the criminal procedure would not breach Art 6, in which case the issue would have to be raised on appeal. A court adjudicating on the current grounds for allowing an appeal would itself be bound by s 6, but would theoretically also retain a discretion under s 8 as to the award of a remedy.

In accordance with the Strasbourg jurisprudence and s 6 of the HRA, the appeal court is itself bound by Art 6.¹⁷² The test for criminal appeals from the Crown Court is simply whether the conviction is ‘unsafe’.¹⁷³ In Mullen,¹⁷⁴ the Court of Appeal said that an abuse of process, or, equally, material irregularities at the trial would empower the court to find that a conviction was unsafe. If the Court of Appeal considered that despite a pre-trial breach of the Convention, a conviction was safe, this view could be challenged as itself—in the particular circumstances—contrary to Art 6. If Art 6 was itself breached owing to the effect of pre-trial improprieties, which were not cured at trial, it is hard to see that the conviction could be regarded as ‘safe’.

This is broadly the stance, with a narrow caveat, currently taken by the Court of Appeal. In Person,¹⁷⁵ the Court of Appeal said: ‘where this court takes the view that an appellant did not receive a fair trial this court would not, save in the most exceptional circumstances, reach the view that the conviction was nevertheless safe’. Now that Art 6 is binding on the Court of Appeal, the exception mentioned would cease to apply since otherwise, that court would be declaring, in effect, its intention to breach the Convention guarantee of a fair trial, contrary to s 6 of the HRA.

Requirements of Art 6

As Chapter 2 indicated, Art 6 is seen as a central Convention Article which holds a preeminent position in the Convention jurisprudence since the right it protects is so fundamentally important in a democratic society.¹⁷⁶ It expresses a ‘fundamental principle of the rule of law’¹⁷⁷ and is to be interpreted broadly.¹⁷⁸ The Court has tended to take an increasingly interventionist stance towards the right to a fair trial. Such a stance was evident in Teixeira v Portugal,¹⁷⁹ Van Mechelen v Netherlands,¹⁸⁰ *Saidi v France*¹⁸¹ and *Rowe and Davis v UK*¹⁸² although the Court continues to adhere to the principle that the assessment of evidence is for the national court.¹⁸³ Apart 172 Delcourt v Belgium A 11 (1970).

173 The Criminal Appeals Act 1968, s 2(1), as amended by the Criminal Appeals Act 1995. This provision, which allows the conviction to stand despite, eg, a misdirection of the judge, may require modification owing to the findings of the European Court in Condrón v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 1; see (2000) J Civ Lib 253.

174 [1999] 2 Cr App R 143.

175 (1998) The Times, 20 February.

176 See pp 57–58.

177 Salabiaku v France (1988) 13 EHRR 379.

178 Delcourt v Belgium (1970) 1 EHRR 355.

179 (1998) 28 EHRR 101; [1998] Crim LR 751.

180 (1998) 25 EHRR 657.

181 (1994) 17 EHRR 251.

from the right to be presumed innocent under Art 6(2), the guarantee of the access to legal advice and the other minimal guarantees of para 6(3),¹⁸⁴ the Court has found that a number of rights are implicit in the term a 'fair hearing'.¹⁸⁵ The principle of 'equality of arms'—equality between defence and prosecution—arising from Art 6(1) affects all aspects of a hearing, therefore overlapping with its expression under Art 6(3).¹⁸⁶

Instances in which a trial remedy may be required

The key question that a number of commentators have emphasised is whether the requirement of fairness under Art 6(1) is likely to add anything to the possibilities of creating police accountability by excluding evidence or staying the proceedings that already existed pre-HRA, domestically.¹⁸⁷ In particular, where the police have not adhered to the statutory safeguards for suspects, is it more likely under s 8 of the HRA that evidence thereby obtained will be excluded, possibly providing greater protection for suspects? As indicated above, Art 6(1) allows each Member State to determine its own rules of evidence. Nevertheless, the admission of evidence obtained in certain ways has been found to infringe Art 6. In these situations, the duty of the court under s 6 of the HRA requires it to exclude the evidence or stay the proceedings. Thus, in certain circumstances, Art 6 is likely to create greater accountability.

It was argued in Chapter 13 that where access to legal advice has been delayed, and the accused has remained silent in interviews without having had access to legal advice, a breach of Art 6(3)(c) and possibly of Art 6(1) is likely to occur if adverse inferences are then drawn at trial.¹⁸⁸ One method of preventing this, which has not been catered for under domestic law,¹⁸⁹ would be to exclude the interviews. A similar argument could also be put forward where, in the same circumstances, the accused had in fact made admissions in the interviews.

A similarly strong argument for exclusion of evidence under Art 6(1) could be raised where the evidence of informers, although not illegally obtained, might affect the fairness of the trial,¹⁹⁰ particularly where part of the evidence and/or the identity of the informer is not disclosed to the defence.¹⁹¹ The rules on disclosure under the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 create a regime which allows sensitive material to be withheld by the prosecution so that neither the court nor the defence is aware of its existence.¹⁹² Where this has occurred, argument for

182 (2000) 30 EHRR 1.

183 Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

184 See Chapter 2, pp 63–64; Chapter 13, pp 860–64.

185 For general discussion see Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of The European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, Chapter 6; Ovey, C, 'The ECHR and the criminal lawyer: an introduction' [1998] Crim LR 4; Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 11.

186 The principle is fully established and long standing in the Art 6 jurisprudence: see X v FRG (1963) 6 YB 520, p 574. See further Chapter 2, p 62.

187 See, eg, Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 1, p 1465.

188 See pp 860–64. This argument is based on Murray v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 29, Averill v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 35, and Magee v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 35.

189 The Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, s 58, only provides that in such circumstances adverse inferences may not be drawn.

190 For detailed discussion see Justice, Under Surveillance: Covert Policing and Human Rights Standards, 1998, Chapter 2, especially pp 37–51 and Chapter 3, especially pp 70–74.

exclusion of evidence could be raised under Art 6 at first instance or on appeal, based on the general requirements of fairness and on the ‘equality of arms’ principle.¹⁹³ The domestic courts would be expected to test issues of admissibility of evidence and of disclosure more directly against the requirements of Art 6 than has generally occurred at Strasbourg, owing to the effect of the margin of appreciation doctrine.

It was found in an early decision, Austria v Italy,¹⁹⁴ that maltreatment with the aim of extracting a confession created a breach of Art 6(2). This argument can be applied where ‘compelled’ admissions, including those obtained by treatment falling within s 76, and those obtained on pain of a penalty under the TA,¹⁹⁵ while not themselves used in evidence, had led to the uncovering of other evidence. It could be argued, in furtherance of a fair procedure under Art 6, that that other evidence should be excluded under s 78. The question of pressure on the applicant in the interview was taken into account by the Court in reaching its conclusion that Art 6 had been breached in *Saunders v UK*¹⁹⁶ by the admission in evidence of the coerced admissions, and the argument could be extended to encompass other evidence uncovered as a result of such admissions. Clearly, the decision in *Brown v Stott*¹⁹⁷ has, however, weakened this argument to an extent, since the courts in future are likely to consider the legitimate aim of the compulsion and the question whether the compulsion is in proportion to the aim in creating a minimal impact on the accused’s Art 6 rights.

The general stance regarding police impropriety

Thus, there are certain instances in which the Strasbourg jurisprudence would support excluding evidence or staying the proceedings in order to meet the requirements of Art 6. But, aside from such instances, the general question of using exclusion of evidence or a stay where police impropriety has occurred arises, and Strasbourg has not offered much guidance as to the requirements of Art 6. Even in such instances, the stance of the domestic court cannot be predicted with any certainty. The domestic courts are not bound by the Strasbourg jurisprudence under s 2 of the HRA and may consider even in such instances that a trial remedy is not required. As indicated below, the domestic courts are likely to concentrate on the particular facts of each case and, in particular, on the question of the reliability of the evidence, in relation to the question of its exclusion. In contrast, a stay may occasionally be determined upon, even where the evidence may be reliable.

191 Eg, the evidence might be tainted owing to the motivation of the informer. In Windisch v Austria [1990] 13 EHRR 281 the Court said: ‘the Convention does not preclude reliance, at the investigation stage, on sources such as anonymous informants. However, the subsequent use of their statements by the trial court to found a conviction is another matter.’ But see Edwards v UK (1992) 15 EHRR 417 (it was found that the hearing in the CA remedied the failure of disclosure). These issues were, however, raised successfully under Art 6 in Rowe and Davis v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 1.

192 For discussion see Archbold: Criminal Pleading, Practice and Evidence, 1999, para 12–52.

193 In Jespers v Belgium, the Commission found that under Art 6(3), the accused has the right ‘to have at his disposal...all relevant elements that have been or could have been collected by the relevant authorities’: App no 8403/78, 27 DR 61.

194 AppI No 788/60 4 YB 112 (1961).

195 See Chapter 13, pp 846–48.

196 (1997) 23 EHRR 313. Saunders is discussed in Chapter 13, p 855.

197 [2001] 2 WLR 817

Clearly, in the case of very serious malpractice, including breaches of Convention rights, the court would view it as impossible to sustain the view that Art 6 would not be breached if the trial went ahead or if, depending on the circumstances, evidence was not excluded. As indicated, the statutory provisions leave this matter open; the only instance in which it is not a matter either of statutory interpretation under s 76, or a matter of discretion under s 78 or in respect of staying the proceedings, is in the case of confessions obtained in breach of Art 3, under s 76(2)(a). The discussion has shown that the courts have continued the common law tradition within the PACE scheme of excluding confessions tainted by impropriety, but they have shown great reluctance to exclude other evidence which is equally tainted. A stay will be used only in relation to certain instances of gross malpractice.

In practice, bearing in mind their previous tendency to exclude such evidence where impropriety or unlawfulness has occurred in the investigative or custodial process, domestic courts will probably exercise discretion in such a way as to ensure that admissions and, probably, silences are excluded under s 78 in compliance with Art 6(1). The domestic jurisprudence is far more extensive on this matter than that regarding confessions under Art 6, and, despite the reluctance of the judiciary to lay down guiding principles for the application of s 78, academics in an extensive literature have identified some indications of adherence to such principle.¹⁹⁸ The effect of Art 6 may be to encourage some clearer statements of principle.

But the stance currently taken towards non-confession evidence, including evidence obtained from informers and from other forms of surveillance, may not satisfy Art 6(1). As indicated, under domestic practice, evidence gained through a very serious impropriety, including a breach of a Convention right, is admissible, as is, under s 76(4) of PACE, physical evidence uncovered through an inadmissible confession gained as a result of impropriety, not excluding Art 3 treatment. The discretion to exclude non-confession evidence is very narrow and the impact which s 78 has had in encouraging adherence to due process may be diminishing at the present time. As L-T-Choo observes: 'recent decisions of the Court of Appeal signal a movement away from focusing on the nature of the breach [of PACE or the Codes] and towards an approach which takes the nature of the evidence as its central consideration'.¹⁹⁹ In other words, the movement is away from due process values and towards acceptance of the crime control norm that the end—a conviction—justifies the means. Until recently, there were expectations that such movement could be reversed under Art 6 following an interpretation of the Teixeira approach to the effect that some forms of evidence gathering would almost automatically render the trial unfair.

From a due process perspective, such an activist interpretation of Art 6 has been urged, and some commentators argued for a near-absolute rule requiring exclusion of evidence where it has been obtained in breach of a fundamental 198 See Allen, op cit, fn 70; Gelowitz, op cit, fn 70; May, op cit, fn 70; Stone, op cit, fn 70; Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 11, Part 5.

199 Choo and Nash, op cit, fn 70.

constitutional right or where its admission would breach the right to a fair trial.²⁰⁰ Clearly, it was tempting to argue that Art 6 requires that a court should not merely inquire into the truth of the charges against a defendant: it should also play a part in maintaining standards in criminal investigations, in discouraging police abuse of power and upholding the due process elements within the investigative process which correspond to the rights of the detainee recognised under PACE and the TA.

Clearly, the requirements placed on the domestic courts depend on the view taken of the meaning of fairness under Art 6. Strasbourg and the domestic courts have united in finding that a breach of another Convention right, perpetrated pre-trial, does not automatically render the trial unfair.²⁰¹ Therefore, the fact that such a breach has occurred is part of the history of the case which can be taken into account in considering the proceedings as a whole, but which, except in the case of a breach of Art 3 in order to obtain a confession,²⁰² is not conclusive of the issue regarding fairness. The same argument applies to findings that flaws in the custodial and investigative procedures, including breaches of the PACE or TA Codes of Practice, not amounting in themselves to breaches of Convention rights, have occurred. They could be addressed, under ss 6 and 7 of the HRA, by means of exclusion of evidence or a stay for abuse of process, in order to avoid breaching Art 6(1), but only if the trial would otherwise be unfair. The discussion below will consider the general Strasbourg stance in relation to improperly obtained evidence and its probable impact on domestic practice under the HRA.

The domestic response to Teixeira v Portugal: the narrow view

As discussed above, *Teixeira de Castro v Portugal*²⁰³ laid down quite a strict test in relation to evidence obtained by entrapment. Where there had been enticement by undercover officers to supply drugs, the applicant was found to have been 'definitively deprived of a fair trial'.²⁰⁴ The case could be distinguished from Ludi v Switzerland,²⁰⁵ in which no breach of Art 6 was found where a police officer had posed as a buyer in a drug deal which was already under way. The Court, therefore, did not find that undercover work of this type would inevitably affect the fairness of the trial. The test was whether the defendant could be said to be 'predisposed' to commit the offence in question. If so, unfairness would not be established. This test arguably differs slightly from the current one under UK law. As indicated above, if undercover officers give the defendant an opportunity to commit the offence where it appears that he would have committed it had the opportunity been offered by someone else, that is not entrapment; but it will amount to entrapment if they impliedly persuade him into it or otherwise can be said to instigate it. It is suggested 200 See, eg, Ashworth, A, 'Article 6 and the fairness of trials' [1999] Crim LR 261, p 271.

201 Khan [1997] AC 558 and Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

202 Under s 76(2)(a).

203 (1998) 28 EHHR 101; [1998] Crim LR 751. See also Van Mechelen v Netherlands (1998) 25 EHRR 647; the findings of the Commission and Court in Rowe and Davis (2000) 30 EHRR 1; Condron v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 1.

204 Ibid, para 39.

205 (1993) 15 EHRR 173.

206 [1994] 1 All ER 898.

that while *Smurthwaite*²⁰⁶ is probably in harmony with the test as laid down by the Court in Teixeira, Williams and O'Hare v DPP is not, since it was not certain that the particular offences in question would have been committed without the intervention of those conducting the 'sting'.

However, the first domestic decision to apply Teixeira, Nottingham CC v Mohammed Amin,²⁰⁷ gave it a restrictive interpretation in distinguishing it on somewhat narrow grounds. The respondent, who was driving an unlicensed motor vehicle, responded to a flagging down by two constables posing as members of the public; he took them to their destination, where the fare was paid over. He contended that the constables had not confined themselves to passive investigation but had incited him to commit the offence, thereby rendering the proceedings as a whole unfair. Lord Bingham found that he had not been pressured or incited into committing an offence. The basis on which it was found that flagging him down—a positive action—was not incitement to commit the offence is, it is suggested, unclear. The respondent had turned off his light, thereby indicating that he was not for hire.²⁰⁸ Similarly, in Shannon,²⁰⁹ the Court of Appeal was unwilling to characterise the behaviour of the reporters as being that of agents provocateurs. But it was also found that even if their behaviour had crossed the borderline into that of an agent provocateur, it would not have been viewed as right to disturb the discretion of the judge to admit the evidence.²¹⁰ This stance was confirmed in *AG's Reference (No 3 of 2000)*²¹¹ in which, on facts bearing quite a strong resemblance to those of Teixeira, it was found that the judge should not have stayed the trial, applying Teixeira, on the basis that the defendant had been encouraged to commit the offence in question by the undercover officers. Instead, it was found that the fact of enticement to commit the offence was not enough: a number of questions should have been asked concerning the defendant's freedom of choice and the extent to which he had been pressured into supplying drugs.

Thus, the key question appears to be whether the courts are prepared to express disapproval of certain evidence gathering techniques by excluding the evidence in question, as Teixeira arguably appears to require. In Shannon, the Court of Appeal appeared to be determined to view Teixeira as an abuse of process case rather than as applicable to exclusion of evidence, on the basis that to find otherwise would create a conflict with the finding of the Court in Schenk.²¹² On this basis, the courts are able to disregard possible conflicts between the domestic basis for excluding evidence obtained by agent provocateurs and the Strasbourg basis, as expressed in Teixeira. It is suggested that determination to retain and maximise judicial discretion, allowing for the pursuit of crime control aims untrammelled by due process constraints imported from Strasbourg, provides the true reason for taking this view of Teixeira.

207 [2000] 1WLR 1071; [2000] Crim LR 174.

208 Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was granted, but it is suggested that the Lords are likely to agree with Lord Bingham.

209 [2001] 1 WLR 51.

210 Ibid, p 73, para 50.

211 [2001] Crim LR 645.

212 (1988) 13 EHRR 242.

Reconciling Teixeira v Portugal and Khan v UK: the broad view

The current narrow interpretation of s 78 of PACE²¹³ indicated above means that improperly obtained non-confession evidence will not be excluded, whether or not the impropriety also amounted to a breach of a Convention right. In other words, the admission of evidence in such circumstances need not amount to a breach of Art 6. The findings in *AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999)*²¹⁴ suggest that at present, there is a tendency to reject the possibility of using exclusion of evidence to uphold fundamental rights. This seems to be the case even where such rights are recognised within a statutory scheme; and possibly also where the breach is of a Convention right. The case of *Khan v UK*²¹⁵ will be utilised by the courts to support this probability, despite the inception of the HRA. It was found in Khan that the admission of evidence obtained in breach of Art 8 did not create a breach of Art 6. It could be argued on a broad view of the decision that Teixeira de Castro is apparently out of accord with Khan since, in so far as the effect of the impropriety at issue in Teixeira might have been cured by exclusion of the evidence, the Court implied that there would be virtually no judicial discretion left to exercise to admit it.

Of course this is not the reading of Teixeira that the courts are adopting, as indicated above. But it is a possible reading. It is unfortunate that the Court did not address the question whether excluding the evidence obtained by entrapment would have rendered the trial fair. In the particular circumstances, the trial would probably have collapsed and therefore that question was of little import. But presumably, the Court itself wished to characterise the matter as one that did not reach into the question of exclusion of evidence since otherwise, it would have had to take a stance on the question of the assessment of evidence which it prefers to leave to the national court. But since it deliberately avoided the question of exclusion of evidence, it is arguable that in some circumstances the principle from Teixeira could be utilised to argue, not for the abandonment of the trial, but for exclusion of the evidence tainted by the unfairness. Moreover, there is a readily apparent argument to the effect that Khan v UK does not in fact imply that the failure to exclude evidence obtained in breach of a fundamental right meets nationally accepted standards of procedural justice, since Strasbourg merely decided that the assessment of evidence was for the national court. In other words, it conceded a margin of appreciation to the national court, leaving it free to take a different stance as to the exclusion of improperly obtained evidence.

A robust interpretation of the Art 6 guarantee of fairness, bearing Teixeira in mind, would support a requirement that an impropriety or illegality in the custodial or investigative procedures would tend to tip the scales towards exclusion of the evidence obtained as a result, including non-confession evidence.²¹⁶ The very significant difference between the positions of the Strasbourg and the national courts

213 See Chalkley [1998] 2 All ER 155; Khan [1997] AC 558 and Shannon [2001] 1 WLR 51.

214 [2001] 2 WLR 56, p 64, per Lord Steyn, and p 65, per Lord Cook of Thorndon.

215 (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

216 In this context, the decision of the Court of Appeal in R v Radak and Others [1999] 1 Cr App R 187; (1999) The Times, 7 October should be noted. The decision related to admission of a written witness statement pursuant to the Criminal Justice Act 1988, ss 23, 25 and 26, and was concerned with prosecution rather than police impropriety. But the decision is of interest since the court relied heavily on Art 6(1) and (3)(d) in finding that the judge's discretion under s 26 had been wrongly exercised, since he had failed to safeguard the defendants' rights in accordance with the Art 6 requirements.

would support such an interpretation. In particular, it might be found that breach of the Convention guarantees in the pre-trial procedures would make it virtually inevitable that the trial would be rendered unfair if evidence deriving from the breach were not excluded.

If this interpretation is adopted, which currently appears to be very unlikely, it would mean that in so far as certain of the due process rights enshrined in PACE, the TA and their associated Codes reflect certain of the principles enshrined in Arts 3, 5, 6 or 8, their status might be enhanced. One particular effect would be that the PACE or TA Code provisions in question, as the detailed domestic embodiment of those rights, would be accorded de facto a higher value than their legal status would appear to warrant.

Moving beyond due process and crime control

It was argued in the Introduction to this chapter that a more developed conception of criminal justice would take into account the interests of victims in dignity and in equality as well as the requirement of fairness to the accused. The issues of exclusion of evidence and of staying the proceedings provide a forum for considering what such a more developed conception might mean. Rape cases in particular highlight the problem of concentrating only on a gender-neutral account of the requirements of fairness to the accused, although the issues they raise also have a wider application.

It could be argued that where evidence which is reliable is crucial to the case, the Convention rights of the victim should be taken into account in making a determination as to its admittance or exclusion. If the accused walks free from court, the victim's life may be profoundly disrupted owing to psychological disturbance, fear, and physical constraints, such as feeling forced to move to a different area. She is likely to be profoundly affected in the free ordering of her life by the knowledge that the rapist is at large. These experiences may occur in any event, but there is a large body of evidence to the effect that the victim's recovery is affected by the conviction of the attacker,²¹⁷ while her physical security at the point at which she is psychologically most vulnerable will be affected by the fact that he has been imprisoned. Thus, it is argued that a developed conception of criminal justice would allow such considerations to be taken into account, under the rubrics of Arts 8, 14 and 3. The issue might be put squarely before the court if, for example, a women's campaigning group was allowed to intervene in order to argue that the courts' duty under s 6 of the HRA required it to take the victims' Convention rights into account.

Similar considerations apply in respect of the victims of many offences. The victim of a serious violent offence may be said to suffer a violation of his or her right to security of the person and possibly to privacy and freedom of movement if an offender is acquitted, not on the basis of doubts about his or her guilt, but as a result of police impropriety. The victim of a racial attack, or the family of the victim, may experience a similar restriction. Article 2 might also be engaged. To take an extreme example: if, in the case of a trial for attempted murder, a court excluded, owing to a serious breach of Art 8, tape recorded evidence linking a defendant with a history of domestic violence to the attempted murder of his wife, the possibility of her subsequent murder could be viewed as engaging the duty of the court under s 6 of the HRA to abide by Art 2.²¹⁸

217 See, eg, Lees, S, Ruling Passions, Sexual Violence, Reputation and the Law, 1997; Sexual Violence: The Reality for Women, 1999.

Such arguments clearly look like crime control arguments and they may well lead to the same outcome. However, feminist and victim-orientated arguments should not merely be co-opted by advocates of crime control.²¹⁹ The difference is that such arguments may be viewed as based on principle, while crime control arguments are purely consequentialist. While the crime control model would not allow for a nuanced, proportionate approach to exclusion of evidence since it would merely ask whether it was reliable, the approach which takes account of the victims' interests can be more nuanced since in some instances, the victims' interests could not be said to be engaged. The question is whether to elevate the concerns of Art 6 above those of Arts 8 or 3 or 14, which are, or may be, it is argued, engaged by the issues in question. Clearly, the court has a public duty to uphold standards of criminal justice which go beyond the interests of the victim.²²⁰ However, strands of Convention jurisprudence are emerging which may allow for those interests to be taken into account in adoption of a nuanced approach.²²¹ The Convention provides a growing recognition of victims' rights.²²² In particular, there is now a significant body of jurisprudence recognising rights of victims and victims' families within the criminal justice system where the State is the 'attacker'.²²³ Thus, there is a case for arguing, under the HRA, that the impact of a decision to exclude evidence or stay the proceedings should be considered from a perspective which is not bounded by Art 6 concerns alone.

Conclusions

While due process demands that improperly obtained evidence should be excluded, that the police officers involved should be disciplined or prosecuted, and, where appropriate, that compensation should be available, it is unclear that it demands, in principle, that a person who is factually guilty of an offence should be acquitted. If evidence is excluded and, as a result, the burden of proof cannot be discharged, acquittal must clearly follow. But methods of escaping from the conflicts of interest indicated inherent in such exclusion should be sought. Such acquittals uphold the integrity of the criminal justice system since they demonstrate a refusal of the courts to associate themselves with a fundamental breach of rights, but they profoundly fail to address the interests of victims, also recognised at Strasbourg, their relatives, and the general societal interest in the prevention of crime. Moreover, although exclusion of evidence may have symbolic value in terms of integrity, it has not been viewed at Strasbourg as providing an effective remedy for breach of a 218 See Osman v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 245, discussed in Chapter 2, pp 39 and 60.

219 For discussion, see Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties Law, 2000, p 194; Young, J, The Exclusion Society: Social Exclusion, Crime and Difference in Late Modernity, 1999.

220 See Fenwick, H, 'Procedural rights of victims of crime: public or private ordering of the criminal justice process?' (1997) 60 MLR 317–33.

221 See further Chapter 2, pp 39–40.

222 See X and Y v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235.

223 Kaya v Turkey (1998–1) ECtHR 297; Akdivar v Turkey (1997) 23 EHRR 143; Mentes v Turkey (1997) 27 EHRR 595; Gulec v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 121; Cetin v Turkey (unreported); Tekin v Turkey RJD 1998-IV 53.

224 Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310, paras 44–47.

Convention right,²²⁴ and it clearly can have no impact on the overwhelming majority of cases in which the defendant pleads guilty. Given that, increasingly, the police know that the case is unlikely to come to trial,²²⁵ the deterrent effect of exclusion, such as it is, may be diminishing. Even in cases that do come to trial, exclusion of evidence can have no impact where there is other evidence which can support the conviction. Stays for abuse of process are rarely used and arguably their use is arbitrary; therefore, they are unlikely to have a significant impact on police practice.

These arguments strengthen the case for further, more radical reform of the police complaints and disciplinary system and of CPS decision making, since so doing would tend to discourage illegality and impropriety and enhance levels of adherence to the PACE rules, including the Code provisions. Arguments for exclusion of evidence on the basis of police impropriety might be raised less frequently. There is a further pragmatic reason for adopting this approach. The judges have made it clear that despite the inception of the HRA, they are wedded to the common law tradition of admitting evidence even if it has been obtained improperly. If anything, decisions such as Forbes and Shannon suggest that their determination to adhere to this tradition has been strengthened by the inception of the HRA. Possibly, this is another example of the common law resisting or subsuming the influence of the Convention. Maintenance of judicial discretion to react to the facts of particular cases remains the overwhelming priority and, in furtherance of this aim, the requirements of Art 6 have been minimised. Given that this clear pattern is now emerging, remedies must be sought elsewhere, while at the same time failures of police accountability should be used to press for organisational reforms.²²⁶ The efficacy of such other remedies is considered below.

4 TORTIOUS REMEDIES²²⁷

Tort actions

Tort damages will be available as a result of some breaches of PACE, the TA and other relevant statutes. For example, if a police officer arrests a citizen where no reasonable suspicion arises under ss 24 or 25 of PACE, an action for false imprisonment will be available. Equally, such a remedy would be available if the Part IV provisions governing time limits on detention were breached²²⁸ or if a detention review failed to occur for a period of time.²²⁹ Trespass to land or to goods will occur if the statutory provisions governing search of premises or seizure of goods are not followed. Malicious prosecution will be available where police have abused their powers in recommending prosecution to the Crown Prosecution 225 See further Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 7.

226 See Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, pp 724–30.

227 See Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 3rd edn, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell for a list of examples of recent damages awards. See also Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 11, Part 3.

228 Eg, Edwards v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset (1992) 9 March, unreported; the plaintiff was detained for 8 hours, 47 minutes following a lawful arrest. The detention was wrongful because it was ‘unnecessary’; compensation was awarded.

229 In Roberts [1999] 1 WLR 662 the review took place two hours after it should have done. The Court of Appeal found that Roberts had been falsely imprisoned during those two hours even though it was found that, had the review taken place, he would have remained in detention.

Service. Also, one of the ancient 'malicious process torts' may be available where a malicious search or arrest has occurred, although in fact these actions are extremely rare and their continued existence is in doubt.²³⁰ Such actions may not be brought because a claim of false imprisonment is preferred, but there is a distinction between malicious process torts and false imprisonment in that in the former case, but not the latter, all the proper procedural formalities will have been carried out. Actions for malicious prosecution are quite common, but the plaintiff carries quite a heavy burden in the need to prove that there was no reasonable or probable cause for the prosecution.²³¹ It may be that if the prosecution is brought on competent legal advice, this action will fail, but this is unclear.²³²

Almost the whole of the interviewing scheme, which is contained mainly in Codes C and E rather than in PACE itself, is unaffected by tortious remedies. Section 67(10) of PACE provides that no civil or criminal liability arises from breaches of the Codes of Practice. The same is true of the TA Codes under Sched 12, para 6 of the TA. This lack of a remedy also extends to some statutory provisions, in particular the most significant statutory interviewing provision, the entitlement to legal advice, arising under both PACE and the TA.²³³ There is no tort of denial of access to legal advice; the only possible tortious action would be for breach of statutory duty. It might have been expected that an action for false imprisonment might lie where gross breaches of the questioning provisions had taken place, such as interviewing a person unlawfully held incommunicado: a detention in itself lawful might thereby be rendered unlawful. However, although the ruling in *Middleweek v Chief Constable of Merseyside*²³⁴ gave some encouragement to such argument, it now seems to be ruled out by the decision in *Weldon v Home Office*²³⁵ in the context of lawful detention in a prison. It seems likely, therefore, that access to legal advice, like the rest of the safeguards for interviewing, will continue to be unaffected by the availability of the pre-HRA tortious remedies although, as discussed below, action under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA might be possible.

Where actions in tort are available against the police, they may be of particular value owing to the willingness of the courts to accept that exemplary or punitive damages may sometimes be appropriate. Such damages are awarded to punish the defendant and will be available only in two instances:²³⁶ where there has been 'oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional behaviour by the servants of the government' or where the profit accruing to the defendant through his conduct may be greater than the compensation awarded to the plaintiff. Only the first of these two categories will be relevant in actions against the police, and in order that such damages should be available, the term 'servant of the government' has been broadly interpreted to include police officers.²³⁷

230 See Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 1st edn, 1987, p 284. For discussion see Winfield, History of Conspiracy and Abuse of Legal Process, 1921.

231 See Glinski v McIver [1962] AC 726.

232 Abbott v Refuge Assurance Co Ltd [1962] 1QB 632.

233 See Chapter 13, pp 806–07.

234 [1992] AC 179; [1990] 3 WLR 481.

235 [1991] WLR 340, CA.

236 This limitation was imposed by the House of Lords in Rookes v Barnard [1964] AC 1129, p 1226. Note that the Law Commission, Consultation Paper on Punitive Damages, Consultation No 132, 1993, advocates, in its provisional conclusion, retention of such damages, but that they should be placed on a more principled basis.

237 Broome v Cassell and Co [1972] AC 1027, p 1088.

If a civil action is brought against an officer on the basis that he or she has acted ultra vires and the officer shows that the statutory conditions for the exercise of power were present, the onus lies on the plaintiff to establish the relevant facts (Greene v Home Secretary).²³⁸ In Holgate-Mohammed v Duke (1984),²³⁹ the House of Lords confirmed that, in addition to showing that the relevant statutory conditions are satisfied, the exercise of statutory powers by officers must not offend against Wednesbury principles; officers must not take irrelevant factors into account or fail to have regard to relevant ones; an exercise of discretion must not be so unreasonable that no reasonable officer could have exercised it in the manner in question. In Ministry of Defence ex p Smith and Others,²⁴⁰ the Court of Appeal affirmed that in judging whether the decision-maker had decided unreasonably, the human rights context was important; the more substantial the interference with human rights, the more the court would require by way of justification before it was satisfied that the decision was reasonable. Under s 6 of the HRA, the question (which would arise under s 7(1)(b)) is whether, in the exercise of discretionary powers, whether or not statute-based, the police breached a Convention right. Section 3 of the HRA is also relevant. This question is returned to below.

Quantum of damages

Civil actions against the police have in the past attracted high levels of damages. One of the highest awards was made in White v Metropolitan Police Comr.²⁴¹ Police officers unlawfully entered the home of a middle aged black couple at night and attacked the plaintiffs. The police then charged both plaintiffs with various offences in order to cover up their own conduct. The plaintiffs were awarded £20,000 exemplary damages each and, respectively, £6,500 and £4,500 aggravated damages. One of the highest awards was made in Treadaway v Chief Constable of West Midlands:²⁴² £50,000, which included £40,000 exemplary damages, was awarded in respect of a serious assault perpetrated in order to obtain a confession. In 1996, a number of very high awards were made against the Metropolitan Police. In *Goswell v Comr of Metropolitan Police*²⁴³ the plaintiff was awarded £120,000 damages for assault, £12,000 for false imprisonment and £170,000 exemplary damages for arbitrary and oppressive behaviour. Mr Goswell, who is black, was waiting in his car when a police officer approached. Goswell complained about the lack of police activity over an arson attack on his home. He was handcuffed to and then struck by the officer; the blow left a permanent scar. Goswell was then arrested for assault and threatening behaviour. He was cleared of these charges and then brought the successful civil action.

In Hsu v Comr of Metropolitan Police,²⁴⁴ the plaintiff won £220,000 damages for assault and wrongful arrest at his home. In Kownacki v Comr of Metropolitan Police,²⁴⁵

238 [1942] AC 284, HL.

239 [1984] AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054, HL.

240 [1996] 1 All ER 257; [1996] ICR 740.

241 (1982) The Times, 24 April.

242 (1994) The Times, 25 October.

243 (1996) The Guardian, 27 April.

244 [1997] 2 All ER 762.

245 (1996) The Guardian, 30 April.

actions for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution against the Metropolitan Police were successful; 200 police invaded the plaintiff's pub and charged him with supplying cannabis and allowing the premises to be used for drug dealing. When the case came to trial, the prosecution offered no evidence and he was acquitted. As a result, he suffered depression and paranoia, which affected his work. The jury found that the officers had failed to prove that they had seen cannabis being openly smoked and sold on the premises during the surveillance operation; £108,750, including £45,000 of punitive damages, were awarded to reflect the jury's disapproval.

However, these high awards are no longer available. The question of the appropriate level of damages was addressed by the Court of Appeal in Thompson v Comr of Police for the Metropolis.²⁴⁶ The court laid down guidelines for the award of damages which took as a starting point a basic award of £500 for the first hour of unlawful detention, with decreasing amounts for subsequent hours. It was found that aggravated damages could be awarded where there were special features of the case, such as oppressive or humiliating conduct at the time of arrest. Such damages would start at around £1,000 but would not normally be more than twice the level of the basic damages. Exemplary damages should only be awarded where aggravated and basic damages together would not appear to provide a sufficient punishment. Exemplary damages would be not less than £5,000, but the total figure awarded as exemplary damages would not be expected to amount to more than the basic damages multiplied by three. The overall award should not exceed £50,000. In accordance with these guidelines, the award made in Hsu was reduced to £50,000.

Impact of the HRA

Sections 6 and 8 of the HRA requires the courts to offer a remedy where a public authority violates the Convention rights,²⁴⁷ unless in so doing it is acting in accordance with incompatible legislation.²⁴⁸ As Chapter 13 indicated, Arts 3, 5, 8 and 14 potentially cover certain pre-trial rights of suspects, regardless of the trial context. Tortious liability would arise and damages could be awarded under s 8 of the HRA if one or more of these Articles were found to have been breached in respect of police treatment of suspects. As indicated, some custodial treatment in breach of these Articles is already tortious under domestic law, and civil actions against the police have provided an increasingly significant means of creating some police accountability,²⁴⁹ but this possibility would clearly be of particular significance where domestic law currently fails to provide a tortious remedy in respect of maltreatment of detainees.

246 [1997] 2 All ER 762.

247 Sections 6(1), 7 and 8. For discussion, see Chapter 4, p 156 et seq.

248 Section 6(2). Section 3 requires that the legislation should be rendered compatible with the Convention rights 'so far as it is possible to do so'.

249 See the Home Affairs Committee First Report 1997–98, Police Disciplinary and Complaints Procedures printed 16.12.97, which noted (para 32) the 'striking' rise in the cost of civil settlements for the Metropolitan Police, from £0.47m in 1991 to £2.69m in 1996. (This figure may decline owing to the decision in Thompson, [1997] 2 All ER 762.) The Police Action Lawyers Group and the Commission For Racial Equality attributed the rise to disillusionment with the complaints process.

The domestic courts may have to reconsider their current approach to conditions of detention in terms of tortious liability. Prior to the inception of the HRA, so long as existing torts or offences, such as assault, were not committed in detention, it followed from the findings in *Weldon v Home Office*²⁵⁰ that no means of redress in respect of adverse conditions, other than a complaint, was available. The possible creation of liability²⁵¹ under the Convention by means of a creative interpretation of the guarantee under Art 8 would not only fill a gap in domestic law, it would fill the gap in the Convention which, as noted above, does not on its face cover most conditions of detention. Such a course would not necessarily involve departing from the findings in Weldon v Home Office, since the liability would be for breach of a Convention right under s 6, using s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, not for false imprisonment. In any event, departure from case law is clearly possible under the HRA, relying on the duty of the court under s 6 and the effect of the Strasbourg jurisprudence under s 2.²⁵²

Where an existing tort action is brought which relates to the exercise of discretionary powers by the police, it could be argued under s 7(1)(b) that the officer had breached a Convention right in their exercise and had therefore acted unlawfully. This would be in essence a question of proportionality in relation to Art 8 or a question of the content and requirements of the right in relation to Arts 2, 3, 5 and 6.²⁵³ Unless s 6(2) applied, the action would succeed if the breach could be established, whether or not the exercise of the power appeared to have a statutory or common law basis. Alternatively, s 3 of the HRA could be relied on where the power was statute-based in order to show that once the provision in question was interpreted compatibly with the relevant Convention right(s), it did not provide the power to act as the officer did. This is clearly a significant matter since it requires more of a police officer than the Wednesbury test did, even in its stricter, more recent manifestations.²⁵⁴

As indicated in Chapter 13, a breach of the Code-based safeguards applying to the exercise of a prima facie tortious power will not deprive it of lawful authority owing to the provision against civil liability for such a breach under s 67(10) of PACE and Sched 12, para 6 of the TA. This will also be the case, a fortiori, where a police action which does not require lawful authority in order to avoid such liability breaches a Code provision. But where provisions of Arts 3, 8, 5 or 14 are coterminous with Code safeguards, liability to pay damages under the HRA for breach of the Convention guarantees might provide the Code provisions with a form of indirect protection, as the more detailed embodiment of the Convention requirements. Chapter 13 identified, at the relevant points, Convention guarantees, including aspects of the Art 3 requirements, which have no domestic statutory basis, but are recognised only in certain Code provisions.²⁵⁵ The creation of new tortious liability indirectly protective of such provisions under the HRA would be a very significant

250 [1990] 3 All ER 672.

251 Under HRA 1998, ss 6 and 7. The HRA does not allow for the creation of new criminal liability.

252 See, in a different context, Douglas v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992.

253 See further Chapter 2, p 66.

254 See Chapter 4, p 106.

255 See pp 852–53.

matter, since it might lead to a regulation of police interviewing practices and techniques which has been largely absent from UK law.

However, at present it is very doubtful whether Art 6 itself could be viewed as providing free-standing rights. Breaches of Art 6 are clearly most likely to be addressed within the criminal process itself. The Strasbourg jurisprudence does not cover instances in which the pre-trial procedure is flawed in a manner which might be viewed, potentially, as infringing the Art 6(1) guarantee of a fair trial, but where no court action in fact occurs. However, given that certain of the rights, and in particular the implied right of access to custodial legal advice under Art 6(3)(c), clearly have value outside the trial context, an action based on s 7(1)(a) or on a breach of the statutory duty under s 58 of PACE, but raising Art (3)(c) arguments under s 7(1)(b), might resolve this issue in favour of the complainant, domestically.

The quantum of damages must be determined in accordance with the provisions of s 8 which include the requirement, under s 8(4) of the HRA, that the court should take into account the principles applied by the European Court of Human Rights in relation to the award of compensation.²⁵⁶ As indicated in Chapter 4, reliance on such principles means that the level of damages awarded may be fairly low,²⁵⁷ in particular, the Court has not, formally, awarded exemplary or aggravated damages²⁵⁸ and it is probably the case that exemplary damages are not available under the HRA.²⁵⁹ But where the applicant has a coterminous tort action, such as false imprisonment, s 8 should not be used to detract from the level of damages which would have been awarded prior to enactment of the HRA.²⁶⁰ It may be noted that Art 5(5) provides an independent right to compensation if Art 5 is breached, but this does not appear to add anything to the damages already available for false imprisonment.

Conclusions: value of civil actions

The value of civil actions against the police in terms of ensuring police accountability is limited for a variety of reasons.²⁶¹ The cost factor will deter most potential plaintiffs from suing the police, especially now that legal aid is unavailable for an increasing section of the population.²⁶² There is a strong tendency to settle actions, which means that the police do not admit liability. Even where a civil action is successful, disciplinary charges are unlikely to be brought against the officers concerned. This has been justified by the police in the past on the basis of the differing standards of 256 See further Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' [1999] CLJ 509; Feldman, D, 'Remedies for violations of human rights under the Human Rights Act' (1998) EHRLR 691; Amos, M, 'Damages for breach of the Human Rights Acts' (1999) EHRLR 178.

257 Non-pecuniary damages are likely to be in the range of £10,000–15,000: see Johnson v UK (1997) 27 EHRR 296.
258 B v UK A 136–D (1988), paras 7–12.

259 See Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 1, p 1437.

260 This follows from the HRA 1998, s 11.

261 It may be noted that if a civil action against a police officer is successful, he or she will not be personally liable. The Police Act 1964, s 48, provides that a chief constable will be vicariously liable in respect of torts committed by constables under his direction or control in the performance or purported performance of their functions.

262 See Legal Action, April 2000, p 34; for discussion see Hansen, O, 'A future for legal aid?' (1992) 19 JLS 85; see also Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, p 680.

proof: civil claims need only be proved on the balance of probabilities while, until recently, disciplinary charges had to be proved beyond reasonable doubt. This is no longer the case, as explained below. Therefore, disciplinary action might be expected to follow a successful civil action, although there is no statutory requirement that it must do so, even in particularly serious cases. The high jury awards of damages in 1996 may reflect a growing public perception that the police are insufficiently accountable. If nothing else, a continuing propensity to make such awards might have helped to draw public and parliamentary attention to an unsatisfactory situation. However, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thompson will make this less likely.

The HRA is unlikely to affect the quantum of damages or the practical problems of suing the police. But, it may have a significant effect. There is clearly something rather strange about creating a vast, complex statutory edifice (PACE, the TA, the CJP) which governs police powers and suspects' rights, but then failing to provide a remedy if those rights are breached, except where that breach is coterminous with an existing area of tortious liability. Thus the HRA can, in theory, have a significant impact in respect of civil liability, since it has created for the first time under ss 7(1)(a) and 8 a remedy in damages where Convention rights are breached in custody by the police, whether or not existing tortious liability would arise. Moreover, the Convention rights now provide the parameters within which discretionary powers must be exercised, under s 6 of the HRA.

5 COMPLAINTS AGAINST THE POLICE AND DISCIPLINARY ACTION²⁶³

Introduction

Clearly, the police complaints and disciplinary system provides a potential method of ensuring that the police adhere to the safeguards created by PACE, as amended, and the TA. PACE set up the Police Complaints Authority (PCA) as an independent body with an involvement in the complaints and disciplinary system, replacing the Police Complaints Board (PCB), which was set up under the Police Act 1976.²⁶⁴ The idea was to afford an appearance of independence to the system. The scheme set up by PACE for dealing with complaints, contained in ss 83–106, was repealed and re-enacted in the Police Act 1996.²⁶⁵ Under s 67(2) of the Police Act 1996, a complaint will go in the first instance to the Chief Officer of Police of the force in 263 See Maguire, M, 'Complaints against the police: the British experience', in Goldsmith, A (ed), Complaints Against the Police: A Comparative Study, 1990; Greaves [1985] Crim LR; Khan (1984) 129 SJ 455; Williams [1985] Crim LR 115; Lustgarten, L, The Governance of Police, 1986, pp 139–40. The Runciman Commission considered that the existing arrangements probably do not command public confidence: Cm 2263, p 46; Harrison, J, Police Misconduct: Legal Remedies, 1987; Triennial Review of the PCA 1991–94, HC 396 (1994–95); Home Affairs Committee Fourth Report, HC 179 (1991–92); Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 2nd edn, 2000, Chapter 11, Part 4, pp 400–15; House of Commons Home Affairs Select Committee, Police Disciplinary and Complaints Procedure, First Report, HC-258–1 (1998).

264 The operation of the PCB did not create confidence in the complaints system: see Brown, Police Complaints Procedure, Home Office Research Study No 93, 1987.

265 Which came into force on 1.4.99, replacing PACE 1984, Part IX.

question, who must determine by reference to the section whether or not he is the appropriate person to deal with it and whether it, in fact, constitutes a complaint about 'the conduct of an officer' and not about 'the direction or control' of a police force.²⁶⁶ The decision as to the side of the dividing line on which a particular complaint falls is made by the police force complained about. Therefore, at the very outset, 'an issue of independence arises'.²⁶⁷

A complaint must be referred to the PCA if it concerns serious misconduct.²⁶⁸ Under s 75(3) of the 1996 Act, if the Chief Officer determines that the report on the complaints investigation indicates that a criminal offence may have been committed, he must send a copy of it to the DPP. In addition, there is a discretionary power to refer complaints to the PCA. It does not carry out the investigation itself in such cases, but supervises it and receives a report at the end of it under s 72. Thus, its role in relation to complaints is very limited.

Failures of the complaints and disciplinary system

The overwhelming majority of complaints do not result in disciplinary proceedings: as many as 30% of complaints are dealt with by informal resolution²⁶⁹ and 50% of complaints are withdrawn.²⁷⁰ Clayton and Tomlinson noted that the 16,712 complaints dealt with in 1990 led to 305 criminal or disciplinary charges and advice or admonishment in 573 cases; thus, less than 2% of complaints led to any disciplinary action.²⁷¹ The PCA Report of 1995 reported that out of 245 complaints of serious assault by police officers, eight led to disciplinary charges; none led to dismissal of an officer from the service. Out of 6,318 complaints of assaults, disciplinary charges were preferred in 64 cases; none led to dismissal of the officer.²⁷² The PCA Report of 1998 stated that 141 complaints concerned serious assaults; 8% of those fully investigated led to disciplinary action. A total of 16,550 complaints were received in 1998–99; 317 were fully investigated, a figure of approximately 2%.²⁷³ In 1997, the Home Affairs Committee considered the figures for the outcome of complaints and found that over the previous two years, 2% of all recorded complaints were substantiated following a formal investigation and less than half of 1% of complaints led to disciplinary or criminal charges.²⁷⁴ The record for 1998–99 suggests that the figures would be approximately the same. While the figures 266 PACE 1984, s 84(4) and (5). The requirement regarding 'the conduct of a police officer' now arises under s 65 of the 1996 Act.

267 Home Affairs Committee First Report (1997–98), para 47.

268 Police Act 1996, s 70, formerly PACE 1984, s 87(4).

269 PCA Triennial Review, HC 466 (1985–88), para 1.14, p 8.

270 See Triennial Review of the PCA 1991–94, HC 396, 1994–95; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 2nd edn, 1992, p 13.

271 Clayton and Tomlinson, ibid, p 13.

272 See Triennial Review of the PCA 1991–94, HC 396, 1994–95.

273 The 1998–99 Annual Report of the PCA, Table 5:2,415 complaints concerned assaults; 81 disciplinary charges were preferred. 203 complaints concerned racially discriminatory behaviour; 3 charges were preferred. The Report does not give the figure for disciplinary action as a percentage of fully investigated complaints.

274 Home Affairs Committee First Report (1997–98), Police Disciplinary and Complaints Procedures, printed 16 December 1997, para 27.

275 See Lersch and Mieczkowski (2000) 23(1) Policing. They considered arguments that the numbers of complaints may not be indicative since citizens may under-complain for various reasons, including lack of confidence in the process. They also looked at the possibility of over-complaint.

may be, to an extent, misleading,²⁷⁵ they strongly suggest that the system is not operating fairly and effectively.

The Committee found ‘perhaps the most telling evidence that all is not well...comes from the opinion of almost all the parties involved’;²⁷⁶ they concluded: ‘there is a great deal of justified dissatisfaction with elements of the disciplinary and complaints system.’²⁷⁷ These criticisms echo those which have, for a number of years, been directed against the whole police disciplinary process, including the hearings, and it is generally agreed that the present system is defective as a means of redress.²⁷⁸ Maguire and Corbett conducted a review of the operation of the complaints system from 1968–1988²⁷⁹ which found that the majority of complainants were dissatisfied and that the public did not have confidence in the system. The Runciman Commission considered that the existing arrangements probably do not command public confidence.²⁸⁰ The Home Office Consultation Paper Complaints against the Police, issued in 2000,²⁸¹ accepted that the system had failed to win public confidence.

There is a disparity between successful civil actions against the police and disciplinary action or prosecution.²⁸² For example, in the Hsu case,²⁸³ it was found that Mr Hsu was assaulted, racially abused and falsely arrested. It was accepted that the police officers in question had lied on oath and fabricated note-book entries. Mr Hsu was awarded £200,000 damages (reduced on appeal to £35,000), but no officer was disciplined.²⁸⁴ Where officers are placed under investigation with a view to disciplinary charges, they may take early retirement or resign on medical grounds. After the MacPherson Report²⁸⁵ into the Stephen Lawrence case, disciplinary charges were recommended against five officers involved. All, however, retired and therefore could not face charges. The Home Office is currently considering the possibility of disciplinary action up to five years after retirement.²⁸⁶ In the wake of the MacPherson

276 Paragraph 35.

277 Paragraph 40.

278 See Greaves, op cit, fn 263; Khan, op cit, fn 263; Williams, op cit, fn 263; Lustgarten, op cit, fn 263, pp 139–40; Harrison, op cit, fn 263; Harrison and Cragg (1993) 143 NLJ 591; Maguire, op cit, fn 263; RCCJ Report, Cm 2263, p 46; Kennedy, H, in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice: A Review of Justice in Error, 1999, Blackstone, p 374; Goldsmith, A, External Review and Self Regulation: Complaints Against the Police—The Trend to External Review, 1988; Harrison, J and Cuneen, M, An Independent Police Complaints Commission, 2000.

279 A Study of the Police Complaints System, 1991.

280 RCCJ Report, Cm 2263, p 46.

281 London, Home Office, 2000.

282 The Butler Report, 1998, criticised the CPS for its decision making in the Treadaway case; Derek Treadaway was awarded £50,000 in damages in respect of a serious assault by police officers while he was in custody: R v DPP ex p Treadaway (1997) The Times, 18 November. The CPS decided not to prosecute the officers. Treadaway successfully sought judicial review of this decision and the case was remitted for re-consideration by the CPS.

283 Thompson v Comr of Police for the Metropolis, Hsu v Comr of Police for the Metropolis [1997] 2 All ER 762.

284 See further the Home Affairs Committee First Report (1998), Section B: ‘The evidence from civil actions’. A further example, in which the disciplinary sanction was, in effect, rescinded, is provided by Goswell v Comr of Metropolitan Police (The Guardian Report, 27 April 1996). The officer who was found in that case to have perpetrated a serious assault, PC Trigg, was dismissed as a result of a complaint from Goswell. In the civil action Goswell had been awarded £120,000 for assault, £12,000 for false imprisonment and £170,000 for arbitrary and oppressive behaviour. Trigg appealed against his dismissal and was reinstated by the Home Secretary, Michael Howard. On the face of it, his reinstatement after it had been proved beyond reasonable doubt (in the disciplinary proceedings) that Trigg had perpetrated the assault in question appeared highly questionable.

285 Cm 4262–I, 1999.

Report, racist police behaviour may begin to lead more frequently to disciplinary charges,²⁸⁷ although such a trend cannot yet be discerned.²⁸⁸

Independence

There appears to be a strong consensus that the independent element in the complaints and disciplinary process is too weak and is the key factor in the inefficacy of the system.²⁸⁹ Maguire and Corbett commented in their 1991 review that an independent system might lead to an improvement in public confidence in the system, although they expressed doubts about its efficacy in other respects.²⁹⁰ The MacPherson Report recommended that there should be an independent tribunal for serious complaints.²⁹¹ Morgan and Newburn find: 'The fact that most complaints...continue to be investigated exclusively by the police themselves is almost certainly an important factor in explaining why so few complaints are made compared with the proportion of members of the public who report having felt like making a complaint.'²⁹² The Police Action Lawyers Group has stated: 'the fundamental problem...is the lack of independence in the system.'²⁹³ The House of Commons Home Affairs Committee found that the introduction of an independent element is desirable in principle.²⁹⁴ Doubts have been expressed, however, taking into account experience from other jurisdictions, about the efficacy of a completely independent investigatory body,²⁹⁵ but prior to the issuing of the Consultation Paper in 2000, there appeared to be a degree of consensus regarding the need for a stronger element of independence which could be achieved through the co-operation of police and expert civilian investigators, drawn from the ranks of bodies such as lawyers and customs officials.

Reform

The changes to the complaints procedure which occurred in the mid-1990s, partly in response to the Runciman Royal Commission Report, did not involve any radical reform. In particular, they did not include the introduction of a new, independent element into the process. The Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994, which was then consolidated in the Police Act 1996, made only limited changes to the functions and powers of the PCA. Under s 37(a) of the 1994 Act, a breach of the PACE Codes became no longer automatically a breach of the Police Discipline Code.²⁹⁶ This change may be seen merely as legitimising police working practices, since it 286 MacPherson Report, Recommendations 55–57.

287 Eg, in February 2000 a police officer, PC Hutt, was disciplined and dismissed from the force for oppressive, racist behaviour (news report 22 February 2000).

288 See fn 273, above.

289 Sanders and Young, op cit, fn 1, p 702; Kennedy, op cit, fn 278, p 374.

290 A Study of the Police Complaints System, 1991.

291 Cm 4262–I, 1999, Recommendation 58.

292 The Future of Policing, 1997, p 53; finding based on Skogan, Contacts between Police and Public: Findings from the 1992 British Crime Survey, HO Research Study No 134, 1994.

293 Home Affairs Committee Report, para 43.

294 Home Affairs Committee, HC 258–1 (1997–98), Recommendation 11.

295 See Goldsmith, op cit, fn 278; Loveday, B, 'Police complaints in the USA' (1988) 4 Policing 172.

appeared that very few complaints in respect of breaches of the Codes were made; those that were rarely led to disciplinary proceedings. Unsurprisingly, this trend continued after the 1994 Act came into force.²⁹⁷ As indicated above, Part IV of the Police Act 1996, which now governs complaints and discipline, was merely a consolidating, not a reforming, measure.

The 1997 Report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs²⁹⁸ made a number of recommendations, reflecting certain of the criticisms noted above, and the Home Secretary, Jack Straw, said that he had accepted the case for speedy reform. But the initial proposals for reform²⁹⁹ mirrored the moderate changes proposed by the Conservative Government in 1993.³⁰⁰

New procedures were introduced in April 1999³⁰¹ which reflected certain of those proposals, including in particular abolition of the criminal standard of proof in disciplinary proceedings.³⁰² Under the new procedure, the hearing will be private, but the complainant can attend the proceedings, although not before his evidence is given,³⁰³ and he may be allowed to cross-examine witnesses.³⁰⁴ A number of provisions, however, allow for the exclusion of the complainant.³⁰⁵ Racist language and behaviour is now a breach of the police code of conduct, but it is not yet possible to determine how far reaching such change might be.

The PCA in its 1998–99 Report noted that further, more radical changes, in particular the ‘use of non-police investigators in exceptional cases’, although accepted by the Home Secretary in principle, had been relegated to future legislation. The PCA concluded that there was no prospect of early legislation and mentioned its unsuccessful attempts to make the more non-controversial changes by means of Private Members’ Bills.³⁰⁶ In 2000, the Government commissioned a feasibility study into the practicality of using independent investigators in exceptional cases,³⁰⁷ and put proposals to use such investigators to the annual Police Federation Conference in May 2000.³⁰⁸ The Government issued a Consultation Paper in 2000 which proposed importing greater independence into the system, by means of a new body, the Independent Police Complaints Commission,³⁰⁹ but made it clear that in the 296 Section 37(a) repealed PACE 1984, s 67(8).

297 Eg, the PCA Report for 1998–99 showed that there were 107 complaints relating to breach of Code A, governing stop and search in the period. One led to disciplinary charges (Table 5, p 13).

298 HC 258–1 (1997–98).

299 HC 683 (1997–98).

300 The Government issued a consultation paper in April 1993 which included various proposals, including abolition of the criminal standard of proof in discipline cases and the double jeopardy rule, which means that criminal proceedings against officers are not followed by disciplinary proceedings. See 143 NLJ 591; in its Triennial Review 1988–91, HC 352, 1991, the PCA also made this proposal. The Labour proposals also address the tendency of police officers who are facing disciplinary charges to take extended sick leave and/or early retirement, thereby evading the disciplinary process.

301 The Police (Conduct) Regulations 1999. The new procedures operated alongside the 1995 ones until March 2000, when the transitional arrangements ended; all cases are now being dealt with under the new procedures.

302 Ibid, reg 23(3).

303 Ibid, reg 25(3).

304 Ibid, reg 25(4).

305 Under reg 25(5) the complainant can be removed if he interrupts. Under reg 27 he can be excluded if matters arise which it would not be in the public interest to disclose to him.

306 PCA Report (1998–99), p 53.

vast majority of cases, a full independent investigation would not occur, owing to cost. Once the system contains this independent element, a number of problems may remain even in relation to those exceptional cases in which independent investigation by civilian investigators occurs. Institutional factors, including obstruction of the system by the police and the possibility that civilian investigators will be affected by police culture, may continue to hamper the system; the success rate may remain low.³¹⁰

Thus, despite evidence of police malpractice from miscarriage of justice cases such as that of the *Birmingham Six*³¹¹ and the subsequent indications discussed above of poor practice and deliberate wrong-doing within the police service, the system for accountability remained, in essentials, the same. The new element of independence is unlikely to have any impact in the majority of instances. The system raises various serious issues under the HRA. It does not generate confidence that it will play a significant part in ensuring that police officers and forces act in compliance with the Convention. In so far as the Convention rights are reflected in the safeguards for suspects contained in PACE, the TA and their associated Codes, it is not apparent that it is likely to ensure adherence to them.

Impact of the HRA

The police complaints mechanism potentially provides a means of creating police accountability, both in terms of underpinning the balance apparently struck by PACE, and in ensuring compliance with the Convention under the HRA. The bodies administering the mechanism, the Police Complaints Authority (PCA), Chief Police Officers, and police disciplinary tribunals are all bound by the Convention as public authorities under s 6 of the HRA. They are also in the position of hearing complaints regarding police officers who are themselves so bound. Both aspects should inform their work and could be raised as issues by way of judicial review. Further, the statutory provisions governing police complaints should be interpreted compatibly with the Convention under s 3 of the HRA.

It is possible, although doubtful, that police disciplinary hearings fall within the field of application of Art 6. Under Art 6, the hearing might be viewed, first and foremost, as forming the determination of a 'criminal charge' against the officer concerned, although this is uncertain. Military and prison disciplinary proceedings fall within the term, owing to the severity of the possible penalty, which includes the possibility of imprisonment. The position regarding disciplinary proceedings carrying the possibility of lesser, albeit quite severe, penalties, such as dismissal or the loss of pension rights, is not yet clearly settled, 307 The study was conducted by the consultants KPMG. They reported on 17 May 2000; their report was accompanied by an independent report by Liberty, recommending the setting up of an independent body to hear police complaints.

308 On 17 May 2000. For comparative discussion of this possibility, see Goldsmith, A and Lewis, C (eds), Civilian Oversight of Policing, 2000.

309 Complaints against the Police: A Consultation Paper, 2000. See proposals: HL Deb, Vol 620, Col WA45, 19.12.00.

310 See Harrison and Cuneen, op cit, fn 278; Goldsmith, A and Faran, S, 'Complaints against the police in Canada: a new approach' [1987] Crim LR 615.

311 See R v McKelvey and Others [1992] 2 All ER 417.

although there are indications that the Court would view proceedings carrying the possibility of lesser penalties as falling outside the meaning of criminal charge.³¹² Disciplinary proceedings and hearings might also be viewed as the determination of the 'civil rights and obligations' of the complainant under Art 6(1), since they may frequently involve inquiry into breaches of such rights, including breaches of the Convention itself. The term 'civil' has, however, been taken to mean that these are rights in private rather than public law,³¹³ although a clear distinction between rights in private as opposed to public law is not apparent in recent Strasbourg jurisprudence. Possibly, complaints proceedings might be found to fall within this term at Strasbourg, or domestically, in future. This view might be encouraged since, as indicated above, the proceedings became more court-like after the 1999 reforms.

On the basis that disciplinary proceedings and the occasional disciplinary hearings ordered by the PCA might be found in future to fall within Art 6, it is arguable that they fail to comply with its requirements since the complainant is in such a weak position in them. They appear to fail to provide a fair hearing for the complainant, bearing in mind the procedure they follow. In investigating a fair hearing, the domestic authorities may take into account the Art 6(3) guarantees even in respect of civil determinations, since they are viewed as minimum guarantees which are covered by the wider para (1) protection of a fair hearing. If consideration is given to the procedures in question it is apparent that, apart from any of the other requirements of fairness, the minimal safeguards of Art 6(3) may not be present, depending on the application of the new Regulations in any particular case.³¹⁴ The system does not allow for the complainant or her legal representative to attend the full disciplinary proceedings or hearings. The independence and impartiality of the hearing may also be questioned, particularly as the vast majority of hearings are not ordered or supervised by the PCA. No compensation can be awarded to the complainant.

There is also the possibility of considering whether the disciplinary system affords the complainant an effective remedy for breach of his or her Convention rights. This argument could be raised under Art 13 which, while omitted from the rights given further effect under the HRA, has some effect in domestic law.³¹⁵ It is debatable whether the police complaints and discipline process should be seen as being the appropriate forum for s 7(1)(a) HRA purposes, since breach of Convention rights by police officers could be raised in the ordinary courts under that sub-section. But, in any event, the Art 13 issue could be raised in, for example, a challenge to a breach of a Convention right in judicial review proceedings, if the applicant had made an unsuccessful complaint. In Govell v UK,³¹⁶ the Commission found that the police investigative system did not meet the requisite standards of independence under Art 13 since the Chief Constable can appoint a member of the same force to investigate; the Home Secretary appoints and remunerates members of the Police 312 See Demicoli v Malta A 210 (1991) and Ravnborg v Sweden A 283-B (1994).

313 Ringelsen v Austria A 13 (1971), para 94.

314 See further Chapter 2, pp 63–64.

315 See Chapter 4, p 135.

316 (1997) 4 EHRLR 438. See also Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310, paras 45–47.

Complaints Authority and has a guiding role in determining the withdrawal of charges. The rules considered in Govell were the PACE rules, but the new rules maintain the same system. In Khan v UK,³¹⁷ the Court also found that the police disciplinary system failed to satisfy Art 13 because of the lack of independence. The remuneration system is still under the control of the Home Secretary,³¹⁸ and under s 83 of the Police Act 1996, his guiding role is retained. Under s 69(5),³¹⁹ a member of the force which is the subject of the complaint can conduct the investigation.

A further issue may arise in respect of public interest immunity attaching to documents coming into existence during a police complaints investigation. The position of the parties to court actions in relation to disclosure of material relating to a complaint was placed on a more equal basis as a result of Chief Constable of West Midlands Police ex p Wiley; Chief Constable of Nottinghamshire Police ex p Sunderland.³²⁰ All the parties concerned argued that public interest immunity did not attach, on a class basis, to documents coming into existence during a police complaints investigation. The House of Lords had to consider whether *Neilson v Laugharne*³²¹ and the decisions following it were wrongly decided. In Neilson, Lord Oliver had determined that a class immunity should attach to police complaints documents on the basis that the police complaints procedure would be placed in jeopardy if that was not the case. However, the House of Lords considered that there was insufficient evidence to support Lord Oliver's conclusion as to the need for a new class claim to public interest immunity. Thus, it was found that Neilson must be regarded as wrongly decided, but that did not mean that public interest immunity would not attach to police complaints documents: whether it did or not would depend on the nature of the particular document or documents in question. This decision emphasises that a clear case must be made out for use of a broad class claim to public interest immunity. It is in the interests of a fair hearing under Art 6(1) and 6(3)(d), since it goes some way towards ensuring that, in actions against the police, or in prosecutions where previous disciplinary findings may be relevant, both parties have access to the same information. However, it leaves open the possibility of a contents claim or of a class claim in relation to specific groups of documents, although a strong justification would be required to establish such a claim. In Taylor v Anderton,³²² the Court of Appeal found that the reports prepared by investigating officers were entitled to class immunity, but that a litigant might nevertheless obtain disclosure of part or all of a report if the judge could be persuaded that the public interest in disclosure outweighed the interest in immunity.

It is debatable whether the current position would satisfy the findings as to the 317 Ibid., paras 44–47; [2000] Crim LR 684.

318 See PCA Report 1998–99 Appendix C, para 5.

319 Which has replaced PACE 1984, s 105(4).

320 [1995] AC 274; [1994] 3 All ER 420; (1995) 1 Cr App R 342, HL.

321 [1981] QB 736.

322 [1995] All ER 420, CA. See also Kelly v Comr of Police of the Metropolis (1997) The Times, 20 August in which it was found that PII attaches to certain of the new forms which are sent to the CPS by police forces.

323 (2000) 30 EHRR 1; (1998) 25 EHRR CD 118 (admissibility decision).

324 (1998) 27 EHRR 249.

duty of disclosure to the defence in *Rowe and Davis v UK*³²³ or in Tinnelly and McElduff v UK,³²⁴ depending on the particular circumstances of a case. In Tinnelly, the Court found that the use of a conclusive certificate preventing disclosure of the reasons for a decision³²⁵ breached Art 6, since it prevented the tribunal from effectively reviewing the facts. Any judge determining the imposition of a contents immunity, whether in a civil action against the police or in a prosecution, would have to take the jurisprudence regarding the equality of arms provision arising both under Art 6(1) and 6(3) into account, as well as the general requirements of a fair trial. The latter requirement is ultimately the overriding one, since merely placing both parties in an equally disadvantageous position would not necessarily satisfy it.

6 PROSECUTION OF THE POLICE

Introduction

Police actions that are unauthorised may create criminal as well as civil liability. For example, the use of force in effecting an unlawful arrest would be an assault. The use of lethal force in such circumstances might give rise to liability for murder or manslaughter. Equally, excessive force used to effect a lawful arrest or to restrain a suspect lawfully detained might give rise to criminal liability. In practice, successful prosecutions of police officers are very rare.³²⁶ A number of high profile cases have failed to lead, ultimately, to successful prosecutions. The Home Affairs Committee noted that no convictions of police officers had arisen from the recent miscarriage of justice cases despite strong evidence of fraud or perjury on the part of some of the officers involved.³²⁷ The number of deaths annually in police custody remains high; between January 1990 and December 1996, 380 such deaths were reported to the Home Office,³²⁸ and the failure of disciplinary charges or prosecutions in relation to complaints arising from such deaths has attracted quite severe criticism.³²⁹ In 1997, the Home Affairs Committee considered evidence from the organisation Inquest which submitted 11 case studies, in certain of which no prosecution or disciplinary action had been taken against officers, despite apparently substantial evidence against them.³³⁰

325 This was not a PII certificate, which would not be conclusive, but a certificate provided for under the Fair Employment Act 1976 in Northern Ireland.

326 Only about 1.5% of cases concerning the police referred to the DPP are prosecuted. See Hyder, 'Cause for complaint' (1990) New Statesman and Society, 12 January.

327 Ibid., para 24.

328 Leigh, Johnson and Ingram, Deaths in Police Custody, Police Research Series Paper 26 (1998).

329 See The Butler Report, 1998; Kennedy, op cit, fn 278, p 374. Note the report in June (1999) LAG 21 regarding the inquest into the death of N Delahunty due to cocaine intoxication aggravated by police restraint. See also November (1999) LAG 6 regarding the acquittal of police officers for the death of a Mr O'Brien in custody after a restraint by a number of police officers. His death was considered in The Butler Report, s 6. In s 8, the report criticised the CPS system for considering prosecutions in respect of deaths in custody (including that of O'Brien) as 'inefficient and fundamentally unsound'. See above, Chapter 13, p 804, fn 245.

330 Ibid., para 25.

Crown Prosecution Service decision making

The Crown Prosecution Service take the decision as to prosecution, but their impartiality and independence have been questioned. It appears that the issue of independence arises at every stage in the decision making process of the CPS in relation to the question whether to prosecute police officers where complaints appear to disclose criminal offences. The CPS is, of course, independent of the police, but 'the issue is whether it exercises this independence properly'.³³¹ Evidence submitted in 1997 to the Home Affairs Committee regarding the matter indicated a 'lack of willingness' on the part of the CPS and DPP to prosecute. 'There is clearly bias which pervades both the police and the CPS preventing viable prosecutions through nonsensical analysis of evidence.'³³² The issue of the quality of CPS decision making in this context clearly raises a number of Convention-based arguments.

The Butler Report (1998) made a number of recommendations designed to improve the quality of CPS decisions as to prosecution. They included sending every death in custody case for a decision as to whether or not to prosecute to the Assistant Chief Prosecutor and instituting a compulsory training programme for all those employed in central casework at the CPS.³³³ The Report also expressed unease with the system whereby the police themselves investigate and report to the CPS on a death in custody. It also suggested that where such a death had occurred and an inquest jury returned a verdict of unlawful killing, the reason for the decision not to prosecute should be given.³³⁴

Impact of the HRA

No criminal liability is created under the HRA, so that a breach of, for example, Art 3 or 8, non-coterminous with existing offences, could not found a prosecution. But, decisions as to prosecutions of the police raise a number of Convention issues which are likely to be addressed in proceedings for judicial review of a decision not to prosecute. The burden of proof would be affected where it was alleged that Art 3 had been breached by custodial maltreatment, or, under Art 2, where a death had occurred in custody. Once it was shown that the detainee was free of the injury in question³³⁵ or was not already in a life threatening condition, before arrest, the State would bear the burden of exculpating the officers involved. This test appears to differ from that currently used by the CPS, which was criticised in The Butler Report.³³⁶ The Butler recommendations, which were largely concerned with procedural matters, including clarification of the system of decision making in the CPS, did not, it is argued, fully address these Convention matters. Possibly it will become apparent that reforms based on a greater awareness of the demands of the Convention in this context are necessary, now that the HRA is fully in force.

331 See Home Affairs Committee First Report (1997–98), para 88.

332 Ibid., para 90.

333 Ibid., pp 53–54.

334 Ibid., p 55.

335 Tomasi v France A 241-A (1992). See also Chapter 2, p 46.

336 Ibid.

7 CONCLUSIONS

A recurring theme throughout this chapter and Chapter 13 has concerned the extent to which a balance is struck between suspects' rights and police powers. The dual themes of the need for enhanced police powers but also for the introduction of rules to protect due process, are only clearly evident in the piece of legislation which is still central to police powers—the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The notion of achieving in PACE what Reiner has called 'a fundamental balance'³³⁷ has some foundation. It may be said that on the face of it, the balance struck by PACE is fairly acceptable, at least in relation to the non-terrorist suspect, despite the increased powers of arrest and stop and search which PACE confers. Concern may be expressed as to the uncertainty of the concept of reasonable suspicion on which these powers depend but, nevertheless, taking PACE and the Codes at face value, a concern to protect the rights of suspects appears to be evident. It is, however, less clear that the later legislation, the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, reflects such a concern.

The post-PACE legislation, then, has effected continued extensions of police powers, but has brought about only minor increases in safeguards for suspects. Those increases, including the use of judicial authorisation for the lengthy detention of terrorist suspects³³⁸ and the requirement of access to legal advice if adverse inferences are to be drawn from silence,³³⁹ were in effect imposed on the Government by decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. The later legislation made no attempt to address one of the central problems inherent in PACE, the lack of sanctions for its breach.

This was a recurring theme in this chapter. It is particularly true of Code C; it creates a scheme which seems to make every effort to ensure fair treatment in custody and in the interview, but which operates outside the realm of general legal sanctions since breaches may be remedied (in the accepted sense of that word) only in internal disciplinary proceedings and only very rarely then. The right to legal advice, although on a statutory basis, is an equally weak position. The Notes for Guidance, which occupy key points in the interviewing scheme, appear intended to have no legal status at all. Since no other effective means is available of ensuring that the rules are adhered to, the courts have stepped into the breach and have developed complex rules for the exclusion of confessions obtained in breach of the interviewing rules. Thus, in effect, exclusion of confession evidence has become the main method of upholding the rights of the suspect while in custody and in the interview.

However, the use of exclusion of evidence as a means of redress leads to very uncertain protection for suspects' rights since it can only operate where the case comes to court and the suspect pleads not guilty. Thus, the police may still be inclined to break the rules in the hope of obtaining a guilty plea and therefore, many interviews may be conducted which fall below the TA or PACE standard. If, in particular instances, this does not come to light, a doubtful guilty plea may be accepted, or a false confession may be admitted, leading to a miscarriage of justice, while on the other hand such failures may sometimes mean that reliable confession evidence cannot be accepted in court, although it would have been had the rules been observed. If confession evidence would not have been available but for oppressive questioning, it is suggested that the energies of the police should have been devoted to uncovering other evidence. Curtailment of the right to silence has merely exacerbated the situation, since it is likely in itself to increase the pressure on the suspect to speak and it may also undermine the safeguard which it is suggested has most real value in the interview: the provision of legal advice from an experienced solicitor. Where non-confession evidence is obtained in breach of the PACE or TA standards, it appears increasingly likely, as *Forbes*³⁴⁰ and *AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999)*³⁴¹ indicated, that the courts will admit it, thereby possibly encouraging laxity in adhering to the rules.

337 Reiner, R, 'The politics of the Act' [1985] PL 394, p 395.

338 See Chapter 13, p 794.

339 See Chapter 13, p 843.

There is the further problem that, as this chapter and Chapter 11 have shown, the Code C and statutory safeguards can be evaded by operating entirely outside the PACE and TA schemes, using secret surveillance techniques, as occurred in *Khan*³⁴² and Chalkley,³⁴³ or operating undercover, as in Amin.³⁴⁴ Thus, the safeguards for suspects can be marginalised. While such techniques are effective in crime control terms,³⁴⁵ the concern must arise that they may be used deliberately in some instances rather than arresting and interviewing a suspect, thereby triggering off all the safeguards. As Chapter 11 explained, such techniques are now regulated by the Police Act 1997 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA). But a breach of either statute does not in itself give rise to liability unless the action, if unauthorised, would create existing tortious or criminal liability. As seen in Chalkley, the courts are not willing to use exclusion of evidence as a means of upholding the integrity of the criminal justice system where such liability could have been incurred in the gathering of evidence. Further, following Chalkley, they are unlikely to do so, even under the HRA, where no existing liability could have been incurred, but a breach of Art 8 has been caused. This latter instance is clearly of particular importance, not only because it would mean that the courts are prepared to receive evidence obtained in breach of a fundamental human right, but also because no other remedy would be available, apart from the possibility of mounting a challenge to the police operation in the tribunal set up under the RIPA.³⁴⁶

Thus, it is fair to conclude that while the PACE and TA schemes themselves have not been upheld where non-confession evidence is obtained, it is also apparent that when the police operate outside those schemes, and act unlawfully, the courts are not prepared to exclude the evidence thereby obtained in order to vindicate the rights violated. As argued above, the use of exclusion of evidence in this fashion can ignore the interests of victims. But to argue for a nuanced approach which would allow consideration of such interests and of due process, depending on the particular circumstances of a case, is to demand a theorised and developed approach which it is currently almost impossible to discern in decision-making based almost entirely on crime control values. In other words, the trend away from due process

340 [2001] Crim LR 649.

341 [2001] 2 WLR 56.

342 [1996] 3 All ER 289; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024.

343 [1998] 2 Cr App R 79.

344 [2000] 1 WLR 1071; [2000] Crim LR 174.

345 See Chapter 11, pp 689–90.

346 See Chapter 11, pp 714 et seq.

evident in the legislative developments is echoed in the current judicial tendencies. As indicated, the other possible remedies available have had little impact in creating police accountability, either in terms of upholding suspects' rights generally, or in respect of the statutory and Code-based safeguards.

However, the same government that introduced the TA and the CJPOA introduced the HRA. One might have expected that the HRA would prove a corrective to the dominance of crime control values evident in criminal justice policies and in judicial decisions. In the pre-HRA period and in the period immediately after the HRA came into force, there was a view that the Act might allow for a 'reinvigoration of fundamental values' in the criminal justice system.³⁴⁷ These two chapters have sought to suggest that, despite unfavourable statutory provisions, particularly those of the TA, the Convention offers some possibilities of curbing police discretion in the interests of due process values since it does allow domestic judges to look more closely and directly at standards of fairness in the criminal justice system. It appeared possible that the inception of the HRA might herald a return to an emphasis on such values which has not been evident since the early 1990s. But this chapter has suggested that the early decisions on the Convention, in particular *Brown v Stoff*³⁴⁸ and Shannon,³⁴⁹ do not suggest that such a return is probable, although there have been decisions in the field of stop and search which suggest otherwise.³⁵⁰ Also, where conditions of detention or secret police operations do not infringe existing tortious liability, the HRA provides the only method, under s 7(1)(a), of challenging the police, although, as explained in Chapter 11 in respect of surveillance, such a challenge would have to be brought in the new tribunal set up under the RIPA, not in the ordinary courts.

It appears likely that the HRA will have a diffuse and patchy effect; it will not have a radical impact on the use of the current repressive legislation or the further powers to be introduced under Part 10 of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Bill 2001, assuming that they become law. It may itself be manipulated either by the judiciary or the legislature in the sense that in court, the rights it affords can be 'read down' in order to preserve the effect of such legislation, while the use of s 19 statements of compatibility may provide such legislation with a spurious appearance of rectitude. MPs may accept that a process of human rights auditing has occurred, allaying concerns about the provisions. A blending of the Convention values with those of the common law is becoming especially apparent in this field, but it is suggested that those of the Convention will only attain an appearance of gaining greater respect owing to the HRA, where they harmonise with values already held dear by the common law. It may be said that where the judiciary have traditionally established a firm opposition to due process values, as they have in respect of the admission of improperly obtained non-confession evidence, the HRA is likely to have little impact, although it may do so where they have traditionally been sympathetic to due process, as they have been in relation to the deprivation of liberty in police detention.³⁵¹ Possibly the difference of attitude is attributable to a 347 Walker, C, in Walker and Starmer, op cit, fn 278, p 62.

348 [2001] 2 WLR 817.

349 [2001] 1 WLR 51.

350 See Chapter 13, pp 773–74.

351 See Roberts v Chief Constable of Cheshire [1999] 1 WLR 662.

traditional common law acceptance and understanding of certain basic human rights, including the right to liberty, but not of more sophisticated and nebulous ones such as rights to be free from humiliating treatment or invasion of privacy. Thus, both the creation of greater police accountability and the tempering of the effects of repressive legislation that could have occurred under the HRA are likely to be muted and inconsistent.

The legislation discussed in these chapters reflects the change in the political climate that became evident in the mid-1990s. As Dixon puts it, 'The political and professional consensus about the need for criminal justice reform [in the face of discovery of a number of miscarriages of justice] had broken down...the new Home Secretary encouraged renewed populist obsession with law and order...'.³⁵² At the time, the Conservative Party had a Home Secretary, in Michael Howard, who was perceived in many quarters as long on right wing law and order rhetoric, and tabloid appeal, but short on measured criminal justice policies.³⁵³ The aims of crime control were furthered, so Howard claimed, by ensuring an enormous increase in the prison population, by increasing, on pain of penal sanctions, the number of instances in which the citizen must take orders from the police,³⁵⁴ and by abolishing or undermining the rights of suspects, in particular the right to silence.³⁵⁵ The stance taken was well summed up in Howard's own words as seeking to redress 'the balance in our criminal justice system which has tilted much too far in favour of the criminal and away from the protection of the public'.³⁵⁶

From the mid-1990s, once Tony Blair became Shadow Prime Minister and Jack Straw Shadow Home Secretary, the Labour Party in opposition adopted a very similar crime control stance to that of the Conservative Party. Since the Labour Government took office in 1997 there have been, apart from the passing of the HRA, no indications of attempts to break with the criminal justice legislative policies of the Conservative Party. Post-2000, both major parties were seeking to outdo each other in encouraging and pandering to populist notions of crime control. The attack on the World Trade Centre in New York in September 2001 has fostered the production of further counter-terrorist legislation in the UK which will continue the trend away from due process in terrorist investigations. The Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Bill 2001 includes a number of further police powers relating to identification in Part 10 and a power to detain non-national terrorist suspects without trial.³⁵⁷ It requires derogation from Art 5 since otherwise, the new provisions would be found to be incompatible with its requirements. It is probably safe to predict that the election in 2001 of Iain Duncan-Smith as the leader of the Conservative Party is also likely to aid in confirming the continuing devaluation of due process in criminal justice policies. The HRA, together with improvement in the police disciplinary system, is, as indicated, likely to have a countering effect, but it is unlikely to be of the radical nature previously predicted.

352 In Walker and Starmer, op cit, fn 278, p 73.

353 Maguire, M, 'The wrong message at the wrong time?', in Morgan, D and Stephenson, G (eds), Suspicion and Silence, 1994, p 48.

354 In the CJPOA 1994, especially ss 71 and 68.

355 In the CJPOA 1994, ss 34, 36, 37; see Chapter 13, pp 842-43.

356 HC Deb Col 211,2 April 1996.

357 The new Bill was passed in the Commons by 323 votes to 79, but it may well be amended in the Lords in December 2001.

FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

1 INTRODUCTION¹

There is no general enforceable right to enter, remain in or move freely about in the UK or travel abroad except in so far as the freedom of movement provisions of EU law apply, and therefore this freedom is in a vulnerable position. International instruments providing rights to freedom of movement have not been ratified by the UK. As explained below, the UK has not ratified the freedom of movement Protocols of the European Convention. Article 12 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 1976 provides protection for freedom of movement, but the UK entered a number of important reservations to this right on ratification. In any event, unlike the Convention, it is not enforceable as far as the UK is concerned by means of individual petition.

In practice, the government has not generally tended to interfere with freedom of movement as far as British citizens are concerned, although they can be extradited. Further, this chapter charts a number of instances in which British citizens can be prevented from travelling abroad. However, non-British citizens born in or resident in the UK may not be allowed to remain or enter and may, therefore, be separated from their families. Asylum seekers who have a claim to enter the UK may not find that the claim receives full consideration, while persons may be expelled from the UK who have a claim to remain. Obviously, such expulsion represents one of the clearest possible infringements of freedom of movement and, although it must be weighed against the accepted right of every nation to place limits on those who can enter or remain within its boundaries,² the mechanism for balancing the two interests should in principle allow them to be fully and fairly weighed against each other.

The extent to which UK law allows determinations as to extradition or deportation and the claims of asylum seekers to be fairly and clearly made is the main issue addressed by this chapter. Thus, it concentrates on the circumstances in which a person can be required to leave the country, although it also considers the freedom to travel abroad. But apart from examining the position of asylum seekers, which raises a number of human rights issues, it does not consider the general claims of those wishing to enter the country, apart from those of asylum seekers, since the main focus of the chapter is on the freedom to remain in the country. Further, this choice is made on the basis that the complex provisions of immigration

1 General reading; Evans, Immigration Law, 1983; Grant and Martin, Immigration Law and Practice, 1982 and supplements; MacDonald, I and Blake, N, Immigration Law and Practice, 5th edn, 2001; Supperstone, M, Immigration Law, 1988; Dummett, A and Nichol, A, Subjects, Citizens, Aliens and Others—Nationality and Immigration Law, 1990; Supperstone and Cavanagh, Immigration, 1992. See also Harlow, C and Rawlings, R, Law and Administration, 1984, Chapters 16 and 17; Reports of the Commission for Racial Equality, Immigration Control and Procedures, Report of a Formal Investigation, 1985 and the Select Committee on Home Affairs, Immigration from the Indian Subcontinent (1981–82, HC 90–1); Papademetriou, G, The European Union's Struggle with Immigration and Asylum, 1996; Jackson, D, Immigration: Law and Practice, 2nd edn, 1999.

2 Recognised by the European Court of Human Rights; see the East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76.

law are a matter more appropriately covered in a number of specialist texts. Full and detailed consideration of the lengthy and complex provisions relating to asylum seekers is also outside the scope of this book.

This chapter begins by looking at the position of asylum seekers in a separate section and considers the relevance of the Human Rights Act (HRA) to their position. It then considers the mechanisms which can be used to expel a person from the country. In a further section, it considers the issues that may be raised under the HRA in respect of such expulsion, matters that might also be raised in respect of asylum seekers. It moves on to consider recent curtailments of the freedom to travel abroad.

At present, the influence of the HRA on freedom of movement is limited. Despite the inception of the HRA, freedom of movement remains in a very precarious position since the routes allowing recourse to the domestic courts under the HRA or to the European Court of Human Rights are unavailable. The UK has so far failed to ratify Protocol 4³ of the European Convention on Human Rights which, under Art 2, protects freedom of movement within a State's boundaries and the freedom to leave the state. Article 3 of Protocol 4, which contains no exceptions, guarantees the right of persons not to be expelled from the State of which they are nationals and to enter that State, while Art 4 prohibits the collective expulsion of aliens.

The UK has also failed to ratify Protocol 7,⁴ which goes further than Art 4 of Protocol 4 since it prohibits the expulsion of an alien unless he or she has been given an opportunity to submit reasons against expulsion and have the case reviewed by the 'competent authority'. The authority need not be a judicial body which complies with Art 6 of the Convention, and compliance with Art 4 of the Protocol would be achieved if that authority merely reconsidered the matter. Thus, this guarantee is of a limited and circumspect nature.

The domestic reception of the Convention under the HRA did not affect the availability of these guarantees to UK citizens, since these later Protocols were not received with the rest of the Convention into domestic law. The Government has reconsidered the question of incorporating the Fourth and Seventh Protocols. It has decided at present to ratify the Seventh Protocol⁵ although it has not yet done so, but has not yet decided to ratify the Fourth, which would require changes to immigration legislation or the entry of a reservation.⁶ It must be noted that European Union nationals have the right to freedom of movement subject to limited exceptions under the Treaty of Rome 1957 and the Treaty of European Union,⁷ as amended by the Amsterdam Treaty, which will be interpreted in accordance with Protocol 4, and Art 1 of Protocol 7.⁸

Breaches of other Convention rights attendant upon infringements of freedom of movement can be brought before the domestic courts, under the HRA, or 3 The Protocol came into force on 2 May 1968.

4 It came into force in November 1988.

5 This will require legislative change to certain family law principles creating inequalities between husband and wife.

6 See Home Office Review of Human Rights Instruments (amended) 26 August 1999.

7 The EC Treaty, Art 48 protects the free movement of workers while the TEU, Art K1 relates to asylum and immigration policy.

8 See further below, pp 946-48.

ultimately determined at Strasbourg. Argument that separation from family or from a particular community amounts to a violation of the Art 8 guarantee of privacy remains a possibility.

2 ASYLUM SEEKERS⁹

Introduction

The UK accepts certain international treaty obligations in respect of asylum seekers under the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees 1951, as amended by the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees. These are reflected in the Immigration Rules and given statutory recognition under s 1 of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, as regards appeals, although neither the Treaty nor the Protocol have been enacted directly into UK law. Thus, there is no right to asylum under domestic law. The scheme instead determines when refolement (return of the asylum seeker to the country of origin) can occur. But, as indicated below, the maze of complex provisions have little to say about the grounds for the grant of asylum. They concern the methods of removing the asylum seeker from the country and dealing with the application as speedily as possible.

The current (cumbersome and complex) domestic scheme is governed by the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 and the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. The 1996 Act amended the 1993 Act and both the 1993 and 1996 Acts were amended and partly repealed by the 1999 Act.¹⁰ A number of statutory instruments also affect the position of asylum seekers, including the Immigration Rules¹¹ and the Asylum Appeals (Procedure) Rules 1996,¹² which were superseded by the Immigration and Asylum Appeals (Procedure) Rules 2000.¹³ The thrust of the changes to the scheme has been to seek to limit the ability to appeal, to speed up the procedure, to minimise the benefit entitlements consistent with enhancing its deterrent quality, and to enhance the possibilities of removing asylum seekers from the UK (to 'safe' third countries or to countries of origin deemed to be safe).

Under Art 1 A(2) of the Convention, asylum should not be refused if the only country to which the person could be removed is one to which he is unwilling to go owing to a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion. A duty to 9 See, generally, Burgess (1991) 141 NLJ 50; Bhaba, J, 'Deterring refugees' (1992) Imm & Nat LP 133; Stanley, A, 'The legal status of international zones: the British experience with particular reference to asylum seekers' (1992) Imm & Nat LP 126; with reference to EU migration control: Grant (1993) 143 NLJ 608; Bernstein, 'Political asylum' (1992) 142 NLJ 1097; on the 1993 Act, Munir (1993) 143 NLJ 1149 and Chowdhury (1994) 144 NLJ 207; The Detention and Imprisonment of Asylum Seekers in the UK, Amnesty International British Section, 1996; Goodwin-Gill, GS, 'Who to protect...how and the future' (1997) 9(1) Int Journal of Refugee Law 1; Shah, P, Refugees, Race and the Legal Concept of Asylum in Britain, 2000; Harvey, C, Seeking Asylum in the UK—Problems and Perspectives, 2000.

10 The 1999 Act repealed ss 1–4,7,9 and 10 of the 1996 Act. It also repealed ss 3–12 and Scheds 1 and 2 to the 1993 Act.

11 Issued as HC 725 (1993) amending the previous restatement of the Rules; they were then incorporated in another restatement, HC 395 (1994).

12 SI 1996/2070.

13 SI 2333/L21.

grant asylum is not directly imposed, but if no safe alternative destination can be found for the asylum seeker, the country in question will have to grant asylum.

Rule 334 of the Immigration Rules provides that asylum will be granted if the Secretary of State is satisfied that: the applicant is in the UK; he is a refugee as defined in the Convention; 'refusing his application would result in his being required to go in breach of the Convention and Protocol to a country in which his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership of a particular social group'. It would appear that Rule 334 goes further than the Convention in requiring a threat to life or freedom. These appear to be more stringent requirements than those denoted by a well founded fear of persecution owing to membership of a particular social group.

At the present time, 78% of asylum applications are initially turned down by asylum case workers, but one-third of those decisions are reversed on appeal. Contrary to popular belief, asylum applications have not been constantly increasing. Between 1995 and 1996 the numbers declined from 40,000 to 20,000. However, between 1999 and 2000, the number increased to 76,000.¹⁴ At present, the numbers are double what they were three years ago. The UK is perceived by some asylum seekers as having a more relaxed regime than some other European countries and as giving a broader definition to the meaning of persecution.¹⁵ Also, a number of asylum seekers speak English and have family connections in Britain. At the initial stage of claiming asylum, certain asylum seekers are selected as appropriate for detention at centres such as the one at Oakington, where their claims can be fast tracked; they may receive an answer in seven days, but will lose their freedom during that time. As indicated below, the practice of detaining asylum seekers may be in breach of Art 5, although the House of Lords considers that the practice can be reconciled with Art 5.

The legal and political context

Commentators tend to agree that the Conservative Governments of 1989 to 1997, especially the Major Government, demonstrated an illiberal and mean-minded attitude towards asylum seekers.¹⁶ The lengths to which the Government was prepared to go were demonstrated in 1996. The Social Security (Persons from Abroad) Miscellaneous Amendment Regulations 1996¹⁷ removed all entitlement to income-related benefit from asylum seekers who failed to claim asylum immediately upon arrival in the UK and from those who were pursuing appeals. Thus, some genuine asylum seekers were faced with the choice of staying in the UK awaiting determination of their claims while homeless and destitute, or abandoning their claims and returning to face persecution. In *Secretary of State for Social Security ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants; Secretary of State for Social Security ex p B*¹⁸ the applicants sought judicial review of the regulations on the ground that they 14 Home Office, Immigration Research and Statistics Directorate.

15 See below, fn 46 and associated text.

16 See Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 7th edn, 1993, p 407; The Detention and Imprisonment of Asylum Seekers in the UK, Amnesty International British Section, 1996; Harvey, op cit, fn 9.

17 SI 1996/30.

18 [1996] 4 All ER 385; (1996) 146 NLJ 985. For comment see Harvey [1997] PL 394. See also The Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea ex p Kihara (1996) The Times, 10 July.

were ultra vires the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, the enabling Act, since, inter alia, they created interference with the exercise of rights under the Act.

The Court of Appeal found that the Leech principle was of assistance to the applicants. *Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Leech (No 2)*¹⁹ concerned the right of prison governors to open and read letters to a solicitor and a right exercisable on grounds of prolixity or objectionability to stop them (Rule 33(3)) unless a writ had already been issued. The opening and reading of such letters was challenged by way of judicial review. The Court of Appeal found that it was a principle of great importance that every citizen had an unimpeded right of access to a court and that this was buttressed by the principle of legal professional privilege. A common law privilege of this nature could openly be taken away by subordinate legislation only where that was expressly authorised by the enabling legislation (s 47 of the Prison Act 1952). Section 47 might authorise some screening of correspondence, but it must be strictly construed in accordance with the presumption against statutory interference with common law rights. The court found that the instant case involved taking the Leech principle a step further. Leech had concerned a direct interference with basic rights. The instant case concerned an indirect interference with such rights. However, the Court of Appeal considered that the step in question should be taken. Simon-Brown LJ found that the rights conferred on asylum seekers under the 1993 Act would be rendered nugatory for some of them by the impact of the 1996 Regulations. The only alternative would be for them to experience a destitution which no civilised nation could tolerate. Simon-Brown LJ said: 'Parliament cannot have intended a significant number of genuine asylum seekers to be impaled on the horns of so intolerable a dilemma: the need either to abandon their claims to refugee status or to maintain them as best they can but in a state of utter destitution.' On these grounds, the 'uncompromisingly draconian' regulations were held to be ultra vires.

The Social Security Secretary, Peter Lilley, then decided to reverse the decision of the Court of Appeal by means of primary legislation. An amendment to the Asylum and Immigration Bill 1996 was therefore rushed through Parliament. When the 1996 Act came into force, many asylum seekers were placed in the situation described by Simon-Brown LJ as one which 'no civilised nation can tolerate' (under s 11 and Sched 1 of the 1996 Act). The asylum seekers in question were helped by voluntary and church groups, but such groups were placed under a great strain as a direct result of the government policy. It became hard, if not impossible, for many asylum seekers to pursue the legal right to claim asylum. However, the asylum seekers' lawyers discovered that the National Assistance Act 1948 obliges local authorities to provide temporary accommodation for those in need. Obviously, the doctrine of implied repeal would have been expected to mean that the 1948 Act was repealed to the extent of its inconsistency with the 1996 Act. It was very difficult to argue with credibility that the Conservative-dominated Parliament had not intended that asylum seekers should be rendered destitute under the terms of the 1996 Act, since that was clearly what it had intended. Nevertheless, when the issue was considered in the High Court (Hammersmith and Fulham LBC ex p M),²⁰ Collins J found 'it was impossible to believe that an asylum seeker who was lawfully here and could not lawfully be removed from the country should be left destitute, starving and at grave risk of illness and even death'. This judgment was upheld on appeal in February 1997 by a court headed by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Woolf.²¹ Thus, at present, withdrawal of accommodation is no longer used to deter asylum seekers and encourage them to abandon their claims.²²

19 [1993] 4 All ER 539.

20 (1996) The Times, 10 October.

The intention of the Labour Government on taking office in 1997 was apparently to uphold Britain's obligations under international law and to make a fresh start with asylum policy.²³ In 1995, Jack Straw called the introduction of the 'white list' (see below) 'the most crude playing of the race card I have ever seen and we are going to resist it. We will have no truck with the crude racist legislation which Mr Howard is proposing.'²⁴ So far, however, it has shown no preparedness to dismantle some of the more draconian asylum rules. The 1998 White Paper accepted that asylum seekers could not be left destitute, but worked on the premise that those who had not established their right to be in the UK were not entitled to the same benefits as those who had.²⁵ The main aim of the government appeared to be to maintain benefits at a minimal level in order to create deterrence.

It is fair to say that the policies of the current Labour Government have not been marked by greater liberality than those of its predecessor. The statutory framework it introduced—the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999—introduced a range of measures designed to deter entry, to speed up the procedure for determining the claim and to deal with the accommodation of asylum seekers while the claim is being heard. The 1999 Act in particular introduced a dispersal policy and gave recognition to the practice of detaining asylum seekers under para 16(1), Sched 2 of the Act which was already apparent.²⁶

The practice of detaining asylum seekers was challenged, in 2001, by action taken under the HRA, relying on Art 5. Collins J found that none of the exceptions under Art 5 applied to such detention and, therefore, the practice was unlawful under s 6 of the HRA.²⁷ The decision caused an outcry in the national press and an attack on the judge from the Home Office. However, it merely depended on a straightforward application of s 6 of the HRA and Art 5. The judgment was then over-turned by the Court of Appeal^{27a} on the ground that the short period of detention in question (10 days) was justified in order to ensure the speedy resolution of the many claims. This was, it is suggested, an executive—friendly ruling which has created a worrying exception to Article 5.

Thus, a pattern similar to that apparent in the Conservative years is emerging, in the sense that the Government answers to popular opinion by producing extensive and draconian laws aimed at asylum seekers, which are then subject to 21 Hammersmith and Fulham LBC exp M (1997) The Times, 19 February.

22 See further Cholewinski, 'Enforced destitution of asylum seekers in the UK: the denial of fundamental rights' (1998) 10(3) Int Journal of Refugee Law 462–99.

23 Government White Paper, Fairer, Faster, Firmer—Modern Approach to Immigration and Asylum, Cm 4018, July 1998.

24 BBC Radio 4 'Today' programme, 26 October 1995.

25 Ibid., para 8.17.

26 Under ss 148–57. In 1999, 1,000 detention places were available, three-quarters of which were used for asylum seekers (Home Office, Immigration Research and Statistics Directorate, July 1999).

27 R (on the Application of Saadi and Others) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept. Judgment of 10 September 2001. (2001) The Times, 22 October; (2001) 145 SJLB 246; (2001) 151 NLJ 1573; [2001] EWCA Civ 1512.

27a challenge on human rights grounds in the courts. The difference is that under the HRA, the judiciary have a clearer mandate for intervention. This does not imply that they will use it; the above judgment of the Court of Appeal suggests that under pressure from the executive, they may decline to do so.

EU policy on asylum

In June 1997, a proposed revision to the Treaty of Rome was considered at the Amsterdam summit meeting and included in the Treaty of Amsterdam, which came into force in May 1999. It allows the European Commission to make proposals for harmonisation of asylum policy which require only qualified majority voting rather than unanimity. The revision is intended to address the lack of uniformity in EU policy on asylum. Some areas are governed by EU standards, but others are the preserve of the individual States. This leaves some areas uncoordinated, including the length of time an asylum seeker might wait in order to hear whether a third country—the one in which he or she should have claimed asylum—will take him or her back. Minimum standards for the reception of asylum seekers are also left to be determined by the individual countries, as are the procedures for dealing with the applications. Harmonisation of policy in the EU may lead to improved standards in relation to some aspects of asylum seeking, although previous harmonisation has probably led to a general lowering of standards. For example, the British rule that asylum must be sought in the first ‘safe’ country of arrival is now part of EU policy. It may be noted that, as part of the reforms, Spain wishes to amend the EU Treaty so that nationals from one EU country cannot seek asylum in another EU country. However, such an amendment would override the 1951 Convention and would fail to take account of possible future human rights abuses in EU countries.²⁸

Grounds for the grant of asylum

The Treaty and Protocol are concerned only with political asylum seekers and this is reflected in the ambit of Rule 334, so that those fleeing from natural disasters or economic crises are not covered. Clearly, sometimes it may be hard to make this distinction when persons leave a country which is in the middle of a civil war. The applicant must belong to a group which is likely to be persecuted and this will include a ‘social group’. The meaning of this term of Rule 75 (now Rule 334) was considered in Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Binbasi:²⁹ it was held to mean that a group of persons could be identified as sharing fundamental unchangeable characteristics or as sharing characteristics to which they had an overriding moral commitment on religious or other grounds.³⁰ However, even where the applicant can be viewed as being a member of such a group, he or she will fail in a claim for asylum on the basis of religious persecution unless an element of discrimination is also present. In *Omoruyi v Secretary of State for the Home Dept*³¹ the applicant, a 28 See further Alston, P, The EU and Human Rights, 1st edn, 1999.

29 [1989] Imm AR 595.

30 For discussion of the meaning of this term as applied to homosexuals, see Bamforth [1995] PL 382.

31 (2000) The Times, 3 November.

Nigerian Christian, claimed asylum on the basis that he feared death since he had defied a Nigerian cult in refusing to submit the corpse of his father to them for ritual mutilation, in accordance with his Christian beliefs. It was found that no element of discrimination was present, since he was under the threat of death for defying the cult, not on the basis of discrimination because of his beliefs. This decision fails to appreciate that the applicant had been indirectly discriminated against, since he had been subjected to a threat which bore unequally on persons depending on their religious beliefs. Possibly, the decision to refuse asylum could also have been challenged by basing his argument on Art 9 read with Art 14 of the European Convention, since Art 14 may recognise indirect discrimination.³²

An asylum seeker may well enter the country without a valid passport or without other documents establishing his or her identity or nationality. However, the House of Lords has ruled that such a person cannot be treated as an illegal entrant under the Immigration Act 1971.³³ If a person seeks asylum, the case must be referred by the immigration officer to the Home Office for decision even though it appears that the claim is unjustified. The Home Office will consider the case in accordance with the provisions of the Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, and the claimant will not be removed until such consideration is completed.

The term 'persecution' has been interpreted fairly restrictively as meaning 'to oppress for holding a heretical opinion or belief';³⁴ under this strict interpretation, 'harassment' will not always be sufficient.³⁵ The House of Lords in *Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Sivakumaran*³⁶ laid down the test for determining whether the fear of persecution is well founded. Once it appears that the applicant genuinely fears persecution, the Secretary of State is required to ask himself on the basis of all the available information whether there has been demonstrated a 'real likelihood' or 'reasonable chance' of persecution.³⁷ The applicant has the burden of proving that there are grounds for thinking that persecution may occur. However, information may be taken into account of which he or she is unaware. Thus, the fear must be based on reasonable grounds, objectively assessed. It therefore appears that the question is not whether a person in possession of the information known to the applicant would have feared persecution, but whether such fear would have been felt by an objective observer in possession of all the available information.

The emphasis of this test differs from that put forward by the High Commissioner, which involves asking whether, subjectively, a real fear of persecution is present and then considering whether it is a fear no one would reasonably hold. The test put forward by the House of Lords therefore provides less protection for refugees and, moreover, the imprecise nature of expressions such as 'real likelihood' leaves considerable latitude for differences of opinion as to the severity of the risk of persecution. The House of Lords' decision in Ex p Sivakumaran to uphold the Secretary of State in refusing asylum applications of the six applicant Tamils from Sri Lanka differed from that of the adjudicator who later heard the appeals of the

32 See Chapter 16, p 984.

33 Nailie and Kanesarajah [1993] AC 674; [1993] 2 WLR 927, HL.

34 See Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p Jonah [1985] Imm AR 7, per Nolan J.

35 Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Yurekli [1990] Imm AR 334, QBD.

36 [1988] AC 958; [1988] All ER 193.

37 See Lord Diplock's judgment in Fernandez v Government of Singapore [1971] 2 All ER 691, p 697.

Tamils from abroad and found that there was a sufficient risk of persecution based upon race, religion and political opinion.³⁸ The fact that all the available information must be considered may also, of course, work to the advantage of the applicant since it will mean that a court cannot disregard any piece of information: this will include what has happened in the past which should be related to any current events,³⁹ although the mere fact that an asylum seeker has been persecuted in the past will not raise a presumption in his favour that he is a refugee.⁴⁰ However, in determining the well-foundedness of the fear, the fact that the applicant has not been singled out for persecution will not be conclusive of the issue.⁴¹

It may be noted that gender is not included expressly in the Convention, but that women may, in certain circumstances, form a persecuted group. There seems to be an increasing possibility that women who are subject to barbaric practices and grossly unequal treatment owing to their gender in certain countries (such as beheading on suspicion of adultery in some Islamic countries, denial of freedom of movement or education under some fundamentalist regimes, genital mutilation in India) may be able to seek asylum on those grounds.⁴² The House of Lords in *Islam v Sec of State for the Home Dept; R v IAT and Another ex p Shah (Consolidated Appeals)*⁴³ recognised that in some circumstances, women can be viewed as a persecuted group. The Lords found that women in Pakistan can be viewed as a particular social group who are persecuted merely through membership of that group, since they are at risk of flogging or death if accused of adultery by their husbands.

Thus, the rights of women and girls may be recognised and declared through the medium of asylum seeking in a manner which, it is suggested, gives the lie to cultural relativism. Such asylum seeking may lead to a greater recognition in the West that unequal practices in some cultures cannot be defended as forming part of a strong cultural tradition, since they merely reflect long standing male dominance in the particular culture.

If the test as to persecution is satisfied and if, as in Bugdaycay, the refugee cannot be returned to another safe country, he or she can settle in the UK, but the United Nations Convention requires under Art 2 that measures relating to public order must be observed. If they are not observed, the refugee can be removed, but not back to the country he or she originally fled from or any other where persecution would be likely to arise.⁴⁴

Third country rules

However, it will be irrelevant that an applicant may have a genuine case for refugee status if the 'third country' rule applies. This rule was enshrined in Rule 354 of the 1994 Rules. If an applicant has had an opportunity to seek asylum in a safe third country en route to the UK, he or she will be sent back to that country to seek 38 Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1990] 3 All ER 652, CA; for comment see Blake, N (1989) 4(1) Imm & Nat LP 7; Burgess, D (1991) 141 NLJ 50.

39 Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p P [1992] COD 295.

40 Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Direk [1992] Imm AR 330.

41 Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Gulbache [1991] Imm AR 526.

42 See, eg, IAT ex p Shah (1996) The Times, 12 November.

43 [1998] 1WLR 270; [1999] 2 All ER 545; for discussion, see July (1999) J Civ Lib 243.

44 Immigration Rule 173.

asylum there. If this appears to be the case, the Secretary of State need not give substantive consideration to the claim and need not contact the authorities in the third country in order to make a judgment as to the likely response to the asylum seeker's application. This can mean that where a plane has simply touched down briefly in a third country, the asylum seeker will be returned to that country. It may also mean that he or she may be returned to a country which can only doubtfully be regarded as safe and which may return the asylum seeker to the original country, as occurred in Bugdaycay, below.⁴⁵

Under s 2(2) of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996, an applicant for asylum could be removed to a third country if, inter alia, the government of that country would not send him to another country otherwise than in accordance with the Convention. In *Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Adan*⁴⁶ the House of Lords found that proposals to remove a Somali citizen to Germany and an Algerian citizen to France were contrary to the 1996 Act. Both France and Germany interpret the expression 'fear of persecution' as relating to conduct that can be attributed to a State, a narrower meaning than that adopted in many other States. Since in both Somalia and Algeria the applicants were not protected from threats from private citizens, France and Germany might view them as not being subject to persecution. Therefore, since the expression in the Convention had only one autonomous meaning and France and Germany were not applying that proper interpretation, they were not countries to which the asylum seekers could be returned.

However, the position has now changed under the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. Under s 11, Member States of the EU are deemed to be places from which the asylum seeker would not be sent to another country otherwise than in accordance with the Convention. This provision runs contrary to the findings in Adan. A decision based on s 11 could only be challenged on the basis that the applicant's Convention rights might be breached as a result.

Appeals

If leave to enter was refused to a claimant to refugee status, he used to be in the same position as other persons seeking entry: under s 13 of the 1971 Act, he had no right of appeal while in the UK. The Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, however, provided for the first time a statutory right of appeal in limited circumstances to a Special Adjudicator under s 8. The Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 was amended by the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996. It was then amended as part of the broad changes to the rules introduced by the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. The Immigration and Asylum Appeals (Procedure) Rules 2000 Pt III, para 3,⁴⁷ makes provision for the procedure to be followed. An appeal lies to a Special Adjudicator; leave to appeal to the Immigration Appeals Tribunal may be granted, by the tribunal, and there is the further possibility of leave to appeal from the tribunal on a point of law to the Court of Appeal. This scheme is considered below.⁴⁸

45 See also Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Mehari [1994] 2 WLR 349.

46 (2000) The Times, 20 December; see Adan v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1999] 1 AC 293.

47 SI 2000/2333 (L21).

48 See pp 954–56.

The right of appeal was balanced under the 1993 Act by a short cut procedure for claims for asylum which the Home Secretary considered to be without foundation. Under the fast track procedure, many asylum applicants have to submit their appeal against refusal of refugee status within 48 hours and it would be heard and decided within seven days. Those who arrive from countries officially designated as ones from which asylum applications will be presumed to be unfounded (countries on the official so called 'white list')⁴⁹ will also be dealt with by this procedure, which may mean that their personal circumstances, which do place them in danger, are not considered. The Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 extended the fast track method; the procedure to be followed is laid down in the Asylum Appeals Procedure Rules 1996.⁵⁰ Sections 2 and 3 of the 1996 Act removed the 'in country' right of appeal in third country cases. Under s 11 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, Member States of the EU which are parties to the Dublin Convention of 1990 (making provision for the question of which State should deal with asylum claims of those arriving from outside the EU) are deemed to be safe countries. A decision based on s 11 can only be challenged on the basis that the applicant's Convention rights might be breached as a result.

Section 12 of the 1999 Act creates two categories of safe countries. Certain other countries can be certified as 'safe' by the Secretary of State. Section 1(2) of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 placed the notion of the white list on a statutory basis, although the designated countries were set out in the Asylum (Designated Countries of Destination and Designated Safe Countries) Order 1996.⁵¹ Those countries are also designated safe under the 1999 Act. That category of countries also includes those members of the EU which have not signed the Dublin Convention. The second category covers all other countries. The Home Secretary must designate them as safe. However, a person cannot be removed to a country in this category if an appeal under s 71 of the 1999 Act is pending. An appeal can be mounted under s 71 to the issue of a certificate under ss 11 or 12, but unless the country falls into the second category under s 12, there is no right to remain in the UK while the appeal is being heard.

Appeals against removal under ss 11 or 12 on the basis that the removal would be unlawful under s 6 of the HRA can be made to an adjudicator under s 65, but the Secretary of State can, under s 72(2), certify that the appeal is manifestly ill-founded. The applicant could challenge the certificate by way of judicial review, but would not have the right to remain in the country while the review was being heard.

Challenges to executive decisions; impact of the HRA

Prior to the inception of the HRA, decisions of the Home Secretary regarding asylum seekers were normally challenged on the basis that they were unreasonable. However, as the following discussion demonstrates, this set the threshold for challenge very high. In particular, it meant that the mere fact that the applicant's Convention rights had been violated by a decision did not in itself provide a ground 49 For the countries designated by Michael Howard, the then Home Secretary, as safe for white list purposes see HC Deb Vol 268 Col 703.

50 SI 1996/2070.

51 SI 1996/2671.

for review, so long as the decision maker had acted reasonably. However, under the HRA, the decision maker is bound by s 6. Therefore, if one or more of the Convention rights are breached, the decision will be unlawful unless s 6(2) applies.

Wednesbury unreasonableness

In making a decision as regards the grant of asylum, the Home Secretary may take into account guidance given by the advisory Executive Committee to the High Commissioner for Refugees as to the interpretation of the Treaty and Protocol.⁵² If an interpretation of the Immigration Rules is adopted which does not conform with the Convention, the decision may be quashed for ‘illegality’ or ‘irrationality’ as occurred in Bugdaycay v Secretary of State for Home Affairs.⁵³ The applicant was a Ugandan refugee whose father and cousins had been killed by the secret police and who therefore feared for his life if he should return to Uganda. He had lived in Kenya and the Home Secretary, in rejecting his claim for asylum, determined to deport him mere regardless of the fact that Kenya had been known to return such refugees to Uganda. The House of Lords found that when the Immigration Rules were interpreted in accordance with Art 33 of the Convention, it could then be found that the decision to deport him would contravene it, because although deportation to Kenya would not directly threaten his life, it might lead to such a threat owing to the probability that Kenya would deport him.

However, the Court of Appeal in *Munongo v Secretary of State for Home Affairs*⁵⁴ confirmed that the courts would not interfere with the Home Secretary’s decision as long as he had followed the correct procedure and his decision was not Wednesbury unreasonable—tainted by illegality or irrationality. They would not, therefore, question the basic credibility of the Home Secretary’s decision as long as there was some evidence to support his findings. The arbitrariness of an executive decision in respect of asylum seekers will be irrelevant to its reasonableness according to the High Court in Special Adjudicator ex p Kandasamy.⁵⁵ The applicant, a Tamil, left Sri Lanka, travelled to Sweden and from there to the UK with the intention of claiming asylum in Canada. He and another person in the same circumstances, S, were detained in the UK and then claimed political asylum. Substantive consideration of their applications was refused, but then S’s application was substantively considered. The applicant sought judicial review of the decision of the Special Adjudicator to refuse substantive consideration of his application on the ground that the adjudicator’s findings were perverse in failing to acknowledge the fact that the situations of S and the applicant were identical or flawed in failing to make plain the respects in which they differed. The fact that an applicant had been treated differently from another in very similar circumstances was not found to provide a ground for review. Public law acknowledged no general principle of consistency. The application therefore failed.

If an asylum seeker applies for leave to move for judicial review of the decision

52 See Miller v Immigration Appeal Tribunal [1988] Imm AR 358, CA; Bugdaycay v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1987] AC 514, HL; Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p Yassine [1990] Imm AR 354, QBD.

53 [1987] AC 514; [1987] 1 All ER 940.

54 [1991] Imm AR 616, CA.

55 (1994) The Times, 11 March.

not to grant asylum, it would be expected that he or she would not be removed from the UK pending the further hearing. If he or she is so removed, an injunction may be issued ordering the minister in question to return him or her to the jurisdiction of the court. If that injunction is breached, the minister may be in contempt of court. The House of Lords so held in M v Home Office,⁵⁶ the case concerned defiance of a court order by the then Home Secretary, Kenneth Baker. Immigration officials had placed a refugee from torture in Zaire back on a plane to that country despite the order prohibiting this. In making the finding of contempt, the House of Lords affirmed the fundamental constitutional principle of obedience of the executive to the law. This contempt conviction of a Cabinet minister persuaded the Government to enshrine in law the principle that refugee claimants have a right to remain in the country until a decision is made on their claim (s 6 of the 1993 Act). This provision is now enshrined in s 15 of the 1999 Act. However, as indicated, the 1999 Act provides for the removal of the applicant in a number of circumstances even before an appeal is heard.

The Human Rights Act

As indicated above, the courts can now find that a decision relating to an asylum seeker is simply unlawful, following the wording of s 6 of the HRA, on the basis that the decision maker has breached one or more of the Convention rights. The most relevant Articles are likely to be Arts 2, 3, 5 and 6. An example was given above of a straightforward finding that Art 5 had been breached by the detention of asylum seekers. Argument could be raised that Art 6 has been breached by the certification of the Home Secretary under s 72(2) of the 1999 Act that an appeal would be manifestly ill-founded, followed by removal of the applicant to another country, since it could be said that the right of access to a court is so fundamentally impaired.⁵⁷

The determination that a country may be viewed as safe has been of especial significance. The courts have allowed the Home Secretary a wide discretion in making such a determination. In *Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Canbolat*⁵⁸ it was found that the Home Secretary was entitled to decide that France was a safe third country, despite evidence to the contrary. The Special Adjudicator had considered that France was not a safe country. However, it was found that the Home Secretary was entitled to form a contrary opinion which could not be challenged on its merits. In Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Abdi; Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Gawe,⁵⁹ the applicants appealed to the Special Adjudicator regarding certificates issued by the Home Secretary to the effect that their claim to asylum was without foundation. The applicants, Somalian nationals, had flown to Spain; they had not claimed asylum there, but had claimed it in the UK. The Home Secretary considered that there was no reason to believe that Spain would not comply with its obligations under the Convention. It was found that the Home Secretary was not obliged to reveal all the material on which he had based the 56 (1993) 143 NLJ 1099; [1993] 3 All ER 537, HL; [1992] 1 All ER 75, CA; for comment on this decision see [1993] PL 586.

57 See Omar v France (2000) 29 EHRR 210.

58 [1998] 1 WLR 269.

59 (1996) The Times, 17 February.

‘without foundation’ certificates. Further, the Home Secretary’s letters of decision alone were sufficient as a basis on which the Adjudicator could uphold the decision. This decision in particular affords judicial review a very narrow role in rendering the Home Secretary accountable for decisions regarding the safety of third countries. Similar leeway was also allowed to the Home Secretary in Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Chahal.⁶⁰

However, these decisions may be contrasted with that in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Javed,⁶¹ in which it was found that the minister had erred in law in arriving at the view that Pakistan could be considered a safe country. The judge, Rose J, reviewed the evidence in coming to the conclusion that women and religious minorities faced persecution in Pakistan.

If decisions, such as those in Javed and that of Collins J on Art 5,⁶² which apply s 6 of the HRA at its face value without showing the deference previously accorded to ministers, continue to occur, it will be possible to say in this context that the HRA has had a real impact in counteracting the effects of repressive legislation. The further possibilities of raising Art 3 and 8 arguments are considered below, in relation to deportation, as is the possibility of arguing that the right of appeal has been impaired beyond a point which can be tolerated under the Convention.

Conclusions

The system continues to be very heavily weighted against a successful claim by means of the application of the third country rule, the use of the white list, the conditions and length of detention awaiting resolution of the claim⁶³ and the limitations placed on rights of appeal. Amnesty estimates that only about six in every 100 applications to the UK are successful.

The current climate in Parliament and in the country is uncondusive to the development of a more humane policy towards asylum seekers, and the attacks on New York and the Pentagon on 11 September 2001 are likely, however illogical this may seem, to serve to increase the hostility currently shown towards them, and to encourage the introduction of ever more draconian legislation. If the current politically courageous attitude of certain judges in this context continues to be evident, they will be placed in an increasingly invidious position, one that places them at odds with the executive, with much of the media, and with public opinion, as they use the HRA as a counterbalance. At present, the Labour Government is being embarrassed by the straightforward effects of the legislation it itself introduced. Section 6 of the HRA does not provide that the judiciary should show deference to the executive in respect of asylum seekers and, therefore, appears to demonstrate a desire on the part of Parliament to bring about a break with the previous position. It appears possible that the Government will react by seeking to limit the possibility of bringing proceedings under s 7(1)(a), as it has done under the RIPA⁶⁴ and in respect of deportation, as considered below.

60 (1993) The Times, 12 March.

61 (2001) The Times, 9 February; see also R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Turgut [2001] 1 All ER 719.

62 See fn 27, above.

63 See The Detention and Imprisonment of Asylum Seekers in the UK, Amnesty International British Section, 1996.

64 See Chapter 11, pp 712–13.

3 DEPORTATION

Deportation represents the clearest infringement of freedom of movement and, therefore, should be used only where there is clear justification and where there are mechanisms allowing careful scrutiny of the decision to deport.⁶⁵ Deportation is available only in respect of persons who are not British citizens. The position as regards citizenship is governed by the Immigration Act 1971, which, as amended, is the current governing legislation replacing the Commonwealth Immigrants Acts.

Prior to 1962, all UK and Commonwealth subjects had the same freedom of movement in terms of entering and remaining in the UK. Immigration controls under the Immigration Act 1962 extended control beyond aliens for the first time.⁶⁶ The 1962 Act was intended to impose control on the numbers of entrants except for those possessing personal or ancestral connections with the UK itself. It therefore marked the development of a policy allowing persons from the mainly white Old Commonwealth to enter while restricting entrants from the mainly black New Commonwealth, which was to continue in subsequent enactments.

However, the 1962 Act did not cover many would-be entrants. In particular, many Asians in Kenya chose, when Kenya became independent in 1963, to opt for retaining their citizenship of the UK and Colonies rather than becoming Kenyan citizens. They would, therefore, have been able to enter the UK under the terms of the 1962 Act and to curb this, the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1968 was passed. It imposed controls to cover holders of UK passports issued outside the UK, unless such persons could show parental or grandparental links with the UK itself (patricity). This test appeared neutral on its face, but in fact discriminated against black Commonwealth citizens in favour of white ones. It also meant that some citizens who now lost UK entry and settlement rights had no such rights in the countries from which they sought entry and so found themselves unable to enter either country.

The 1968 Act thus avoided making an overt affirmation that the UK was prepared to operate arbitrary distinctions between would-be entrants but, in fact, created hardship for particular groups. Eventually, it was condemned as racially motivated by the European Commission of Human Rights in the East African Asians cases⁶⁷ on the basis that it had subjected them to racial discrimination which, in the circumstances of the case, could be termed 'degrading treatment' within Art 3. However, well before that ruling, the concept of partiality had become the basis of the main immigration measure, the Immigration Act 1971.

The 1971 Act was amended by the British Nationality Act 1981 which attempted to simplify matters by defining the categories of citizens who would be subject to controls and those who would not. 'British citizens', as defined under the Act, are immune from controls, while all others are subject to control including those within the new categories of 'British Dependent Territories Citizens' and 'British Overseas Citizens', a category covering UK and Colonies citizens resident in independent 65 For criticism of the procedure see Zellick [1973] Crim LR 612; Robertson, op cit, fn 16, pp 322–28.

66 For background to this Act and the 1968 Act which followed it, see Steel, No Entry, 1969; Bevan, The Development of British Immigration Law, 1986; Dummett and Nichol, op cit, fn 1.

67 (1973) 3 EHRR 76.

Commonwealth countries without citizenship of those countries. The first category includes residents of Hong Kong. However, these new categories cannot be relied on without reference to the 1971 Act in order to determine whether a person is immune from immigration controls because the concept of British citizen is itself defined to include all those who had such immunity when the 1981 Act came into force in 1983.

Thus the 1971 Act created two groups of people: those who have the 'right of abode'; and those who do not, and are therefore subject to controls.

The right of abode is governed by s 2 of the 1971 Act as amended, which provides:

- (1) A person is under this Act to have the right of abode in the United Kingdom if:
 - (a) he is a British citizen; or
 - (b) he is a Commonwealth citizen who—
 - (i) immediately before the commencement of the British Nationality Act 1981 was a Commonwealth citizen having the right of abode in the United Kingdom by virtue of s 2(1)(d) or s 2(2) of this Act as then in force; and
 - (ii) has not ceased to be a Commonwealth citizen in the meanwhile.
- (2) In relation to Commonwealth citizens who have the right of abode in the United Kingdom by virtue of subsection (1)(b) above, this Act, except this section and s 5(2), shall apply as if they were British citizens; and in this Act (except as aforesaid) 'British citizen' shall be construed accordingly.

In general terms, the Act largely placed Commonwealth citizens in the same position as aliens in respect of the right of abode, apart from EEA citizens, who have special rights of entry (see below). Therefore, two categories of citizens had the right of abode: those who had acquired rights before commencement of the Act; and those who were British citizens.

British citizens

Obviously, only the category of British citizens is ongoing; therefore, it is important to consider the mechanisms by which a person can become a British citizen. Citizenship can be acquired by birth, although not by birth alone, adoption, descent, registration and naturalisation. In practice, the relevant group will largely consist of Commonwealth immigrants who were born in the UK, have a UK-born parent or, in some cases, grandparent, or have been settled in the UK for some time.

After 1983, when the 1981 Act came into force, merely being born in the UK was not enough to acquire British citizenship of the United Kingdom and Colonies; the further requirement was imposed that the child's father or mother be, at that time, either a British citizen or 'settled' in the UK.⁶⁸ The meaning of 'settled' is considered above. If the child was illegitimate, however, the question of settlement would only be relevant in relation to the mother.⁶⁹ This discriminates against the father and although the Family Law Reform Act 1987 has equated the positions of legitimate and illegitimate children in a number of respects, it has not done so in this one despite a recommendation to do so by the Law Commission.⁷⁰ If a child is born outside the UK after 1983 and either parent is a British citizen, the child will acquire citizenship,⁷¹ but again the father is discriminated against if the child is illegitimate, since he will not be able to pass on his right to British citizenship.

68 The 1981 Act, s 1(1).

69 See s 50(9)(b).

One fundamental problem arising from the provisions relating to those born in the UK after 1983 is that it may not be clear whether the parent is 'ordinarily resident' (settled). Much will depend on the residence intentions of the parents at the time of the birth. A person's citizenship entitlement may therefore remain uncertain for a substantial period. However, if the parent is not a British citizen or settled at the time of the birth, but becomes so before the child is 18, he or she can still become a British citizen. Alternatively, he or she can become a British citizen if until the age of 10, in any one year for all those 10 years, the number of days on which he or she was absent from the UK did not exceed 90.⁷² The Home Secretary has a discretion to register even where the 90 day period has been exceeded in any or all of those first 10 years under s 1(7).

Various other persons have the right to be registered as British citizens, including certain former citizens of the UK and Colonies who did not become British citizens under the 1981 Act and have remained in the UK for five years without breach of the immigration laws and have been accepted for settlement.⁷³ The Home Secretary can also register certain persons such as minors as citizens at his discretion.⁷⁴

Naturalisation is at the discretion of the Home Secretary under s 6 of the 1981 Act. The Home Secretary may 'if he thinks fit' grant a certificate of naturalisation to a person who appears to him to satisfy the requirements of Sched 1 of the Act. These requirements relate to past residence in the UK, intention to remain there, good character and knowledge of the language.

Before 1981, wives of citizens of the UK and Colonies acquired on marriage the right to obtain citizenship by registration. In contrast, husbands of citizens of the UK and Colonies could only apply for naturalisation. This distinction was, however, removed by the 1981 Act which took away the registration rights of wives and made the grant of citizenship discretionary in both cases. The Immigration Act 1988 placed a further restriction on wives, who could acquire the right of abode. A polygamous wife used to be able to claim the right under s 2(2) of the 1971 Act (before amendment), but it is now provided that the first polygamous wife to exercise such right, by entry or by obtaining a certificate of entitlement shall, by so doing, exclude the rights of others.

Citizenship can be acquired by naturalisation but, in contrast to the right of certain persons considered above to citizenship by registration, citizenship by naturalisation is only at the discretion of the Home Secretary. In exercising this discretion, he will take into account the requirements of Sched 1.⁷⁵ The requirements include past residence in the UK, good character, knowledge of language and intention to remain; 70 Law Com No 118, para 11.20.

71 The 1981 Act, s 2.

72 Sections 1(3) and (4).

73 The 1981 Act, s 4(2).

74 See the 1981 Act, s 3(1): power to register any minor; and under ss 1(7), 3(4) and (5), 7(6) and (8): persons who have not fulfilled certain requirements which, if fulfilled, would have placed the Home Secretary under a duty to register them.

75 The 1981 Act, s 6.

they may not be so stringently applied where the applicant is married to a British citizen.

*The position of EU and EEA nationals*⁷⁶

European Union nationals have enforceable rights to freedom of movement under the Treaty of Rome⁷⁷ and these were extended to nationals of Austria, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden under the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994 SI 1994/1895. Prior to 1994, the Immigration Rules could only affect EU nationals to the extent permitted by Community law.⁷⁸ It was clear that any conflict between the Rules and EU provisions had to be resolved in favour of the latter.⁷⁹ The position of EU nationals was strengthened when s 7(1) of the Immigration Act 1988 was brought into force in July 1994: 'A person shall not "require leave to enter or remain" in any case in which he is entitled to do so by virtue of an enforceable Community Right...' Thus, EEA nationals must be viewed as entering as of right rather than falling into categories of persons who need administrative permission to enter. This does not mean that EEA nationals may not be subject to border controls. In Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Flynn,⁸⁰ the applicant sought judicial review of the decision of the Home Secretary to maintain border controls affecting the free movement of persons between Member States of the EU. He relied on Art 7(a) of the EC Treaty (inserted by Art 13 of the Single European Act 1986 and renumbered by Art G(9) of the Treaty on European Union 1992), which provides that the Community shall adopt measures with 'the aim of progressively establishing the internal market over a period expiring on December 1992... The internal market shall establish an area without internal frontiers in which the free movement of goods, persons...is ensured.' The appellant argued that Art 7(a) required the abolition of border controls by that date and that he had been detrimentally affected since he had been subjected to such controls. In Case 44/84 Hurd v Jones,⁸¹ the ECJ had found that a provision produces direct effects between the Member States and their subjects only if it is clear and unconditional and not contingent upon any discretionary implementing measure. Article 7(a) did not satisfy those requirements, since no clear and precise obligation was imposed by Art 7(a): the establishment of the internal market was not an obligation but an aim. Article 7(a) was therefore not of direct effect so that individuals could invoke it.

Article 48 is the principal provision governing the free movement of workers and it is supplemented by implementing secondary legislation. The fact of employment brings the provisions into play as regards the worker and his or her family and this has been interpreted, at least in the English courts, to mean that a person divorced from a worker is no longer entitled to remain in the UK.⁸² The free 76 See, generally, Evans (1982) 45 MLR 97; (1984) American Journal of Comparative Law 679; Steiner, J, Textbook of EC Law, 1998, Chapter 18 for further reading in respect of the relevant EU provisions.

77 See IT 68-70; acceptability of discrimination between EU nationals and non-EU nationals reiterated in Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p Al-Sabah [1992] Imm AR 223, CA.

78 Council Regulations (EEC) 1612/68, (EEC) 1251/70; Council Directives (64/221 EEC), (68/360 EEC), (72/194 EEC), (73/148 EEC), (75/34 EEC), (75/35 EEC); Council Declaration (EEC) 1451/68.

79 See Giangregorio v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1983] 3 CMLR 472; Monteil v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1974] 1 CMLR 265; Rubruck v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1984] 2 CMLR 499.

80 (1995) The Times, 20 July.

81 [1986] ECR 29.

movement to work may include the right to seek work,⁸³ although it may be necessary to show that the person has a genuine chance of obtaining work,⁸⁴ while the term ‘worker’ includes persons working to fulfil some economic purpose even though the work is part time and the worker must partly rely on public funds for support.⁸⁵

These rights do not extend to those wishing to enter and remain to exercise civil or political rights.⁸⁶ Moreover, they are not absolute; EU law permits a Member State to refuse a Community national permission to enter and remain on various grounds. States can deny these rights to workers on the grounds of ‘public policy, public security and public health’ (Art 48(3)).⁸⁷ This principle has been enshrined in Directive 64/221. Public policy is the most uncertain term and potentially very wide; however, it has been held by the European Court of Justice (ECJ) in *Van Duyn v Home Office (No 2)*⁸⁸ that Member States are not free to interpret it unilaterally, although it has been accepted that the concept of public policy will vary from State to State, and so States will have an area of discretion within the limits defined by the Treaty. In Rutili v Ministre de l’Intérieur,⁸⁹ the ECJ found that restrictions on the free movement of EU nationals could be imposed only where an individual’s presence constituted a ‘genuine and sufficiently serious threat to public policy’. The court considered that this principle embodied the principle applied to the restrictions on the rights under the European Convention that restrictions should be accepted only when necessary. Thus, the test of proportionality must be applied to restrictions on movement on grounds of public policy. In Bouchereau,⁹⁰ the concept of public policy was further narrowed, the ECJ holding that it connoted a threat ‘affecting one of the fundamental interests of society’.

Under Art 3(1) of the Directive, moreover, the power to restrict movement by deportation or otherwise may only be exercised on grounds of personal unacceptability.⁹¹ Thus, if the sole reason relied upon to justify exclusion or deportation is past membership of an undesirable organisation, the exclusion or deportation will not be lawful. It is necessary to show that there is something substantively undesirable about the specific individual in question. Reliance on the commission of a criminal offence simpliciter to justify exclusion or deportation would be contrary to the Directive. Thus, the EU national would retain his or her rights to enter and stay if re-offending was not anticipated or the crimes committed were fairly trivial, because the ‘public policy’ condition would not be satisfied.⁹² The ruling in Bouchereau gave some guidance as to the factors to be taken into account 82 Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Sandhu [1983] 3 CMLR 131.

83 Hoth v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1985] Imm AR 20; Bouanimba v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1986] Imm AR 343, IAT (Arts 48–51).

84 Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p Antonissen [1992] Imm AR 196: appeal against a deportation order failed as the applicant, who had served a prison sentence for a serious crime, was thought to have no chance of finding employment.

85 Kempf v Staatssecretaris van Justitie [1987] 1 CMLR 764.

86 See Levin v Secretary of State for Justice [1982] ECR 1035; and Re a Belgian Prostitute [1976] 2 CMLR 527.

87 For consideration of Art 48, see O’Keeffe [1982] 19 CMLR 35.

88 [1974] ECR 1337.

89 [1975] ECR 1219; [1976] 1 CMLR 140.

90 [1977] ECR 1999.

91 Van Duyn v Home Office (No 2) [1974] ECR 1337.

92 See Bonsignore v Oberstadtdirektor of the City of Cologne [1975] ECR 297.

in making a determination as to the relevance of criminal activity; the relevant factors included the type of offence, the defendant's assumed propensity to re-offend and the seriousness of the offence if recommitted.⁹³ In Escuriaza,⁹⁴ the Court of Appeal considered that these tests are the same as those which will generally be applied in order to deport an alien, but it is suggested that cases may arise of a less clear cut nature than Escuriaza in which it will be important to apply the more stringent Community test.

Grounds for deportation

Broadly, a person who is not a British citizen can be deported under s 3(5) of the 1971 Act, as amended by the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. The 1999 Act amendments cover those who do not observe conditions attached to a limited leave to enter or persons who remain or stay beyond the time limited by the leave. The effect is that those in breach of conditions of entry or overstayers are now subject to removal (rather than deportation) on receipt of directions given by an immigration officer. In practice, this distinction is of significance only in that rights of appeal are restricted in respect of such persons.

A person is liable to deportation under s 3(5) of the 1971 Act as amended, on three grounds: the Secretary of State deems his deportation to be conducive to the public good; or a court recommends deportation after his conviction for a criminal offence. A person may also be deported on other than personal grounds if he or she belongs to a family of which the wife or husband is deported. This rule arises under s 5(4) and is overtly discriminatory in that a wife will normally be deported with her husband, whereas a husband may remain when his wife is deported. The wife will not, however, be automatically deported with the husband: rr 365 and 367 of the 1994 Rules provide that various circumstances should be taken into account, including her own wishes and her ability to maintain herself, without charge on the public funds for the foreseeable future. A wife will not normally be deported with the husband under r 365 of the 1994 Rules where she qualifies for settlement in her own right or where she is living apart from the husband. However, the bland assumption that all husbands, whatever their actual circumstances, should be treated differently from all wives is unjustifiable.

In considering the merits of the decision to deport, r 364 provides guidance as to the factors to be taken into account:

...the public interest will be balanced against any compassionate circumstances of the case. While each case will be considered in the light of the particular circumstances, the aim is an exercise of the power of deportation which is consistent and fair as between one person and another, although one case will rarely be identical with another in all material respects.

93 See also Puttick v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1984] Imm AR 118; Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p Tamdjid-Nezhaad [1986] Imm AR 396.
94 [1989] 3 CMLR 281. For further discussion of deportation of EU nationals see Vincenzi [1994] Crim LR 163.

Deportation after conviction

Deportation owing to conviction of a criminal offence is fairly readily resorted to but, as the Court of Appeal held in Nazari,⁹⁵ it should not be undertaken without full inquiry into all the circumstances. It should not be done, as has sometimes happened in the past, 'as if by an afterthought at the end of observations about any sentence of imprisonment'. A number of factors were identified which a court might bear in mind when considering deportation: the long criminal record of the accused; the seriousness of the offence bearing in mind the circumstances surrounding it, not merely its nature;⁹⁶ the effect that an order recommending deportation will have on others who are not before the court and who are innocent persons, in terms of hardship and breaking up of families. The court should not, however, take into account the nature of the regime to which the deportee will return.

An important circumstance will be the likelihood of the repetition of the offence; where this factor is present, it may aggravate an otherwise trivial offence; where it is absent, it may have a mitigating effect on a serious offence.⁹⁷ This seems to have been accepted in Serry:⁹⁸ one offence of shoplifting did not support deportation, presumably because there were no particular aggravating circumstances.

Deportation for the public good

This head of deportation, which is the most contentious in civil liberties terms, can cover a number of factors, but it seems reasonably clear that the decision to deport should be based on all the circumstances relevant to the particular evil in question and the consequences flowing from the deportation. Thus, in Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p (Mahmud) Khan,⁹⁹ the applicant successfully challenged the IAT's dismissal of his appeal against deportation, on the ground that the tribunal's reasons for its decision—that he had entered into a marriage of convenience—failed to show that it had properly considered whether the couple did intend to live as man and wife. In other words, grounds which might raise an inference that the marriage was merely one of convenience were not examined to see whether this was actually the case.¹⁰⁰ Similarly, it is not enough to show that a person has behaved in an anti-social manner in the past; it must be considered whether future wrongdoing is likely.¹⁰¹ In considering circumstances flowing from the deportation, it would appear that detriment as well as good flowing from it to the public or part of the public may be considered: the two may be balanced against each other. Thus, in *Singh v Immigration Appeal Tribunal*¹⁰² the House of Lords held that the immigration adjudicatory authorities ought to have taken into account the detrimental effect on the Sikh community in the UK which deportation of the applicant would have.

95 [1980] 3 All ER 880, CA.

96 See Sachs LJ in Caird (1970) 54 Cr App R 499, p 510.

97 See Tshuma (1981) 3 Cr App R (S) 97.

98 (1980) 2 Cr App R (S) 336.

99 [1983] QB 790.

100 The ruling in Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p Ghazi Zubalir Ali Khan [1983] Imm AR 32 was reached on similar grounds.

101 Malik v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1981] Imm AR 134; Immigration Appeal Tribunal ex p Ullah (1983) The Times, 14 January.

102 [1986] 2 All ER 721, HL.

The applicant was a valued member of that community by virtue of his religious, charitable and cultural activities.

The ‘conducive to public good’ ground for deportation can be used where a person is convicted of an offence, but the court does not recommend deportation, and also, most controversially against individuals who have engaged in some form of undesirable political activity.¹⁰³ The use of this power to exclude people on political rather than criminal grounds has attracted most criticism. For example, the student activist Rudi Dutschke was deported back to West Germany in 1969, on the basis that he might “become a focus for student unrest”.¹⁰⁴ Similarly, the journalists Agee and Hosenball were deported on national security grounds, Agee presumably because of the damage he might have done to the CIA in writing books exposing certain of their activities.¹⁰⁵ It was unclear, however, that damage to the public good would be averted by the deportation. Similarly, rather flimsy grounds were relied on in deciding to deport a number of Iraqi or Kuwaiti residents during the Gulf War 1991. For example, a Lebanese citizen, Cheblak—a known pacifist who had lived and worked as an academic in the UK for 15 years, had two children who were British citizens and who had campaigned for an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait—was ordered to be deported on national security grounds.

Cheblak sought leave to apply for judicial review of the Home Secretary’s decision, partly on the basis that it was irrational or that all relevant circumstances had not been taken into account. In *Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Cheblak*¹⁰⁶ the Court of Appeal, however, preferred not to make any inquiry into these possibilities on the basis that national security matters are the sole preserve of the executive.¹⁰⁷ However, it seems to follow from dicta in that case that although the decision to deport was effectively excluded from review, there could be some review of preconditions and procedures.¹⁰⁸ The deportation notice informed the applicant that he could make representations to an independent panel who would advise the Secretary of State. Lord Donaldson MR said, in relation to this panel, ‘I have no doubt that the advisory panel is susceptible of judicial review if, for example, it could be shown to have acted unfairly within its terms of reference’.¹⁰⁹ However, so long as a fair procedure seems to have been followed, bearing in mind the constraints on the disclosure of the case against him to the applicant, it seems that no redress will be available if the Secretary of State decides to ignore the advice of the adviser or if the grounds for exclusion are flimsy or based on error. This is because the courts tend to view decisions taken on national security grounds as purely a matter for the executive despite their impact on civil liberties.¹¹⁰

Ultimately, Cheblak was not deported after his case was considered by the advisory panel set up to replace a statutory right of appeal. However, 14 persons were deported and, of these, it is not known whether the panel advised revocation

103 See Martinez-Tobon v Immigration Appeal Tribunal [1988] Imm AR 319, CA.

104 For discussion, see Hepple (1971) 45 MLR 501.

105 See Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Hosenball [1977] 1 WLR 766; [1977] 3 All ER 452, CA.

106 [1991] 1 WLR 890; [1991] 2 All ER 319, CA. For comment see [1991] PL 331.

107 Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Cheblak [1991] 1 WLR 890. See below, p 952. For discussion see [1991] PL 333.

108 See Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism in British Law, 1st edn, 1986, pp 90–92.

109 [1991] 1 WLR 890, p 907.

110 See Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service [1985] AC 374, p 412.

of the order or whether the grounds on which it was ordered were as doubtful on the face of it as those which applied in Cheblak's case.

The purpose of deportation on this ground should be clear: that removal of the deportee is necessary for the public good and that even if this is not the only purpose, it should be the dominant one.¹¹¹ However, in a number of rulings, courts have not applied a 'dominant purpose' test in considering the relevance of other purposes which may have influenced the Secretary of State's decision to deport. In Brixton Prison Governor ex p Soblen,¹¹² a deportation order was challenged on the grounds that the Secretary of State had allegedly acted for an improper purpose—in order to comply with a request from the US for S's return made in order to circumvent the non-availability of extradition proceedings which were not possible owing to the nature of S's offences. The Court of Appeal upheld the deportation order on the basis that the Secretary of State could act for a plurality of purposes. The fact that this might be termed extradition by the back door did not affect the validity of the order. The court considered that the need to serve the public good by the removal of S need not be the dominant motive in making the order, although the minister must have a genuine belief that removal was necessary on that basis. It did not matter if the minister's main motive for acting might have been to comply with the request from the US.

The danger in this approach is clearly that the individual circumstances of the person in question may become much less significant than the political expediency of falling in with the wishes of particular governments. However, there are signs that this approach may not be sustained. In subsequent cases it has been accepted that there may be a 'plurality of purposes', but that it should be shown that the same decision would have been reached even in the absence of consideration of the 'improper' purpose.¹¹³

Appeals

Certain appeals against deportation may be brought to the Immigration Appeal Tribunal under s 63 of the Immigration and Asylum Act (IAA) 1999. The tribunal can consider the determinations of both facts and law under the Sched 4, para 21 of the IAA 1999, and there is a right of appeal on a point of law to the Court of Appeal under Sched 4, para 23 of the IAA 1999. Arguments based on the Convention, raised under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, must be brought in the tribunal under s 65.

The position as regards the more controversial deportation decisions is rather different. If the decision to deport has been taken for reasons of 'public good', on grounds of 'national security', 'diplomatic relations' or for 'reasons of a political nature', the ordinary right of appeal was excluded unless the deportee was an asylum seeker, in which case Sched 2 para 2(a) of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act afforded him or her the right to appeal to a special adjudicator. Similarly, a person refused entry on grounds of public good (without anything more specific as to reason) had no right of appeal (ss 15(3), (4), (5) and 14(3)). In such cases, there was a right to an ex gratia hearing before three advisors. The procedure was described by the then Home Secretary as follows:

111 See, in another context, Westminster Corporation v London and North Western Rly Co [1905] AC 426.

112 [1963] 2 QB 243.

113 See Inner London Education Authority ex p Westminster CC [1986] 1 All ER 19; Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Owen [1985] QB 1153; and Lewisham LBC ex p Shell UK Ltd [1988] 1 All ER 938.

The person concerned...will be given...such particulars of allegations as will not entail disclosure of sources of evidence. He will be notified that he can make representations to the three advisors... The advisors will...allow him to appear before them, if he wishes... As well as speaking for himself he may arrange for a third party to testify on his behalf. Neither the sources of evidence nor evidence that might lead to disclosure of sources can be revealed to the person concerned but the advisors will ensure that the person is able to make his points effectively... Since the evidence against a person necessarily has to be received in his absence, the advisors in assessing the case will bear in mind that it has not been tested by cross-examination and that the person has not had the opportunity to rebut it... On receiving the advice of the advisors the Secretary of State would reconsider his original decision but the advice given to him would not be revealed.¹¹⁴

Thus, a person could be deported after a hearing in which he was unable to challenge the case against him, in which evidence which he was unable to contest was given in his absence and in which he could not call witnesses or have legal representation. He was not informed of the decision taken by the advisors, did not know whether it was complied with or why it was not complied with and could not appeal from it.

Mark Hosenball challenged this procedure in respect of the decision to deport him on grounds of national security (see Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Hosenball above) on the basis that it did not comply with the principles of natural justice since he had not been given adequate particulars of the allegations against him. The Court of Appeal, while acknowledging that the principles of natural justice would normally require that such particulars would be given, said that in cases where national security is involved, 'the rights of the individual (including his entitlement to natural justice) must be subordinated to the protection of the realm' (per Geoffrey Lane LJ). Lord Denning considered that in such cases it was not the proper role of the courts to attempt to determine the proper balance between the requirements of national security and the claims of the individual; this role fell correctly within the ambit of the Home Secretary's responsibilities. Similarly, in Ex p Cheblak,¹¹⁵ the applicant complained that the reasons given for the decision that his deportation would be for the public good were wholly insufficient to enable him to challenge the order. Lord Donaldson MR referred to Geoffrey Lane LJ's comments in Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Hosenball and said:

In accepting, as we must, that to some extent the needs of national security must displace civil liberties... it is not irrelevant to remember that the maintenance of national security underpins and is the foundation of all our civil liberties.¹¹⁶

He used the analogy of a person who is detained pending trial and then found innocent. However, he did not address the flaw in the analogy: there must be reasonable suspicion that the person remanded in custody has committed the offence, whereas in the case of the deportee, there may be a very insufficient objective basis for determining that deportation is in the public good. Nevertheless, no check existed which could prevent the deportation if the Home Secretary's personal decision was that it should be carried out. Thus, civil liberties were severely infringed in a manner arguably unwarranted by the needs of national security.

114 HC Deb Vol 819 Col 376, 15 June 1971.

115 [1991] 1 WLR 890; [1991] 2 All ER, CA. See also Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Chahal [1995] 1 All ER 658; (1993) The Times, 12 March.

116 [1991] WLR 890, p 907.

This was eventually found to be the case by the European Court of Human Rights in Chahal v UK.¹¹⁷ Originally an illegal immigrant, Mr Chahal obtained leave to remain in Britain indefinitely in 1974. In 1984, he visited the Punjab for a family wedding and met the chief advocate of creating an independent Sikh state to be carved out of India. Later, he was arrested by the Indian police and allegedly tortured. He escaped from India and became the founder of the International Sikh Youth Federation in the UK. After a fight at a Sikh temple, he was arrested and convicted of assault and affray, but his conviction was overturned by the Court of Appeal. In 1990, he was arrested after a meeting at a Southall temple. The Home Office accused him of involvement in Sikh terrorism; the Secretary of State made a determination that deportation of the applicant would be conducive to the public good and therefore he was liable to be deported under s 3(5)(b) of the Immigration Act 1971. However, the applicant claimed asylum in the UK on the basis that he was a refugee within the meaning of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees 1951 as recognised in r 173 of the Immigration Rules 1990. He claimed that he would be tortured if sent back to India. The Secretary of State maintained that the question whether he was a refugee was irrelevant once the decision to deport had been made. The applicant sought judicial review of the decision to deport him on the basis that his status as a refugee should have been taken into account.¹¹⁸

The main question at issue was whether a balancing exercise between the threat to the security of the UK posed by the applicant and the threat to the life or freedom of the applicant if deported to the country in question (India) should have been carried out. It was found that the combined effect of the Convention and the 1990 Rules required that it should have been. However, although the Secretary of State had not deemed such an exercise necessary, there was no evidence that it had not been carried out. The court was not able to determine whether, after carrying out such an exercise, the Secretary of State's decision could be called irrational, since while there was a great deal of evidence as to the risk to the applicant, there was none as to the risk to national security in the UK which he posed. However, the court could consider whether the Secretary of State had been correct in his assessment of the risk to the applicant if returned to India. The Secretary of State had observed that under the Indian Constitution, the applicant could come to harm only if convicted of a crime by due process and in accordance with the law. That still left open the possibility of informal ill-treatment; nevertheless, there were not considered to be sufficient grounds for finding that the Secretary of State had made an irrational or perverse decision in determining that the applicant's claim for asylum status was not made out. The application therefore failed.

Mr Chahal was then imprisoned while he pursued an application to the European Commission of Human Rights, alleging a breach of Art 3, which guarantees protection from torture and from inhuman and degrading treatment, and of Art 5, which guarantees judicial control over loss of liberty. The European Court of Human 118 Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Chahal [1995] 1 All ER 658.

117 (1997) 23 EHRR 413.

Rights noted that the protection of Art 3 of the Convention is absolute (no derogations are provided or allowed) and found that there were strong grounds for believing that Mr Chahal would indeed have been tortured had he been returned to India. Thus, had the order to deport been implemented, a breach of Art 3 would have occurred. Article 5(1) not only provides that deprivation of liberty is only permitted within the specified exceptions, it also requires that it should be 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law'. In *Winterwerp v Netherlands*¹¹⁹ the court found that this meant that the procedure in question must be in accordance with national and Convention law and it must not be arbitrary. In the instant case, the applicant complained, inter alia, that he had been detained although there had been no court hearing. The court found that a breach of Art 5 had occurred, since his detention should have been subject to scrutiny in court. It had been considered by the advisory panel, but that did not provide sufficient procedural safeguards to qualify as a court. Further, a breach of Art 5 read in conjunction with Art 13 had occurred, since effective remedies did not exist before the courts in England.

The judgment in Chahal v UK now stands in stark contrast to the executive-minded judgments in Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Hosenball and indicates the failure of the domestic judiciary to maintain human rights standards as high as those maintained by the European Court of Human Rights. As regards decisions to detain persons who are alleged to pose a risk to national security, it was apparent that methods of disclosing to a court some of the material on which that claim was based had to be put in place. Both aspects of this decision are to be welcomed as enhancing the role of the judiciary in relation to persons who are often in an extremely vulnerable position. At the same time, it should be borne in mind that Mr Chahal was detained for six years in breach of Art 5 of the Convention. Thus, his fundamental rights were violated for all that period of time.

The Labour Government implemented the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights in *Chahal v UK*¹²⁰ by creating the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC) set up under s 1 of the Special Immigration Appeals Act 1997 (SIACA). SIACA provides under s 4 that the tribunal can hear an appeal on a point of law or on the basis that the discretion exercised should have been exercised differently. Under amendment by the 1999 Act s 2A of the SIACA now provides that the tribunal will be the appropriate forum for actions under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. There is also a right of appeal on a point of law to the Court of Appeal. The SIAC will now deal with the most controversial cases, as indicated above, in particular those where deportation is deemed to be for the public good.

The Rules governing the procedure have been issued which prescribe the forms of hearing adopted by the tribunal in relation to particular proceedings,¹²¹ and which allow for hearings in the absence of the person bringing the proceedings and his or her legal representative. In such instances, a special advocate will be appointed who has had security clearance. It appears possible that the position of the complainant in the determinations of the new tribunal will be quite weak in some instances, depending on the circumstances and the national security issues. The difficulty with tribunals of this nature is that the limitations under which they operate, which limit the opportunities of the defence to challenge evidence, tend to detract from the benefits of such proceedings.¹²² The tribunal can allow the appeal. If it finds a breach of a Convention right owing to the effect of incompatible legislation, it will not have the power to make a declaration of incompatibility.

119 A 33; (1979) 2 EHRR 387.

120 (1997) 23 EHRR 413.

121 SI 1998/1881.

Convention rights under the HRA

All the persons administering deportation decisions are public authorities under s 6 of the HRA and therefore must abide by the Convention rights. As indicated, under the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, Convention-based arguments must be raised in one of the two tribunals. Argument below will concentrate on the SIAC, since it deals with the more contentious claims.

The SIAC is bound by s 6 of the HRA, since it is a public authority. Thus argument could be raised before it that, at least in respect of the circumstances of certain claims, it does not provide a fair hearing under Art 6. However, Art 6 will apply only if the Commission hearings are within its field of application. The proceedings of the SIAC might be viewed as the 'determination of civil rights and obligations' under Art 6(1). The term 'civil' has, however, been taken to mean that these are rights in private rather than public law,¹²³ although a clear distinction between rights in private as opposed to public law is not apparent in its recent jurisprudence. The role of the Commission under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA as providing a remedy against public authorities in respect of alleged breaches of Convention rights may suggest that it need not satisfy Art 6 on the basis that the rights cannot be viewed as private, depending on the sense in which such rights are viewed as 'private'.¹²⁴ They cannot merely be assigned the meaning of 'private' as understood in UK administrative law. Whether it falls within Art 6 is likely to be a matter which, initially, will be raised before the Commission itself.

Assuming that the tribunal is covered by Art 6(1) or, under the development of the Strasbourg jurisprudence, may be found more clearly to be so covered in future, it is hard to see that it is likely to provide a fair hearing for the applicant, bearing in mind the procedure it may follow, indicated above, since the complainant or applicant may be in such a weak position before it. As Chapter 2 indicated, since Art 6(3) contains minimum guarantees, the para 1 protection of a fair hearing goes beyond para 3.¹²⁵ In investigating a fair hearing, the domestic authorities are not confined to the para 3 guarantees; they can consider further requirements of fairness. If consideration is given to the procedures in question it is apparent that, apart from any of the other requirements of fairness, the safeguards of Art 6(1) and Art 122 See Walker, op cit, fn 108, p 82; he advocates an inquisitorial system for such tribunals; see also White, C, 'Security vetting, discrimination and the right to a fair trial' [1999] PL 406, p 413, discussing the new tribunal set up under the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

123 Ringelsen v Austria A 13 (1971), para 94.

124 See Chapter 2 for discussion of the public law/private law issues; p 59. It must be borne in mind that the term 'civil' has an autonomous Convention meaning.

125 See p 58.

126 See, on this point, Zana v Turkey (1997) 27 EHRR 667, in which, in the context of terrorism, the applicant was not allowed to be present at the trial; a breach of Art 6 was found on this basis.

127 See further Chapter 14, pp 900-02.

6(3) may not be satisfied, depending on the use of the power to exclude the applicant¹²⁶ or her legal representative, or limiting disclosure of evidence.¹²⁷

The Commission should, in any event, provide an effective remedy in order to answer to the demands made clear in Chahal. In Chahal, the Advisory Panel on deportation decisions failed to satisfy Art 13 since it failed to offer sufficient safeguards for Art 13 purposes. In particular, it lacked the ability to take a binding decision. The Court said that the remedy offered should be 'as effective as it can be' given the need, in the context in question, to rely on secret sources. The Commission can take binding decisions, but its efficacy in other respects is questionable.

In making determinations as to alleged breaches of Art 8 the Commission will have to consider proportionality, since Art 8(2) requires such consideration. In order to do so it may need to evaluate a number of factual matters. But the procedural limitations under which it will be likely to operate may place even greater difficulties in its path in considering the question of proportionality than there would be in an ordinary court, in judicial review proceedings. It may be argued that documents or sources cannot be disclosed on grounds of national security or the prevention of crime. If as a result it operates a 'light touch' review, based in effect on Wednesbury unreasonableness, it will fail to satisfy the demands of Art 13 as recently interpreted at Strasbourg¹²⁸ and therefore, a fortiori, it will not satisfy Art 6.

In *Balfour v Foreign and Commonwealth Office*¹²⁹ the court found that once an actual or potential risk to national security had been demonstrated by a public interest immunity certificate, the court should not exercise its right to inspect the documents. This view of national security as the exclusive domain of the executive was not adhered to in the robust approach taken to the concept in the context of deportation by the SIAC in the case of Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman.¹³⁰ However, the Court of Appeal overturned their ruling, finding that the threat to national security was for the government to determine and that it should be broadly defined to include the possibility of future threats, including those to the UK's 'allies', and their findings were confirmed by the House of Lords.¹³¹ These findings are not fully in accordance with the findings of the Strasbourg Court in Tinnelly or in Chahal v UK.¹³² Both, particularly Tinnelly, took the view that the threat to national security should be demonstrated.

Since there is a means of appeal from the Commission and the tribunal, there is an independent domestic means of determining whether the tribunal offers an effective remedy and whether it should abide by Art 6.

Article 3

Applicants may raise Art 3 arguments before the Immigration Adjudicator, Commission or the Immigration Appeals Tribunal, or in proceedings for judicial 128 Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493. The domestic court found that the continuance of the ban on homosexuals in the armed forces was not beyond the range of responses which was open to a reasonable decision maker. The Strasbourg Court considered that the threshold at which the domestic court could find the policy irrational was set so high that it effectively precluded consideration of the proportionality of the ban with the aim in view. Therefore, judicial review was not found to satisfy the requirements of Art 13.

129 [1994] 2 All ER 588.

130 [1999] INLR 517.

131 [2000] 3 WLR 1240, CA; [2000] 3 WLR 877, HL.

132 (1998) 27 EHRR 249 (in the context of Art 13).

review, based on a number of Convention decisions. In MAR v UK,¹³³ for example, the applicant argued that if deported to Iran, he would be likely to meet with Art 3 treatment owing to his drug convictions. The application was declared admissible. *D v UK*¹³⁴ also concerned the risk of Art 3 treatment after deportation. The European Court of Human Rights found that removing a drug courier in an advanced stage of AIDS to his country of origin, St Kitts, would expose him to Art 3 treatment there. In St Kitts, much less effective treatment for AIDS was available; he would have had no accommodation and no means of support. A similar stance may be taken where, if deported, the applicant would be likely to be subject to criminal proceedings which could lead to a disproportionate or unjust sentence.¹³⁵

Article 8

Argument could also be raised based on Art 8, on the basis that removal from the country would adversely affect private and family life. However, as Chapter 12 indicated, the Strasbourg jurisprudence has afforded a wide margin of appreciation to the State in relation to deportation and immigration decisions, on the basis that it is accepted in international law that the State has the right to control the entry of non-nationals onto its territory. Thus, in Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v UK,¹³⁶ it was found that the duty imposed by Art 8 did not extend to creating a general obligation to respect the choice by married couples of the country of their matrimonial residence. Therefore, Art 8 did not require the UK to accept the non-national spouses for settlement in that country.

However, in contrast, where a non-national is faced with expulsion from a country in which he or she has lived for some time and where members of the family are established, the Court has shown itself willing to uphold the right to maintain family ties if satisfied that the ties are clearly in existence.¹³⁷ In Beldjoudi v France,¹³⁸ the European Court of Human Rights found that the right to family life under Art 8 encompasses the right of an alien to remain in a Convention State if it has been demonstrated that he or she has a long established and settled family life there.¹³⁹ In *Nasri v France*¹⁴⁰ the applicant, who had committed serious crimes, was threatened with expulsion from France to Algeria. He had lived in France almost all his life and was deaf and dumb. The Court considered that the impact of expulsion on his family life would be particularly severe, bearing the effect of his handicap in mind. He was able to maintain a 'minimum psychological and social equilibrium only within his family'.¹⁴¹ His family had no close ties to Algeria. On this basis, a breach 133 Unreported.

134 (1998) 24 EHRR 423; (1997) The Times, 12 May.

135 Altun v Germany (1983) 36 DR 209.

136 Judgment of 28 May 1985, A 94 (1985); (1985) 7 EHRR 471. A breach of the Convention was found when Art 8 was read in conjunction with Art 14 (see above).

137 In Moustaquim A 193; (1991) 13 EHRR 802 it was found that deporting the applicant to Morocco from Belgium where his family lived would entail a breach of Art 8; this claim outweighed the claim of the Belgian state that expelling Moustaquim was necessary for the 'prevention of disorder and crime'. Of course, had his expulsion been characterised as necessary on grounds of national security, the outcome would probably have been different. The European Court of Human Rights tends to show timidity in the area of national security on the ground that the Member State is best placed to determine its needs (see Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 443) and see further Chapter 2. See also Djeroud v France, A 191-B (1991); for comment see (1991) YBEL 554–56.

138 A 234-A; (1992) 14 EHRR 801.

139 See also the opinion of the European Commission of Human Rights in Uppal v UK (No 2) (1981) 3 EHRR 399. (1995) 21 EHRR 458.

of the right of respect for family life was found. A similar decision was reached in the Berrehab case,¹⁴² in which the Netherlands wished to deport the father of a small child resident there with her mother. The father could not be expected to travel frequently between the Netherlands and Morocco and therefore would be unable to maintain family ties. A breach of Art 8 was found.

A key factor in these decisions was the extent to which the applicant could be viewed as having close ties with the country of origin. A breach of Art 8 is more likely to be found where he or she had left that country at an early age and could not be viewed as having such ties. These factors have to be balanced against factors of immigration control, where there have been breaches of immigration law, or, where relevant, public order. In Poku v UK,¹⁴³ the balance came down against family life. The applicant came from Ghana and was an illegal overstayer. She had a husband and young child in the UK and a child by a former husband, a British citizen. She argued that her deportation would interfere with the rights of her children, husband and former husband. But, taking into account the extent of the disruption of family life and the question whether the family could live in Ghana, and balancing these factors against her breaches of immigration law, it was found that the application was manifestly ill-founded. The Commission reiterated the finding in *Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v UK*¹⁴⁴ to the effect that Art 8 does not create a general obligation to respect the choice by married couples of the country of their matrimonial residence.

Given that this is an instance in which a wide margin of appreciation has been conceded to the State, it is suggested that these decisions should not merely be applied domestically without taking into account the effect of that doctrine. If immigration officials or ministers have breached Art 8, they have acted unlawfully under s 6 of the HRA. It is not apparent that deference is called for. However, it does not appear that the courts are applying this standard of review. In Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Mahmood,¹⁴⁵ the applicant sought judicial review of the decision of the Home Secretary to remove him from the UK as an illegal entrant. He had been married for less than two years to a woman resident in the UK who had borne him two children. On the assumption that the HRA applied (the decision had been made in 1999), the court applied a low standard of review. It asked whether the decision maker could reasonably have concluded that the interference with family life was necessary to achieve one or more of the legitimate aims of the Convention. Taking into account the relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence, the court found no breach of Art 8.

It is suggested that the court applied the wrong standard of review. It should have asked whether the tests under Art 8(2) were satisfied: was the decision necessary and proportionate to the end in view? In other words, the court should have addressed itself to those questions rather than asking whether the response of the decision maker could be viewed as reasonable in the light of that end. The test

141 Paragraph 46.

142 (1988) 11 EHRR 322.

143 (1996) 22 EHRR CD 94.

144 Judgment of 28 May 1985, A 94 (1985); (1985) 7 EHRR 471. A breach of the Convention was found when Art 8 was read in conjunction with Art 14 (see above, Chapter 2, p 86).

145 (2001) The Times, 9 January.

used appeared to represent a standard of review indistinguishable from that denoted by the Wednesbury test. A rather different standard was applied in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p R.¹⁴⁶ The court found that a decision to remove R which might break his close ties with his ex-wife and children would risk a breach of Art 8 on the basis of failing to respect his family life. The Secretary of State gave an undertaking not to remove R until his wife's application to remain in the UK had been determined. Arguably, this was a somewhat more generous interpretation of the requirements of Art 8 than accorded to them at Strasbourg. Further, the court did not appear to ask whether the decision was one of those reasonably open to the decision maker as furthering the aims recognised in Art 8(2); the court merely asked whether there was a risk of that the decision would breach Art 8.

It may be concluded that the HRA is showing its potential to have a tempering effect on deportation decisions, and is imposing a human rights dimension on them which was not previously apparent and was infrequently imposed upon them through the medium of the Wednesbury test. But clearly, the standard of review which becomes the accepted one under s 6 of the HRA will remain the crucial issue.

At the time of writing, the Government, with strong support from the Conservative Party led by Iain Duncan-Smith, has introduced a new Bill dealing with terrorism in the wake of the attacks on the Pentagon and on the World Trade Centre in New York in September 2001, the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Bill 2001. A power of detention without charge or trial for non-British citizens suspected of terrorism who cannot be deported is included. This power infringes certain of the Convention rights, most notably Arts 6 and 5, under the HRA but the government has entered a derogation to Art 5. Under (current) clause 29 the judiciary would be prevented from hearing challenges to certain of the new counter-terrorist powers.

At the present time, the Home Secretary, David Blunkett, has spoken of changing the balance between human rights and such powers. The leader of the Conservative Party, Iain Duncan-Smith, agrees with him as to the need to change the balance. The possibility that the HRA may be amended or that challenges under the HRA to the new counter-terrorist powers, can be heard only by Special Commissioners or Advisors, not in the ordinary courts, arises.

4 EXTRADITION

Introduction

The law of extradition is concerned mainly with persons who are alleged to have committed a crime in one country but are currently in another country, whether because they normally reside there or because they have escaped to that country. It is a procedure that creates a very significant infringement of freedom of movement and potentially of other human rights. It will therefore be suggested that there is a tension between the European Convention on Human Rights on the one hand and the European Convention on Extradition 1984 on the other. Extradition is also anomalous in the sense that the level of suspicion required of an offence in order to extradite a person is lower than that which would be required to convict him of an offence in the UK. Thus, a person may be punished by being extradited to a country in which he might arguably receive a trial of a lower level of fairness than he would have received in the UK; he may receive a longer prison sentence and harsher treatment during it than he would have received and he may be imprisoned away from his family so that he cannot readily receive visits. This may all occur on the basis of a fairly low level of suspicion. These possibilities, and certain of their implications under the HRA, are considered further below.

146 (2001) The Times, 29 November.

The extradition procedure allows for the expulsion of British citizens from their own country; since it represents such a serious invasion of freedom of movement and of liberty, a number of procedural barriers have been created. Owing to the formality of the procedure, attempts are sometimes made to circumvent it by using deportation as a disguised form of extradition. In particular, this may occur where, in reality, the suspect is wanted for a 'political' offence. As indicated above, this was alleged in Brixton Prison Governor ex p Soblen.¹⁴⁷ It was argued that the US had requested S's return in order to circumvent the non-availability of extradition proceedings, which were not possible owing to the nature of S's offences.

Elements of extradition

The most significant statute governing extradition is currently the Extradition Act 1989. Under s 1(1) and (2), the State requesting extradition must be one with which the UK has an extradition agreement or must be a Commonwealth State. There is also provision for special extradition arrangements made in relation to specific cases with States which do not have an extradition agreement with the UK. The crime must be committed within the territory of the requesting country. In *Al Fawwaz v Governor of Brixton Prison*¹⁴⁸ the US sought the extradition of A, who was alleged to have conspired with terrorists to plant bombs in various US installations and to murder US citizens. A argued that he had never been to the US and that he could not be extradited, since the offences in question had taken place outside that country. It was found that the required territorial jurisdiction could be established on the basis of certain acts of A, including purchasing a satellite phone system in the US and setting up a secure telephone line.

Section 2 defines the crimes which are 'extradition crimes'. The term means conduct which, had it occurred in the UK, would have constituted an offence carrying a sentence of at least 12 months' imprisonment. The conduct must have constituted such an offence at the time when it was committed, according to the House of Lords in Bow Street Magistrates' Court ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 3).¹⁴⁹ However, there is a very significant exception to these rules. The offence must not, under s 6, be of a political character. It has been found that the offence must be political in relation to the requesting State, not another State. Thus, the attempted assassination of the vice-premier of Taiwan in New York, not in Taiwan, by a member of an opposition organisation, was not viewed as political since the applicant had no political grudge against the US. Had it occurred in Taiwan, it might have been viewed as falling within the political offence exception. There must be a close link between the crime and the political motive. The killing of civilians, although from a political motive, was not found to fall within the exception in T v Secretary of State for the Home Dept,¹⁵⁰ since the explosion which caused the deaths occurred at an airport, not at a military installation or government building.

147 [1963] 2 QB 243.

148 (2000) The Times, 2 December.

149 [1999] 2 All ER 97.

Under s 9(8) of the Extradition Act, a magistrate must be satisfied that there is a prima facie case against the accused. In other words, extradition will not be possible unless the requesting State has quite a strong case against him. However, s 9(8) is subject to an exception which renders it almost valueless as a procedural safeguard. If there is an Order in Council giving effect to extradition arrangements with the requesting State, which provides that there is no need for evidence of a prima facie case, the magistrate need be satisfied merely that conduct alleged against the accused amounts to an extraditing crime. This arrangement is in accordance with the European Convention on Extradition. An interesting situation might arise where a prima facie case was required and the evidence supporting it had been obtained in breach of a Convention right. It would seem, according to the ruling of the Divisional Court in Re Proulx,¹⁵¹ that even in such circumstances, and where the evidence was confession evidence, it might not be appropriate for the magistrate to refuse to admit it since the admissibility of the evidence would eventually be considered in the requesting State. The decision implied that even though the evidence might normally have been inadmissible, it would not be in an extradition case. It is unclear, it is suggested, that this decision is in accordance with the duties of the court and of the magistrate under s 6 of the HRA and Art 6.

Where a prima facie case is not needed, it is arguable that a magistrate, bound by s 6 of the HRA, should still consider the effect of extradition on the applicant's Convention rights, owing to the requirements of s 6. If the magistrate or a higher court, on appeal, considered that extradition, although otherwise warranted, would create a breach of the rights, it would seem to be consonant with the courts' duty under s 6 to refuse to commit. However, so doing might appear to be contrary to the relevant Order in Council. If so, a higher court could make a declaration of incompatibility between the Order and the right in question.¹⁵² This would not, of course, benefit the applicant.

State immunity

A country may seek the extradition of a former Head of State in order to stand trial for crimes committed during his period of office for which he appears to bear responsibility. The questions which will arise in such an instance were extensively considered by the House of Lords in Bow Street Magistrates' Court ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 3).¹⁵³ The case concerned an extradition request from Spain to the UK that Senator Pinochet should be extradited to stand trial for conspiracy to murder, conspiracy to 150 [1996] 2 All ER 865, HL.

151 [2001] 1 All ER 57.

152 Since Orders in Council fall within the meaning of primary legislation under the HRA; see Chapter 4, p 139.

153 [1999] 2 All ER 97.

torture and hostage-taking. Pinochet was in the UK at the time for medical treatment. He had been in power in Chile between 1973 and 1990; the House of Lords considered that there was little dispute that appalling human rights abuses, including murder and torture, had occurred during his time in power.

The first ruling of the House, to the effect that Senator Pinochet could be extradited, was set aside because a member of the House of Lords, Lord Hoffman, had connections with Amnesty International, which was a party in the case.¹⁵⁴ A differently constituted appeal committee of seven Law Lords re-heard the appeal.

The key question concerned the extent of State immunity. Heads of State have immunity for all actions while in office and retain it after leaving office in relation to activities carried out in an official capacity while in office. However, the question was whether that immunity could extend to 'crimes against humanity' including torture (an international crime by virtue of the 'Torture' Convention of 1984). It would be anomalous if the immunity covered such crimes since the their target is, precisely, the officials likely to carry them out, acting in an official capacity. However, it was necessary that the crimes in question were criminal in UK law at the time when they were allegedly carried out. The Torture Convention was ratified in UK law on 8 December 1988. Therefore, it was found, the crimes of torture in question were not recognised in UK law before that date. The House of Lords found that Pinochet lost his immunity on that date in relation to such crimes once he was no longer in power. Therefore, he had no immunity in relation to the crime of conspiracy to torture which he was alleged to have committed after that date. In the event, it was decided, controversially, by the Home Secretary, that he was too ill to stand trial and he returned to Chile.

This was clearly a significant decision of the House of Lords since it means that former Heads of State may not be able to escape responsibility for the commission of crimes against humanity while they were in power, committed in their official capacity. It means at the very least that the number of countries they can travel to are limited, depending on the crimes in question and the point at which, if at all, a country recognised those crimes in its own law. Clearly, if such recognition only occurred after the commission of the crimes, extradition would not be possible. Thus, there are limitations on the use of extradition in this respect. Nevertheless, this was a significant decision in terms of creating accountability for human rights abuses perpetrated by the State.

Challenges to extradition: impact of the HRA

Procedures

A person can challenge an extradition committal in various ways. He or she could seek habeas corpus—the ancient writ which can be used to challenge detention on any ground.¹⁵⁵ It is sought in the High Court by means of an ex parte application and must take precedence over all other business. The court will, if it thinks that there is a case for the issuance of the writ, adjourn the proceedings and hold an inter partes hearing. If the writ is issued, it will mean that the person detaining the applicant must immediately release him or her. Under s 6 of the HRA, a court considering a writ for habeas corpus must ensure that it discharges its duty to abide by the Convention rights.

154 Bow Street Magistrates' Court ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 2) [1999] 1 All ER 577.
155 The person must be notified of this possibility: Extradition Act 1989, s 11.

Thus, although the scope for review was quite limited in a habeas corpus application, it is suggested that it has now widened; apart from considering procedural issues, the court should also consider whether it itself, as a public authority, would ensure that no breach of the rights would occur if it intervened to prevent return of the applicant, unless in so doing it was acting within the terms of s 6(2) of the HRA to enforce incompatible legislation. For such an argument to succeed, it would have to be found that sections of the Extradition Act are irretrievably (taking s 3 of the HRA into account) incompatible with one or more of the requirements of the Convention rights. At present, it is suggested that a court would be unlikely to take such a stance, but would instead read down the legislation or the Convention right in question in order to avoid having to make a declaration of incompatibility.¹⁵⁶ Thus, it appears that the courts have a more substantive supervisory jurisdiction in hearing a habeas corpus application in relation to extradition, owing to the HRA, than they considered that they had previously.¹⁵⁷ Clearly, the Home Secretary, also a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, should already have discharged his or her duty not to breach the Convention rights in taking an extradition decision. But, the mere fact that this ought to be the case would not absolve the court from taking a fresh decision on the matter since each public authority has a separate responsibility for ensuring that it does not breach the Convention rights.

The applicant can also make representations to the Secretary of State within 15 days of receiving notice that the Secretary of State is minded to issue an order of return.¹⁵⁸ Since, as mentioned above, the Home Secretary is a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, the possibility, which may not have been brought fully to his or her notice, that such an order would lead to a breach of the applicant's Convention rights, could be put forward, with substantiating evidence.

The applicant could seek judicial review of the decision to extradite, but it might seem most fruitful to seek to challenge the decision under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, which would of course be possible since the bodies involved in making decisions in relation to extradition are all public authorities. The use of s 7(1)(a), as opposed to non-HRA judicial review, would be a better option, since the standard of review should be stricter. However, alternatively, judicial review could be sought on the basis that the decision was unreasonable, and HRA arguments could also be raised under s 7(1)(b). The question should be, straightforwardly, has the decision maker breached one of the applicant's Convention rights in the sense that, if the decision is carried out, a breach is very likely or almost bound to follow? The breach could be a direct consequence of the extradition or it could be indirect, in the sense that it

156 See Chapter 4, pp 143–45.

157 See Schmidt v Federal Government of Germany [1994] 3 All ER 65.

158 Extradition Act 1989, s 13(1), (2).

159 Protocol, Arts 3 and 4.

would occur as a result of the treatment the applicant would receive in the requesting State. Thus, a direct breach might occur of Art 8 or possibly Art 12, while an indirect breach of Arts 2, 3, 5, 8 or 6 or of Art 1, Protocol 6 might be likely. It may be noted that no derogation or reservation may be made in relation to Protocol 6.¹⁵⁹

It should be pointed out that under the new anti-terrorism legislation, introduced into the Commons in October 2001, the procedures described are to be speeded up and appeal rights are to be removed. The new legislation may well, therefore, be of doubtful compatibility with Art 6 of the Convention.

Convention rights

The most relevant rights are those of Arts 8, 3, 5, 2, 14 or Protocol 6. As Chapter 2 explained, a violation of Art 3 may occur because of the treatment a person may receive when returning to his or her own country having been expelled or refused admission. It will have to be clearly established that the danger of such treatment is really present. The question arose in *Soering v UK*¹⁶⁰ whether expulsion to a country (the US) where the applicant risked the death penalty would be compatible with Art 3 because it would subject him to conditions on Death Row likely to cause him acute mental anguish. It was found that the conditions on Death Row would expose the applicant to Art 3 treatment.

Now that the UK has ratified Protocol 6 and included it in Sched 1 of the HRA, the possibility that an extradition will lead to the use of the death penalty against the applicant would create a violation of Art 1 of Protocol 6. Thus, the duty of the Home Secretary under s 6 of the HRA means that persons can no longer be extradited to the US if they would be very likely, owing to the nature of the alleged crimes, to face the death penalty there,¹⁶¹ regardless of the question of possible Art 3 treatment. This means that if a person who was allegedly part of the terrorist organisation which conspired to hijack planes in order to fly into the World Trade Centre in New York on 11 September 2001, murdering over 5,000 people, was apprehended in the UK, he could not be extradited to the US.

Arguments similar to those considered above in relation to deportation could be raised under Art 8 regarding the effect of extradition on family life. Since the person in question may be a British citizen, the arguments could have, in one respect, more weight. However, given that it will be alleged that he or she has committed a criminal offence, such arguments would probably be outweighed.

Argument could be raised under Arts 5 and 14 that although a breach of Art 5 alone would not occur, owing to the prison sentence likely to be received in the requesting State, evidence of discriminatory sentencing affecting the group to which the applicant belongs might demonstrate that a breach of the two Articles read together would occur if he or she is extradited. A similar argument could be made in relation to the right to a fair trial under Art 6.¹⁶²

160 Judgment of 7 July 1989, A 161; (1989) 11 EHRR 439. For discussion see Schabas (1994) 43ICLQ 913.

161 See Aylor-Davis v France (1994) 76-A DR 164; Raidl v Austria (1995) 82-A DR 134.

162 A similar argument, but not based on the Convention, was put forward, but failed, in Re Ramda (1997) The Independent, 27 June.

5 EXCLUSION ORDERS¹⁶³Power of exclusion

Apart from extradition, there are now no general powers to exclude British citizens from the country. Until recently, however, exclusion orders could be made under s 5 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act (PTA) 1989 in respect of a British citizen (as defined under the British Nationality Act 1981) who had been ordinarily resident in Britain for three years or less, although he or she could not be excluded from Britain altogether, only moved from one part of it to another. In practice, this meant that persons were excluded from England to Northern Ireland. It was irrelevant whether the person excluded to Northern Ireland was born in Britain and had family there so long as he or she had only been ordinarily resident in Britain for three years or less.¹⁶⁴ The order prevented the citizen being in or entering Britain; an order under s 6 prevented the citizen being in or entering Northern Ireland. A s 7 order excluded a non-British citizen from either Britain or Northern Ireland. In effect, these powers meant that Northern Irish citizens could be forced to go back to Northern Ireland; there was little reciprocity in terms of excluding Irish citizens to Britain.¹⁶⁵

An order could be made if the person was suspected of involvement in acts of terrorism or was attempting or might attempt to enter Britain with a view to being concerned in such an offence. The Home Secretary had to be 'satisfied' that the person in question is so involved. The decision to exclude took place secretly and was often based on material of doubtful worth.¹⁶⁶ If an order was served on a person, he or she had the right within seven or 14 days to make written representations to the Secretary of State and to have a personal interview with an adviser nominated by the Secretary (Sched 2, para 4 of the PTA). There was no requirement for the Secretary of State to give reasons for making an order. Once the order was made, the excludee could not re-enter the forbidden territory at all until it was revoked; there was no power to suspend the order for a short period of time in order to allow the excludee to attend family occasions such as funerals. Exclusion orders expired in three years and this meant that the case would be reviewed every three years, but a fresh order could be issued before the end of the three year period.

These provisions were reviewed by Lord Jellicoe in 1983;¹⁶⁷ he concluded that they were of some value in curbing terrorism, but accepted that dumping the problem in Northern Ireland as opposed to Britain was merely transferring it from one area to another. He also accepted that by this means, the whole problem of 163 Reading: (for background) Laquer, The Age of Terrorism, 1987; Wilkinson, P, Terrorism and the Liberal State, 1995; Gearty, CA, Terror, 1991; in relation to Ireland: Townshend, Political Violence in Ireland, 1983; on exclusion orders specifically: Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism in British Law, 2nd edn, 1992, Chapter 6; Bonner, D, Emergency Powers in Peacetime, 1985, Chapter 4; Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1990, Chapter 7, pp 217–21; Bonner, D, 'Combating terrorism in the 1990s: the role of the prevention of Terrorism Act 1989' [1989] PL 440, pp 452–56; on application of exclusion orders to MPs, see Walker [1983] PL 537.

164 This occurred in Mathews (1993) unreported, 7 July.

165 Walker, op cit, fn 163, pp 84–65; only four persons have been excluded to Britain.

166 Lord Shackleton, in his review of the PTA, warned that some of the material had no evidential value and had to be treated with great caution (para 41 of the review). See also Ewing and Gearty, Freedom under Thatcher, p 218.

167 Report on the Operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1978, 1983.

political terrorism might be exacerbated owing to the alienation the suspected terrorist would feel in being uprooted. In accordance with his Report, the period of ordinary residence for s 5(4) purposes was reduced to three years from 20 with a view to bringing within the net only those who might well have come to Britain specifically with the idea of perpetrating terrorist offences. The Report concluded that the exclusion power should be allowed to lapse as soon as circumstances suggested that it was not strictly necessary.¹⁶⁸

Safeguards

The safeguards available were of limited scope: the individual concerned could write to the Home Secretary requesting an interview, the interview would be with an adviser appointed by the Home Secretary and accountable to him. It hardly amounted, therefore, to an independent review of the decision. Moreover, there was no need for the Home Secretary to give reasons for the order and therefore the individual concerned could not challenge it effectively. Detention could be based on an exclusion order even where the grounds for the order were flimsy or non-existent. In Breen v Chief Constable for Dumfries and Galloway,¹⁶⁹ police detained Breen while an exclusion order was being made. When the detention was challenged, it was found that the police can detain on this basis so long as they are unaware that there may be no grounds for the order. Thus, police accountability for such detention was extremely limited.

Decisions to exclude appeared to be subject to extremely limited judicial review. In Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Stitt,¹⁷⁰ it was found that considerations of national security and confidentiality meant that the Secretary of State need not give any reasons at all for the decision to exclude. Some progress was made towards less restricted review in Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p McQuillan.¹⁷¹ The applicant applied for judicial review of the Home Secretary's decision to exclude him from Great Britain and the subsequent refusal to reconsider that decision in spite of the changed circumstances of the applicant. Evidence was adduced by the applicant to show that he had not at any time been involved in any terrorist activity and also that his life would continue to be endangered if he was forced to remain in Northern Ireland. It was found that the case raised human rights issues and that therefore, the order required close scrutiny. However, it was found that on national security grounds, the Home Secretary's decision must stand: he could not be required to give any reasons for it and thus the court was unable to assess its rationality. The argument that the human rights context requires close scrutiny of a decision was confirmed as correct in Ministry of Defence ex p Smith and Others.¹⁷² The Court of Appeal found that: '...the more substantial the interference with human rights, the 168 Ibid, para 200; however, the review by Lord Colville recommended on this basis that power to make exclusion orders should be repealed (Report on the Operation in 1990 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1989).

169 (1997) The Times, 24 April.

170 (1987) The Times, 3 February.

171 [1995] 3 All ER 400; (1994) The Independent, 23 September.

172 [1996] 1 All ER 257; [1996] ICR 740; (1995) The Times, 6 November. See also Cambridge HA ex pB [1995] TLR 159, CA; [1995] 1WLR 898 pp 904-05; Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p McQuillan [1995] 3 All ER 400; (1994) Independent, 23 September, in which Laws J's approach was expressly followed. Sedley J was unable to find for the applicant owing to the particular statutory framework in question.

more the court will require by way of justification before it [will be] satisfied that the decision was reasonable.¹⁷³ However, the national security justification normally put forward in exclusion cases was likely, in the pre-HRA era, to satisfy even this more stringent requirement of reasonableness.

It should be noted, however, that it is a fundamental principle of English law that the courts always have a duty to ensure that a body exercising power does so within the parameters set for it by the primary legislation. In Anisminic,¹⁷⁴ it was held that this power of the court to keep the deciding body within the remit defined in the Act which gave it its powers could not be excluded, despite clear words in a statute to the contrary. To allow the court's supervisory jurisdiction to be ousted would be to accede to the proposition that the body in question had arbitrary powers and the courts are not prepared to believe that such powers are ever granted, since the grant of them would undermine the basic principle of the rule of law. However, in the area of exclusion orders, since the courts had decided that the minister was not obliged to give them reasons for his decisions, they had made it effectively impossible for them to determine whether the minister had acted within his powers. In practice, therefore, though not in theory, review by the courts was limited to cases in which the order given was bad on its face, because, for example, it purported to exclude a suspect for more than three years contrary to Sched 2, para 2. To assert that the courts would not have had the power to quash such an order through the writ of certiorari would have been tantamount to asserting that the minister had been endowed with an unlimited and arbitrary power in which case, by definition, the power would not be a legal one. It is submitted, therefore, that the courts retained the power of supervisory review of exclusion orders but that in practice, review was impossible except in the improbable case of an order which palpably purported to exceed the powers given to the minister under the Act.

Abolition

The powers were used with increasing infrequency: there were 248 orders in force in 1982; by the end of 1996 there were 24. In 1997, the Home Secretary considered that they were no longer effective in combating terrorism and revoked the 12 which remained. The exclusion powers were lapsed with effect from midnight on 21 March 1998. Thus, under the Labour Government, exclusion orders were not used, although until repeal of the PTA by the Terrorism Act 2000, they could have been reactivated.

The power of exclusion was abolished under the Terrorism Act 2000 in the sense that the PTA was repealed and the powers were not included in the new Act. These powers would clearly be entirely irrelevant in relation to the new domestic groups to be designated as terrorist¹⁷⁵ and probably largely irrelevant to the small Irish splinter groups, such as the Real IRA. They would be extremely complex to operate in respect of 'international terrorists'. Thus, even if they were retained, these powers would probably remain largely unused under the new statute. Nevertheless, their repeal is to be welcomed on the principle that such laws should be repealed rather than left to lie on the statute book with the possibility that they could be arbitrarily reactivated in future.

173 [1996] 1 All ER 257, p 263.

174 [1969] 2 AC 147, HL.

175 See Chapter 8, pp 402–03.

Conclusions

There may be some value in exclusion orders; they may have the effect of disrupting lines of communication and breaking up terrorist units. Also, they can prevent terrorists travelling freely between Britain and other countries. Obviously, imprisonment would be a more effective way of achieving these objects, but if evidence had to be produced in court, it might endanger informers and witnesses. Also, such orders allow preventive action before a group can become established in the UK; they may also be useful where a terrorist is currently imprisoned, but it is clear that he or she will return to terrorism on release. They can even be used where a person has been acquitted of terrorist offences,¹⁷⁶ where the evidence, while failing to connect the defendant beyond reasonable doubt to particular offences, does suggest that there may be some involvement in terrorism. This has also occurred where a person has been arrested but not charged.¹⁷⁷

However, it is unclear that the serious infringement of civil liberties which these orders represent can be justified by reference to their value. The power to exclude a person from a particular place where he or she may be surrounded by friends and family to a place where he or she may be a target for terrorists on grounds which may have not been fully tested represents a gross infringement of personal liberty which requires a very strong justification and should be balanced by effective safeguards. Such justification would be shown if exclusion orders had a clear effect on terrorism and the individuals affected were unlikely to engage in terrorist activities in the place to which they were excluded. However, it is not possible to be sure that these conditions are met, especially as, by its nature, the exclusion process allows persons to be excluded of whom it cannot be said that they are clearly implicated in terrorism.

6 FREEDOM TO TRAVEL ABROAD¹⁷⁸

United Kingdom law has traditionally presumed that UK citizens would be free to travel abroad, but this freedom is in practice dependent on the possession of a valid passport, although in law it is possible to enter or leave Britain without one. A passport was defined in *Brailsford*¹⁷⁹ as a 'document issued in the name of the Sovereign...to a named individual...to be used for that individual's protection as a British subject in foreign countries'. As this definition suggests, passports grew up not as a restriction on freedom of movement, but as an affirmation of it, but the position today hardly reflects such an affirmation. Passports are issued by the Passport Office, a department of the Home Office, under the royal prerogative.

176 The cases of McBrearty (1990) The Times, 9 January, p 2 and Ellis (1991) The Times, 31 October, p 3.

177 Eg, Hagan (1987) The Times, 20 May.

178 For comment, see Williams, DW, 'British passports and the right to travel' (1974) ICLQ 642; Jaconelli, J (1975) 38 MLR 314.

179 [1905] 2 KB 730, p 745.

Thus, the Home Secretary can exercise a discretion to withhold a passport where a person wishes to travel abroad to engage in activities which are politically deplored, although legal. Because these powers arise under the royal prerogative, it was thought that they would not be open to review until the ruling in Council for Civil Service Unions v the Minister for the Civil Service (the GCHQ case)¹⁸⁰ in which the House of Lords determined that the mere fact of the power deriving from the prerogative as opposed to statute was not a sufficient reason why it should not be open to review. Lord Roskill said that the executive may act under statute which has, by necessary implication, replaced a former prerogative power or may act under the prerogative alone, but that in either case it would be an archaism to talk of the act of the executive as the act of the sovereign. This decision was applied in Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs ex p Everett,¹⁸¹ the Court of Appeal holding that review was available of a refusal to issue a passport to a British citizen living in Spain. Thus, refusal or withdrawals of passports must be made fairly and reasonably, although the merits of such decisions cannot be considered.

Recently, certain restrictions on travel have been imposed in respect of two groups of persons—those suspected of football hooliganism and those convicted of drug trafficking offences. Section 33 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 provides a court with power, on sentencing the offender in respect of certain drug trafficking offences, to impose a travel restriction order. If it does not do so, it must state its reason for that decision, under s 33(2)(c). The order must continue for not less than two years after the offender's release from custody, under s 33(3). It may include a direction to surrender the offender's passport, under s 33(4).

The Government sought to deal with the problem of football hooliganism abroad by introducing the Football (Disorder) Act 2000, Sched 1 of which amends the Football Spectators Act 1989 in order to curb the freedom of movement of football supporters in certain circumstances. Section 14e of the 1989 Act provides power for a court to remove a person's passport after he has been convicted of certain offences.

The most significant powers arise under s 21. Section 21A of the 1989 Act, as amended, provides a power for a constable in uniform, with permission from an inspector, to detain a person for up to six hours where reasonable suspicion relating to certain offences arises. Section 21B(2)(c) provides a power, with the authorisation of an officer of at least the rank of inspector, to order the detainee not to leave England and to surrender his passport on the basis of suspicion that he may commit certain offences. This power is therefore not subject to supervision by the courts. Under the Football (Disorder) Duration of Powers Order 2001, the powers under s 21 have been extended for a further year, from 28 August 2001 to the same date in 2002.

These new provisions strike directly at freedom of movement, but it appears that they are not directly affected by the HRA or the European Convention, as an international instrument, since Protocol 4 guaranteeing freedom of movement is not included in Sched 1 of the HRA and has not been ratified by the UK. If it is eventually included in Sched 1, Art 2—which provides that everyone shall be free to leave any country—would appear to be in conflict with the new provisions.

180 [1985] AC 374; [1985] 3 WLR 1174; [1984] 3 All ER 935, HL.

181 [1989] QB 891; [1989] 1 All ER 655, CA.

However, it is subject to para 3, which provides that infringement can be justified to allow restrictions necessary in a democratic society for the prevention, inter alia, of crime or disorder. It may well be that s 21 of the 1989 Act, as amended, is incompatible with Protocol 4, Art 2, on the basis that preventing a person from travelling abroad on the grounds merely of the suspicion of a police officer, with no judicial oversight, is disproportionate to the aim in view.

It would be possible for a person to seek judicial review of a decision to remove his passport. As far as the substantive right to freedom of movement is concerned, the review would be based, however, not on the Convention, but on the pre-HRA grounds. Therefore, so long as the discretion of the officers in question had been exercised in a reasonable manner and within the s 21 powers, the fact that Protocol 4, Art 2 would have been breached would be irrelevant. But once judicial review proceedings had been brought, the applicant could raise the question of the effect of Art 6 under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA. It could be argued that the ban on travelling amounted to a penalty similar to a criminal sanction and that therefore, it should not be possible for it to be ordered by a police officer, without the possibility of a fair hearing before a court or tribunal. At Strasbourg, the fact that national law classifies an act as non-criminal is relevant, but not conclusive. In Benham v UK,¹⁸² the leading case on 'criminal charge', the Court found that although the legislation in question¹⁸³ clearly did not create a criminal offence in UK law, it should be accounted criminal for Art 6(1) purposes. The proceedings against the applicant¹⁸⁴ had been brought by the public authorities; the proceedings had some punitive elements and the bringing of them implied fault on the part of the applicant. Further, the penalty was severe (committal to prison for up to three months).¹⁸⁵

Under the HRA the national court, however, may be placed in a difficulty where an act is impliedly classified as non-criminal, but Art 6 suggests that it is criminal. Owing to the provision of s 3(2) of the HRA, it would appear that a national court could not merely re-define s 21 as creating a criminal offence if that involved finding that Art 6 and s 21 were incompatible. The court would have to issue a declaration of incompatibility if it found that s 21 should be so viewed, since there would be no means of interpreting the provisions in order to create compatibility. The fact that the Football (Disorder) Act 2000 was declared to be compatible with the Convention rights under s 19 of the HRA should not (and would be unlikely to) deter a judge from making a declaration of incompatibility, since the legal advice behind the s 19 declaration might have been flawed.

7 CONCLUSIONS

A recurring theme throughout this chapter has concerned the balance struck by the relevant rules between the rights of those who wish to remain in this country, or 182 (1996) 22 EHRR 293. See also Lauko v Slovakia [1999] 1 EHRLR 105 in which it was found that a penalty for anti-social behaviour was inherently criminal in nature.

183 Community Charge (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations, reg 41.

184 In respect of default on payment of the community charge or poll tax.

185 The magistrates could only exercise their power of committal on a finding of wilful refusal to pay or culpable neglect (para 56 of the judgment).

travel abroad, and societal interests. Such interests are, of course, the proper concern of EU governments. They are also affected by popular perceptions of the nature of the threats to such interests and their impact on society. Such perceptions focus the debate on certain threats in a manner which may obscure other methods of serving the public interest. A government may well feel disinclined to provide benefits for asylum seekers in the knowledge that funds are thereby being redirected away from matters of legitimate domestic concern, such as the provision of education or housing, which are also far more popular with voters. Speedy extradition and deportation procedures can be used to tackle the international problems of terrorism and drug trafficking. The more minor problem of football hooliganism abroad is nevertheless a problem that attracts immense media attention, and the measures adopted to curb it can be viewed as a test of a government's general preparedness and ability to adopt tough measures to tackle crime and disorder.

It is suggested that the later legislation discussed in this chapter shows a tendency to display an increasingly authoritarian trend, although it has been tempered by the need to import procedures imposed on the UK by Strasbourg. The Government which introduced the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 and the Football (Disorder) Act 2000 also introduced the Human Rights Act 1998. The HRA may prove to be a corrective to the introduction of unbalanced measures unduly interfering with freedoms in the name of curbing entry into the country or removing persons from it in order to enhance State security or prevent crime or for economic purposes. As indicated, the HRA has had a certain counterbalancing effect, not on freedom of movement, but on rights-infringing measures incidental to its curtailment.¹⁸⁶ Clearly, the effect of the HRA is impaired by the failures so far to introduce Protocols 4 and 7 into Sched 1. But, although it is not possible to rely on those Protocols, other rights, in particular those guaranteed under Arts 3 and 8 and Protocol 6, can be relied upon, and provide, as they should do, a set of values which determine the parameters within which decisions to remove persons from the country have to be taken.

Perhaps the key concern of the civil libertarian at the present time is that the corrective effect of the HRA in this context, fragile, precarious and partial as it is, will be curbed almost to vanishing point. In the aftermath of the attack on the World Trade Centre in New York in September 2001, the Government decided to introduce three new anti-terrorism Bills.¹⁸⁷ The measures to be introduced include the introduction of faster deportation procedures for asylum seekers and speedier extradition procedures which would prevent or curb the use of appeals. As indicated above, a legal power to detain a suspected terrorist indefinitely until a country is found to which he can be deported is being introduced. The power is likely to require amendment of the HRA in order to derogate from Article 5. Clearly, the HRA itself provides a basis for intervention in such instances and also—on its face—demands a more intensive scrutiny of executive actions under s 6. One method of importing such faster procedures could be modelled on the arrangements put in place by the RIPA for the new tribunal which considers allegations of unlawful actions by the police and security and intelligence services.¹⁸⁸ As Chapter 11 explained, challenges to those bodies under the HRA must be brought in the tribunal and recourse to the ordinary courts thereafter is minimal. Any such move in the context of removal from the UK may be accompanied by further powers afforded to the Home Secretary to issue certificates preventing even such recourse on various grounds. If the counter-terrorist measures to be put in place proved effective, there would be less cause for complaint, since terrorism presents in itself one of the greatest possible threats to civil liberties, both in terms of actual and feared effects, regardless of the government response. But the concern is that far reaching repressive measures which have been waiting for some time to get on to the statute book will be introduced on the basis that this is an opportune moment. They will then remain there, whether or not the terrorist threat eventually subsides, and the victims may be those weak and unpopular groups in society who have been the main subjects of this chapter.

186 See p 942.

187 They were announced by Tony Blair at the beginning of the Labour Party Conference in Brighton, on 30 September 2001.

188 See Chapter 11, pp 714 et seq.

PART V

EQUALITY AND THEORIES OF ANTI-DISCRIMINATION LAWS

One of the main themes in human rights jurisprudence concerns the duty of States to treat citizens with equal concern and respect. This does not mean that no differentiation between citizens may occur, but that inequality of treatment should not be based on factors which do not justify it. Thus, discrimination may be defined as morally unjustifiable as opposed to justifiable differentiation.¹ It may be said that the latter occurs when a difference in treatment is accorded owing to behaviour which is the result of voluntary choice, the former when it is based on an attribute over which the individual has no control, such as sex or skin colour. Thus, in a society that allows or imposes discrimination in this sense, the groups affected will be entirely frustrated in pursuing their objectives in all areas of life because the disadvantage they are under cannot be removed. These statements alone, however, are inadequate as failing to deal with behaviour which may in a sense be the result of voluntary choice, but might also be said to be determined by social conditioning. Further, they do not explain whether differentiation would be justified if based on behaviour to which a person is morally committed owing to her membership of a certain group. Thus, it should also be argued that morally unjustifiable differentiation would also occur, at least presumptively, if different treatment was based on behaviour over which the individual had little real choice. Finally, this argument should encompass the notion that the physical attribute or behaviour in question may, exceptionally, be objectively relevant to the differential treatment and thereby could justify it. As Chapter 16 will demonstrate, anti-discrimination schemes tend to begin by outlawing discrimination on the basis of sex, race or skin colour. They then move on to a more developed conception of equality, which understands that discrimination occurs on the basis of a number of other factors, including sexual orientation, transsexuality, religion or disability.

Once factors which do not justify differentiation are identified, the State can be said to be under a duty to ensure that unequal treatment on the basis of such factors does not occur, at least in spheres under its control. However, at different times and according to different schools of thought, the scope of the duty varies. Under early classic liberal rights theory, the State came under a duty to ensure that no formal discriminatory mechanisms were in place, but once that was done, it was thought that individuals would have equal freedom to exercise their talents.² However, this theory came to encompass the notion of State intervention in order to ensure that some individuals did not prevent others from exercising their talents. This is the dominant theory underpinning the UK legislative policy on equality: it assumes that once people have equal freedoms, they will have equal opportunities and thus all that is needed is to ensure such freedoms. Some egalitarians would go further, insisting that persons should be placed in a similar position, even if in order to do so they are treated unequally. Some forms of liberal thought³ would now also support treating persons unequally in order to ensure equality of opportunity. However, broadly, liberals view equality as formal, while egalitarians, including socialists or communitarians, view it as substantive. Formal equality⁴ (or treating like as like) is the limitation placed upon equality legislation by liberalism; its drawback is that it puts the protection of such legislation beyond the reach of those who are differently situated.⁵ If women's domestic and parental roles⁶ tend to differ from those of men, and those roles interfere with women's role as (cost efficient) workers, in a formal equality model, which takes the male as the norm and assumes that a woman is like a man, the employer may justifiably treat women differently. If some persons from minority groups are educationally or socially disadvantaged, their difference of situation cannot be addressed by means of legislation based on a formal equality model.

1 See Wallman, 'Difference, differentiation, discrimination', 5 New Community 1.

2 See Mill, JS, On the Subjection of Women, 2nd edn, 1869.

3 See Raz, J, The Morality of Freedom, 1986; Dworkin, R, Taking Rights Seriously, 1978, p 272.

This argument does not imply that the imposition of formal equality has no impact on the distribution of social benefits. In particular, formal equality affects the market by inducing it not to act in an arbitrary and ultimately inefficient fashion. Formal equality, if fully established, disallows the individual biases of employers to feed into the market,⁷ and may therefore promote genuine competition based on individual merit, thereby preventing the unwarranted under- or over-advantaging of certain groups. Perpetuation of an unequal pay policy may not seem to lead clearly and immediately to an inefficient operation of the market. If a certain group can be treated disadvantageously in terms of pay, this may appear in some respects to benefit the market, since the availability of cheap labour may lead to increased productivity and market expansion. Nevertheless, unequal pay may eventually distort the operation of market forces, creating dysfunction in the market, since certain professions and certain specialities within professions may be shunned by advantaged groups because of the low pay they offer, with the result once again that genuine competition is not fostered within them.

Thus, it may be argued that formal equality 'perfects' the market: rather than allowing bias to benefit certain individuals at the expense of others, it forces the market to treat every employee or would-be employee as an autonomous individual having made a free choice as regards position in the market. Further, it can force the market to treat each individual as an equivalent 'unit of production'.⁸ Beyond that it will not go, and therefore it is not ultimately gravely disruptive of market forces. Once a formal equality regime is established and internalised by the market, market forces can have free rein.

4 Under classic liberalism as expressed by Mill, op cit, fn 2.

5 Several feminist writers have pointed out that the principal limitation of the formal equality principle is that it assumes that the male is the norm. MacKinnon puts it particularly aptly, 'Why should you have to be the same as a man to get what a man gets simply because he is one?' See MacKinnon, C, 'Difference and dominance: on sex discrimination', in Bartlett, K and Kennedy, R (eds), Feminist Legal Theory, 1991; see also MacKinnon, C, 'Reflections on sex equality under law' (1991) 100 Yale LJ 1286-93.

6 Matters belonging to the 'private' sphere, in a liberal conception. Mill's view, as expressed in op cit, fn 2, was that formal equality operates in certain 'public' spheres, such as franchise, employment and education.

7 This argument is put forward by Weiler in 'The wages of sex: the uses and limits of comparable worth' (1986) 99 Harv L Rev 1728, p 1762: '...real world labour markets leave a good deal of leeway for countless managerial judgments about how to classify, value and pay certain jobs in comparison to others.'

8 In other words, formal equality requires in general that one employee should not be perceived as more expensive than another and therefore the market need not accommodate the cost or individuals who are given unnecessary special protection such as, eg, barring women from night work during pregnancy.

Substantive equality, on the other hand, demands not merely that persons should be judged on individual merit, but that the real situation of many women and/or members of minority groups which may tend to place them in a weaker position in the market should be addressed by a variety of means, including anti-discrimination legislation. Proponents of this argument recognise that the achievement of substantive equality involves more than a few discrimination claims. Such claims can only have limited impact in bringing about social change; far reaching structural changes can be achieved only as a result of government policy and changed social expectations. Nevertheless, under a substantive equality model, equality legislation would attempt to reflect and further the societal movement towards equality which is taking place in the Member States of the EU. Thus, legislation enshrining anti-discrimination measures may move beyond seeking to ensure formal equality and may encompass a more sophisticated notion of equality, requiring understanding of the differential impact of certain measures on certain groups, and of the value of positive action.

FROM INEQUALITY TO NEUTRALITY, FROM FORMAL TO SUBSTANTIVE EQUALITY

During the 20th and 21st centuries in Western democracies, it has been possible to discern a pattern in the landscape of 'equality' law. There has been a clear movement, reflected in the law, towards acceptance of the equal treatment of persons, and towards a more developed conception of equality, and away from the acceptance of unjustifiable differentiation, which reflects to an extent the different theories considered above. In the first phase such differentiation, based on particular protected grounds expressly enshrined in the law, is gradually removed; in the second, there may be a hiatus during which the law is neutral and there is freedom to discriminate; in the third, the law may be used to try expressly to prevent discrimination, or at least certain aspects of it, on such grounds. In the fourth, a more developed conception of equality may become apparent: in this phase, the law will tend to permit discrimination—termed positive or affirmative action—on the ground that it is morally justified as a temporary measure intended to combat the effects of previous discrimination.

However, although this general pattern can usually be identified, it may well be that particular aspects of the 'first phase' discrimination which for various reasons—usually associated with religion or with the armed forces—are especially resistant to change, are still in existence during the third phase. Such aspects will still tend to follow the general trend, but more slowly, and will themselves almost certainly move eventually from one phase to another.⁹ In other words, some specific inequalities may still be enshrined in law in the third or fourth phases. Moreover, within each phase there may be movement; in the first, legislation may enshrine gross and absolute inequality, which gradually gives place to a lesser and more pragmatic inequality. An example is afforded by the legal regulation of sexual acts between consenting males: until 1967 these were merely forbidden, on the ground that sexual satisfaction gained in this manner was inimical to the moral basis of society. The removal of this barrier but the fixing of the age of consent for male homosexuals at 21, and then at 18, suggested a retreat from an absolutist position, but a disinclination to carry through such a retreat fully.

9 An example is afforded by the exclusion of women from the Anglican priesthood, an instance of 'first phase' discrimination which survived until 1994. 'First phase' discrimination in this context, although almost squeezed out of existence, will subsist: under the current arrangements, women priests cannot become bishops.

Since slavery was abolished at the beginning of the 19th century, generalised racial inequality has never been enshrined in law in the UK in the way that sexual inequality has been until relatively recently. People from certain ethnic backgrounds have not been prevented from voting, from holding civic office, from owning property or from forming contracts. The legal scheme which until quite recently governed sexual inequality in the UK would probably find parallels in terms of racial inequality only under regimes such as that in South Africa during the apartheid years.

The movement towards equality on the grounds of sexual orientation is still poised between the first and second phases, although a few instances of legally enshrined inequality remain. In the UK, there are signs at present that its entry into the third phase is imminent; it seems highly probable that it will do so sometime within the next few years. The signs that this is likely to occur are already in place: the existence of pressure groups operating within the UK and abroad; and official recognition afforded to such groups in some other Western democracies coupled with instances in which their policies have been afforded a degree of legal recognition.¹⁰ Moreover, instruments which are capable of affecting law and policy in the UK already enshrine guarantees of freedom from discrimination on this ground, including the European Convention on Human Rights and the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights. Recently, more far reaching European legal instruments have been introduced, at international level, which could be used to address discrimination on this ground. Arguments in favour of discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation in various spheres such as employment may now be viewed as rooted only in prejudice: the social need to retain such discrimination is not apparent.¹¹ At present, such prejudice is allowed relatively free rein and therefore can affect every area of life from employment to expressions of sexuality, and since the UK does not, in general, recognise same-sex partners, they suffer in comparison with heterosexual couples in relation to immigration,¹² pensions and inheritance rights.

ANTI-ASSIMILATIONISM

Although this chapter concentrates on the extent to which the law has influenced equality of opportunity, it does not imply that all members of the groups in question

10 Eg, the armed forces in Belgium, Denmark, The Netherlands and Spain are all open to homosexuals. See further Homosexuality: A Community Issue, 1993, a report compiled by the European Human Rights Foundation.

11 Some Conservative opinion takes the view that homosexuality is a form of immorality which should be suppressed in order to uphold the moral bonds which keep society together. This view may derive from that expressed by Lord Devlin (The Maccabean Lecture, The Enforcement of Morals, 1959, reprinted in 1965). It seems likely that this body of opinion would not support legislation aimed at preventing discrimination in, eg, employment on grounds of sexual orientation. For discussion of Lord Devlin's view see Chapter 5, p 269.

12 See Chapter 15, p 945, and below, pp 1052 et seq.

will necessarily want the opportunity to adopt the way of life of the dominant group. Some women and some members of ethnic minorities believe that true equality means accepting and respecting different values rather than trying to extinguish them.¹³ The notion of ‘assimilationism’ has come particularly under attack¹⁴ in various writings on feminist legal theory, which have advocated the ‘feminism of difference’ and rejected the rights analysis of the liberal feminist.¹⁵ Of course, there is a crucial difference here between the assertion of the values of groups of persons belonging to ethnic minorities and those of women, in that women will be committed to an enormous and disparate range of values and will therefore behave as differently from each other as men do.¹⁶ However, assuming for the purposes of the argument that a body of values of a more nurturing, caring, conscience-based kind can be associated with women, just as certain values and beliefs can be associated with groups such as Sikhs or Muslims, it could be argued that such values are not necessarily opposed in their entirety to those of the dominant group and, in any event, need not be rejected in seeking to overcome disadvantage. In suggesting this, the danger should be borne in mind that extreme forms of ‘celebration of difference’ may be merely another route to economic and political subjugation; history does not afford many examples of groups who overcame disadvantage by rejoicing in their rejection of the whole body of values which originally placed them in that position. In any event, despite a difference of emphasis, there is a measure of harmony between moderate anti-assimilationist theory and liberal rights theory as regards the need to protect people from discrimination on unjustifiable grounds by outlawing sex- and race-based disadvantages, so that women or members of ethnic minorities can choose whether or how far to accept—while perhaps working to modify—the lifestyle associated with the dominant group.

DISCRIMINATION AND THE LAW

This part begins, in Chapter 16, by considering and evaluating the domestic and European legislation aimed specifically at preventing discrimination based on certain protected grounds including those of race, sex and disability. The anti-discrimination scheme adopted in respect of disability is compared with those applicable to discrimination on grounds of sex or race. The chapter considers the means used in the legislation of distinguishing between relevant and irrelevant

13 Eg, MacKinnon, C, ‘Toward feminist jurisprudence’, 34 Stanford L Rev; Littleton, CA, ‘Reconstructing sexual equality’, in Bartlett, op cit, fn 5.

14 See Gilligan, C, In A Different Voice: Psychological Theory and Women’s Development, 1982. It should be noted that the ‘feminism of difference’ has itself come under attack from postmodern feminists as impoverished and limited in its assumption that there is essential commonality between all women. See Cain, ‘Feminist jurisprudence: grounding the theories’, in Bartlett and Kennedy, op cit, fn 5, pp 265–68.

15 ‘Feminist rights analysis generally pretends that there are no differences between men and women and attempts to advance women by giving them the rights men have’: Olsen, E, ‘Statutory rape: a feminist critique of rights analysis’, in Bartlett and Kennedy, op cit, fn 5, p 312.

16 The argument that women can and should be viewed as a homogeneous group has been put by Martha Minow: ‘cognitively we need simplifying categories and the unifying category of “woman” helps to organise experience even at the cost of denying some of it’ (Minow, M, ‘Feminist reason: getting it and losing it’, 38 J Legal Educ 47, p 51).

factors founding differentiation, since only the former provide a morally justifiable basis for different treatment. The legal means of ensuring that such distinctions can be made can then be contrasted with the failure so far to ensure that homosexuality per se is not regarded by the law as an irrelevant factor on which to base differentiation in such spheres as employment, housing and education.

Broadly, the legislation embodies two methods of challenging direct discrimination and discriminatory practices: under the first, the 'individual' method, the responsibility lies mainly with the victim of discrimination to bring an action against the discriminator, while under the second, termed the 'administrative' method, an institution or body uses various methods of seeking to ensure that discrimination is prevented. Chapter 16 moves on to consider the efficacy of the current legal model in practice.

The main emphasis of this chapter will be on the tensions placed on the interpretation of the legislation, not only as claimants have sought to use it, to do more than merely bring about formal equality, but also as they have sought to bring further grounds within the category of those that are protected. It will be apparent that a number of further grounds have received protection—the anti-discrimination schemes, both domestic and European, have widened their scope and are currently under pressure to widen still further. The potential of the Human Rights Act (HRA) to influence the domestic scheme in both respects is quite a significant theme, although, owing to the influence of EC law, the HRA is likely to have less influence in this context than in others considered by this book.

The anti-discrimination legislation focuses on certain specific and limited areas of activity, in particular that of employment. However, discrimination affects all areas of life and certain areas of law, especially of criminal law, may embody and reinforce it, subsisting alongside specific anti-discrimination laws in other spheres. Therefore, Chapter 17 goes on to consider the effect in this area of criminal law and the criminal process as positively or negatively influencing the achievement of substantive equality on certain grounds. Many aspects of discrimination on grounds of race have now, in a very significant reform, been brought within the race discrimination scheme by its amendment in 2000. The analysis of civil anti-discrimination legislation undertaken in Chapter 16 will focus on its efficacy in identifying, compensating for or preventing unjustifiable differentiation and this will also be the case in relation to the criminal law and the criminal justice system: consideration will be given to the role of the criminal law in preventing certain expressions of discrimination which are unaffected by the civil anti-discrimination legislation but which have a severe impact on the lives of certain groups, while the extent to which the criminal justice system positively seeks to eliminate discriminatory behaviour by those who administer it will be explored. However, the criminal law and the criminal justice system will also be considered in another light; it will be considered how far they may be said to contain provisions which themselves discriminate on the basis of morally irrelevant factors. Such provisions may be particularly significant, since they amount to a denial of moral autonomy and may also be said to signal the acceptance of some forms of discrimination as part of British culture.

ANTI-DISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION

1 INTRODUCTION¹

The discussion of anti-discrimination law in England and Wales below will show that a similar, but far from identical, model is used in respect of the protected grounds. It concentrates heavily on an individualistic remedial model, that is, one that relies on the aggrieved individual to seek a remedy. Obviously, this model is found throughout tort law but, in this instance, depending on trade union involvement, it may be especially indefensible since it may mean that a member of an already weak and disadvantaged group may find that their disadvantage is exacerbated by the process of bringing an action.² The significant differences between the schemes will be indicated, especially where they represent a weakness.

The model is, it is suggested, complex, tortuous and formalistic. Its expression in the various anti-discrimination measures also provides a protection against discrimination, which has often been found to be patchy, inconsistent and ineffective.³ Nevertheless, it has also often been said that there is 'too much law' in this area. It is suggested that this is for two reasons. In the UK, there are three strands of law, deriving from the domestic schemes and those of the European Community and the European Convention on Human Rights. The Human Rights Act (HRA) has complicated the issue since it has introduced a form of anti-discrimination law into domestic law—Art 14—but has given it a lesser status than has EC law. At the same time, at the international and domestic level, the Convention is a source of general principles for EC law. This complex web of law will soon affect a number of protected grounds.

The further reason for the over-abundance of law is that a struggle is evident at every point in the schemes to take account of the needs of employers and others, bearing in mind that the private sector is affected, while affording some recognition to the detriment that discrimination creates. Thus, measures have been carefully tempered by exception clauses, which have then in turn gathered complex legal accretions. In other words, there are strong indications, especially in the scheme relating to disability, of reluctant and timid reform. Nowhere is such reluctance more evident, it will be argued, than in relation to the nature of the remedies and their delivery.

1 Reading on race and sex discrimination: Gregory, J, Sex, Race and the Law: Legislating for Equality, 1987; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties, 1st edn, 1993, Chapter 18; Dine, J and Watt, B (eds), Discrimination Law, 1996; Palmer, Discrimination at Work, 3rd edn, 1996; McCrudden (ed), Anti-Discrimination Law, 1991; Hepple, B and Szyzszak, E (eds), Discrimination and the Limits of the Law, 1992; von Prondzynski, F and Richards, W, 'Tackling indirect discrimination' [1995] PL 117; Gardner, J, 'Discrimination as injustice' (1996) 16(3) OJLS 353; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2000, Chapter 17; McColgan, A, Discrimination Law: Text, Cases and Materials, 2000; Ewing, KD, Bradley, A and McColgan, A (eds), Labour Law: Text and Materials, 2001; Livingstone, S, 'Article 14 and the prevention of discrimination in the ECHR' (1997) EHRLR 25; Ewing, KD, 'The HRA and labour law' (1998) 27ILJ 275; Deakin, S and Morris, J, Labour Law, 2nd edn, 1998, Chapter 6; Bindman, Discrimination Law, 2000; Hepple, B, Coussey, M and Choudhury, T, Equality: A New Framework, 2000.

2 See, especially, pp 1047–48, below.

3 See the criticisms in Hepple, Coussey and Choudhury, op cit, fn 1.

Nevertheless, the law acts as a symbolic affirmation of society's disapproval of discrimination and arguably provides a focus for challenge that, it is suggested, fuels determination to seek change rather than distracting attention away from more fruitful avenues.

Flawed as the schemes are, it will be found that they only apply arbitrarily to certain protected grounds. Others, including that of sexual orientation, are not yet within them, although attempts have been made through the courts to obtain legal recognition for such other grounds for discrimination. The net result is, this chapter will suggest, that a mass of complex and, in some respects, unsatisfactory law has gathered round certain protected grounds, while in respect of others the strong possibility of discrimination leads the individual concerned to seek to conceal the potential basis for discrimination from others, thereby in turn obscuring the true nature of the problem.

European Community law

Sex discrimination law in the UK cannot be studied without taking into account European Community law, which has been a highly significant influence (race discrimination provisions have also been influenced indirectly). Article 119 of the Treaty of Rome, which was signed by Britain in 1973, governs the principle of equal pay for equal work. It is now Art 141 of the EC Treaty. It is amplified by the Equal Pay Directive 75/117, while the Equal Treatment Directive 76/207 and the Pregnancy Directive 92/85 govern other aspects of sexual discrimination. Treaty Articles have both direct and horizontal effect and, therefore, Art 141 can be enforced in domestic courts against private and State bodies through the vehicle of the Equal Pay Act (below).⁴ In other words, the provisions of the Act can be ignored or twisted out of their natural meaning in order to give effect to Art 141.⁵ Directives, in contrast, only have vertical effect; they can, if sufficiently precise, clear and unconditional, be enforced against State bodies—emanations of the State.⁶ Also, they can have indirect horizontal effect against private bodies through interpretation.⁷ They can also by this means have indirect vertical effect (the interpretative obligation can be employed in an action in reliance on the domestic implementing legislation where the respondent is a State body).

There have been a number of significant recent developments.⁸ Directive 97/80, the Burden of Proof Directive,⁹ implemented in SI 2001/2660, affects the anti-sex discrimination scheme, as indicated below. The Race Directive,¹⁰ extending beyond the employment field, which is to be implemented by July 2003, will bring race

4 See Biggs v Somerset CC [1996] IRLR 203.

5 See Worringham v Lloyds Bank plc Case C-69/80 [1981] ECR 767; for the CA decision see [1982] IRLR 84.

6 See 13, below.

7 Through s 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972.

8 For discussion, see Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC, 'New European equality measures' [2000] PL 562.

9 The Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001, in force from 12 October 2001. For discussion, see Guild (2000) 29 ILJ 416.

10 Com 2000 328 (01), adopted in June 2000 by the Council of Ministers. The 'Race Directive' came into force on 19 July 2000 and has to be implemented by Member States within three years of this date (for comment, see Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC, op cit, fn 8).

11 Adopted under Art 13 of the Treaty Establishing the European Community (TEC).

discrimination within the direct coverage of EC law for the first time. The Framework Directive¹¹ on equal opportunities in employment, adopted, like the Race Directive, under Art 13 of the EC Treaty,¹² will allow for the extension of anti-discrimination measures into new areas, in particular that of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. Thus, there is clear pressure emanating from the EC to develop a broad anti-discrimination programme domestically. The reforms could have two effects. First, the depth and impact of the current domestic provisions relating to discrimination on grounds of sex, gender reassignment, race and disability, could be strengthened. Second, the anti-discrimination programme is likely to broaden so that discrimination on new bases, in particular that of sexual orientation, but also that of transsexuality per se, is recognised within the law as unjustifiable.

The HRA and the European Convention on Human Rights

The EC provisions are in some respects more valuable than the guarantee of freedom from discrimination under Art 14 of the European Convention, partly because they may override domestic statutory provisions in domestic courts,¹³ and partly because, as Chapter 2 explained, Art 14 only covers areas falling within the scope of the other Articles.¹⁴ This limitation was highlighted in Botta v Italy.¹⁵ The European Court of Human Rights considered a claim that the lack of disabled facilities at a seaside resort violated the applicant's right to equal enjoyment of his right to respect for private life under Art 8 read together with Art 14. The claim was rejected on the basis that 'social' rights, such as the participation of disabled people in recreational facilities, fall outside Art 8. Therefore, Art 14 did not apply.

Even where Art 14 may apply, Strasbourg has been very reluctant to afford it separate consideration, if a breach of another Convention right is established.¹⁶ Where Art 14 has been considered, it has been afforded a narrow interpretation by the Commission. For example, in *Stedman v UK*¹⁷ a requirement to work on a Sunday led to the dismissal of the applicant, who had religious objections to Sunday working. It was found by the Commission that a general requirement that has a disproportionate impact on one group is not discriminatory. This decision suggests that Art 14 does not recognise indirect discrimination and that, as Ewing puts it, 'the Convention rights can be qualified by contract'.¹⁸ This does not mean, however, that Art 14 is of no value in this area. The Court may eventually adhere to a more developed conception of discrimination and may depart, as it has done in some 12 For discussion of Art 13, which was added by the Amsterdam Treaty, see Bell [1999] 6 Maastricht J of European and Comp Law 5.

13 In general, EU directives are enforceable in national courts only against the State or against bodies under the control of the State (Foster v British Gas plc [1990] 3 All ER 897) but not against private bodies. However, it was found in Francovich v Italy [1992] 21 IRLR 84; [1991] ECR I-5357; [1995] ICR 722 that an individual who suffers loss at the hands of a private body owing to the State's failure to undertake full implementation of a directive may have a claim against the State. See further Ellis, E, European Community Sex Equality Law, 2nd edn, 1998, Chapter 4. For discussion of the influence of EU equality laws, see McCrudden (1993) 13 OJLS 320; Ellis [1994] 31 CMLR 43.

14 See Chapter 2, pp 85–86.

15 (1998)26EHRR 241.

16 See Dudgeon v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 149, para 69; discussed in Chapter 12, pp 738–39.

17 (1997) 23 EHRR CD 168.

18 Ewing, op cit, fn 1, p 288.

other contexts, from the stance taken by the Commission. In *Schuler-Zraggen v Switzerland*¹⁹ the Court said: ‘the advancement of the equality of the sexes is today a major goal in the Member States of the Council of Europe and very weighty reasons would have to be put forward before such a difference of treatment [as occurred in the instant case] could be regarded as compatible with the Convention.’²⁰ The Court has recognised that positive discrimination may be appropriate in some circumstances; it has said that the guarantee under Art 14 will be violated where persons in analogous situations are treated differently where there is no objective and reasonable justification, but also where States without such justification fail to treat differently persons whose situations are significantly different.²¹

Further, Art 14 covers discrimination on a wide range of bases and therefore, combined with Art 8 or, in some circumstances, Arts 9, 10 or 11 can be used to address discrimination that is currently outside the EC or domestic anti-discrimination schemes. For example, it can be used to attack discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation or of religion, which are not covered under the schemes discussed below, or under the current EC schemes. It can also, very significantly, cover discrimination in contexts not covered by the domestic or EC schemes and can fill gaps in those schemes even within the contexts they do cover. But the HRA itself will curb the effect of the Convention since it only binds public authorities under s 6. Since it currently appears that the HRA does not create direct horizontal effect,²² its impact in this area is subject to certain limitations.

If a public authority discriminates in a manner that could be addressed by Art 8 in conjunction with Art 14, or Art 8 alone, a free standing action could be brought against it under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. If anti-discrimination measures are statutory, s 3 of the HRA applies if it appears that there is a potential conflict between the provisions and Arts 14 and 8. Since this area of law is largely (although not wholly) covered by statute, Art 14 may have quite a wide ranging indirect horizontal effect. As discussed below, this may open the possibility of bringing some forms of discrimination within the Sex Discrimination Act that are not currently covered by it. The problem is that the statutory scheme is limited to discrimination on certain grounds and it may not be possible to interpret the provisions widely enough to cover other forms of discrimination. But, by this route, it is possible that gaps in the statutory schemes, including the scheme relating to disability, could be narrowed.

Thus, unless the courts eventually take the view that they themselves, as public bodies, must seek to ensure that an applicant obtains his or her Convention rights, Arts 14 and another Article (usually Art 8) combined will not be directly justiciable against private bodies except as a matter of interpretation where a statute applies and s 3 of the HRA has an impact. It is hard to see that indirect horizontal effect could be created by seeking to develop the existing common law under the impetus 19 (1993) 16 EHRR 405, para 22; see also Van Raalte v Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 503, para 39.

20 See further Livingstone, op cit, fn 1; Ewing, op cit, fn 1, p 288; Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 17.

21 Thlimmenos v Greece, Judgment of 6 April 2000.

22 See Chapter 4, pp 161–2 and Chapter 10, pp 542–43.

23 As occurred in Douglas v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992; see Chapter 10, pp 581–86.

of s 6 of the HRA²³ since the common law has failed so far to develop any anti-discrimination remedies. Thus, the potential of Art 14 domestically is doubly limited—first by its own inherent limitation, since it is non-free standing, and second by the lack of direct horizontal effect under the HRA. In general, therefore, it is not expected that at present the impact of the HRA in this context will be very great, although in respect of certain currently unprotected grounds it may be of great value, while it may also be valuable in extending the meaning of statutory provisions, by considering the effect of Arts 8 and 14 read together.

Where another Article and Art 14 combined cover the same area as EC provisions, they can be used as a source of general principles for the interpretation of the EC law, under Art 6 of the Treaty of Rome (now Art 13, as amended by the Amsterdam Treaty). The EC provisions can override domestic law and, therefore, by this means those Convention Articles could be given, in a sense, further effect than the HRA allows them to have. Thus, for example, an applicant bringing an action against a private body and seeking to rely on the Sex Discrimination Act in respect of discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment in a context excluded from the Act, could begin by arguing that s 3 of the HRA should be used to broaden the meaning of the Act in reliance on Arts 8 and 14. If this failed, on the basis that such an interpretation would amount to legislating, the applicant could rely on s 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972²⁴ in arguing that the interpretation in question should be adopted in order to satisfy the demands of Equal Treatment Directive.²⁵ At that stage, in order to determine the requirements of the Directive, Strasbourg jurisprudence on Arts 8 and 14 could re-enter the argument. Once (and if) domestic measures are adopted in response to the Framework and Race Directives, this possibility may become even more significant.

As Chapter 2 explained, Protocol 12 provides a free standing right to freedom from discrimination.²⁶ Protocol 12 is evidence of a clear recognition of the weakness of the anti-discrimination measures under the Convention and its existence may perhaps prompt the European Court of Human Rights to move away from its previous stance under Art 14 in favour of a more developed and determined position on anti-discrimination, even prior to the ratification of Protocol 12. If Protocol 12 is ratified by the UK and then included in Sched 1 of the HRA, it will have a far reaching impact in this context, since a free standing right to non-discrimination on a wide range of grounds, including those of sexual orientation or religion, would then be created, which would have direct effect as against public authorities. It might also have an impact on the currently protected grounds since it could be relied upon in an attempt to extend or fill gaps in the legislation. Thus, it would create new rights against public authorities. At present, Protocol 12 has not been ratified and the Government is opposed to ratification.

24 See Chapter 3, p 130.

25 See p 989, below.

26 See p 85 for further discussion see Khaliq, V, 'Protocol 12 to the ECHR: a step forward or a step too far?' [2001] PL 457.

2 DOMESTIC ANTI-DISCRIMINATION MEASURES

The Sex Discrimination Act 1975²⁷

At common law and under statute, women were historically subject to a number of legal disabilities, but the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century saw the gradual removal of such disabilities by statute. Women obtained the right to sign contracts, to own property irrespective of their marital status, to vote and to stand for Parliament. The Sex Disqualification (Removal) Act 1919 removed any disqualification by way of sex or marriage for those who wished to exercise a public function, hold a civil or judicial office, enter any civil profession or vocation or be admitted to any incorporated society. However, the marriage bar continued to operate in many jobs until the Second World War.²⁸ Once these disabilities had been removed there was opposition to further legislation.²⁹ It was thought that the barriers preventing women entering public life were down and therefore further measures were unnecessary. However, the fact that women were, for the first time, able to enter the public domain did not mean that they were accepted there. Theoretically, women had the same opportunities as men but, in practice, since there were no formal barriers to discrimination by employers and others, these practices continued. It may be assumed that this was due in part to prejudice and in part to the operation of the market which had no interest in ensuring better treatment for a group of employees who could traditionally be treated badly. Employers openly paid the 'women's' rate for the job,³⁰ a lower rate than that for men, and openly refused to appoint women above a certain level or to do certain jobs.³¹ Under the common law, it was immaterial that the grounds for such decisions might be capricious or reprehensible.

The view taken in the 1974 White Paper on Sex Discrimination preceding the 1975 Act was that women were being held back in employment and other fields because they were not being judged on their individual merits, but on the basis of a general presumption of inferiority. It was apparent that the common law was not

-
- 27 General reading: Atkins and Hoggett, Women and the Law, 1984, pp 1–63 for background; Pannick, D, Sex Discrimination Law, 1985; Bourne, C and Whitmore, J, Anti-discrimination Law in Britain, 3rd edn, 1996; Townshend-Smith, R, Sex Discrimination in Employment, 1989; Honeyball, Sex, Employment and the Law, 1991; McCrudden, op cit, fn 1; Rhode, D, Justice and Gender: Sex Discrimination and the Law, 1989; Fenwick, H and Hervey, T, 'Sex equality in the Single Market: new directions for the European Court of Justice' [1995] 32 CMLR 443–70; Hervey, T, Justifications for Sex Discrimination in Employment, 1993; Ellis, 'The definition of discrimination in EC sex equality law' (1994) 19 EL Rev 563; Millar and Phillips, 'Evaluating anti-discrimination legislation in the UK: some issues and approaches' (1983) 11 Int J Soc Law 417; McGinley, 'Judicial approaches to sex discrimination in US and UK—a comparative study' (1986) 59 MLR 413, p 415; on pregnancy, see Conaghan (1993) 20 JLS 71. Current reading: Fredman, S, Women and the Law, 1997, esp Chapters 5, 7, 9; Deakin and Morris, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 6; von Prondzynski and Richards, op cit, fn 1; Barnard, C and Hepple, B, 'Substantive equality' (2000) 59(3) CLJ 562; Hepple, Coussey and Choudhury, op cit, fn 1; Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 17; McColgan, op cit, fn 1; McGlynn, C, 'Reclaiming a feminist vision: the reconciliation of paid work and family life in EU law and policy' (2001) 7 Columbia Journal of European Law 241.
- 28 The 1919 Act was found to mean only that the employers must lift restrictions on women; it did not prevent particular employers imposing restrictions on women and it gave rise to no right of litigation: see Price v Rhondda Urban Council [1923] 2 Ch 372.
- 29 Atkins and Hoggett note the lack of parliamentary concern about women at work and failure to debate the problem: op cit, fn 27, p 19.
- 30 In 1970, women's average pay was 63.1% that of men (EOC, 1988b, p 45).
- 31 The study by National Segregation 1979 showed that by 1971, over half of all men were in occupations where they outnumbered women by at least 9 to 1 and 77% worked in occupations which were at least 70% male.

going to bring about change, partly because the judiciary saw the creation of a comprehensive anti-discrimination code as the province of Parliament but also because, even in the 1970s, sympathy with discriminatory practices was evident among certain judges. In Morris v Duke-Cohen,³² for example, a judge was prepared to find a solicitor negligent for taking advice from a wife when a husband was available, on the basis that a sensible wife would expect her husband to make the major decisions.

Formal and substantive equality

The legislation affords recognition to two competing views as to the most effective means of securing equality: the so called formal equality approach and the pluralist approach.³³ The former, which, as mentioned above, is based on classic liberalism and is the dominant approach, assumes that in a just society, the sex of a person would carry no expectations with it; it would be as irrelevant as their eye colour. It takes the view that women and men are equally able to take advantage of opportunities and that therefore, if a man would have been expected to satisfy the same conditions as the woman, no discrimination has occurred. Thus, once specific instances of differential treatment based on sex are prevented or addressed, women will no longer be placed at a disadvantage. The pluralist approach, on the other hand, which was imported from the US,³⁴ takes a number of factors, such as past discrimination or social conditioning, into account and asks whether policies and practices which are neutral on their face actually have an adverse impact on women owing to factors which particularly affect them. It accepts that there may be differences between the situations of men and women, but holds that penalties should not inevitably attach to the recognition of those differences. This approach derives from the Supreme Court decision in Griggs v Duke Power Company,³⁵ when the defendant company administered an aptitude test to all job applicants it was shown that significantly fewer blacks than whites passed the test and that the skills examined by the test were not particularly relevant to the jobs applied for. In these circumstances, it was held that the test was discriminatory.³⁶ In the context of sex discrimination, the use of aptitude or other tests would be unlikely to disadvantage women. But past discriminatory practices—although their effects are becoming less apparent—might do so,³⁷ as might the effect of caring responsibilities: for example, currently more women than men are single parents.

The two methods of securing equality embodied in the legislation—the individual approach and the general administrative approach—need not entirely be considered in isolation from each other. The weakness of the first is that specific instances of 32 (1975) 120 SJ 826.

33 See Gardner (1989) 9 OJLS 1 and Brest (1976) 90 Harv LR 1 on the different philosophies apparent in the legislation.

34 For a comparative discussion of the approaches to UK and US discrimination, see McGinley, op cit, fn 27.

35 (1971) 401 US 424.

36 For further discussion in the US context see Wilborn, The disparate impact model of discrimination: theory and limits' (1985) 34 American University L Rev 799.

37 See Steel v Post Office [1977] IRLR 288.

discrimination may be addressed only if the individual concerned is prepared to take on the burden of a legal action. Such an approach is clearly only capable of bringing about slow and piecemeal change, especially as the two parties concerned—usually the woman and her employer—are clearly not confronting each other on equal terms; the lack of legal aid exacerbates this situation. However, apart from bringing about general change by addressing itself to institutionalised discrimination, the administrative body created by the legislation can aid the individual and can undertake the investigation triggered off by an individual action.

Field of Application of the Sex Discrimination Act

The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (SDA) covers discrimination on a number of protected grounds: of sex, of marital status and of gender reassignment. The protection on grounds of sex applies equally to men. Section 3 covers discrimination on the grounds of marital status, but in this instance the comparison is between a single person and a married person of the same sex. The provision against marital discrimination is more circumscribed: it is confined to the employment field only and discrimination on the grounds of divorce or of being unmarried is not covered. Section 2A, which now prohibits discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment, is even more circumscribed; it only covers direct (not indirect) discrimination in employment and training and in relation to barristers (in Scotland, advocates). Pay-related discrimination on this ground is dealt with under the SDA, although such discrimination on grounds of sex is dealt with in the Equal Pay Act 1970 (EPA). In other words, the SDA covers only the non-pay-related aspects of employment discrimination on grounds of sex—the pay-related aspects fall within the EPA. As will be seen, this separation has added to the complexity of the substantive law, although the two statutes are intended to work together as a complete code.

The Act does not make discrimination on the three protected grounds generally illegal; it only outlaws it in the contexts in which it operates. Thus, a two-stage approach has been created; first, discrimination must be shown, and then that it falls within one of the contexts covered by the Act. The contexts are: employment (s 6), education (s 22) and the provision of goods and services (s 29). Section 29 was found to have a narrow application to public bodies by the House of Lords in Amin.³⁸ A number of public functions, including policing decisions, were excluded.

The prohibition of discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment arose from the findings of the ECJ in Case 13/14 P v S and Cornwall CC.³⁹ P had been dismissed from her employment on the ground that she was a transsexual. Her application under the Sex Discrimination Act failed as it was found that transsexuals were outside the terms of the Act. It was argued in the European Court of Justice that her case fell within the Equal Treatment Directive. The decision of the European Court of Human Rights in *Rees v UK*⁴⁰ was relied upon by the European Court of Justice in deciding that transsexuals fall within the Directive. This was found on the basis that the Directive is simply the expression of the principle of equality, which is one of the fundamental principles of European Union law. It was found that where a person is dismissed on the basis that they have undergone or are about to undergo gender reassignment, he or she is being discriminated against in comparison with persons of the sex to which he or she was deemed to belong before undergoing gender reassignment. This ruling was given domestic effect in the Sex Discrimination (Gender Reassignment) Regulations 1999, which brought direct discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment within the SDA 1975 by introducing s 2A.⁴¹

38 [1983] 2 AC 818 HL. The decision partly relied on interpreting RRA 1976, s 75 as intended to limit the application of the Act in respect of public authorities.

39 Judgment of 30 April 1996; [1996] ECR I-2143; [1996] IRLR 347.

40 (1986) 9 EHRR 56.

However, the domestic implementation may be inadequate. In particular, the exclusion of indirect discrimination may mean that s 2A does not do enough to comply with the Equal Treatment Directive. As indicated above, an argument that the provisions of the SDA should be extended by purposive interpretation in order to comply with the Directive could be strengthened by taking account both of s 3 of the HRA and of the general requirement under EC law to use the Convention as a source of general principle. Further, since Directives have vertical effect, they can, if sufficiently precise, clear and unconditional, be enforced against State bodies—emanations of the State. Thus, if necessary, a claim for indirect discrimination on this ground could be brought against such a body relying only on the Directive.

Discrimination on grounds of race⁴²

It was apparent that the common law would not provide a sufficient remedy for racial discrimination. For example, in *Constantine v Imperial Hotels*⁴³ nominal damages only were awarded in respect of clear racial discrimination although the applicant had attempted to claim exemplary damages. However, the discriminatory effect of a contract or covenant could be taken into account by a court as a matter of public policy in reaching a decision,⁴⁴ while discriminatory words contained in a trust might, under certain circumstances, be struck out, although the courts have tended to be reluctant to do this.⁴⁵ The discriminatory nature of foreign legislation might also be considered in determining its impact,⁴⁶ and this possibility still exists, although it is not of great significance. There seemed to be a clear need for further measures and, therefore, the first Race Relations Act (RRA) was passed in 1965, although it was soon superseded by the 1968 Act and then by the 1976 Act. The 41 SI 1999/1102; see the Government's Consultation Paper Legislation Regarding Discrimination on Grounds of Transsexualism in Employment; for discussion see McColgan, op cit, fn 1, pp 382–86 and see further Griffiths, E (1999) J Civ Lib, July, p 230.

42 General reading: Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 4th edn, 1995, Chapter 10; Lustgarten, L, The Legal Control of Racial Discrimination, 1980; Gregory, op cit, fn 1; Bourne, C and Whitmore, J, Race and Sex Discrimination, 1993; Feldman, op cit, fn 1, pp 874–79; Lustgarten, L, 'Racial inequality and the limits of law' (1986) 49 MLR 68–85; Bindman, 'Reforming the Race Relations Act' (1985) 135 NLJ 1136–38 and 1167–69; Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 17; McColgan, op cit, fn 1; Millar and Phillips, op cit, fn 27; Deakin and Morris, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 6; von Prondzynski and Richards, op cit, fn 1; Barnard and Hepple, op cit, fn 27; Hepple, Cousseay and Choudhury, op cit, fn 1.

43 [1944] KB 693.

44 On public policy at common law see Cretney (1968) 118 NLJ 1094; Garner (1972) 35 MLR 478.

45 Re Lysaght [1966] Ch 191 (in order to qualify for a scholarship under the trust a student had to be male, British and could not be Catholic or Jewish; this was not found contrary to public policy, but as the college which was to be a trustee refused to discriminate on religious grounds, those words were struck out); for comment see (1966) 82 LQR 10.

46 See Oppenheimer v Cattermole [1975] 2 WLR 347.

1976 Act is much more far reaching than its predecessors; under the 1968 Act, an individual had to complain to the Race Relations Board rather than take the complaint to court. The 1976 Act was modelled on the Sex Discrimination Act; it makes discrimination a statutory tort, follows the same pattern as regards direct and indirect discrimination and sets up the Commission for Racial Equality with a similar role to the Equal Opportunities Commission,⁴⁷ set up under the 1975 Act. It also operated initially in the same contexts and uses the same terms; therefore, decisions under one of the two statutes affect the other. The Act provides a remedy for direct or indirect discrimination on the grounds of colour, race, nationality or ethnic or national origins.

The discrimination must occur within the areas covered by the Act: employment, education, housing or the provision of goods and services. Section 20 of the RRA, which covers the provision of goods and services, was found to have a narrow application to public functions owing to the decision in Amin.⁴⁸ Thus, areas of governmental activity were excluded from the ambit of the Act. The prison service was not covered, nor were a number of police activities such as exercising stop and search powers or investigating offences. Thus the RRA, like the SDA, had an inconsistent and arbitrary application to the police. Until its amendment in 2000, the RRA could not be used to challenge allegedly discriminatory practices in the criminal justice system except in the sphere it covered, including employment. Thus, for example, racial discrimination in a prison resulting in refusal of employment would be covered,⁴⁹ but other discriminatory practices within the criminal justice system, such as racially discriminatory arrests or stops and searches, fell outside the Act.

However, the decision in *Farah v Comr of Police of the Metropolis*⁵⁰ made it clear that racial bias in policing decisions will fall within the Act although, importantly, it did not create vicarious liability in respect of such decisions. Farah, a Somali citizen and refugee who was 17 at the time, was attacked by a group of white teenagers who set a dog on her and injured her. She summoned police help by telephone; when the police arrived, they made no attempt to arrest her attackers, but arrested her and charged her with affray, assault and causing unnecessary suffering to a dog. No evidence was offered when she appeared to answer the charges, and she was acquitted. She brought an action for damages against the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, alleging false imprisonment, assault and battery and malicious prosecution. She included in the statement of claim an allegation that the conduct of the police officers amounted to unlawful racial discrimination. Judge Harris refused to strike out the allegation of racial discrimination. He also allowed her to amend that part of her claim, so that she alleged that the officers were acting as the commissioner's agents and had discriminated against her on grounds of race in both failing to afford her the protection which would have been afforded to white victims of crime and in bringing 47 See below, pp 1049–52 for consideration of the role of both bodies.

48 [1983] 2 AC 818 HL. The decision partly relied on interpreting RRA 1976, s 75 as intended to limit the application of the Act in respect of public authorities.

49 RRA 1976, Part II; in Alexander v Home Office [1988] 1 WLR 968, CA (the plaintiff, a prisoner, was refused work in prison kitchen owing to racial stereotyping).

50 [1997] 1 All ER 289.

the proceedings against her. The commissioner appealed against the refusal to strike out the allegation of racial discrimination.

The Court of Appeal found that two important issues fell to be determined. First, whether a police officer came within s 20 of the RRA 1976, which prohibits racial discrimination in the provision of services and, secondly, if he did, whether his Chief Officer of Police would be answerable in law for any breaches of the Act he might have committed. The court held that an officer providing protection to a citizen was providing a service within the section. Policy reasons against such a conclusion, including the possibility that the police would have to face numerous claims of race discrimination, were rejected as outweighed by the need to provide a remedy for a citizen who had suffered discrimination in a situation where she was in dire need of protection. Moreover, nothing in the Act made police officers immune from claims of racial discrimination. However, the court found that the Commissioner was not vicariously liable for the acts of the officers. Section 53 appeared to deny vicarious liability except in so far as provided for by the Act. Her claim against the individual officers for discrimination was out of time. The appeal was allowed and therefore her claim of discrimination had to be struck from the statement of claim. This decision was to be welcomed as making it clear that the possibility of compensation for racially discriminatory police actions and decisions was available. However, it also hedged this possibility around with restrictions, since it denied the possibility of vicarious liability.

However, after amendment by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 (which inserted s 19B into the 1976 Act), discrimination (direct or indirect) by a public authority in carrying out its functions is brought within the ambit of the Act. This amendment of the RRA was effected to implement Recommendation No 11 of the MacPherson Report into the death of Stephen Lawrence,⁵¹ after the MacPherson inquiry found 'institutional racism' in the Metropolitan Police, which had resulted in significant failures in the investigation of his death at the hands of racists. The term 'public authority' is to be interpreted consistently (although not identically) with the interpretation afforded to the same term under the HRA.⁵² Law enforcement by public authorities is now brought within the statutory framework for the prohibition of discrimination, thus closing the gap that was dramatically and disturbingly highlighted by the Stephen Lawrence case. Thus, the actions of the police in investigating crime are now covered by the RRA, as are other functions of public authorities. Section 4 of the 2000 Act inserts ss 76A and B into the RRA, providing that chief officers of police will be vicariously liable for the actions of their officers.

However, there are still exceptions to the coverage of the Act, created by the amendments. Section 19D exempts 'any act done for the purpose of making a decision about instituting criminal proceedings'. This formulation leaves open the possibility that acts remote from that decision, including the uncovering of evidence, are covered by the RRA.

The amendments to the RRA now represent one of a number of important differences between the statutory scheme covering discrimination on grounds of 51 Cm 4262-1. For discussion of the amendments, see O'Conneide, C, 'The Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000' [2001] PL 220.

52 See Chapter 4, pp 157-61.

sex and that covering the ground of race. The RRA creates the most comprehensive domestic scheme that this chapter considers since the provisions under the RRA outlawing discrimination in private clubs of 25 members or more, segregation and 'transferred discrimination'—discrimination on the grounds of another's race—have no counterparts under the SDA. The 'functions of a public authority' head is not replicated in the SDA. Employment covers 'pay', thus ensuring a less complex scheme than that applying in respect of sex discrimination claims. The influence of the EU is less important, although rulings of the European Court of Justice and of the domestic courts taking EU provisions into account affect concepts under the RRA. It should be noted that the EU has not ignored race discrimination and has passed a number of resolutions and declarations giving guidance to Member States,⁵³ but its influence in this area, although beginning to develop, is at a much earlier stage than its influence on sex discrimination. As indicated above, the Race Directive will bring race discrimination directly within the ambit of EU law. And aside from EU provisions, the UK is a party to a number of international declarations on race discrimination and xenophobia which, although not part of UK law, may influence it.⁵⁴

The Disability Discrimination Act 1995⁵⁵

The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (DDA) is modelled to an extent on the SDA and RRA schemes; the DDA adopted the concepts of direct discrimination and victimisation used in the SDA and RRA and a body was set up to promote and monitor the scheme, although it initially had an advisory role only. But the DDA scheme differs in some important respects from the earlier schemes. In general, it is narrower in scope than the earlier legislation, in terms both of its application and of the forms of discrimination covered. Originally, the Act only applied to employers who employ more than 20 people. It is now applicable to those employing more than 15 (s 7(1)).⁵⁶ Thus, many small businesses will still fall outside its scope. Most significantly, the Act does not import the concept of indirect discrimination in its full sense, although, as indicated below, the concept of direct discrimination is broader than that used in the SDA and RRA. Also, direct discrimination can be justified; this is understandable, within limits, in this context. Unlike the provisions against race and sex discrimination, the Act is incomplete—it relies on being fleshed out by non-statutory rules.⁵⁷ Under one of the more significant SIs, tribunals are bound to take into account the Disability Discrimination Code of Practice, which came into force in December 1996.⁵⁸

53 See Resolutions, Reports and Declarations of the Council of the EC: Resolution of 16 July 1985 (OJ C186 26.7.85, p 3); Declaration of 11 June 1986 (OJ C158 25.6.86, p 1); Resolution of 24 May 1988 (OJ C177 6.7.88, p 5); Council Decision 88/348/EEC (OJ L158 25.6.88); Eurigenis Report 1991. For criticism of the EU stance on racism, see Bindman (1994) 144 NLJ 352; see also Lester, op cit, fn 8.

54 European Convention on Human Rights, Arts 3 and 14; International Labour Organisation; International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights; the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, para 2; International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

55 For discussion, see McColgan, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 8; 'Interpreting the Disability Discrimination Act (1998) 80 EOR 14; Doyle, B, 'Enabling legislation or dissembling law? The DDA 1995' (2001) 64 MLR 7; Butterworth's Discrimination Law Handbook, 2000; Clayton and Tomlinson, op cit, fn 1, pp 1230–33.

56 By 2004, this figure is to be reduced to apply to employers who employ more than two employees.

57 See SI 1996/1996; SI 1996/2793; SI 1996/1836.

58 Under SI 1996/1996.

The Act adopts what may be termed a 'medical' as opposed to a 'social' model of discrimination. Under a medical model, the impairment is located in the person in question; he or she must claim to be significantly impaired in his or her ability to perform certain tasks in order to come within the scope of the legislation. Under a social model, the impairment depends on the attitudes of others as reflected in the arrangements for, for example, access to buildings. Thus, a person who has, for example, muscular dystrophy and has as a result significant mobility difficulties might well have no difficulty in performing a managerial job which depends on skills unrelated to mobility, so long as no obstacles are placed in her way in the form, for example, of steps which make it difficult for her to enter her own workplace. If a lift or other means of access were provided, she would not be impaired in her ability to perform the job. Thus, the impact of her disability would be determined by social factors such as the willingness of the management to install a lift, rather than by the inherent nature of her disability.

Field of application

The DDA 1995 does not make discrimination on the ground of disability generally illegal; as with the sex and race legislation, it only outlaws it in the contexts in which it operates: employment (Part II), disposal of premises (s 22) and the provision of goods and services (s 19). The Act was also amended and extended by the Special Education Needs and Disability Act 2001 to place duties on schools and on the providers of post-16 education and related services. The Act applies to all employers who have 15 or more employees, but it excludes a number of occupations, including the police, firefighters, barristers, prison officers, the armed forces, and those working on ships or aircraft.⁵⁹ Unlike the provisions in respect of employment, which do not apply at present to businesses with fewer than 15 staff, the service provisions apply across the board. These provisions require traders not to refuse service to disabled people or to offer an inferior service. The Special Education Needs and Disability Act 2001, which adds s 28A to the DDA, covering schools, and s 28R covering further and higher education, leaves the full field of application to orders made by the Secretary of State in respect of coverage of certain educational institutions under s 28R(6)(c) and in respect of the services covered within schools under s 28A(3).

The Act creates complex definitions as to those who are covered by it. Under s 1(1) the person concerned must have 'a physical or mental impairment which has a substantial and long term adverse effect on his ability to carry out normal day to day activities'. The definition includes within its scope progressive diseases such as multiple sclerosis or forms of dystrophy which may not currently be of great significance in terms of impairment, but are likely to become so. The DDA also covers those who have had a disability in the past, whether or not they have recovered (s 2(1)). Thus a three stage approach has been created; first it must be shown that the applicant is 'disabled' within the definition, then discrimination must be shown, and then that it falls within one of the contexts covered by the Act. Further, as discussed below,⁶⁰ a duty of adjustment is placed on various bodies under the Act.

⁵⁹ See below for consideration of certain exclusions.

⁶⁰ See pp 1043–45.

Coming into force in stages

The employment-related provisions came into force in December 1996. The first part of Part III of the Act, the provision of access to goods, facilities and services, also came into force in December 1996. The second part of Part III of the Act, the duty to make reasonable adjustments in the context of the provision of access to goods, facilities and services, did not come into force until 1 October 1999. The third stage of Part III will not come into force until 2004 and will require traders to make physical alterations to premises to facilitate equal service, typically by installing lifts or ramps. The provisions regarding education added to the DDA in 2001 will come into force as appointed by the Secretary of State.

3 DIRECT DISCRIMINATION ON GROUNDS OF SEX, MARITAL STATUS, GENDER REASSIGNMENT, RACE OR DISABILITY

Sex discrimination

The concept of direct discrimination on grounds of sex governed by s 1(1)(a) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 embodies the formal equality approach. It involves showing that the applicant has been less favourably treated than a man has been or would be treated. There is little guidance in the Act as to the basis for comparison; s 5(3) merely provides that there must be no material difference between the situations of the man and the woman. Thus, the comparison is between a woman and a comparable man. It should be noted that it is possible for the applicant to compare herself with a hypothetical man; the issue is not whether a man or a woman receives a benefit, but whether the woman would have been better treated if she had been a man.

The test can be broken down into three stages. First, the woman must show that there has been differentiation in the treatment afforded to herself and a man (or a hypothetical man). Motive is irrelevant; the question at this stage is merely whether a woman has been treated one way and a man another. Secondly, she must show that her treatment has been less favourable and thirdly, following the ruling of the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC,⁶¹ that there is a causal relationship between her sex and the treatment; in other words that but for her sex, she would have been treated as favourably as a man was or would have been. Following *Birmingham CC ex p EOC*⁶² it is not necessary to show that the less favourable treatment is accorded through an intention to discriminate: motive is irrelevant.

The plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the differential treatment was on grounds of sex and not for some neutral reason. She is always likely to find difficulty in discharging this burden of proof, as the ruling in *Saunders v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC*⁶³ suggests. The applicant applied for a job as a golf professional and was asked questions at the interview which were prima facie discriminatory. She was asked, for example, whether she thought she would be able to control unruly male players and whether she considered the job unglamorous. She was not appointed, although she was somewhat better qualified than the man who was. The Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) held that had her qualifications been substantially better than those of the appointee, that would have raised a prima facie inference of discrimination which the employer would have had to rebut by giving a satisfactory explanation. It was found that the nature of the questions, taking all the circumstances into account, did not of themselves raise a sufficient inference.

61 [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607; [1989] IRLR 318; [1989] 3 WLR 122; the 'but for' test applied in James was put forward by Lord Goff in the House of Lords in Birmingham CC ex p EOC (1989) 18 ILJ 247; for comment, see Ellis (1989) 52 MLR 710.

62 [1989] AC 1155; [1989] 1 All ER 769.

63 [1978] IRLR 362.

In *Khanna v MOD*⁶⁴ it was found that the evidential burden would shift only when the evidence was all on one side, but this was clarified by the finding in *Dornan v Belfast CC*⁶⁵ that once the woman has raised a prima facie inference of discrimination, the burden will shift to the employer to show that the differentiation occurred on non-discriminatory grounds. In other words, although the plaintiff began the case bearing the burden of proof, it might shift to the defendant once a certain stage is reached. Thus, the formal burden of proof remained on the plaintiff, but once it appeared that a minimum threshold of proof of discrimination is established, the burden shifted to the defendant. Now, under the Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001 the complainant need not prove her case, merely the facts of the case, from which the court of tribunal should draw inferences of discrimination if the employer does not provide a satisfactory explanation.⁶⁶

Dismissals and other detrimental action on the ground of pregnancy might appear to be discriminatory, but the wording of s 1(1) may not allow such action to fall readily within the scope of direct discrimination because in making the comparison between a woman and a man it is required under s 5(3) that 'the relevant circumstances in the one case are the same or not materially different in the other'. Dismissal on grounds of pregnancy was covered by s 60 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, which provided that if a woman were dismissed because she was pregnant then the dismissal was automatically unfair, but in order to rely on this an employee had to have been employed for two years; where this was not the case, the employee had to seek to show that the 1975 Act applied. Pregnancy dismissals were regulated from October 1994 by ss 23–25 and Schedules 2 and 3 of the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act (TURERA) 1993,⁶⁷ and now are regulated by s 99 of the Employment Rights Act 1996. Under s 99, such dismissal will be unfair from the date on which employment begins. Further, under s 47C of the 1996 Act, as amended by the Employment Relations Act 1999, an employee has the right not to be subjected to a detriment done for a prescribed reason. Such reason is prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State and relates to pregnancy, maternity, childbirth, and maternity leave.

Since pregnancy dismissals were therefore only recently addressed under other legislation, applicants sought to rely on the SDA.⁶⁸ The decisions discussed below could now be relied upon in an action in which it was argued that other employment

64 [1981] ICR 653, EAT.

65 [1990] IRLR 179. See, further [1990] IRLR 161.

66 See fn 9, above. The Regulations came into force on 12 October 2001.

67 The TURERA sections mentioned implemented the EC Pregnancy Directive 92/85.

68 See Fredman, S, 'A difference with distinction: pregnancy and parenthood re-assessed' (1994) 110 LQR 106.

discrimination based on maternity had arisen. Section 47 of the 1996 Act would provide a further possible argument in such circumstances. A pregnancy dismissal was at issue in Turley v Allders,⁶⁹ since the applicant did not have the requisite period of continuous employment, she sought to rely on the SDA. The EAT held that there was no male equivalent to a pregnant woman and therefore, as no comparison could be made, the action must fail. However, a method of making the comparison was found in a later EAT decision, Hayes v Malleable WMC;⁷⁰ it was found that it could be made between a pregnant woman and a man with a long term health problem. Thus, it would be direct discrimination if a woman was dismissed on grounds of pregnancy where a man needing the same period of absence through illness would not have been dismissed. This analogy has not been well received;⁷¹ it has been pointed out that pregnancy is a healthy, normal state, not an illness;⁷² moreover, it may be planned, unlike an unexpected illness, and in any event there will normally be far more notice before the absence takes place than there would be in a case of illness. Commentators have found the comparison between a pregnant woman and a diseased man inherently distasteful. It is also highly disadvantageous to women, a very high percentage of whom may become pregnant at some time during their working life and in particular between the ages of 20 and 35 (the time when women are most likely to become pregnant), while the percentage of men likely to take around two or more months off work during those years owing to an illness or accident is likely to be far lower.

The Hayes approach will no longer be followed after certain decisions of the European Court of Justice. In *Dekker v VJV Centrum*⁷³ the court found that a woman who was not appointed to a post because she was pregnant at the time of the interview, although she was considered to be the best candidate, was the victim of direct discrimination. *Webb v Emo Air Cargo (UK) Ltd*⁷⁴ concerned the dismissal of the claimant after it was found that she was pregnant. She had been recruited to replace an employee going on maternity leave, but had then discovered herself to be pregnant and therefore (it seemed) unavailable for duties in the period required. The question was whether her dismissal constituted direct discrimination within the terms of s 1(1)(a) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, in the light of Community law. The Court of Appeal continued the Hayes approach in determining that if a man with a medical condition as nearly comparable as possible (with the same practical effect upon availability to do the job) with pregnancy would also have been dismissed, then the dismissal of the woman was not sex discrimination. Thus, the plaintiff who was, owing to pregnancy, unavailable for duties in the period required, could be dismissed without infringing the SDA because a diseased man who was similarly unavailable at the relevant time would also have been dismissed. The argument was therefore rejected that since only a woman can be pregnant, it followed that a woman who is dismissed for any reason related to her pregnancy is 70 [1985] ICR 703. See also Brown v Rentokil Ltd [1992] IRLR 302; Shomer v B and R Residential Lettings Ltd [1992] IRLR 317. It may be noted that dismissal on grounds of pregnancy seems to be increasing. The EOC cited a number of such instances in its 1991 report.

69 [1980] ICR 66.

71 See Proposals of the Equal Opportunities Commission: Equal Treatment for Men and Women, 1988, Chapter 2.

72 Lacey (1987) 14 JLS 411, p 417.

73 [1991] IRLR 27; [1990] ECR I-3941.

74 [1993] 1 WLR 49, HL; [1992] 1 CMLR 793, CA.

dismissed because of her sex and thus discriminated against. The House of Lords favoured the approach of the Court of Appeal, but since it considered that the relevant rulings of the European Court of Justice did not indicate clearly whether the dismissal would be regarded as based on pregnancy or on unavailability at the relevant time, it referred the following question to the court:

Is it discrimination on grounds of sex contrary to the Equal Treatment Directive for an employer to dismiss a female employee:

- (a) whom it engaged for the specific purpose of replacing another female employee during the latter's forthcoming maternity leave,
- (b) when very shortly after appointment the employer discovers that the appellant herself will be absent on maternity leave during the maternity period of the other employee and the employer dismisses her because it needs the jobholder to be at work during that period, and
- (c) had the employer known of the pregnancy of the appellant at the date of appointment she would not have been appointed, and
- (d) the employer would similarly have dismissed a male employee engaged for this purpose who required leave of absence at the relevant time for medical or other reasons?

The European Court of Justice found that the plaintiff should not be compared with a man unavailable for work for medical or other reasons, since pregnancy is not in any way comparable with pathological conditions. The court then found that, since the plaintiff had been employed permanently, her dismissal could not be justified on the ground of inability to fulfil a fundamental condition of her employment contract because her inability to perform the work was purely temporary. In other words, it could not be said that she had been taken on solely to cover a maternity leave. The court further found that the protection of Community law for pregnant women could not be dependent on the question whether the woman's presence at work during the maternity leave period is essential to the undertaking in which she is employed. Thus, dismissal of the plaintiff clearly constituted sex discrimination, contrary to the Equal Treatment Directive. (When the House of Lords reconsidered the case in the light of these findings, it allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the IT to consider the award of compensation to the applicant (Webb (No 2)).⁷⁵

In a similar decision, Habermann-Beltermann,⁷⁶ rather than relying directly upon unavailability, the employer sought to rely upon the statutory exclusion (with criminal sanctions)⁷⁷ of pregnant women from night work, which 'caused' Habermann-Beltermann's temporary unavailability for work. The court's decision that the statute could not justify Habermann-Beltermann's dismissal, or the termination of her contract, reflects a refusal to focus upon a male norm or to pander to the argument that the continuation of the employment relationship in such circumstances produces undue financial burdens upon the employer.⁷⁸ However, in both Habermann-Beltermann and Webb, the court refused to confront clearly the 75 [1994] QB 718; [1994] 4 All ER 115; [1994] 3 WLR 941. Webb was applied in O'Neill (1996) The Times, 7 June in relation to a pregnancy dismissal. Following Webb, the dismissal was found to be unlawful.

76 [1994] ECR I-1657.

77 The German Mütterschutzgesetz (MSchG), para 8(1), which prohibits the employment of pregnant or breast-feeding women on night work.

78 See the Opinion of the Advocate General, para 16.

question whether any adverse treatment of women connected with pregnancy amounts to sex discrimination. In both judgments, the crucial fact upon which the court relied was that the employment contracts in question were of a permanent and not fixed term nature. The decision of the court in both cases was based upon the mismatch between the period for which the employee would be unavailable and the period for which she had been employed (indefinitely). This was a very significant development from the stark statement of principle in Dekker. The court's conclusion that the termination of Habermann-Beltermann's contract was not 'on the ground of pregnancy' but by reason of the statutory provision in the MSchG, opens the door to a narrower interpretation of the Dekker ruling than that ruling seemed at first to promise.⁷⁹ The result was that the court, unlike the Advocate General,⁸⁰ was able to avoid making explicit the point that a justification based on availability, with reference to market cost to the employer, would be by definition excluded in a case of direct discrimination on grounds of pregnancy, thereby, by implication, leaving it open in future cases.

Likewise, the ruling in Webb is not ultimately fully supportive of substantive equality since it leaves open the possibility of an apparently neutral explanation for pregnancy dismissals: that a pregnant woman recruited on a temporary basis may justifiably be dismissed if unable through unavailability to fulfil the purpose for which she was recruited. The argument is therefore left open that if a temporarily employed man or hypothetical man would have been dismissed, if unable through unavailability to satisfy a purpose for which he was employed, a woman so unavailable through pregnancy, who has been dismissed, has not been discriminated against. Therefore, by the recruitment of temporary staff, the employer can safeguard its market position. Elements of the ruling, however, suggest a desire to go further and it is in this sense internally inconsistent: it asserts that in general, to dismiss a pregnant woman through unavailability at a time when she is essential to a purpose of the undertaking can never be justifiable, but it leaves open the possibility that the employer can do just that so long as she was recruited on a temporary basis specifically for that purpose.

Thus, both judgments impliedly accept that adverse treatment flowing from pregnancy is susceptible to justification. Therefore, an employer may be able to contend successfully that not only market costs associated with unavailability but also other costs arising from pregnancy,⁸¹ not the pregnancy itself, were the 'cause' of the dismissal of a pregnant woman. It is even possible that such an argument could be used in relation to a permanently employed woman, since the court's mismatch argument is not so readily applicable to a justification based on the other costs associated with pregnancy. This is not to contend that the court would necessarily accept such assertions by employers, merely to note that, in principle, 79 This part of Habermann-Beltermann is similar to the court's ruling in Hertz that dismissal through absences caused by illness, where those absences arise outside the protected period of maternity leave, is permissible, even where the illness is pregnancy-related. See Shaw, J, 'Pregnancy discrimination in sex discrimination' (1991) 16 EL Rev 313–20.

80 Opinion of the Advocate General, para 16.

81 Eg, adjustment of working conditions, time off for ante-natal examinations, removal of hazardous substances from the working environment or other measures of special protection for pregnant workers required, eg, by the Pregnancy and Maternity Directive, Council Directive 92/85/EEC.

the judgments leave open these possibilities. The effect of the judgments may be to disadvantage women doubly: they may have to take the risk that they will have no remedy if employed on a temporary basis, but dismissed for reasons connected with pregnancy,⁸² and they may tend to find that they are more likely to be offered temporary contracts, thereby undermining their bargaining power in the market still further.

In both judgments, the court could have rejected a formal equality interpretation of the legislation in favour of completely excluding the use of unavailability through pregnancy or the cost of pregnancy as a justification,⁸³ thereby affording recognition to the real situation of women. In support of this, it should be pointed out that the real situation of women which may mean that they are unavailable for work for a period is only biologically determined in so far as the bearing of children is concerned; in terms of caring for children, it is legally and socially determined. The legal and social factors in question which found the perception that pregnancy, maternity leave and child care are to be viewed as one single indivisible burden to be shouldered by women alone, arise, it is submitted, from a sexually stereotyped view of the child care responsibilities of males and females. Thus, unavailability for work arising, or apparently arising,⁸⁴ from pregnancy, maternity leave and child care is not a sex neutral justification for adverse treatment.

At the least, the court could have achieved a compromise somewhat more satisfactory in terms of promotion of substantive equality than the one it does achieve, by framing its judgment in terms of the proportion of the period for which the woman was employed during which she would be unavailable. Thus, a woman employed, for example, on a temporary three year contract in order to fulfil a particular purpose who would be unavailable for three months on maternity leave and therefore unable to fulfil it would be said nevertheless to be available for a substantial part of the period. Instead, the court chose to confine its ruling to those employed for an indefinite period.

As indicated above, under s 99 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (ERA) a woman is protected from dismissal on grounds of pregnancy and under s 71 of the ERA, as amended, all women have an automatic right to 18 weeks' maternity leave. If a woman has one year's continuous service, she has a right to an additional period of leave which ends after the 29th week after the start of the week in which birth occurred.⁸⁵ Compensation under the ERA is much lower than that which was available under the SDA.

82 So long as the context allows the dismissal to be characterisable as owing to unavailability and therefore inability to satisfy a particular purpose.

83 The argument for so doing was put succinctly by Stevens J in a dissenting US judgment: commenting on a rule allowing adverse treatment of women for reasons connected with pregnancy, he said: 'By definition such a rule discriminates on grounds of sex, for it is the capacity to become pregnant which primarily differentiates the female from the male.' General Electric Co v Gilbert (1976) 429 US 126, pp 161–62.

84 It appeared that no attempt was made to ascertain the period for which the plaintiff would actually be unavailable. See Webb v EMO Air Cargo [1992] 4 All ER 929, HL, p 932, per Lord Keith. It is not mandatory that employees should be absent from work for the whole period of maternity leave or that, during maternity leave, they should be out of communication with the workplace.

85 ERA, s 73 and the Parental Leave and Maternity etc. Regulations 1999, regs 5 and 7. Previously, she had a right to return to work within 29 weeks of the birth under the Employment Protection Consolidation Act 1978, s 39(1)(b). For further discussion of the current position see McColgan, A, 'Family friendly frolics' (2000) 29ILJ 125.

Detrimental action on grounds of pregnancy other than dismissal (such as demotion or failure to appoint or to promote) will fall within the Webb approach and it is therefore unfortunate that the European Court of Justice failed to rule clearly that such action would be direct sex discrimination. A possible approach would be to treat detrimental action on grounds of pregnancy as indirect rather than direct discrimination on the ground that a condition is being applied to all employees not to need certain periods of time off work. As argued above, this is very likely to have an adverse impact on women and arguably cannot be justified using the current tests for justification (see below). This is not to suggest that this would be a satisfactory approach: the use of equality law in relation to pregnancy is flawed since it relies on comparisons with men rather than simply acknowledging, as pregnancy-related legislation does, that proper provision for maternity is good employment practice. As will be seen below, there have been a number of instances in which women, especially single parents, have been forced to address the issue of flexible working—in the sense of working hours that fit in with child care—by seeking to use the concept of indirect discrimination. In many ways this attempt has highlighted the problem of using this concept in the way that the early (and, to an extent, also the later) decisions on pregnancy-as-direct-sex-discrimination did.

In discussing pregnancy, it must be borne in mind that the legislation relating to maternity leave enshrines straightforward direct discrimination on grounds of sex since it relates only to women. A preferable approach would be to offer a more generous parental leave entitlement to parents rather than only to mothers, to be divided between the partners as they saw fit. Parental leave has been available in most of the EU Member States⁸⁶ prior to the implementation of the Parental Leave Directive, implemented by the Parental Leave and Maternity etc Regulations.⁸⁷ The Regulations allow for three months' unpaid leave for any person having responsibility for a child until it is five. This is in addition to maternity leave provision. Section 57A of the ERA also allows for reasonable time off for carers. The take up of parental leave is clearly likely to be low since it is unpaid, while take up under s 57A will be slow, although it will increase since it applies only to children born after 19 December 1999. The five-year cut off point under s 57A is also very grudging.

At present, women are doubly disadvantaged: on becoming parents they have in effect no choice but to be the partner that takes leave, but they may be viewed by employers as less reliable or less committed owing to this fact. Even women who do not wish to have children may experience discrimination on this ground since, at the point of appointment to a post, the possibility that they may have children and therefore take leave may be covertly, even unconsciously, held against them. At present, as indicated by the provision for parental leave, recognition, of a slow and reluctant nature, of the responsibilities of fathers is occurring⁸⁸ and if flexible 86 For details see McColgan, op cit, fn 1, pp 378–79.

87 The Parental Leave and Maternity etc Regulations 1999 SI 1999/3312 were passed to implement the Directive.

88 The proposals under the Green Paper on Parental Rights 2001 which propose the introduction of paid paternity leave and 26 weeks' adoptive leave are limited to parents or disabled children and adoptive parents. The Government still opposes paid parental leave.

working hours are eventually introduced as a right they are likely to be applicable to both parents.⁸⁹ Without further change in this direction the problems associated with the legally enshrined expectation that some women will damage their career for their home life, while some men will conversely damage their home life to further their career, will continue. These include the likelihood that some women will forgo having children, and that some of those who do may suffer employment detriment, including periods without work, leading to poverty and insecurity for themselves and their children, and severely affecting them after they reach pensionable age.⁹⁰ At present, some employers recognise that many employees have children and that seeking to enable them to continue at work without suffering stress is good practice that makes business sense, since skills and training are not lost to the company and productivity is enhanced. A company which could only or mainly rely on those without parental responsibilities would clearly be impoverished in terms of the pool of talent it could rely on. But the stance of the current government in seeking to enhance opportunities to achieve work/family balance, while showing greater imagination and far-sightedness than the previous one, has so far been hesitant and reluctant. This issue is considered further below, in relation to indirect discrimination on grounds of sex.

Discrimination on grounds of marital status

The concept of direct discrimination on grounds of marital status is governed by s 3(1)(a) of the SDA 1975. Under s 3(1)(a), the applicant must show that he or she has been less favourably treated on grounds of marital status than a single person of the same sex has been or would be treated. There is little guidance in the Act as to the method of making the comparison; s 5(3) merely provides that there must be no material difference between the situations of an unmarried and a married person. As with discrimination on grounds of sex, it is possible for the applicant to compare him or herself with a hypothetical single person. The test can be broken down into three stages. First, the married person must show that there has been differentiation in the treatment afforded to him or herself and a single person (or a hypothetical single person). Motive is irrelevant. Secondly, he or she must show that the treatment has been less favourable and thirdly, following the ruling of the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC,⁹¹ that there is a causal relationship between his or her marital status and the treatment; in other words that but for her marital status, she would have been treated as favourably as a single person was or would have been. The plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the differential treatment was on grounds of marital status and not for some neutral reason.

89 The proposals under the Green Paper on Parental Rights 2001 include the possibility of an entitlement to reduced hours working for both parents. See below, pp 1014–15 for discussion of some of the current measures relating to the work/life balance.

90 See TUC Submissions to the House of Commons Social Security Committee, June 1999 (see TUC website: www.tuc.org.uk).

91 [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607; [1989] IRLR 318; [1989] 3 WLR 122; the 'but for' test applied in James was put forward by Lord Goff in the House of Lords in Birmingham CC ex p EOC (1989) 18ILJ 247; for comment, see Ellis, op cit, fn 61.

Discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment

Under s 2A(1) of the SDA ‘person A discriminates against another person B if he treats B less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons, and does so on the ground that B intends to undergo, is undergoing, or has undergone gender reassignment’. This provision is based on the models already considered relating to discrimination on grounds of sex and marital status. Thus, the same steps must be taken and the plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the differential treatment was on grounds of gender reassignment. It must be pointed out that s 2A does not prohibit discrimination on grounds of transsexuality in a general sense⁹² and that therefore, there is a significant gap in the legislation which possibly could be filled by the use of purposive interpretation, as discussed above.⁹³

Race discrimination

Direct discrimination arises under s 1(1)(a) of the RRA and the test to be applied mirrors that under the SDA except that the unfavourable treatment in question must be on ‘racial grounds’. This means that discrimination on the grounds of someone else’s race is covered (transferred discrimination).⁹⁴ For example, if a waitress disobeyed an instruction to serve whites only and was dismissed for serving black customers, that would be discrimination on racial grounds.⁹⁵ The applicant must show that the group falls within the definition of racial grounds in s 3(1) of the Act which covers ‘colour, nationality, ethnic or national origins’ and a racial group is defined by reference to the same. Employment of the concept of ethnic origins widens the meaning of racial group and means that some religious groups may fall within it even though discrimination on the grounds of religion is not expressly covered. The leading case on the meaning of ‘racial group’ is Mandla v Dowell Lee.⁹⁶ The House of Lords had to consider whether Sikhs constituted an ethnic group and defined the term ‘ethnic group’ as one having a long shared history and a cultural tradition of its own, often, but not necessarily, associated with religious observances. On that definition Sikhs were a racial group and fell within s 3(1). This does not mean that a purely religious group will fall within s 3(1).

Using this definition it was found in *CRE v Dutton*⁹⁷ that gipsies, who have a shared history going back 700 years, may be termed a racial group and the definition was considered further in *Dawkins v Department of Environment*⁹⁸ in relation to the claim that Rastafarians constitute a racial group. It was found that the group in question must regard itself and be regarded by others as a distinct community by virtue of certain characteristics. The two essential characteristics were: a long shared 92 See Bavin v The NHS Trust Pensions Agency and Secretary of State for Health [1999] ICR 1192.

93 See pp 982–85.

94 It was confirmed in Showboat Entertainment Centre v Owens [1984] 1 WLR 384 that dismissal for refusal to obey an unlawful discriminatory instruction would fall within s 1(1)(a). See, to the same effect, Zarczyńska v Levy [1979] 1 WLR 125.

95 See Zarczyńska v Levy [1979] 1 WLR 125.

96 [1983] All ER 1062; [1983] 2 AC 548; for comment, see Beynon and Love (1984) 100 LQR 120; McKenna (1983) 46 MLR 759; Robilliard [1983] PL 348; Pagone (1984) 43 CLJ 218.

97 [1989] WLR 17; [1989] 1 All ER 306, CA. See also Souster v BBC Scotland [2001] IRLR 150.

98 [1993] ICR 517; for comment, see Parpworth (1993) 143 NLJ 610.

history of which the group was conscious, and a cultural tradition of its own including family and social customs. Lord Fraser considered that there could be other relevant, but not essential characteristics such as a common geographical origin, a common language, literature and religion. It was found that Rastafarians did have a strong cultural tradition which included a distinctive form of music and a distinctive hair style. However, the shared history of Rastafarians as a separate group only went back 60 years; it was not enough for them to look back to a time when they, in common with other Africans, were taken to the Caribbean. That was not sufficient to mark them out as a separate group since it was an experience shared with other Afro-Caribbeans. It appears, then, that this first step is complex and, it might seem, not entirely free from ambiguity. The exclusion of religious groups such as Muslims from the scope of the legislation is a matter which, it is suggested, should be reviewed, although they may fall within the indirect discrimination provisions, as indicated below. It should be noted that religious (but not racial) discrimination in employment may give rise to liability in Northern Ireland under the Fair Employment (NI) Act 1976.

A decision made on racial grounds means that the alleged discriminator made a decision influenced by racial prejudice, but according to the ruling in CRE ex p Westminster Council,⁹⁹ this does not mean that the discriminator must have a racial motive. The council wanted to employ a black man as a refuse collector, but withdrew the offer after pressure from the all-white work force. The Commission for Racial Equality (CRE) initiated a formal investigation and served a non-discrimination notice on the council. The council challenged the service of the notice by means of judicial review and sought certiorari on the basis that the CRE's findings were perverse—a finding that the CRE could not reasonably make. However, it was held that the decision was made on racial grounds, although it was found that the employer was not motivated by racial prejudice, but by the desire to avoid industrial unrest. Nevertheless, that was irrelevant; the decision was influenced by racial prejudice, although it was not the prejudice of the respondent.

Often, the hardest task in a direct discrimination case will be proving that unfavourable treatment was on grounds of race. However, the decision in *Dornan*¹⁰⁰ will apply in race discrimination cases and will mean that once an inference has been raised that discrimination has occurred, the burden of proof will shift to the employer to prove that the decision in question was made on other grounds. Raising such an inference may involve obtaining statistical material from the employer. In *West Midlands Passenger Transport Executive v Jaquant Singh*¹⁰¹ the applicant, who believed that he had been racially discriminated against in being refused promotion, wanted an order of discovery in respect of specific material held by his employers indicating the number of whites and non-whites appointed to senior posts. He claimed that if he were able to obtain access to the material, he would be able to invite an inference of direct racial discrimination. The employers resisted discovery. The Court of Appeal held that discovery would be ordered only where it could be termed necessary, but that it could be so termed since the employee had to establish a discernible pattern of treatment towards his racial group and there was no other way of raising the necessary inference.

99 [1984] IRLR 230, QBD.

100 [1990] IRLR 179. See above, p 995.

101 [1988] WLR 730.

Under s 1(2) of the Act it will be direct discrimination to maintain separate facilities for members of different races, even though they are equal in quality. However, if segregation grows up because of practices in the workforce, the employer will not come under an obligation to prevent it according to the ruling in *Pel Ltd v Modgill*¹⁰² although this seems to be in conflict with s 32 of the Act which provides that an employer will be liable for acts done by employees in the course of employment unless he or she has taken reasonable steps to prevent such acts. It would seem that the employer should come under some obligation to prevent segregation even if he or she did not instigate it. Moreover, even if segregation in itself is not unlawful, it may be that once a black/white divide in the workforce is established, a practice of treating the black group differently may develop, which will raise an irresistible inference of direct discrimination even though such treatment might not raise such an inference if applied to an individual black worker.¹⁰³

Disability discrimination

The concept of direct discrimination within the DDA 1995 involves showing, in relation to the fields covered, that the applicant has been less favourably treated for a reason related to her disability than a non-disabled person has been or would be treated. No guidance is given in the Act as to the basis for making a comparison between the two persons. It should be noted that it is possible for the applicant to compare herself with a hypothetical person; the issue is not whether a disabled or non-disabled person receives a benefit, but whether the disabled person would have been treated more favourably if she had not been disabled.

The test can be broken down into five stages. First, the applicant must show that she is disabled within the meaning of the Act. Then she must show that there has been differentiation in the treatment afforded to herself and a non-disabled person (or a hypothetical person). Third, she must show that her treatment has been less favourable. Fourth, the applicant can rely on the ruling of the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC,¹⁰⁴ the sex discrimination case mentioned above, in showing that there is a causal relationship between her disability and the treatment; in other words that but for her disability she would have been treated as favourably as a non-disabled person was or would have been. Following *Birmingham CC ex p EOC*¹⁰⁵ it is not necessary to show that the less favourable treatment is accorded by an intention to discriminate: motive is irrelevant. Fifth, the alleged discriminator can seek to justify the treatment.

The plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the differential treatment is on grounds of disability and not for some neutral reason. Discharging this burden of

102 [1980] IRLR 142.

103 See John Haggas plc (1993) The Guardian, 29 May: different, less favourable treatment of the black group was found to be direct discrimination.

104 [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607; [1989] IRLR 318; [1989] 3 WLR 122; the 'but for' test applied in James was put forward by Lord Goff in the House of Lords in Birmingham CC ex p EOC [1989] 18 ILJ 247; for comment, see Ellis, op cit, fn 61.

105 [1989] AC 1155; [1989] 1 All ER 769.

proof may be problematic, although it may sometimes be clearly apparent that the employment detriment was on grounds of disability, and attention will shift to considering whether the disability fell within the Act and whether the detriment can be justified. The decision in *Dornan*¹⁰⁶ will probably, however, apply in disability discrimination cases and will mean that once an inference has been raised that discrimination has occurred, the burden of proof will shift to the employer to prove that the decision in question was made on other grounds.

As indicated above, the DDA does not cover indirect discrimination, but the requirements regarding unfavourable treatment bear some resemblance to the indirect discrimination provisions relating to the other protected grounds, discussed below. The idea is to outlaw practices which, while neutral on their face as between disabled and non-disabled people, place some disabled people at a substantial disadvantage. The test under the DDA differs from that of the RRA or SDA in that the less favourable treatment can be justified. This is inevitable, since otherwise a mentally handicapped person with severe learning difficulties could win an action under the DDA in respect of failure to appoint her to, for example, a post as a teacher. Under s 5(3) of the DDA, the adverse treatment is justified only if the reason for it is material to the circumstances of the case and is substantial. Similar wording is used in s 28S(8) in relation to higher or further education, but the treatment can also be justified if it is to maintain academic standards or other 'prescribed' standards under s 28S(6). Under s 28S(7), less favourable treatment can also be justified if it is of a prescribed kind, and/or it occurs in prescribed circumstances. This was explained in Parliament as allowing for the making of rules which would have the effect of excluding a disabled person from a course where they would be unable because of their disability to undertake a profession which the course is designed to lead to.¹⁰⁷ Wording similar to that of s 5(3) is used in s 28B(7) in relation to schools, but less favourable treatment can also be justified if it is the result of a 'permitted form of selection' as defined in s 25 of the 2001 Act, inserting s 28Q(9) and (10) into the DDA. Essentially, this means that where a school operates a form of selection, either as a private school or under the relevant legislation (on grounds of ability or special aptitude), that may justifiably preclude the admission of a disabled pupil. The Code of Practice explains that less favourable treatment will be justified only if the reason for it relates to the individual circumstances in question and is not trivial or minor.¹⁰⁸

The test for justification in respect of the provision of goods and services differs from the key test in relation to employment or education. It consists of a list of instances in which the unfavourable treatment will be justified, under s 20(4). They include treatment necessary not to endanger health or safety, treatment necessary since otherwise the service could not be provided to members of the public, and differences in the cost of providing the service to the disabled person and to members of the public.

The test under s 5(3) (and the equivalent tests in relation to education) bears some similarity to the need to show justification for an indirectly discriminatory requirement under s 1(1)(b) of the SDA or RRA. But it is not as strict a test as that of 106 [1990] IRLR 179. See above, p 995.

107 Per Margaret Hodge, Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Education and Employment, Standing Committee B, Sixth Sitting, Col 206,3 April 2001.

108 Paragraph 4.6.

objective justification laid down in Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz,¹⁰⁹ which is discussed below. Under the Bilka test, conditions creating disparate impact will be justifiable if they amount to a means chosen for achieving an objective which correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate to that end and are necessary to that end. It was found that the DDA test differed from that in Bilka, and the difference between the tests was made clear by the EAT in Baynton v Saurus.¹¹⁰ It was determined that the individual circumstances in question must relate to both employer and employee and that a balancing of those circumstances can be carried out. In Heinz v Kendrick,¹¹¹ the EAT followed Baynton, but made it clear that once the test was satisfied, the disadvantage must be justified, even though this meant that justification could readily be found. It criticised the lowness of the threshold, but considered that Parliament alone could remedy it. In *Jones v Post Office*¹¹² Arden LJ said obiter that the term ‘substantial’ in s 5(3) of the DDA (equivalent to s 28S(8) of the DDA) means that the reason given by the employer (or educational institution) must carry real weight, but this does not mean that the employer must take into account all the latest research on the subject. The Court of Appeal in that case gave further elucidation. It was found that the reason given by the employer (or other) must fall within the band of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer.¹¹³

Section 5(5) of the DDA provides that if an employer is under a duty to make reasonable adjustment under s 6 (see below), but fails without justification to make any such adjustment, his treatment of that person cannot be justified, unless it would have been justified even if he had complied with the duty. This requirement is reiterated, with examples in the Code.¹¹⁴ Clearly, s 5(5) also implies that if the failure is justifiable or that the adjustment is made, but unfavourable treatment occurs, it is a fortiori possible to find that the treatment is justifiable.

It is suggested that, contrary to the findings of the EAT above, the Bilka test could be imported by interpretation of the meaning of both ‘material circumstances’ and ‘substantial’. As it is, it is unclear how the test is to be applied. For example, a requirement to drive on a daily basis in a job description or advertisement would not affect some disabled people, but would probably discourage a candidate with epilepsy. The employer would be under a duty to make reasonable adjustment under s 6 (see below). Assuming that the employer had failed to make any such adjustment, the question would then be first whether that failure was justified and, secondly, whether, once it was justified, or even if it was unjustified, the requirement to drive would have been justifiable even after the adjustment was made. In the circumstances, it might be possible to make adjustment by organising another person to drive the disabled person or by enabling her to use public transport. If such adjustment was not possible or would have placed an unreasonable burden on the employer, it would be justifiable not to make it. Alternatively, it might be possible to make some such adjustment which the employer refused to make, such as

109 [1986] IRLR 317; [1986] CMLR 701.

110 [1999] IRLR 604.

111 [2000] IRLR 141.

112 [2001] IRLR 384.

113 That test was also accepted as the proper one in Foley v Post Office [2000] ICR 1283.

114 Paragraph 4.7.

employing a person to drive the disabled person part of the week. In either circumstance, if the requirement to drive a car on a daily basis was found to be essential to the job, the less favourable treatment—not offering the job—would not breach the Act.

But, the questions to be asked in arriving at the conclusions that a failure to make reasonable adjustment was justified and that the unfavourable treatment was justified are unclear. In the circumstances envisaged, taking into account the employer's needs, it is unclear that it would be necessary to ask, for example, whether the undertaking had a real need, for instance, to broaden the geographical area which its sales executives could cover, or to ask whether the means used to answer to that need were appropriate or whether the requirement was necessary. The extent to which other means of achieving the same objective would have to be considered is also unclear. If such other means of achieving the objective were available or feasible, it could be seen as unnecessary to impose the condition that applicants have a driving licence. However, this fairly strict test for justification, based on Bilka, seems to have been rejected.

Harassment¹¹⁵

It has become clear under the SDA and RRA that if the employer subjects the applicant to employment detriment arising from harassment, such as a transfer from one establishment to another, this will be direct discrimination.¹¹⁶ Moreover, sexual or racial harassment appears to be a detriment in itself¹¹⁷ if it is discriminatory under s 6(6)(b) of the Sex Discrimination Act or s 4 of the Race Relations Act which speak of 'or subjecting [the employee] to any other detriment', even though it does not lead to other unfavourable action, so long as some employment disadvantage arises. In *De Souza v Automobile Association*¹¹⁸ the Court of Appeal found that racial abuse in itself is not enough to cause an employee detriment within the meaning of s 4 of the RRA. The court must find that by reason of the act complained of, a reasonable worker would or might take the view that he had thereby been disadvantaged in the circumstances in which he had thereafter to work. Such disadvantage may be interpreted quite broadly. In Hereford and Worcester CC v Clayton,¹¹⁹ firefighters were informed of the 'bad news: the new firefighter is a woman'. This was found to be a sexist insult capable of detrimental consequences. It sent the wrong signal to the firefighters and might have been likely to cause victimisation. This was less favourable treatment on the grounds of sex and amounted to unlawful sex discrimination.

There seems to be some uncertainty as to whether 'detriment' should be interpreted subjectively or objectively and a tendency to adopt the latter approach 115 See generally Hadjifotiou, Women and Harassment at Work, 1983; MacKinnon, C, Sexual Harassment of Working Women, 1979; Mullender, R, 'Racial harassment, sexual harassment and the expressive function of law' (1998) 61 MLR 236.

116 Porcelli v Strathclyde Regional Council [1986] ICR 564.

117 Although see (1985) 101 LQR 471 on this point.

118 [1986] ICR 514.

119 (1996) The Times, 8 October.

120 Wileman v Minilec Engineering Ltd [1988] ICR 318; for criticism see Gay (1990) 19 ILJ 35, who considered this ruling to be an 'example of judicial insensitivity'.

where the applicant is perceived as particularly sensitive¹²⁰ and the former where he or she is thought to be more robust.¹²¹ This mixed approach may render the test for harassment under-inclusive and it is therefore suggested that an objective test should be used, involving asking only whether the offending behaviour had reached a level at which reasonable people would term it humiliating.

The problem inherent in viewing harassment as discrimination is that the judicial inquiry necessarily focuses on the question of equal treatment rather than on the nature of the treatment. In other words, where a man or other comparator was or would also have been subjected to the behaviour in question, experienced by the applicant as humiliating or degrading, the claim may fail.¹²² This problem was illustrated by the findings in Stewart v Cleveland Guest Ltd.¹²³ The claim was brought by a woman who had been subjected to a display of sexually explicit pictures of women in the workplace. She had also been subjected to sexual assault and to sexual harassment at work, although these incidents were not included in her claim. She had eventually got the pictures removed, when her union intervened, but the management had allowed the workers to know who was to blame for their removal, and she had felt unable to return to the workplace. The tribunal found that the display was sexually neutral (despite the fact that the pictures were only of women and women were in the minority in the workplace), although it also found that her objections to the pictures were reasonable. It reached the decision to dismiss her claim on the basis that other women in the workplace did not object and, therefore, it could be said that, objectively, the pictures were not offensive or created humiliating conditions of work. However, taking into account all the circumstances of the case, it could be argued that there was sufficient evidence that the pictures were, objectively, offensive and degrading and that the other women had been, as was argued, desensitised by the male-orientated general ethos. The EAT upheld the tribunal but left open the possibility that apparently neutral general treatment which had a particular impact on women could be viewed as discrimination.

However, in a later decision, Sidhu v Aerospace Composite Technology Ltd,¹²⁴ a different approach was taken. The plaintiff had been subject to racial abuse and an assault. He and the racist workmates were dismissed because of his violent reaction to the assault. The racist element in it was disregarded by the employers in taking the decision to dismiss him. It was found in the EAT that to disregard this element was a 'race-specific' decision having a 'race-specific' effect. The nature and effect of the decision was found to amount to treatment on racial grounds amounting in itself to racial discrimination under s 1(1)(a) of the RRA, and it was not found necessary to consider whether a person of a different racial group or a white person would have been treated differently. Clearly, the claim might have failed had the employer been allowed to rely on the argument that a white person who had reacted to a racist assault in the same way would have been treated in the same way. Thus, 121 Snowball v Gardner Merchant [1987] ICR 719.

122 For criticism of this approach, which compares it with the evolving stance in US law away from the requirement to prove differential treatment and towards emphasis on the question whether there had been creation of a hostile working environment, see Dine, J and Watt, B, 'Sexual harassment: moving away from discrimination' (1995) 58 MLR 343.

123 [1996] ICR 535.

124 [1999] IRLR 683.

at present it appears that two different approaches are emerging. In applying these findings to allegations of harassment under the SDA as amended, the RRA and the DDA, it is clear that behaviour that can reasonably be viewed as humiliating or degrading will not necessarily amount to discrimination: all will depend on the specific circumstances.

Section 41(1) of the SDA states that an act done by an employee in the course of employment shall be treated as done by the employer as well as by him or her, whether or not it was done with the employer's knowledge or approval. There are equivalent provisions in s 32 of the RRA and s 58 of the DDA. Thus, a harassment claim on the protected grounds may be brought where the employer had made little or no effort to curb the harassment.¹²⁵ In Tower Boot Co v Jones,¹²⁶ the Court of Appeal adopted a purposive approach to the legislation in finding that employers must take steps to make themselves aware of harassment in the workplace and must take further steps to prevent it. It was not sufficient for employers simply to argue that the harassment did not take place in the course of employment:¹²⁷ this would create an obvious anomaly, since gross harassment (which occurred in Jones) could never be said to take place in the course of employment. The decision reaffirmed a broad liability of employers for racial abuse, and in *Burton and Another v De Vere Hotels*¹²⁸ it was found that the employer will be liable if it allows employees to be subject to racial abuse where it could have been prevented. On this principle, an action might be brought successfully where the employer did not know of the harassment but should have known, thus placing a duty upon employers to be aware of what is occurring in the workplace.¹²⁹ These decisions were made in the employment field, but would be applicable to the fields of education and housing. For example, under s 17 of the RRA, which provides that discrimination by bodies in charge of educational establishments may occur if a person is subjected 'to any other detriment', an action might be successful against school administrators who failed to prevent racial harassment of a pupil.

The European Commission has defined sexual harassment as 'conduct of a sexual nature or other conduct based on sex affecting the dignity of men and women at work'.¹³⁰ This clearly covers verbal or physical conduct. The Commission has published a Code of Practice¹³¹ on sexual harassment based on the definition above, which has been supported by the Council of Ministers,¹³² giving guidance to employees and employers and stating that harassment 'pollutes the working environment and can have a devastating effect upon the health, confidence, morale and performance of those affected by it'.¹³³ The Commission has recommended 125 See Enterprise Glass Co Ltd v Miles [1990] Ind Relations Review and Report 412-15C.

126 [1997] ICR 254; [1997] IRLR 168.

127 This had been accepted by the EAT: see [1995] IRLR 529.

128 (1996) The Times, 3 October.

129 This has been accepted in the US: Continental Can Co v Minn 297 NW 2d 241.

130 OJ C157/2. See Employment Law Review for 1992, below.

131 Commission Recommendation of 27 November 1991 on the Protection of the Dignity of Men and Women at Work OJ L49 3, 1992. This followed a report by Rubenstein, M, The Dignity of Women at Work: A Report on the Problem of Sexual Harassment in the Member States of the European Communities, 1987. See above, fn 130. For criticism of the Code, see (1993) 143 NLJ 1473.

132 In a Declaration (see (1992) 217 European Industrial Relations Review 21; see also Rubenstein, M (1992) 21 ILJ 70).

133 See OJ 4.2.1992.

that the Code should be adopted by Member States,¹³⁴ which should also take other action to address this problem, but the UK Government has not yet shown any inclination to respond. However, industrial tribunals faced with an allegation of sexual harassment as a form of direct discrimination should have regard to the guidance offered by the Code.¹³⁵ The new Race Discrimination Directive¹³⁶ defines discrimination so as to include harassment where the behaviour in question creates an 'intimidating, hostile, degrading or offensive, humiliating or offensive environment' and has the purpose or the effect of violating a person's dignity. Thus, it is clear that the harasser need not appreciate the effect of his or her behaviour.

4 INDIRECT DISCRIMINATION ON GROUNDS OF SEX OR RACE¹³⁷

Sex discrimination

The concept of indirect discrimination was imported into the SDA under s 1(1)(b) with a view to outlawing practices which, while neutral on their face as between men and women, have a disproportionately adverse impact on women. It was intended to outlaw not only isolated acts of discrimination, but also institutionalised discrimination. This reflects the pluralist approach; it takes account, for example, of past discrimination against women. In asking not whether a woman can, in theory, comply with a condition, but whether she can do so in practice, it broadens the area of morally unjustifiable differentiation.

There are four stages in operating this concept. First, it must be shown that a condition has been applied to the applicant. It might be to be of a certain seniority, height or type of experience. Secondly, it must be shown that the condition is one which will have a disproportionate impact on women; in other words, considerably fewer women than men will be able to comply with it. For example, fewer women than men might have a certain type of experience owing to a now outlawed system of keeping women at a certain level and thereby preventing them gaining the experience in question. Thirdly, once the claimant has proved these two requirements, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to show that the condition is justifiable regardless of sex. For example, there are fewer women engineering graduates than men; therefore, a requirement that applicants have a degree in engineering hits disproportionately at women. However, the employer will normally be able to show that a degree in engineering is genuinely needed for the job. Fourthly, if the employer cannot show that the requirement is genuinely needed for the job, the woman must show that it is to her detriment because she cannot comply with it. This requirement was included because it was thought necessary that the woman should be the victim rather than allowing anyone to bring a claim in respect of a discriminatory practice operating at her place of employment.

134 Commission Recommendation of 27 November 1991.

135 Wadman v Carpenter Farrer Partnership (1993) The Times, 31 May, EAT.

136 Directive 2000/43/EC.

137 See Byre, Indirect Discrimination, 1987; McGinley, 'Judicial approaches to sex discrimination in US and UK—a comparative study' (1986) 49 MLR 413, pp 427–35; Hunter, Indirect Discrimination in the Workplace, 1992; von Prondzynski and Richards, op cit, fn 1; Gardner, J, 'Discrimination as injustice' (1996) 16(3) OJLS 353; Townshend-Smith, R, 'Justifying indirect discrimination in English and American law: how stringent should the test be?' (1995) 1 Int Journal of Discrimination and the Law 103.

Two early decisions made clear the grounds for including this second type of discrimination in the Act and demonstrated the way in which it would operate. The case of Steel v the Post Office,¹³⁸ which concerned the allocation of postal walks to postmen or women, illustrated the operation of the four stages. Certain walks were more in demand than others and the walks were allocated on the basis of the seniority of the employee. Ms Steel made a bid for a walk, but lost it to a younger man. She had worked for the Post Office much longer than he had, but she had only been accepted into the permanent grade in 1975 when the SDA came into force. Before 1975, the Post Office had directly discriminated against women by refusing to allow them to enter the permanent grade. Ms Steel's seniority had been calculated from that point. The practice in question was interpreted as a 'requirement', thereby widening the meaning of the term. It had a disparate impact on women because fewer of them could comply with it than men because of the past discrimination and the requirement as to seniority could not otherwise be justified. 'Justified' was strictly interpreted as meaning 'necessary'. Finally, the requirement was clearly to her detriment, as she could not comply with it.

The application of the phrase 'can comply' was considered in Price v Civil Service Commission.¹³⁹ The Civil Service had a rule that applicants had to be under 28. Mrs Price, who was 35, applied but was rejected and claimed sex discrimination. It was found that owing to the prevailing social conditions, more men than women could comply with the requirement because at the time, there was a general expectation that women would rear a family and so would be less likely to be available in the job market at that age than men. However, women could theoretically comply with a requirement to be 28 and available in the job market; they could choose not to have children. The words 'can comply' were interpreted to mean that in practice, fewer women could comply with the condition. The court also considered the means of identifying a group of men and women to be looked at in order to see whether fewer women could comply with the condition. It found that the group to be considered would be the pool of men and women with the relevant qualifications; it would not include the whole population.¹⁴⁰ The applicant's case, therefore, passed all four tests and succeeded, with the result that the Civil Service altered the age bar.

The main difficulties in the operation of indirect discrimination have arisen in three areas: the finding of a disparate impact, involving identification of the correct 'pool', the meaning of justifiability and the determination as to the meaning of 'a requirement or condition'. The current position as regards disparate impact may be summed up in the following manner, which is based on the ruling of Mustill LJ in Jones v Chief Adjudication Officer.¹⁴¹

- (a) identify the criterion for selection (the condition);
- (b) identify the relevant population, the 'pool', comprising all those who satisfy the other criteria for selection and ignoring the allegedly discriminatory condition;

138 [1977] IRLR 288.

139 [1977] 1 WLR 1417.

140 See Jones v Manchester University (1993) The Times, 12 January, CA, which reaffirmed this approach to the 'pool', holding that the applicant could not redefine its parameters, which would be fixed by the relevant advertisement.

141 (1990) EOR 1991.

- (c) divide the relevant population into groups representing, first, those who satisfy the allegedly discriminatory criterion and secondly, those who do not;
- (d) ascertain what are the actual male/female balances in the two groups;
- (e) if women are found to be under-represented in the first group, it is proved that the criterion creates disparate impact.

Choosing the appropriate 'pool' is crucial to the plaintiff's chances of success; the tribunal may decide that she has chosen the wrong pool and that therefore, the statistical evidence she has prepared showing disparate impact relates to the wrong groups of persons.¹⁴² However, a more relaxed approach was evident in *London Underground v Edwards (No 2)*¹⁴³ (discussed further below) in which the Court of Appeal accepted that the tribunal could take into account the common knowledge that there are more female than male lone parents. Once the calculation has been completed, it will be possible to determine the proportions of women and of men affected by the disputed requirement. But, it must be found that the proportion of women who can comply is 'considerably smaller' than the equivalent proportion of men.

In *Secretary of State for Employment ex p Seymour-Smith and Perez*¹⁴⁴ a challenge was mounted against the increases in the qualifying period for redundancy from one to two years in 1985. It was argued that a considerably smaller proportion of women than of men could comply with it and that therefore, it breached the Equal Treatment Directive. In 1985, 77.4% of men and 68.9% of women fulfilled the condition. On a reference to the ECJ, it was found that such figures would not reveal that a considerably smaller proportion of women than men could fulfil the requirement. However, the ECJ also pointed out that a less than considerable differential, which persisted over a long period, could satisfy the requirement of indirect discrimination. The House of Lords considered the position as at 1991, not 1985, since both parties accepted that 1991 was the relevant date. Looking at the years between 1985 and 1991, there was a constant disparity between men and women: the ratio of men to women who qualified was 10:9. Given the persistence of this disparity it could not, it was found, be brushed aside as inconsiderable, bearing in mind the context of equality of treatment.

It is clear from this decision that determining the relevant proportions of men and women who can comply with a condition is not necessarily a straightforward matter that can be resolved by a 'snap-shot' approach. Further guidance was given in Barry v Midland Bank,¹⁴⁵ in which it was found that since the smaller the disadvantaged group in proportionate terms, the narrower the differential, a better guide may be to consider expressing the proportions as ratios of each other. Lord Nicholls explained that therefore, in a workforce of 10,000 employers of which 10% work part time, where 90% of the part timers are women, a requirement that disadvantages part timers will disadvantage 0.2% of males and 1.8% of women. Those proportions would not appear to satisfy the 'considerably smaller'

142 See Pearse v City of Bradford MC [1988] IRLR 379.

143 [1998] IRLR 364.

144 [2000] IRLR 263, HL.

145 [1999] 1 WLR 1465.

requirement. But if the proportions are expressed as ratios of each other it will be found that the ratio of women who cannot comply to that of men who cannot is 9:1.

The meaning of 'justifiable' has undergone considerable change since the ruling in *Ojutiku v Manpower Services Commission*¹⁴⁶ in which, departing from the Steel interpretation, it was held to mean 'reasons which would appear sound to right thinking people'. This obviously widened its meaning and would have allowed a great many practices to be justified, greatly undermining s 1(1)(b). However, in Clarke v Eley IMI Kynoch Ltd,¹⁴⁷ its meaning was somewhat narrowed. The company had a policy of always selecting part time workers for redundancy first, regardless of their length of service, although for full time workers a 'last in, first out' system was in operation. Therefore, the requirement to work full time so as not to be made redundant hit disproportionately at women, as more women than men worked part time. The employer argued that the practice could be justified because it was long standing and the workforce liked it, but it was found that this was not sufficient to render it 'justifiable', and the claimant therefore succeeded. This was clearly in accord with the policy of including indirect discrimination in the statutory scheme in order to outlaw long standing discriminatory practices.

The test for the meaning of justifiable¹⁴⁸ was more precisely defined by the European Court in Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz.¹⁴⁹ Under this test, conditions creating disparate impact will be justifiable if they amount to a means chosen for achieving an objective which correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate to that end and necessary to that end. So this test would be fulfilled if, for example, an undertaking had a real need to increase its scientific expertise in a certain area. The means used to do so would have to be appropriate, such as asking that applicants have a degree in a certain science. If other means of increasing its expertise were not available, it would be seen as necessary to impose the condition that applicants have a science degree. This approach was taken in Hampson v Department of Education and Science,¹⁵⁰ and means that s 1(1)(b) has been brought into line with the 'material difference' defence under s 1(3) of the Equal Pay Act 1970 (see below).

The Bilka decision narrowed the defence available to employers, but the findings in *Perera v Civil Service Commission*¹⁵¹ (a race discrimination case) meant that a number of requirements or conditions creating disparate impact will fall outside the Act and will obviously not require application of the Bilka test because they will not support an indirect discrimination claim at all. It was held in Perera that a condition must amount to an absolute bar in order to be termed a requirement or condition. If the employer has only taken the factor into account as one among others, it will not fall within s 1(1)(b). This is very restrictive, as non-absolute criteria could clearly be used and could have an adverse impact on an applicant. For example, an

146 [1982] ICR 661; [1982] IRLR 418.

147 [1983] ICR 703.

148 For discussion of the test see Leigh (1986) 49 MLR 235.

149 [1986] IRLR 317; [1986] CMLR 701; see also Rimmer-Kuhn v FWW Spezial-Gebäudereinigung [1989] IRLR 493.

150 [1991] 1 AC 171; [1990] 2 All ER 513, HL; on the Court of Appeal decision see Bourn (1989) 18 ILJ 170; Napier (1989) 48 CLJ 187.

151 [1983] ICR 428; [1983] IRLR 166.

unjustifiable height bar might normally be operated, but the employer might be prepared on occasion to consider people under it. Nevertheless, the bar could have a significantly adverse effect on women. Thus, the development of indirect discrimination has been constrained and the EOC has therefore argued for reform of the meaning of the term 'condition'.¹⁵² The decision in Perera may be out of accord with the ruling of the European Court of Justice in Enderby v Frenchay,¹⁵³ which is discussed below. In Falkirk Council v Whyte,¹⁵⁴ the decision was found to be out of accord with the purposive approach to legislation that implements a Directive, which has been adopted in a number of equal pay cases. It was found that the term 'a requirement or condition' should not be afforded a restrictive interpretation; the proper test, it was said, was to ask whether the 'factor' hindered women as opposed to men in the particular context. Under the Burden of Proof Directive, (implemented in SI 2001/2660) a similar approach will prevail, since the terms used are 'provision, criterion or practice', which appear to cover non-absolute criteria.

One of the key issues which has arisen over the last 10 years is that of flexible working. The term 'flexible' can be used in two senses. First, it can relate to the need of parents or other carers to work hours which do not impinge too greatly on their caring responsibilities—a matter forming one aspect of the 'work/life' balance. Secondly, it can refer to the preference of some employers to demand that employees work hours which suit the changing needs of the business or concern in question. These matters are increasingly becoming the subject of indirect discrimination claims. In *London Underground v Edwards (No 2)*¹⁵⁵ the plaintiff, a woman train driver, brought an indirect discrimination claim after the employer imposed shift changes in accordance with its new business plan. She could not comply with the changed shifts because of her responsibilities as a single parent. It was found that out of the pool of train drivers there were 2,000 men, all of whom could comply with the new shift arrangements. There was a component of only 21 women in the pool. Out of that number, one woman—the applicant—could not comply. Thus, 95.2% of women could comply and 100% of men could comply. In determining that a 'considerably' smaller proportion of women could comply, the Court of Appeal took into account the small number of women in the pool, suggesting that women already found it hard to comply with the requirements of the job. Further, if one more woman had been unable to comply, that would have had a significant effect on the proportion of women who could not comply, whereas if one man had not been able to comply, that would have had little effect on the male figures. On the issue of justification, the Court of Appeal found that employers should recognise the need to take a reasonably flexible attitude to accommodating the needs of their employees. They considered that London Underground could have quite readily accommodated the needs of a good employee (she had worked for them for 10 years and there had been no complaints about her work) which would not have been damaging to their business plan.

152 See Proposals of the EOC: Equal Treatment for Men and Women, p 9.

153 [1994] 1 All ER 495; [1993] ECR I-5535, ECJ; [1992] IRLR 15, CA.

154 [1997] IRLR 560.

155 [1998] IRLR 364.

156 [1989] ICR 250.

A different attitude was evident in *Clymo v Wandsworth LBC*¹⁵⁶ which concerned the employee's need to adopt a different pattern of working. The plaintiff had returned to work after childbirth and found she could not comply with a requirement to work full time; she wished to work part time. The EAT found that no requirement to work full time had been applied. In any event, it was found, she could comply with it—she merely had to make a choice between her childcare responsibilities and full time working. This was a very technical approach to the statute, which gave priority to the employer's autonomy in choosing to impose full time working rather than to the employee's choices. It appears to be out of accord with the approach taken in Edwards and that taken in other, later decisions,¹⁵⁷ although it cannot be assumed that it has been entirely discarded.

A number of measures emanating from the EC have had some effect on the work/life balance, including the Working Time Directive,¹⁵⁸ which was implemented in the Working Time Regulations 1998.¹⁵⁹ But, it is generally accepted that while the Regulations have had some impact on the long hours culture of the UK,¹⁶⁰ it has not been of a radical nature, partly because of the possibilities of opting out of the provisions.¹⁶¹ The Part-Time Workers Directive¹⁶² was implemented in the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations 2000.¹⁶³ The Regulations prohibit discrimination against part time workers. But the employee must point to a comparator under the Regulations, although possibly to a hypothetical comparator under the Directive, and must show that he or she has been treated unfavourably in comparison with a comparable employee working full time, on the ground of part time working. The unfavourable treatment can be justified. Thus, the scheme is likely to be limited in its effects; it has been estimated that, owing to the need to find an appropriate comparator, it is likely to affect only about 7% of UK part time workers.¹⁶⁴ The Regulations do not provide a right to work part time or to work flexible hours to accommodate caring responsibilities or to job-share. In order for employees to seek to assert such rights, they must use, as indicated above, the difficult route provided by the SDA. Thus, although social patterns are changing, and men increasingly have responsibilities as carers, the current gendered divide in caring responsibilities has not elicited a legislative response that recognises that divide, thus sometimes forcing women into a dependency on men which may result in a blighting of their lives and those of their children.¹⁶⁵ Use of the indirect discrimination route in efforts to avert these possibilities is, as indicated, burdensome and fraught with pitfalls.

157 See Zurich Insurance Co v Gulson [1998] IRLR 118.

158 Directive 93/104/EC.

159 SI 1998/1833.

160 See the TUC Report, March 2001 'Burnout Britain' factsheet, www.tuc.org.uk.

161 See further Ewing, Bradley and McColgan, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 4, pp 411–13.

162 Directive 96/34/EC.

163 SI 2000/1551.

164 Government's Regulatory Impact Assessment.

165 See Cabinet Office Briefing Women's Incomes Over the Lifetime and Women and Men in the UK: Facts and Figures (www.women.unit.gov.uk/publications.htm).

Race discrimination

The tests to be applied to establish indirect discrimination under s 1(1)(b) of the 1976 Act are identical to those arising under the Sex Discrimination Act, apart from the need to show that the requirement or condition which has been applied adversely affects persons of a particular racial group. Thus, the first step in a case of indirect discrimination on racial grounds is for the applicant to define which racial group he or she belongs to. For example, an individual could be defined as non-British, non-white, Asian or a sub-group of Asian. The choice of group is important, since discrimination affects racial groups differently. For example, a requirement to be clean-shaven might discriminate against Sikhs, but might not affect West Indians. Therefore, if in such circumstances the applicant chose 'non-white' as his group, the claim would fail. However, if he chose Sikh and non-Sikh, it would be more likely to succeed. The applicant should argue all possible groups in the alternative.

The next step, according to Perera v Civil Service Commission,¹⁶⁶ is for the applicant to show that an absolute condition has been applied to him or her. In Perera this concerned a requirement that a candidate for the Civil Service had a good command of English. This requirement was sometimes waived; it was determined that it could not, therefore, amount to a 'requirement or condition' for indirect discrimination purposes. As noted above in relation to indirect sexual discrimination, this decision placed a brake on claims of indirect discrimination¹⁶⁷ although that approach was being abandoned even prior to implementation of the Burden of Proof Directive. It was pointed out in *Meer v Tower Hamlets*¹⁶⁸ by Balcombe LJ in the Court of Appeal that it allows discriminatory preferences free rein, as long as they are not expressed as absolute requirements. In that case, a candidate who had previous experience working in the local authority was preferred although such experience was not absolutely required, and this had a tendency to debar non-British applicants. The Commission for Racial Equality has recommended that this interpretation should be abandoned so that non-absolute criteria can be considered.¹⁶⁹ Once the Race Directive is implemented, it will be reasonably clear that indirect discrimination can be found to exist where a non-absolute requirement is applied to the applicant. The Directive uses the same wording as that adopted in the Burden of Proof Directive.¹⁷⁰

If a condition can be identified, the applicant must show that a 'considerably smaller proportion of his or her group can comply with it', and the approach adopted in sex discrimination cases, discussed above, will be used, although where indirect discrimination is based on nationality and affects an EC national it will be sufficient to establish a risk that the group of workers in question is unable to comply with the requirement.¹⁷¹ This approach would obviate the need to produce statistical evidence proving the effect of the requirement in practice. This approach would

166 [1983] ICR 428; [1983] IRLR 166.

167 For criticism of the decision see Mead (1989) 18ILJ 59.

168 [1988] IRLR 399, p 403.

169 CRE, Second Review of the Race Relations Act, 1991.

170 See above, p 1014.

171 O'Flynn v Adjudication Officer Case C-237/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 541.

not apply in other instances of indirect discrimination, but it may be introduced under the Race Discrimination Directive, which requires the applicant to show that the provision or practice in issue 'would put persons of a racial or ethnic group at a particular disadvantage compared with other persons' (emphasis added). That approach may appear to allow for consideration of a risk of inability to comply, although the use of the word 'would' as opposed to 'could' does not make this interpretation certain.

Once the applicant has established a prima facie case of indirect discrimination, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to show that the requirement or condition is justifiable.¹⁷² In *Ojutiku v Manpower Services Commission*¹⁷³ two African students obtained places on a polytechnic management course, but were refused grants by the Manpower Services Commission since they lacked industrial experience. They claimed that this requirement was indirectly discriminatory as it was more difficult for African applicants to show that they had previous management experience. However, the claim failed on the basis that the requirement could be justified. The test for justification was determined to be somewhat short of 'necessary', connoting a belief which would be justifiable if held on reasonable grounds, and this was reiterated in Singh v British Railway Engineers.¹⁷⁴ The applicant, who wore a turban in accordance with his religious beliefs, could not comply with a requirement to wear protective headgear and therefore had to take a less well paid job. It was found that while the requirement did have an adverse impact it was justifiable, partly because the other employees would resent exceptions being made. However, the term 'justifiable' is now to be interpreted in accordance with the Bilka test,¹⁷⁵ which is applicable in sex discrimination cases and should therefore, by extension, apply to the equivalent provision under the RRA according to Hampson v DES.¹⁷⁶ This accords with the ruling in *Rainey v Greater Glasgow Health Board*¹⁷⁷ that the Bilka test would be applicable in sex discrimination and equal pay cases in respect of the grounds on which differential treatment could be justified. This is an important instance of the indirect influence of EU law on national provisions against racial discrimination.

The Commission for Racial Equality has, for a number of years, criticised the interpretation of indirect discrimination and has proposed a new definition: any practice or policy which is continued or allowed should be unlawful if it has a significant adverse impact on a particular racial group and is not necessary. It has further proposed that significant adverse impact should mean a 20% difference in impact between groups.¹⁷⁸ These proposals are now, broadly, encapsulated in the Race Directive, which must be implemented by July 2003.

172 For discussion of the justification defence see Lustgarten, L (1983) 133 NLJ 1057 and (1984) 134 NLJ 9.

173 [1982] IRLR 418.

174 [1986] ICR 22.

175 Above, fn 149.

176 [1991] 1 AC 171; [1990] 2 All ER 513, HL.

177 [1986] 3WLR 1017, HL.

178 See the CRE Consultative Paper, Second Review of the Race Relations Act 1976, 1991. The 20% notion derives from US civil rights law.

5 EQUAL PAY¹⁷⁹

The Equal Pay Act 1970 governs the contractual aspects of a woman's employment. It is anomalous in that it is separate from the SDA; there is no good reason for having two separate instruments and it merely introduces further complexity and technicality into an already complex scheme. The Act received the royal assent in 1970, but it did not come into force until 1975; the idea was that employers would voluntarily remove sexual discrimination in pay. In fact, as the TUC warned the government would happen, employers moved women off the 'women's grade' on to the lowest grades with a view to minimising their statutory obligations and made sure that men and women were not working on comparable jobs.

The aim of the Act is to prevent discrimination as regards terms and conditions of employment between men and women and, to this end, it employs the device of an equality clause. If certain conditions are satisfied, the terms of the woman's contract are deemed to include such a clause. Under the original provisions, the equality clause only operated in two circumstances: that the woman was employed on like work with men in the same employment under s 1(2)(a) or on work rated by a job evaluation scheme as equivalent to that of a man in the same employment under s 1(2)(b). The latter provision was not of much value as it was voluntary and it was, therefore, left to the woman to persuade her employer to undertake such a scheme. In practice, this meant that women were left with the like work provisions. Owing to sexual segregation in the job market, women were concentrated in certain occupations, such as cleaning or cooking, and were unable to point to a man doing like work even where he was in the same employment.

Thus, the Act had little impact on women's lower pay since it could only be used against the most gross forms of pay discrimination. However, in 1982 the European Commission brought an action against the UK (Commission of European Communities v UK)¹⁸⁰ on the basis that the UK was in breach of its obligations under the Equal Pay Directive owing to the narrow application of the equality clause. In response, the UK Government was forced to amend the 1970 Act in order to include the possibility of making an equal value claim. It did so very reluctantly and this was reflected in the response. The amendment (new s 1(2)(c)) was effected by statutory instrument, thereby curtailing debate on the new provisions, and the new regulations were intended to operate only as a last resort: the other two possibilities had to be tried first. Moreover, an attempt was made to widen the defences available to employers by using a different wording for equal value claims.

179 General reading: Townshend-Smith, op cit, fn 27, Chapter 9; Bourne, C and Whitmore, J, Discrimination and Equal Pay, 1989, Chapter 7; Arnall, A, 'Article 119 and equal pay for work of equal value' (1986) Eur L Rev 200; 'Pay inequalities and equal value claims' (1985) 48 MLR 560; 'Courts, community law and equal pay' [1988] PL 485; Edwards, 'Equal pay: the European dimension' (1990) BLR July 177; Bourne, 'Equal pay' (1990) 140 NLJ 1284; Fenwick, H, 'Indirect discrimination in equal pay claims' (1995) 3 European Public Law 331; McColgan, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 10.

180 [1982] ICR 578; [1982] 3 CMLR 284.

Choice of comparator

The first step under the Act is for the woman to choose a comparator. This might have caused difficulty where the woman was employed doing like work with a few men but wanted to compare herself with a man doing work of equal value; however, the issue was resolved in favour of claimants by the House of Lords in Pickstone v Freemans.¹⁸¹ Mrs Pickstone and other warehouse operatives were paid less than male warehouse checkers, but a man was employed as an operative. The defendants therefore argued that the claim was barred owing to the wording of s 1(2)(c): ‘...where a woman is employed on work which, not being work to which (a) or (b) applies, is “of equal value”’ (emphasis added). Paragraph (a) did apply because one man was employed doing the same work and therefore it could be argued that a like work claim arose, but not an equal value one. The House of Lords considered that allowing this argument to succeed would mean that Parliament had failed once again to implement its obligations under Art 119 and it could not have intended such a failure. In such circumstances, any interpretation should take into account the terms in which the amending regulations were presented to Parliament; in other words, a purposive approach should be adopted. Using this approach, the defendants’ argument could be rejected on the basis that the claimant should be able to choose her comparator, rather than allowing the employer to impose one on her. This ruling put an end to what has been termed the ‘token man loophole’.¹⁸² had it gone the other way, employers might have been encouraged to employ one man alongside a large number of women in order to bar equal value claims.

‘Same employment’

Once a claimant has chosen a comparator, it must be shown that they are in the same employment. The meaning of this provision was considered by the House of Lords in Leverton v Clwyd CC.¹⁸³ A nursery nurse who wished to compare her pay with that of clerical staff was not employed in the same establishment as they were. Under s 1(6), ‘the same employment’ is defined as meaning at the same establishment or by the same employer and that the same conditions of employment are observed. The claimant and comparators were employed by the same employer and, although there were some differences in the individual terms of employment, it was still possible for the House of Lords to find on a broad view of the agreement governing the terms of employment of claimant and comparator that they were sufficiently similar to satisfy the s 1(6) test.

Clearly, it would be possible to frame legislation allowing equal value claims so that it would operate in one of three circumstances: it could apply to all employees who could point to any other employee, wherever employed, doing work of equal value; it could apply to employees employed by the same employer governed by roughly similar terms of service—the position taken under the UK legislation—or it could apply to employees working under the same roof as their comparators. In making it clear that a broad middle way is open to such claims, the House of Lords gave encouragement to them and followed a policy which seems to be in tune with that underlying the legislation.

181 [1988] AC 66; [1988] 2 All ER 803; for comment see: (1988) 51 MLR 221; [1988] PL 483.

182 See Napier, ‘Julie Hayward and the continuing saga of equal pay’ (1998) 138 NLJ 341.

183 [1989] 2 WLR 47; [1989] 1 WLR 65, HL.

However, it is worth considering the advantages of the first and least restrictive method which was omitted from the legislation in order to minimise disruption to existing pay structures. If, in principle, a person doing work of equal value to that of another worker should be paid an equal wage, if the inequality is attributable to sex discrimination, then it ought to be immaterial that the two workers are employed by two different employers. It might be said that an employer cannot be expected to take responsibility for the wage policies of other concerns, but can only be expected to remove pay discrimination within the sphere he or she is able to affect. However, on a broader view, it might be argued that an employer has a duty to ensure that his or her own concern is not operating a discriminatory wage scheme whatever the basis of comparison. In closing off that broad possibility, the legislation leaves intact the grossest pay disparities arising from establishments with low paid all-female workforces, because they cannot point to a male comparator. This aspect of the legislation may even encourage sexual segregation in employment because if no male is employed (other than those prepared to work for the same low wages as the women)—at least in any post conceivably comparable with that of the majority of the workforce—equal value claims are precluded. The result in some occupations may be the encouragement of a low paid all-female workforce overseen by a few men in managerial positions.

The term by term approach

Assuming that a claimant can point to a comparator in the same employment, the industrial tribunal will appoint an independent expert in order to determine whether the two jobs are of equal value under such heads as responsibility, skill, effort, qualifications and length of training. The expert's report is not conclusive of the issue, but the tribunal is unlikely to reject it. If the jobs are of equal value, then a term of the claimant's contract which is less favourable than a term of her comparator's will be compared. It is now clear after the ruling of the House of Lords in *Hayward v Cammell Laird*¹⁸⁴ that the term by term approach—as opposed to consideration of the contract as a whole—is correct. The defendants had resisted the plaintiff's claim on the ground that her contract and that of the male comparators must each be looked at as a whole, in which case her perks—such as free lunches and two additional days' holiday—equalled the £25 per week extra which the men received. The House of Lords found that the word 'term' in s 1(2) was to be given its natural and ordinary meaning as a distinct part of a contract and, therefore, it was necessary to look at one term of the claimant's contract; if there was a similar provision in the comparator's contract which was found after they had been compared to be less favourable to the woman than the term in the comparator's, then the equality clause would operate to make that term equally favourable to her.

Obviously, this ruling prevented employers claiming that fringe benefits equalled pay. Such a claim might have been advantageous to an employer who might be able to provide a benefit at little real cost, such as free meals for a cook. Moreover, previously, employers might have provided a 'protective package' for female employees which included less pay but more time off or more sick benefits. All women, whether desirous of such a package or not, would receive it whether or not they would have preferred to be paid more. Employers, however, feared that the Hayward ruling would lead to 'leap frogging'; women would receive the male higher pay; the men would then claim the women's old fringe benefits and all employees would level up to the detriment of the company, which would be faced with a great increase in costs. However, employers may be able to avoid this by gradually modifying practices on pay and fringe benefits. There would also be the possibility—mentioned only as dicta in Hayward—that certain fringe benefits might be used to found a defence to an equal value claim (see below).

184 [1988] WLR 265; [1988] 2 All ER 803; for comment, see Ellis (1988) 51 MLR 781; Napier, op cit, fn 182.

The 'material factor' defence

Even if a woman is able to show that she is doing like work, work rated as equivalent or work of equal value to that of her comparator, the claim will fail if a s 1(3) defence operates:

...an equality clause shall not operate in relation to a variation between the woman's contract and the man's contract if the employer proves that the variation is genuinely due to a material factor which is not the difference of sex and that factor:

- (a) in the case of an equality clause falling within subsection (2)(a) or (b) above, must be a material difference between the woman's case and the man's; and
- (b) in the case of an equality clause falling within subsection (2)(c) above, may be such a material difference.

This is known as the 'material factor defence'. The difference in wording for equal value claims was intended to mean that a 'material factor' could be interpreted more widely in such claims. In fact, as will be seen, the width of the interpretation given to the defence in all three types of claim means that this possibility is of less significance than was expected. The defence will operate if a material difference between the cases of the woman and the man can be identified which is not the difference of sex—such as additional payment for the geographical difference in the location of two parts of the same concern. As the 1970 Act must be construed in harmony with the SDA, the variation in pay must be genuinely due to the factor in question; otherwise it may be discriminatory. Therefore, in Shields v E Coomes,¹⁸⁵ the difference in pay was apparently due to the protective function exercised by the male employees in a betting shop. However, not all the men discharged such a function, but all received the higher pay and, therefore, allowing the protective function to operate as a material factor would have been directly discriminatory because a woman who exercised no protective function would not receive the higher pay, while a man in the same position would.

In *Leverton v Clwyd CC*¹⁸⁶ the House of Lords found that different hours and holidays could amount to a material factor under s 1(3) if pay could be broken down into a notional hourly income. If, once this was done, the pay of claimant and comparator were found to be equal, the claim would fail on the basis that the difference in salaries was due to the difference in hours and not to the difference of sex. This point was touched on obiter in Hayward, but in Leverton it was made clear that a s 1(3) defence might be available where a man and a woman had different contractual packages so long as the packages did not contain any element of direct or indirect discrimination. It may be noted that more than one material factor may be identified; if so, it is not necessary for the employer to establish the proportion which each factor contributes to the difference in pay.¹⁸⁷

185 [1978] WLR 1408, CA.

186 [1989] WLR 47.

The most far reaching and controversial argument under s 1(3) has been termed the 'market forces argument',¹⁸⁸ since it allows the employer to argue that because the market may favour some employees more than others, they must be paid more, and that to fail to do so would be to disrupt normal market forces.¹⁸⁹ In other words, if a woman is willing to work for less than a man, this provides a reason for paying her less. The early cases rejected this argument,¹⁹⁰ in Jenkins v Kinsgate,¹⁹¹ for example, a part time worker was paid at a different hourly rate from the full time workers. The employer tried to use the s 1(3) defence in answer to her claim for equal hourly pay in arguing that part time workers have less bargaining power and therefore the market demanded that he should pay full time workers more. The argument was that this was a genuine difference between the two cases which was not sex-related; any part time worker, male or female, would have been paid less. However, the part timers were all female and so the practice had a disparate impact on women. Construing the EPA in accordance with the SDA, the EAT concluded that a practice which had a disparate impact on women could not sustain a s 1(3) defence, as to allow it to do so would be indirectly discriminatory.

However, this approach was not followed in Rainey v Greater Glasgow Health Board,¹⁹² which concerned a comparison between female and male prosthetists working in the NHS. The men were receiving higher pay, but the defendants argued that this was due to the need to attract them from the private sector in order to set up the prosthetist service. This argument entailed consideration not just of factors relating to the personal attributes of the claimant and comparator, such as length of experience, but also the difference in their individual positions in the market. In other words, it widened what could be considered as a material factor. The relevant circumstances were that those from the private sector had to be paid above the normal rate to attract them. However, the House of Lords held that although taking this into account as a material factor was acceptable, it must be objectively justified—no element of discrimination must have crept into the circumstances. In order to ensure this, the House of Lords used the same test as for justification under indirect discrimination—the Bilka test laid down by the European Court of Justice.¹⁹³ Here, the objective was setting up the NHS prosthetist service which entailed attracting 187 Golder v Rowntree Macintosh Ltd [1993] IRLR 27.

188 Townshend-Smith, op cit, fn 27, p 175.

189 The US doctrine of 'comparable worth' has also been attacked as disruptive of market forces: see, eg, Weiler, 'The wages of sex: the uses and limits of comparable worth' (1986) 99 Harv L Rev 1728.

190 Clay Cross v Fletcher [1978] 1 WLR 1429; [1979] 1 All ER 474.

191 [1981] IRLR 388, p 390.

192 [1987] AC 224; [1987] 1 All ER 65; [1986] 3 WLR 1017, HL. It may be that the reasoning in Rainey will be applied only where indirect discrimination can be identified affecting the factor in question: Strathclyde Regional Council v Wallace [1996] IRLR 672, noted (1997) 26(2) ILJ 171. If this is correct, the factor need not be objectively justified: it need only be genuinely necessary and material, ie, relevant. One problem with this approach is that it may lead to failures to recognise the existence of indirect discrimination affecting material factors.

sufficient experienced prosthetists. The means chosen involved attracting persons from the private sector which involved paying them more. It was accepted that this was both appropriate and necessary. So the material factor passed the Bilka test and further, because this was a like work case, the factor had to be a difference between comparator and claimant. The difference was that she was from the public sector, while he was from the private sector.

Thus, this ruling broadened what could be termed a material factor and allowed market forces to defeat equal pay claims so long as no indirect discrimination was shown. Clearly, the danger of the market forces argument is that employers will often argue that business will suffer if a group of women are paid more. What are sometimes termed “women’s jobs’ have traditionally been undervalued by the market; the equal pay legislation was specifically aimed at breaking down traditional pay hierarchies and, therefore, this argument, if allowed too wide a scope, could completely undermine it. However, the Rainey ruling does appear to an extent to be trying to keep the argument in check in finding that only in objectively justified circumstances should more be paid to a certain group; this is not the same as allowing the market generally to set the rate. The effect of this argument was further curbed in Benveniste v University of Southampton,¹⁹⁴ it was found that although particular constraints might affect pay and might lead to a pay differential between a man and a woman, they could do so only while the constraint was in operation. Once it had ceased to apply, the lower pay should be raised to the level it would have been at had it not been affected by the constraint.

A variation on the market forces argument was put forward in Enderby v Frenchay.¹⁹⁵ Speech therapists wished to compare their pay with that of clinical psychologists and pharmacists who were paid at much higher rates. The employers denied that the work of the two groups was of equal value, but argued that in any event, a material factor justified the difference: it had emerged as a result of different pay negotiations and, moreover, the pharmacists were in demand in the private sector and this had influenced pay. The employers further argued that the speech therapists could not assert that the material factor was tainted by indirect discrimination without first showing that a condition had been applied to employees which had an adverse impact on women. The employer thus had two arguments: first, no condition could be identified which had been applied; secondly, if it had been, it could be justified by the factors mentioned: the separate pay processes in conjunction with market forces.

The claimant, however, argued that the salaries of the therapists were low because the profession was predominantly female and that whether a condition could be identified or not was immaterial: in practice, one type of work was largely done by women and another largely by men and, although of equal value, the men’s work attracted a higher salary. These factors, it was claimed, gave rise to a presumption of discrimination which could not be objectively justified because the reason for the difference was that the profession in question was staffed by women. This argument, if accepted, would have distinguished the claim from that in Rainey.

193 In Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz [1986] IRLR 317; [1986] CMLR 701. See above, p 1013.

194 [1989] IRLR 122.

195 [1994] 1 All ER 495; [1993] ECR I-5535, ECJ; [1992] IRLR 15, CA.

The EAT found for the employers, ruling that the pay was the result of different bargaining processes which, looked at separately, were not indirectly discriminatory. Therefore, a material factor could be identified which was influenced by market forces. Further, even if the factor identified did not justify all of the difference in pay, that did not matter because it was impossible to say how much was needed above normal rates to attract and retain certain staff. It was clear that the case raised difficult issues, and so at the Court of Appeal stage three questions were referred to the European Court of Justice:

- (1) If there is a difference in pay between two jobs assumed to be of equal value, of which one is carried out almost exclusively by women and the other predominantly by men, must the difference be objectively justified by the employer? Does this mean that all the steps needed to show indirect discrimination should be taken, including identifying a particular barrier?
- (2) Are separate bargaining processes a sufficient justification for a variation in pay if they are not internally discriminatory?
- (3) If there is a need to pay men more to attract them, but only part of the difference in pay is for that purpose, then does that justify all of the difference?

The first question relates to the determination of a prima facie case of indirect sex discrimination; is it necessary to be able to identify a 'barrier' or 'condition' which it is more difficult for women to meet than men (or vice versa) in order to show indirect discrimination? The second and third questions relate to justifications for indirect discrimination. First, is the use of separate sex-neutral collective bargaining systems sufficient justification for indirect sex discrimination? Secondly, will the more favourable market position of certain employees justify unequal pay? In other words, can the overt operation of market forces justify indirect sex discrimination?

Assuming that the jobs compared were of equal value, the Court of Justice held,¹⁹⁶ reiterating the well established principle of reversal of the burden of proof in indirect sex discrimination cases (citing Case C-33/89 *Kowalska v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg*¹⁹⁷ and Case C-184/89 *Nimz v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg*¹⁹⁸ concerning measures distinguishing between employees on the basis of their hours of work, including equal pay cases) that '...it is for the employer to prove that his practice in the matter of wages is not discriminatory, if a female worker establishes, in relation to a relatively large number of employees, that the average pay for women is less than that for men'.

Applying these rulings by analogy to this equal value claim, the court concluded that there is a prima facie case of sex discrimination, where the pay of speech therapists is significantly lower than that of clinical psychologists and pharmacists and speech therapists are almost exclusively women. The 'factual' considerations as to whether the jobs are indeed of equal value and whether the statistics adduced support the required disparities are questions for the national court. At this point, the burden of objective justification shifts to the employer.

The court replied in the negative to the question whether separate collective bargaining processes, which are each, in themselves, non-discriminatory, constitute sufficient objective justification for the differences in pay. The fact that the different wages are reached by separate processes of collective bargaining does not of itself justify the discrimination, since it is a merely descriptive explanation. It fails to explain why one process produced a more favourable result for the employees than the other. Moreover, allowing that justification would enable employers to circumvent the principle of equal pay very readily by using such separate processes.

196 Enderby v Frenchay [1994] 1 All ER 495; [1993] ECR I-5535, ECJ; [1992] IRLR 15, CA.

197 [1990] ECR I-2591.

198 [1991] ECR I-297.

In contrast to its answer to the second question, the court accepted 'the state of the employment market' in its answer to the third as a possible justification for indirect discrimination. The market forces concerned here were the shortage of candidates for the more highly paid job and the consequent need to offer higher pay in that job in order to attract candidates. The court repeated that it is the duty of the national courts to decide 'questions of fact' such as this and reiterated from its previous case law¹⁹⁹ some forms of 'needs of the employer' which may constitute justification for indirect sex discrimination.²⁰⁰

While the questions referred to the ECJ were unanswered, the issue raised in (2) was resolved in *Barber and Others v NCR (Manufacturing) Ltd*²⁰¹ using a completely different approach from that of the EAT in Enderby and one which seems to be more in harmony with the policy of the Act and with the Bilka test. Indirect clerical workers, who were mainly women, wanted to claim equal pay with direct clerical workers who were mainly men (the women's work was 'indirect' as not directly related to shop floor production). The direct workers negotiated a new agreement regarding hours and moved to a shorter week. Thus, the hourly rates of the two groups now differed although it had been the same. The EAT considered whether the employer had established that because the difference arose from different collective bargaining agreements untainted internally by discrimination this could found a s 1(3) defence. In putting forward this argument, the employers had relied on Enderby where the EAT had held that this was possible. The EAT said that the correct question to be asked must first be identified. It could be asked whether the cause of the variation in pay was free from sex discrimination, or it could be asked whether the variation was itself genuinely due to a material factor other than the difference of sex. The second question was the right one because the cause—separate collective bargaining processes—might be free from discrimination, but the result might not be. In this instance, the evidence showed why the difference had been arrived at, but did not show any objective factor which justified it. Thus, there was a pay difference which was not based on a material factor. The equality clause therefore operated, meaning that although the claimants did not obtain the same pay as the comparators because of the difference in hours, the hourly rates were equalised. The EAT considered that it did not need to refer to the ECJ or await the decision in Enderby, since the proper result could be arrived at under domestic law.

This ruling was foreshadowed in Handels-og Kontorfunktionaerernes Forbund i 199 Case 170/84 Bilka [1986] ECR 1607, Case C-184/89 Nimz v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg [1991] ECR I-297 and Case 109/88 Danfoss [1989] ECR 3199; [1989] IRLR 532.

200 In 1997, the Government conceded the equal value issue and settled the claim: see April 1997 IRLB No 567.

201 [1993] IRLR 95. Cf the decision in British Coal Corporation v Smith [1993] IRLR 308.

Danmark v Dansk Arbejdsgiverforening (the Danfoss case),²⁰² which was a Danish reference to the ECJ. The Court did not need to consider the question as to the relevance of two separate collective agreements, one for women, one for men, but when the Advocate General addressed this point he determined that the existence of such agreements would not exclude the operation of the Equal Pay Directive although it would not inevitably be unlawful to have two separate agreements; it would be the manner of the agreements which would be relevant.

This approach should prevail, it is submitted, because merely to ask whether arriving at two levels of pay was due to the operation of two different bargaining processes would be to obscure the discriminatory nature of the result.²⁰³ It is necessary to look behind the bargaining processes and to ask why one was able to arrive at a more favourable result. This might be because unions have traditionally been more effectual in obtaining better pay for men than for women and in itself this may be due to the fact that men's work has traditionally been valued more highly by the market than women's. Thus, to use different agreements as a material factor in themselves would be to cloak the discriminatory forces which lie behind them.

The main issue in the Danfoss case arose because the Danfoss Company paid the same basic wage to all employees, but also an individual supplement based on factors such as mobility and training. The result was that a somewhat lower average wage was paid to women and it was therefore claimed that the system was discriminatory. The Court determined that because the system lacked transparency, once a woman had shown that the average wage of women and men differed, the burden of proof would shift to the employer to prove that the wage practice was not discriminatory. It would have been unfair to expect the woman to prove that the system was discriminatory since she would not have been able to work out which factors had been taken into account. The Court considered that even if the application of criteria such as the need to be mobile worked to the detriment of women, the employer could still use them in relation to specific tasks entrusted to the employee so long as the Bilka test was satisfied.

Conclusions

The Enderby approach in the European Court of Justice obviously eases the task of the claimant in showing that a material factor is tainted with indirect discrimination in order to shift the onus onto the employer and determines that asking an employee to identify a specific requirement or condition where it is alleged that a material factor is so tainted is misconceived. Sometimes, it may be possible to identify a condition such as a need to be mobile in order to attract higher pay. However, and this seems to be the basis of the decision in Enderby, in many instances it may not be possible to identify any such condition with sufficient specificity. Instead, it would seem that where two jobs are of equal value, but that held by the woman attracts lower pay, the suggestion is that the market has allowed differentiation because of the traditional expectation that a woman would not be the breadwinner and would therefore work for less.

202 [1989] ECR 3199; [1989] IRLR 532.

203 For comment on this issue, see 'Equal value claims and sex bias in collective bargaining' (1991) 20ILJ 163; see, also (1989) 18 ILJ 63.

Thus, the 'condition' which has been applied, in a general sense, is for a woman to work in a traditionally 'male' occupation, such as lorry driving, rather than in one of a traditionally 'female' nature, such as cooking, in order to obtain the higher pay. Obviously, some women can do so, but such a requirement hits disproportionately at women since, in practice, they will be less likely to enter the 'male' occupation owing to tradition, discrimination against them—perceived and real—in such occupations and social conditioning. Identifying such a 'condition' should suffice to raise an inference of indirect discrimination which, of course, would be open theoretically to rebuttal by an objective justification. To go further as the EAT appeared to do in Enderby and require identification of some specific condition which the particular employer has imposed is to misunderstand the nature of equal pay claims and the scheme of the Act which is predicated on the assumption that it is not pure coincidence that some jobs done predominantly by women are paid less than those done predominantly by men. In other words, the 'condition' should be assumed to apply to a largely female profession; the question is whether the difference in pay can be justified and it may be argued that where a particular occupation is staffed predominantly by women and is of equal value to one staffed predominantly by men but there is a wide disparity in pay, it would be hard for the employer, if not impossible, to show that the difference arose from anything other than the mere fact that one occupation was female dominated. In any event, it is clear that the fact of separate bargaining processes merely amounts to a smoke screen obscuring the traditional operation of market forces founding the difference in pay and therefore clearly should not be able to justify it, given that the legislation was introduced in order to interfere with, rather than bow to, market forces.

The material factor defence could potentially be seen as operating at three different levels of generality. First, it might only arise where a difference in the 'personal equation' of the man and the woman, such as length of experience or qualifications, could be identified. This was the approach rejected in Rainey. Secondly, a factor might be identified going beyond the personal equation of the complainant, but still amounting to a non-sex-based difference between her and her comparator. At the present time this is the predominant approach. The most significant factor of this type and the one most likely to undermine the equal pay scheme is the 'market forces' factor, which received some endorsement from the ECJ in Enderby. This factor is, however, subject to a rigorous application of the Bilka test; it does not mean that the laws of supply and demand can simply determine the rates of pay in question. Nevertheless, adoption of this approach may tend to undermine the aim of the Act as removing pay discrimination. Thirdly—and this defence would be available only in respect of equal value claims because of the wider wording applicable—there might be scope for a number of market-based arguments not based on a difference between the man's and the woman's case, such as using the leap frogging argument from Hayward as being in itself a material factor, although arising only from the general operation of the concern in question. This possibility has not yet been put forward; it would, of course, be out of harmony with the policy of the Act and arguably could not be termed an 'objectively justified reason' under the Bilka test. The complexities of the second approach, which the courts are currently trying to get to grips with, illustrate the difficulty adverted to at the beginning of this chapter of ensuring that only morally justifiable differentiation occurs.

6 VICTIMISATION²⁰⁴

Under the relevant statutes, victimisation occurs when a discriminator treats a person less favourably for taking action or aiding in an action under the RRA or SDA or EPA or DDA—for doing a ‘protected act’. The provisions under s 2 of the RRA and s 55 of the DDA are almost identical to the equivalent ‘victimisation’ provisions under s 4 of the SDA and have the same aim—to deter employers and others from dismissing or treating adversely someone who undertakes a ‘protected act’ or aids another in doing so.

In order to determine whether the unfavourable treatment is linked to the protected act, it is necessary to ask whether the claimant would have been subjected to the treatment but for performing the protected act. In order to decide this question, it must be asked how a comparable person would have been treated. According to the findings in *Aziz v Trinity St Taxis*²⁰⁵ the comparison must be between a person who has done the act and a person who has not, not between a person who has done the act and a person who has taken action under other legislation. This stance was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in *Brown v TNT Express Worldwide (UK) Ltd*²⁰⁶ and by the House of Lords in Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police v Khan.²⁰⁷

Following *Aziz v Trinity St Taxis*²⁰⁸ there has to be a clear causal relationship between the action brought and the unfavourable treatment. Aziz, a taxi driver and a member of Trinity Street Taxis (TST), thought that TST were unfairly treating him and made a tape recording of a conversation to prove it. He took his claim of race discrimination to an industrial tribunal, but it failed. He was then expelled from TST and claimed victimisation. The Court of Appeal considered the question of causation: had TST treated him less favourably by reason of what he had done in making the tapes with a view to bringing a race discrimination case, or had it expelled him because of the breach of trust involved in making the tapes? It was found that the necessary causal relationship was not established; it was not apparent that TST were influenced in their decision to expel him by the fact that the tapes were made in order to bring a race relations case; they would have expelled him anyway because of the breach of trust. This was a fine distinction to make and it is arguable that once a plaintiff has shown that unfavourable treatment has prima facie some causal relationship with a protected act, some causal potency, the burden of proof should shift to the employer to show that it was entirely unrelated to that act.

Under s 4(1) of the SDA, less favourable treatment of someone because she has done a ‘protected act’—brought an action or intends to do so or has assisted in such action under the 1975 Act or the EPA—amounts to victimisation. The usefulness of 204 For discussion of the victimisation provisions see Ellis, E and Miller, CJ, ‘The victimization of anti-discrimination complainants’ [1992] PL 80.

205 [1988] WLR 79; [1988] 2 All ER 860.

206 [2001] ICR 182.

207 (2001) The Times, 16 October, HL; [2000] IRLR 324; [2000] ICR 1169, CA.

208 [1988] WLR 79; [1988] 2 All ER 860.

this provision has been diminished owing to the need to show that the unfavourable treatment is solely due to the protected act and not in part for some other reason.²⁰⁹ It may often be hard to prove that this is the case and this is particularly unfortunate owing to evidence which is beginning to emerge in both race and sex discrimination cases that in respect of certain professions, including in particular the police, those in authority are becoming more likely to respond to a protected act by bringing disciplinary proceedings which might not otherwise have been undertaken. This occurred when Alison Halford brought discrimination proceedings against, inter alia, Merseyside Police Authority and was probably a factor in her decision to settle the discrimination claim rather than pursue it to a conclusion.²¹⁰ A further barrier to victimisation claims was identified in Wales v Comr of Police for the Metropolis,²¹¹ it was found that unless the first action complained of amounts to actionable discrimination (the action would have succeeded had it been brought), further unfavourable acts occurring owing to the complaint do not fall within s 4(1). This decision may be incorrect and the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Tower Boot Co v Jones*²¹² may ameliorate its impact (since many victimisation claims could be brought as harassment claims), but it does narrow down one avenue leading to possible redress.

Under the DDA, victimisation occurs when a discriminator treats a person, disabled or non-disabled, less favourably for complaining that the DDA has been breached or aiding in that complaint. Following Aziz v Trinity St Taxis,²¹³ there has to be a clear causal relationship between the action brought and the unfavourable treatment.

The approach in victimisation cases may, however, change somewhat as a result of the findings of the House of Lords in Nagarajan v London Regional Transport.²¹⁴ The Lords found that the alleged discriminator need not have the protected act consciously in mind; all it is necessary to show is that an important or significant cause of the less favourable treatment is the fact that he or she had knowledge of the fact that the applicant had done a protected act. Such a formulation of the test, which echoes the test under s 1(1)(1)(a) of the RRA and SDA, might have led to a different result in Aziz since it could have been argued that the employer had the protected act subconsciously in mind. At the least, it makes it clear that the alleged discriminator need not have a conscious motive connected with the relevant legislation and that there may be more than one cause of the unfavourable treatment. Thus, this decision and that in Aziz regarding the choice of comparator afforded greater force to the anti-victimisation provisions of the RRA, which will also extend to the equivalent provisions of the SDA and DDA. However, the decision of the House of Lords in *Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police v Khan*²¹⁵ signalled, to an 209 Aziz v Trinity St Taxis [1988] 2 All ER 860, CA.

210 A similar conclusion was reached in a race discrimination case which was settled in May 1993. Joginder Singh Prem claimed that Nottinghamshire Police had discriminated against him in failing to promote him. They responded by bringing disciplinary charges which were later dismissed. He was awarded a payment of £20,000 in respect of the discrimination and an ex gratia payment of £5,000 in respect of the victimisation, although it was denied. See (1993) The Guardian, 5 May.

211 [1995] IRLR 531. For discussion, see (1997) 26(2) ILJ 158.

212 [1997] ICR 254; [1997] IRLR 168. See above, p 1009.

213 [1988] WLR 79; [1988] 2 All ER 860.

214 [1999] 4 All ER 65; [1999] 3 WLR 425.

215 (2001) The Times, 16 October, HL; [2000] IRLR 324; [2000] ICR 1169, CA.

extent, a change of direction which may detract from that impact. The Lords found that where a person who has made a claim to a tribunal alleging discrimination subsequently applies for another job, it is not victimisation for the current employer to refuse to provide a reference, citing the claim as the reason. The Chief Constable of Khan's force had stated in response to the reference request that he could not comment as to the reference for fear of prejudicing his own case before the tribunal. The Lords reached their conclusion on the ground that although Khan had been unfavourably treated by comparison with other employees who had not done a protected act (in respect of such persons, the reference would have been sent), the treatment was not by reason of his having done the protected act; it was due to the existence of the proceedings which made it reasonable for the Chief Constable to seek to preserve his position. The proper question to be asked was not merely 'But for the protected act would the adverse treatment have occurred?', but to inquire into the motivation of the alleged discriminator. In this instance, the motive concerned the need to preserve his position in relation to the legal claim; he did not, according to the House of Lords, act as he did in refusing to give the reference for the reason that Khan had done a protected act.

The problem with this approach is that it means that initiating a protected act is likely or bound to set in motion a chain of events, allowing an alleged discriminator to claim that it was one of those events, not the act itself, which led to the unfavourable treatment. If the focus of the inquiry is on the motivation of the alleged discriminator and not on the causal relationship between the unfavourable treatment and the protected act, the claim of victimisation may fail where the alleged discriminator can plausibly (and even with factual correctness) argue that he or she was motivated by one of the events set in motion by the doing of the protected act, not the act itself. In relation to this point it can be argued that two persons may be placed in a very difficult position by reason of the doing of the protected act—the alleged discriminator and the alleged victim. In the instant case, the Chief Constable might have prejudiced his position by writing the reference. Equally, Khan may have been adversely affected by the fact that it was not written. He did have an interview for the other post, but was eventually rejected. It is impossible to say whether the rejection was due at least in part to the lack of a reference and to the fact that he was known to be bringing a discrimination claim. Therefore, there is a choice in such instances before the courts. Should the position of the alleged discriminator or that of the alleged victim be protected? If a test of a straightforward causal relationship is used, the latter is likely to be protected. If a subjective test is used, the position of the former will be protected. The policy of the legislation appears to be to protect the position of the latter and, therefore, a causal relationship test should have been used.

But, in future, a person who has brought a discrimination claim will have to suffer the detriment of knowing that while the claim is pending, he or she is in difficulties in applying for another post, thus possibly missing significant opportunities and also being forced to stay in the same workplace in which he has made the claim, which may well be very unpleasant. Thus, the decision of the House of Lords allows a person who has done a protected act to suffer some detriment which is causally linked to the doing of the act. The decision may deter some claimants, precisely the outcome that the legislation appeared to be designed to prevent. In the instant case, it would not have seemed too onerous to expect the police force in question to have put a procedure in place designed to cope with this very situation, such as devolving the writing of the reference to a person not directly implicated in the discrimination claim. If that had any effect on the position of the Chief Constable in relation to the claim, that might be viewed as an inevitable consequence of seeking to protect the position of persons who undertake protected acts. In any event, it is hard to see that it would have such an effect since the person writing the reference would presumably rely on personnel records in order to do so which presumably would be disclosed in any event to the tribunal hearing the claim. But, the net result of the decision in Khan is to allow some detrimental action against persons who have done protected acts.

Flawed as these provisions are, it should be pointed out that they do not appear to cover the employee who is victimised for taking any form of legal action; nor do they apply to post-employment victimisation.²¹⁶ Thus, where a police officer brought an allegation of rape and buggery against a colleague in respect of an alleged off-duty attack, her subsequent vicious and prolonged victimisation at work could not, it was found, be addressed under the anti-victimisation provisions of the SDA,²¹⁷ although it might be said that a clearer example of gross discrimination on grounds of sex could hardly be found. She was, for example, threatened with violence by her Chief Superintendent, forced to undergo psychological analysis, advised to leave the force, harassed, and denied time off work.

This might be an instance in which action under the HRA would provide an alternative possibility. Indeed, the HRA may provide the possibility of curbing victimisation in relation to the taking of legal action in situations ranging far outside the employment context, although admittedly not where the responsibility lies with a private body. Where an applicant has been victimised in a work-related situation, or indeed in any situation for which a public authority has responsibility, such as in an educational institution, as a result of instigating legal action, whether against a colleague or the employer, or perhaps against any person or body, it would be arguable that Art 6 has been breached on the basis that the victimisation is intended to force her to drop the action, thus impairing her exercise of her Art 6 rights.²¹⁸ It could also be argued that where a person has been victimised post-employment on the basis of taking action under the RRA, SDA, or DDA, or on the basis of alleged employment detriment under other legislation on other unprotected grounds, Arts 6 and 14 could be engaged.²¹⁹ The same argument could be made on any protected ground within Art 14, including on the grounds of race, sex or disability, outside the contexts and/or grounds covered by the anti-discrimination legislation. Where victimisation reaches the level of viciousness found in the instance given above, an action based on Art 3 or Art 8²²⁰ could be brought. In all these instances, assuming that the body responsible, directly or indirectly for the victimisation, was a public 216 Adekeye v Post Office (No 2) [1997] IRLR 105.

217 Waters v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1997] IRLR 589.

218 See the discussion in Chapter 2, pp 60–61.

219 On the basis that Art 14 encompasses a number of protected grounds in a non-exhaustive list; see Chapter 2, p 85.

220 Arguably, the treatment to which the woman police officer was subjected could be viewed as analogous to that suffered by the applicants in Lustig-Prean v UK (1999) 7 BHRC 65; Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493. Indeed, it is suggested that it might, unlike the treatment in those instances, fall within the boundaries of Art 3.

authority, the action could be brought directly against it under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. This is clearly a very significant possibility, and since one might have expected the courts, under the impetus of the HRA, to seek to prevent victimisation by private bodies with a view to punishing persons for or preventing them from taking legal action, it is at least possible that eventually a right to take legal action free from victimisation will be discovered to exist arising from common law principle.²²¹

7 LAWFUL DISCRIMINATION

Exclusions from the Sex Discrimination Act²²²

A large number of exclusions were embodied in the Sex Discrimination Act and therefore discrimination in such circumstances was lawful under domestic legislation. Certain occupations were excluded under s 19, which covers employment for the purpose of organised religion, and s 21, which covers mine workers. The armed forces were also excluded under s 85(4), but this exclusion was abolished under ss 21–28 of the Armed Forces Act 1996. Acts safeguarding national security were exempted (s 52), as were acts done under statutory authority (s 7 and s 51). This last provision means that the 1975 Act is of lower status than other statutes, since it is unable to prevail over other statutory provisions relating to the protection of women even though they were passed before it. Thus, statutes intended to enshrine discrimination in their provisions, such as tax, immigration or social security statutes, were not affected by the 1975 Act.²²³ These exceptions have tended to be narrowed owing to the impact of the Equal Treatment Directive. For discussion of lawful discrimination under EU law see below.²²⁴

A general exception to provisions against discrimination in the employment field also arises where sex can be said to be a genuine occupational qualification (GOQ) under one of the s 7 provisions.²²⁵ This arises in a number of contexts, including those where the job appears to call for a man for reasons of physiology (excluding physical strength or stamina)²²⁶ or for reasons of authenticity in respect of plays or other entertainment, or to preserve decency or privacy, or where the job involves dealings with other countries where women are less likely to be able to carry them out effectively because of the customs of that other country. MacKinnon has argued that these exceptions are too broad as extending some way beyond biological differences and accepting differential treatment based solely on social categorisation.²²⁷ On this basis, it is arguable that they are due to be overhauled and 221 There are recent indications that the common law is showing a robustness in providing for protection against discrimination which was not previously evident: see Matadeen and Another v Pointu and Others, Minister of Education and Science and Another [1999] 1 AC 98, but there would be the grave problem of finding an existing cause of action. The alternative is that direct horizontal effect will at some future point be found to arise under the HRA on the basis that a court is a public authority under s 6; see Chapter 4, p 157.

222 For discussion, see Pannick, op cit, fn 27, pp 255–70; McColgan, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 6, pp 346–54.

223 Section 51 was substituted by the Employment Act 1989, s 3, which is of narrower scope. For discussion of provisions intended to protect women, especially in relation to reproductive risks, see Kennedy (1986) 14IJLS 393.

224 See pp 1037–38. See, particularly, the discussion of Johnston v Chief Constable of the RUC [1986] ECR 1651.

225 For analysis of s 7 see Pannick, D (1984) OJLS 198.

226 For criticism of this provision see Pannick, op cit, fn 27, p 238.

227 MacKinnon, op cit, fn 115, pp 121, 180.

narrowed down, particularly the last-mentioned, on the ground that the UK should not bow to discriminatory practices in other countries.

The existing GOQs under s 7 of the SDA are also applied under s 7A in respect of discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment. Further GOQs are applied under s 7B where (a) the job involves the likelihood of performing intimate physical searches pursuant to statutory powers or (b) living in a private home where objection might reasonably be taken to allowing the person in question ‘the degree of physical or social contact with a person living in the home’ or ‘knowledge of intimate details of the person’s life’, or (c) it is necessary to live on premises provided by the employer since it is impracticable for the holder of the job to live elsewhere and objection could be taken to the job holder sharing accommodation with persons of either sex while undergoing gender reassignment; or (d) the job holder provides personal services to vulnerable individuals and the employer reasonably believes that they cannot be effectively provided by a person while undergoing gender reassignment. The GOQs under paras (c) and (d) do not apply to persons whose gender reassignment is complete. It is arguable that the width of these GOQs means that the SDA is not in compliance with the Equal Treatment Directive, in which case, as argued above, the Directive itself could be relied upon or a purposive approach could be adopted to the SDA. If neither the SDA or ETD could be found to apply, the HRA could be relied upon if the action was against a public authority, using ss 6, 7(1)(a) and relying on Art 8.²²⁸

Exclusions from the Race Relations Act²²⁹

Like the SDA, the RRA cannot affect (a) discrimination which falls outside its scope or (b) discrimination enshrined in other statutes, even those which predate it (s 41(1))²³⁰ or (c) discrimination occurring within the scope of a specific exception. In respect of (a) this includes not only racist behaviour falling outside the contexts covered by the Act, but also such behaviour occurring within those contexts but unable to find a legal niche within them owing to the particular wording of the Act. For example, it was found in *De Souza v AA*²³¹ that racial insults, as such, do not amount to ‘unfavourable treatment’ within employment.

Alternatively, one of the exceptions may apply. Exceptions in respect of small premises or partnerships with less than six partners are provided by s 10 and s 32. Under s 75, restrictions on employment in Crown Service are permissible, although the Government has accepted that this provision should be narrowed down.²³² Section 42 provides that nothing in the RRA ‘shall render unlawful an act done for the purpose of safeguarding national security’. Prior to the passing of the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000, s 69(2)(b) provided for the use of ministerial certificates as conclusive evidence that acts or arrangements specified were done 228 See further on this point below, in relation to discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation; pp 1057–58.

229 For discussion see McColgan, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 7, pp 433–45.

230 The scope of s 41 was narrowed by the House of Lords in Hampson v DES [1990] 2 All ER 513 to cover only acts done in necessary performance of an express statutory obligation, not acts done in the exercise of a discretion conferred by the statute.

231 [1986] ICR 514; for comment see Carty (1986) 49 MLR 653; see also Khan v GMC (1993) The Times, 29 March.

232 Government Response to the CRE’s Reform of the RRA 1976 (1998); available at <http://195.44.11.137/coi/coipress.nsf>.

for that purpose. Section 7 of the 2000 Act amends s 42 to add the words 'if the doing of the act was justified for that purpose', and repeals s 69(2)(b).

The Act employs the concept of a genuine occupational qualification (GOQ) under s 5, but the GOQs are of much narrower scope than those arising under the 1975 Act. They come down to two. First, that for reasons of authenticity, a person of a particular racial group must be employed. This might cover plays and restaurants or clubs with a particular national theme. Secondly, the services being provided are aimed at persons of a specific racial group and can most effectively be provided by persons of that same racial group. In *Lambeth BC v CRE*²³³ it was determined that this requirement would be interpreted restrictively: a managerial position which involved little contact with the public would not fulfil it.

8 POSITIVE ACTION²³⁴

The theoretical basis

A significant divergence within equality theory lies between belief in equality of outcome and belief in equal treatment. The two views appear to diverge, since achieving an equal outcome may mean treating persons unequally for a time, as opposed to treating them equally even if that produces unequal results. Nevertheless, it may be argued that such divergence is to an extent more apparent than real, since the underlying aim of providing equal treatment may be to ensure, ultimately, an equal outcome. The conflict between ensuring equality of treatment and furthering equality of outcome by means of positive action appears to be founded on the perception that such action means treating two likes unlike and thereby creating a denial of formal equality. In espousing a very significant principle, equal treatment of two likes or formal equality has a clear, simple and, to an extent, warranted appeal. But, positive action cannot be accommodated within a formal equality model, since such a model only permits unlike (and, presumptively, unfavourable) treatment if difference is identified. In terms of pure theory, positive action has no place within a formal equality model either as an aspect of the equality principle or as an exception to it. In practice, an unsatisfactory compromise may be reached whereby positive action is viewed as an exception to the equality principle. Once that principle has been abandoned, unequal treatment may be meted out. But, apart from the conceptual incoherence of this position, it is suggested that it is unsatisfactory in that it does not readily provide a means of recognising the convergence between equality of outcome and of treatment which is not apparent within the other exceptions to the equality principle.

However, it may be possible to escape from the constraints of formal equality by adopting a substantive as opposed to a formal equality model. Substantive equality recognises that men and women, whites and blacks, may be differently situated, but seeks to prevent both perpetuation of such difference and disadvantage flowing from it. In particular, substantive equality recognises that merely treating like as 233 [1990] IRLR 231, CA.

234 For general discussion, see Edwards, Positive Discrimination, 1987; Sacks, V, 'Tackling discrimination positively in Britain', and Parekh, B, 'The case for positive discrimination', in Hepple and Szyszczak, op cit, fn 1.

like, while ignoring the context within which such treatment is meted out, fails to understand the disadvantages certain groups may be under because of past discrimination, social attitudes and unequal distribution of social benefits. One factor both springing from and underpinning such a situation appears to be a lack of women or blacks in more advantageous and influential employment. Thus, use of positive action may be accommodated within a substantive equality model, since an outcome which both countered prior disadvantage and tended to change the context within which women or members of ethnic minorities take part in employment would be in accordance with such a model.

Forms of positive action and their recognition in national law

Four types of positive action may be identified:²³⁵

- (1) reverse discrimination, which in its most absolute form would mean favourable treatment of a woman or a member of an ethnic minority on the ground of gender or race despite inferior qualification for a job or an inferior claim (in terms of criteria other than race or gender) to a facility such as housing;
- (2) adopting a presumption in favour of appointing a candidate from the disadvantaged group if his or her qualifications were roughly equal to those of a person from the non-disadvantaged group;
- (3) action to promote opportunities for members of the disadvantaged group in order to ensure that its members were in a strong position to compete for employment; or (in its weakest form)
- (4) adoption of equal opportunities policies particularly affecting advertising and recruiting.

At present, there is no scope for positive action in the first two forms under the SDA and RRA, while scope for the third form is extremely limited. Acts done to meet the special needs of certain racial groups (such as by the provision of English language classes) in regard to education, welfare and training are permissible, but such provision can only be made available where there were no or very few members of the group in question doing that work in the UK at the time.²³⁶ Also, under s 37 of the RRA, employers can encourage applications from members of particular racial groups which are under-represented in the workforce. Similarly, s 47(3) of the SDA permits the restriction of access to training facilities to those 'in special need of training by reason of the period for which they have been discharging domestic or family responsibilities'. It should be noted that employers and others are under no duty to make such provision. But, general positive action is unlawful under the wording of s 1(1) of both statutes. Thus, employers can pursue equal opportunities policies such as stating in job advertisements that applications from certain groups will be welcomed, but in general cannot appoint a less well qualified black²³⁷ or woman in order to address under-representation of black people or women caused by past discrimination. Nor can they import a general presumption that a woman or black with roughly equal qualifications to those of other candidates should be appointed.

235 For discussion of forms of positive action see McCrudden (1986) 15ILJ 219.

236 RRA 1976, ss 35–38.

A particular type of positive action known as 'contract compliance', which fell within the third and fourth forms of action identified above and had the potential to produce quite far reaching beneficial effects, was outlawed by the then Conservative Government.²³⁸ Under this method, organs of the State such as local authorities produced a 'check list' of equal opportunities policies and asked the companies with which it was thinking of dealing to show evidence of compliance with such policies. If the company could not show in response that certain procedures were in place intended to combat racism or sexism, it lost business. Parliament has, however, left intact a limited power to vet potential contractors as regards their race relations record,²³⁹ presumably because the previous government viewed race discrimination as more serious or politically contentious than gender discrimination.

The RRA, after amendment by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 (which inserted a new s 71 into the 1976 Act), places a general duty on public authorities to 'eliminate unlawful racial discrimination' and to 'promote equality of opportunity and good relations between persons of different racial groups'. This general duty will be supported by specific duties set out in subordinate legislation and those specific duties will be enforceable by the CRE. The specific duties appear to allow for positive action of types (3) and (4), indicated above. Guidance will be offered by Codes of Practice to be promulgated by the CRE under s 71C. The CRE can seek to enforce the specific duties by issuing a compliance notice under s 71D. It will require the person in question to comply with the specific duty and can also require the person to furnish the CRE with information in order to verify that the duty has been complied with. A court order can be obtained under s 71E to force the public authority to furnish the information and to comply with any requirement of the notice.

Positive action favouring women under EU law

Given the recent increase in the use of positive action within some Member States of the Community and the acceptance of the need for such action by the European Council and Parliament (see Council Recommendation 84/635 EEC, below, and para 26 of the Advocate General's Opinion in Kalanke below) and in much of the relevant literature²⁴⁰ the decision in Case 450/93 Kalanke v Freie Hansestadt Bremen^{240a} was highly significant in terms of its ability to affect an emerging tendency.

Within the Equal Treatment Directive positive action is viewed, under Art 2(4), as a derogation from the equal treatment principle which must, it seems, be looked at in the same light as the other derogations from that principle under Art 2(2) and (3). The exception under Art 2(2) is applicable to occupations in which the sex of the worker is a determining factor; Art 2(3) covers the provision of special protective measures for women, particularly those relating to pregnancy and maternity. The conceptual similarity between the derogations was confirmed and made explicit 237 In Riyat v London Borough of Brent (1983) (cited in IDS Employment Law Handbook 28, 1984, p 57) it was held that discrimination in favour of black job applicants was unlawful.

238 Under the Local Government Act 1988, s 17; for criticism, see Townshend-Smith, op cit, fn 27, pp 237–38.

239 The 1988 Act, s 18.

240 See, eg, Morris G, and Deakin, S, Labour Law, 1995, Chapter 6, p 589.

240a [1995] IRLR 660. For discussion see Shiek, D (1996) 25ILJ 239.

by the Advocate General and, to a lesser extent, by the Court of Justice in Kalanke; the decisions in Case 318/86 *Commission v France*²⁴¹ and Case 222/84 *Johnston v Chief Constable of the RUC*²⁴² on Art 2(3) and (4) are therefore relevant for comparative purposes.

The decision in Case 318/86 Commission v France concerned in part a quota system used to allot only 10–30% of posts to women in the French national police and prison service, regardless of their performance in the recruitment competition. The system was therefore intended to ensure that men overwhelmingly outnumbered women in these services. The French Government sought to justify this policy within Art 2(2) on the ground that appointing an ‘excessive proportion of women’ would ‘seriously damage the credibility’ of the police corps since it would have difficulty in maintaining public order. The Court of Justice found that certain activities within the police service could properly be performed by men only, but that this could not provide justification for a system of recruitment which left it unclear whether the quotas operating for each sex actually corresponded to the specific activities for which the sex of the person in question constituted a determining factor. The lack of transparency—the fact that no objective criteria determining the quotas laid down were available—made it impossible to verify such correspondence. This part of the Court’s decision, therefore, left open the possibility of allocating men and women to different specific activities and thereby excluding women from certain areas of employment on grounds which, it would appear, were in themselves non-transparent, since the assumption that women police officers would be unable to carry out effectively activities intended to maintain public order was in itself untested. In effect, one non-transparent factor—the system of recruitment—cloaked another; the first such factor was rejected, but the second accepted. The other part of the decision concerned direct discrimination within the system of promotion to the post of head warder within the French prison corps. The Court found that having regard to the need to provide opportunities for promotion within the corps of warders’ (p 3580, para 17) justification for the discrimination could be found. This finding was made despite acceptance by the Court that sex was not a determining factor for the appointment of governors owing to the administrative nature of the job.

A similar position was taken in Case 222/84 Johnston v Chief Constable of the RUC in which the Court found that Art 2(2) might in principle allow a wide derogation from the principle of equal treatment since ‘in a situation characterised by serious internal disturbances the carrying of firearms by policewomen [in the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC)] might create additional risks of their being assassinated and might therefore be contrary to the requirements of public safety’ (para 16). Thus, the sex of the worker could be a ‘determining factor’ in making appointments to posts which necessitated carrying arms. However, the national court might only rely on this derogation if it ensured compliance with the proportionality rule. It was for the national court to determine whether proportionality had been observed and therefore the Court did not give an opinion on the matter (para 9). In contrast to this stance, the Court took a narrow view of Art 2(3), finding that it would not allow a reduction of the rights of women on the basis of a need for protection

241 [1989] 3 CMLR 663; [1988] ECR 3559.
242 [1986] ECR 1651.

'whose origin is socio-cultural or even political' (p 1659, para 8). It thereby created an appearance of accepting substantive equality arguments, but abandoned them in favour of focusing on special female vulnerability in relation to Art 2(2), readily accepting the assumption that women were more at risk than men and that women police officers could therefore be confined to other duties of a narrower, family-oriented nature. In a manner recalling the position taken in Commission v France, the Court did not appear to recognise that there was a contradiction in rejecting a potential basis for derogation on the ground that it was founded on socio-cultural considerations, but opening the way to acceptance of another which appeared to be equally open to such criticism.

The decision in Kalanke v Freie Hansestadt Bremen concerned a quota system which was in a sense the converse of that in question in Commission v France in that it ensured positive action in favour of women. In the German public services, an appointing procedure had been adopted whereby women with the same qualifications as men had to be given automatic priority in sectors in which they were under-represented. In evaluating qualifications family, work, social commitment or unpaid activity could be taken into account if relevant to the performance of the duties in question. Under-representation was deemed to exist when women did not make up at least half the staff in the individual pay brackets in the relevant personnel group or in the function levels provided for in the organisation chart. Mr Kalanke was not approved for promotion under this procedure and sought a ruling from the Bundesarbeitsgericht that the quota system was incompatible with the German basic law and the German civil code. The Bundesarbeitsgericht considered that no such incompatibility arose since the system only favoured women where candidates of both sexes were equally qualified and, further, that the quota system was interpreted in accordance with German basic law which meant that although in principle priority in promotions should be given to women, exceptions must be made in appropriate cases. However, since the national court was uncertain whether the system was in accord with the Equal Treatment Directive, it referred to the European Court of Justice questions relating to the scope of the derogations permitted to the principle of equal treatment under the Directive.

The court found that the quota system created direct discrimination within Art 2(1) but that it might be permissible under Art 2(4), basing this finding on the ruling from Commission v France cited by the Advocate General (para 18). It approved the finding of the Council in the third recital in the preamble to Recommendation 84/635/EEC of 13 December 1984 in relation to positive action (OJ 1984 L331, p 34) that 'existing legal provisions on equal treatment...are inadequate for the elimination of all existing inequalities unless parallel action is taken by government...and other bodies...to counteract the prejudicial effects on women in employment which arise from social attitudes, behaviour and structures' (para 20). It then went on to find, citing Johnston, that derogations from the equality principle must be narrowly construed and that national rules which guarantee women 'unconditional priority' go beyond promoting equal opportunities and overstep the limits of the exception in Art 2(4). Although the Court found that Art 2(4) permits 'national measures relating to access to employment, including promotion, which give a specific advantage to women with a view to improving their ability to compete on the labour market' (para 19), it did not find that the promotion scheme at issue fell within the exception. This conclusion was apparently founded on the distinction it drew between equality of opportunity and equality of outcome in finding that the quota system 'substitutes for equality of opportunity the result which is only to be arrived at by providing such equality of opportunity'. It therefore found that national rules of the type in question are precluded by Art 2(1) and (4).

As this ruling and the Opinion of the Advocate General make clear, the Equal Treatment Directive encapsulates a view of equality under Art 2(1) which impliedly finds inequality of outcome acceptable so long as equal treatment is accorded. Positive action aimed at reducing such inequality must be seen as an exception to the equal treatment principle: the relationship between the two can be viewed only in negative terms under Art 2(4). The Directive therefore creates a conceptual separation between positive action and the equality principle which necessitates characterising such action as direct discrimination which may be susceptible to justification only within the specified exception.²⁴³ There is therefore, it seems, no room for an argument from principle in favour of equality of outcome as an aspect of the equality principle encapsulated under the Directive. (It may be noted that this stance is out of accord with the UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women 1979 Art 4(1), which provides that 'the adoption of temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality between men and women shall not be considered discrimination'.)

As the Advocate General observed, the stance of the Directive under Art 2(1) reflects a formal equality position. A formal equality model only permits unlike (and, presumptively, unfavourable) treatment if difference is identified. Nevertheless, as the Advocate General pointed out, positive action may be viewed as furthering substantive as opposed to formal equality. However, the Advocate General appeared to view substantive equality measures as confined to those which would allow individual women to compete with men on a formal equality basis. He did not appear to recognise that furtherance of substantive equality demands that the context within which such competition takes place must change. As MacKinnon has argued,²⁴⁴ substantive equality recognises that the context within which women take part in employment may place them under a disadvantage owing to past discrimination, social attitudes and a gendered social situation. Positive action may be viewed not as compensating women for historical disadvantage, but as an effective means of allowing its effects to be more rapidly overcome in future. In finding that the quota system could not fall within Art 2(4), the court and the Advocate General failed to give weight to the substantive equality argument that the social context within which women undertake employment, which is influenced by the imbalance between women and men in senior or more influential posts, tends to perpetuate inequality. Although the Court found that certain measures giving a specific advantage to women would be permissible within Art 2(4), it considered that measures used to address such an imbalance could not be seen as a means of creating a reduction in the 'actual instances of inequality which may exist in the reality of social life'. The position adopted appeared to be contradictory since it accepted that ensuring equality of 'starting points' would not lead to achieving substantive equality and yet viewed substantive equality as the ultimate objective of providing equal opportunities (para 14).

243 See Ellis, 'The definition of discrimination in European Community sex equality law' (1994) 19 EL Rev 563–80, pp 567–68; Hepple, B, 'Can direct discrimination be justified?' (1994) 55 EOR 48.

244 MacKinnon, C, Towards a feminist Theory of the State, 1989; MacKinnon, C, 'Reflections on sex equality under law' (1991) 100 Yale LJ 1281.

The Opinion of the Advocate General and the judgment of the Court also reveal, it is suggested, a contradiction in the application of the proportionality principle. The Court, unlike the Advocate General, did not expressly apply that principle in finding that the limits of Art 2(4) had been overstepped. However, that finding in itself involved, it is suggested, application of the proportionality principle: the quota system appeared to fall within the Court's interpretation of Art 2(4) but created, in the view of the court, too great an offence to the equality principle owing to its unconditional nature. In Johnston, in contrast, the Court found that the national court might only rely on the derogation under Art 2(2) if it ensured compliance with the proportionality rule, but that ensuring such compliance was a matter for the national court to decide and therefore the Court did not give an opinion on the matter (para 9). However, it also found that in determining the scope of the derogation, proportionality must be observed (para 38), implying that making such a determination would not be a matter solely within the jurisdiction of the national court. Comparing the findings within these two lines of case law, it is suggested that the point at which the Court of Justice accepts that the principle of proportionality allows a derogation to apply, thereby leaving the determination as to compliance with proportionality in the particular instance to the national court, is unclear; the two exercises of jurisdiction are in danger of being unclearly demarcated, laying the court open to the charge that the principle is being used to excuse either intervention or failure to intervene in national policies in a non-transparent and subjective fashion.

If the findings in Kalanke and Johnston are inconsistent as regards the demarcation between the point at which proportionality becomes a matter for the national court and the point at which it remains a matter for the Court of Justice, it is suggested that the use made of the proportionality principle in Kalanke to find that the derogation under Art 2(4) did not apply is also incompatible with the view taken in Johnston that proportionality would be sufficiently adhered to in allowing the policy in question to fall within the Art 2(2) derogation. This may also be said, it is suggested, of the ruling in Commission v France in so far as aspects of the systems at issue in that case were found to fall within Art 2(2). It is contended that it would have been open to the court in Kalanke, basing itself on the previous line of case law, to find that proportionality would be sufficiently observed in bringing the quota system within the scope of the derogation and, further, that the case for so doing was stronger than in either of the other two instances. This is contended taking into account the extent to which the policies at issue in Johnston and Commission v France created inequality of treatment and the extent to which they were found to be subject to justification

The German quota system was dependent on equality of qualifications and, according to the national court, would not be rigidly adhered to. In contrast, the policy considered in Johnston operated on the same basis as reverse discrimination since it was unable to take account of the fact that the qualifications of women applicants might be superior to those of male applicants. That policy created a greater affront to the equality principle than the German system in that it aimed at creating a complete imbalance between men and women in the body of police in question, thereby ensuring inequality of treatment and of outcome, whereas under the German system it seemed probable that ensuring equality of outcome would have led eventually to equality of treatment, once the imbalance in certain sectors of the German Civil Service had been corrected. Moreover, in contrast to the position in Johnston and in relation to the post of governor under the French system, the German quota rules did not preclude applications from men for the posts in question.

The justification underpinning the French public service quota system arose from the view that disorder would be less readily contained if an imbalance between men and women in the police service was not maintained, basing this view on an untested assumption regarding the possibility that the presence of a certain number of female police officers might detrimentally affect the power of the police to control disorder. This assumption was accepted by the Commission (p 3581, para 23) and the Court in relation to specific activities, but it is suggested that the means adopted were not clearly an appropriate means of achieving the end in question or necessary to that end (the test for proportionality from Johnston, para 38). The same criticism may be levelled, it is submitted, at the justification advanced to defend the UK policy for the RUC, namely that reserving posts exclusively for men would ensure that persons in those posts would be subject to a lesser risk of assassination. In contrast, it is suggested that adoption of positive action in Kalanke would have been likely to contribute to achieving the desired outcome: as the Advocate General accepted, the imposition of quotas 'is an instrument which is certainly suitable for bringing about a quantitative increase in female employment' (para 9).

It is further suggested that if one applies the 'very logic underlying the derogations', which according to the Advocate General is aimed at 'ensuring the efficacy of the principle of equal treatment' (para 17) to the German quota system, it may be found to cause less affront to that principle than the systems at issue in the other two rulings. As argued above, the German system was in accordance with substantive equality in that it sought to achieve an outcome which would counter past disadvantage and it recognised the real and gendered situation in which women take part in employment. In contrast, it is suggested that in both Johnston and Commission v France the Court allowed the national authorities some discretion as to permitted exceptions from the equality principle on grounds which failed to further either formal or substantive equality. Thus, acceptance of positive action could have been seen merely as a means of moving more speedily towards a desired outcome and therefore, in contrast to the position taken in both the previous decisions, the offence to the equality principle could have been viewed as less significant. By this means, the Court could have recognised the distinction between the exception under Art 2(4) and the other two exceptions. Once the offence to the equality principle created by the German quota system is balanced, as indicated here, against the underlying justifications for it, it is suggested that scope can be created for finding that Art 2(4) was applicable.

However, in Case C-409/95 *Marschall v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen*²⁴⁵ the Court found that a quota system allowing affirmative action was lawful on the basis that it was conditional (para 33 of the judgment). The Court said (para 29) 'even where male and female candidates are equally qualified males tend to be promoted... particularly because of prejudices and stereotypes concerning the role and capacities of women in working life ...'. So a rule can fall within Art 2(4) if it counteracts the prejudicial effect on women of those prejudices (para 31). But since it is a derogation, it must be strictly construed, and so it must contain a proviso (as did the scheme at issue) allowing men to be promoted or employed if special circumstances apply (paras 32 and 33). In taking this stance, the Court appears to have adopted the course the Court left open to it (as argued above) in Kalanke. Similarly, in *Badek and Others v Landesanwalt beim Staatgerichtshof des Landes Hessen*²⁴⁶ the Court found that the ETD does not preclude a rule applying in public service sectors where women are under-represented which gives priority to women where male and female candidates are equally qualified so long as an objective assessment of the candidates is carried out which takes account of their specific personal situations.

Article 141 of the Treaty, as amended by the Amsterdam Treaty, replaced Art 119, which provided for equal pay for work of equal value. Article 141 makes the same provision, but para 3 empowers the Council to adopt measures to ensure the application of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment including (emphasis added) the equal pay principle. Thus, measures may be adopted going beyond the provision of equal pay. Paragraph 4 provides:

...the principle of equal treatment shall not prevent any Member State from maintaining or adopting measures providing for specific advantages in order to make it easier for the under-represented sex to pursue a vocational activity or to prevent or compensate for disadvantages in their professional careers.

This wording differs from that used in Art 2(4) of the Equal Treatment Directive since, inter alia, the word 'opportunities' which was central to the findings in Kalanke is not used: it speaks instead of making it easier for the under-represented sex to pursue a Vocational activity' or preventing or compensating for disadvantages in professional careers. But the term 'specific advantages' is reminiscent of the terms used by the Advocates General in Kalanke and Marschall, and may imply that covert disadvantages are outside the scope of the provisions. Indeed, the paragraph could be interpreted simply as seeking to ensure equality of starting points in the manner of para 2(4) as interpreted in these two instances. But it seems to have been adopted in response to Kalanke, and wording which is deliberately different from that used in Art 2(4) has been used. Thus, Art 141 appears to be in accordance with the findings of the Court in Marschall and may even go beyond them.

Thus, forms of positive action, in the sense in which that term is usually understood, are lawful in the Community so long as provisos apply. Positive action in the form of training opportunities may also be lawful within Art 2(4), but since, in referring to the areas covered in Art 1(1), Art 2(4) covers training in apparent contradistinction to access to employment and promotion, it would appear that measures going beyond allowing special training opportunities should be covered. The Advocate General mentioned positive action in the form of the development of child care structures, but this begs the question why such measures should be viewed as positive action, as opposed to being offered to all carers of children, men and women. Offering such measures only to women reinforces the perception not only that they are more expensive employees, but also that they should shoulder the main burden of responsibility in caring for children.

The main barrier to acceptance of positive action within the Equal Treatment Directive is created by its restrictive approach, which allows such action to be scrutinised only as an exception to the equality principle. Nevertheless, adoption of a broad approach to Art 2(4), similar to that taken in relation to Art 2(2) in Johnston and Commission v France, allowed the accommodation within the Directive of forms of positive action in Marschall. Such an approach can be justified in relation to Art 2(4), although not in relation to Art 2(2), on the basis that it provides a means of recognising the limitations of the formal equality approach.

Goals and timetables in the UK

The Government has not committed itself to the establishment of quotas on the lines of that considered in Marschall; it has instead preferred an approach relying on 'goals and timetables'. In July 1998, a target of a 50:50 male/female appointment ratio for men and women in public life, based on merit, was established.²⁴⁷ In its White Paper Modernising Government it committed itself to a pro rata representation of ethnic minority groups in public appointments and to targets of 35% women in the top 3,000 Civil Service posts and 25% in the top 600. It also committed itself to a target of 3.2% of ethnic minority post-holders in the top 3,000 posts and stated that an equivalent target would be set for disabled persons.

In one context—the crucial one of parliamentary representation—the current Labour Government has gone further than merely setting non-statutory, voluntary goals. The Government brought forward legislation to amend the SDA to allow for all-women short lists in order to increase the representation of women in Parliament to a ratio of 50:50 women MPs.²⁴⁸ The Conservative Party, although concerned at the gross underrepresentation of women in its group of MPs, has made no proposal likely to have any significant impact in changing the representation, while the Liberal Democrats voted against introducing all-women short-lists in their Autumn 2001 conference. They are therefore likely to remain in the same position as the Conservative Party in this respect.

The duty of reasonable adjustment under the DDA

The DDA does not cover indirect discrimination, but the duty of reasonable adjustment bears some resemblance to the indirect discrimination provisions discussed. It also represents a form of positive action, since the duty creates obligations to take positive steps to seek to remedy certain disadvantages that 247 Press release of a speech by Joan Ruddock, Minister for Women, at a TUC Conference, 9 July 1999—www.dss.gov.uk/hq/press/1998/july98/186.htm.

248 The Sex Discrimination (Election Candidates) Bill 2001, which received its first reading in the Commons on 17.10.01. The intention is to reverse the decision in Jepson and Dyas-Elliott v the Labour Party [1996] IRLR 116, in which it was found that the use of all-women short-lists created unlawful discrimination against men.

disabled persons might be under. The duty is placed on employers, on providers of services and on providers of education at all levels. The idea is to outlaw practices which, while neutral on their face as between disabled and non-disabled people, place some disabled people at a substantial disadvantage.

Under s 5, the DDA will be breached if the employer fails to comply with a duty of reasonable adjustment and it cannot show that the failure to comply is justified. Section 6 provides that if arrangements made by the employer or physical features of the employer's premises 'place the disabled person at a substantial disadvantage in comparison with persons who are not disabled, it is the duty of the employer to take such steps as it is reasonable in the circumstances of the case for him to take to prevent the arrangements or feature having that effect'.

Under s 6(3), a non-exhaustive list of examples of adjustments is given. Such adjustment might include, for example, making adjustments to premises, making alterations to working procedures or hours, allowing absence for rehabilitation, assessment or treatment. In practice, such adjustments might mean providing Braille keyboards, installing ramps or lifts, or sanitary facilities with disabled access. In *Morse v Wiltshire CC*²⁴⁹ it was made clear that the duty of the employer involves the taking of a number of sequential steps. It must first be asked whether there is a duty to adjust. Secondly, it must be considered whether the employer has taken reasonable steps to make the adjustment, and thirdly, whether any failure to take the steps can be justified.

A duty of adjustment also arises under s 19 in relation to the provision of goods and services. Under s 19, a service provider discriminates under the Act if he refuses to provide to the disabled person a service he provides to other members of the public. Section 21 provides that if the service provider has a practice that makes it impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled persons to make use of a service which he provides to other members of the public, it is the duty of the provider to take such steps as it is reasonable in the circumstances of the case for him to take to prevent the practice having that effect. This means adjustment to current means of service provision, including provision of auxiliary aids and availability of alternative means of delivering a service. Unlike the provisions in respect of employment, which do not apply to businesses with fewer than 15 staff, the service provisions apply across the board. However, this requirement is qualified by the need to make only 'reasonable' adaptation. Thus, for example, a large restaurant chain might be expected to provide menus in Braille, but a small high street café might satisfy this requirement by having a waiter read out the menu.

Thus, the DDA will also be breached if the provider of services fails to comply with the duty of reasonable adjustment, depending on what is reasonable in the circumstances. A shop owner who refused to allow guide dogs on the premises would breach the DDA, although she could refuse to allow all other animals to enter. The duty might also mean that a café should display a price list in large type, an estate agents or bank might need to install an induction loop for those with impaired hearing. It might mean merely ensuring that a member of staff was available to open a door to a disabled person or to retrieve articles from high shelves.

There is quite a lot of evidence suggesting that these requirements have not been brought to the attention of service providers. The Chairman of the National Disability Council, the official advisory body on disability (now replaced by the Disability Rights Commission),²⁵⁰ has expressed concern that many businesses, especially small ones, were not aware of the requirements of the Act.²⁵¹ For example, a survey commissioned by the Guide Dogs for the Blind Association found in October 2001 that thousands of pubs and restaurants continue to refuse to accept guide dogs; only two respondents to the survey of 500 publicans and restaurateurs said that they were aware of the law.²⁵² Companies such as large supermarket operators are aware of the law, but tend to under-enforce it. For example, supermarkets provide disabled parking, but clearly prefer to use persuasive ('talking' spaces) rather than coercive means (wheel clamps) to prevent non-disabled drivers using the disabled spaces.

Under ss 28C and 28T the DDA, as amended by the 2001 Act, will be breached if the provider of education in question fails to comply with a duty of reasonable adjustment and he cannot show that the failure to comply is justified. Sections 28C and T provide that if arrangements made by the provider for admission to the institution in question and in relation to the services provided 'place the disabled person at a substantial disadvantage in comparison with persons who are not disabled', it is the duty of the provider to take such steps as it is reasonable for it to have to take to prevent that effect from occurring. The steps that should be taken do not require schools, under s 28C(2), to alter or remove a physical feature or provide auxiliary aids or services; the precise steps to be taken in schools will be determined by regulations to be made under s 28C(3). Examples of adjustments to be made in schools would include timetabling lessons on the ground floor if there is no lift and bringing library books to a disabled pupil if the library is inaccessible.²⁵³ No provision states that higher or further educational institutions need not make physical alterations or provide auxiliary aids, which suggests that their duty of reasonable adjustment may be more far reaching than that placed on schools. In determining the steps to be taken the institution must, under s 28T(2), have regard to a code of practice issued under s 53A of the DDA.

It is suggested that the duties placed on educational institutions by the 2001 Act, while closing a significant gap in the DDA provision, are of quite a qualified and indeterminate kind. In this respect the 2001 Act continues the stance adopted by the DDA itself.

9 EFFICACY OF THE INDIVIDUAL METHOD

Remedies

The main weakness of the individual method arises from the various remedies available in discrimination cases which (apart from an award of equal pay) are 250 See below, p 1049.

251 See The Guardian, 29 September 1999.

252 See The Guardian, 3 October 2001.

253 Standing Committee B Fourth Sitting Col 151, 29 March 2001.

generally perceived as inadequate,²⁵⁴ as are the means of enforcing them. Under the RRA, SDA and DDA a tribunal can award a declaration which simply states the rights of the applicant and the respect in which the employer has breached the law. It can also award an action recommendation which will be intended to reduce the effect of the discrimination. However, the EAT in *British Gas plc v Sharma*²⁵⁵ held that this could not include a recommendation that the applicant be promoted to the next suitable vacancy since this would amount to positive discrimination. It has, however, been pointed out that this would merely be putting the person in the position he or she should have been in rather than giving them a special preference.²⁵⁶ The tribunal can also award compensation which will be determined on the same basis as in other tort cases. It will be awarded for pecuniary loss and injury to feelings; exemplary damages will not be available. Awards have tended to be low,²⁵⁷ but they have risen since the decision in *Noone*²⁵⁸ in which a consultant who was not appointed on grounds of race was awarded £3,000 for injury to feelings. In Alexander, some guidance as to awarding compensation for injury to feelings was given by May LJ:

...awards should not be minimal because this would tend to trivialise or diminish respect for the public policy to which the Act gives effect. On the other hand...awards should be restrained.

He considered that they should not be set at the same level as damages for defamation and awarded £500 for injured feelings owing to racial discrimination.²⁵⁹ The legislation placed an upper limit on awards which was equivalent to that payable under the compensatory award for unfair dismissal. However, the upper limit on damages in respect of sex discrimination was challenged before the European Court of Justice in Marshall (No 2).²⁶⁰ The ECJ found that the award of compensation in sex discrimination cases brought against organs of the State should be set at a level which would allow the loss sustained to be made good in full. Thus, the Court found that the fixing of an upper limit of this nature was contrary to the principle underlying the Equal Treatment Directive since it was not consistent with the principle of ensuring real equality of opportunity. In response to this decision, the upper limits for compensation under the SDA and RRA were abolished.²⁶¹ The result has been a dramatic increase in the size of awards. For example, in Johnson v HM Prison Service and Others,²⁶² an award of £28, 500 was upheld on appeal. It was found that the award was not excessive in the circumstances; severe victimisation on racial grounds had occurred. It may be noted that this is currently the highest UK award made in a racial harassment case. No compensation is payable in respect of indirect discrimination unless there has been 254 See Lustgarten (1980), op cit, fn 42, pp 225–28; Cotterrell [1981] PL 469, p 475; McColgan, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 5, pp 280–88.

255 [1991] ICR 19; [1991] IRLR 101.

256 See Rubenstein [1991] IRLR 99.

257 Gregory notes that in 40% of cases, the award was less than £200 and in only 29% did it exceed £1,000 (Gregory, op cit, fn 1, pp 80–81).

258 [1988] ICR 813; [1988] 83 IRLR 195.

259 [1988] 1WLR 968, CA.

260 [1993] QB 126; [1993] 3 WLR 1054; [1993] 4 All ER 586; [1993] IRLR 445, EC; [1994] 1 All ER 736, HL.

261 SI 1993/2798; Race Relations Remedies Act 1994.

262 (1996) The Times, 31 December. In a race discrimination case, Virdi v MPS (see (2001) The Guardian, 14 February) Virdi received £350,000 compensation.

an intention to discriminate; this exclusion from the compensation scheme has been much criticised²⁶³ and may contravene European law.²⁶⁴ It seems fairly clear that awards made at the levels mentioned prior to the Marshall (No 2) decision were unlikely to deter employers from discrimination or to affect deeply rooted discriminatory ideologies in institutions.

It is fairly common for the defendant to fail to comply with the award²⁶⁵ and, if so, the applicant must return to court in order to enforce it. If an action recommendation has not been complied with, the tribunal will award compensation, but only if compensation could have been awarded at the original hearing. As this is unlikely to be the case in an indirect discrimination claim, no remedy will be available except to apply to the CRE or the EOC alleging persistent discrimination.

Success rate of applications

The individual method has so far had only limited success in bringing about change. Gregory notes that in 1976, only 40% of applications in respect of sex discrimination were heard and 10% were successful, while in the same year 45% of applications in respect of race discrimination were heard and 3.4% were successful.²⁶⁶ The number of applications began to decline from 1976 onwards, although it rose again in the 1990s.²⁶⁷ Possibly, the decline may have occurred because the success rate was so low that applicants were deterred from bringing a claim in the first place. In other words, the number of applications may have been self-limiting: only the very determined applicants would pursue cases all the way to a hearing. Of course, the decline in the rate of applications may have been partly attributable to the initial rush to attack very blatant examples of sexism and racism, which died away as employers and others began to ensure that policies enshrining such values were either abolished or made less overt.

Less than half of the applications are heard; there is obviously a strong tendency to give up a claim half way through. There may be a number of reasons why cases are not brought, why they are abandoned and why the success rate is so low. Obviously, the applicant is in a very vulnerable position; the position of the parties is usually unequal, especially if an applicant is bringing the claim against his or her employer. The applicant will be afraid of being labelled a troublemaker, perhaps of being sacked or of losing promotion prospects. There may be continual pressure not only on the applicant but on any workmates who have consented to act as witnesses in the claim and they may withdraw their consent to act. The weakness of the remedies is unlikely to encourage claims and the complexity and technicality of the substantive law may also act as a deterrent. It may do so in any event, but coupled with the lack of legal aid, the task facing the applicant may appear overwhelming.

263 See, eg, Townshend-Smith, op cit, fn 27, p 206.

264 In Von Colson v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen [1984] ECR 1891 the Court held that any sanction must have a real deterrent effect. See also Marshall (No 2), fn 260, above.

265 Leonard, Judging Inequality, 1987, found that almost 50% of applicants reported delay in getting the employer to pay the compensation (pp 27–29).

266 Gregory, op cit, fn 1, pp 87–88.

267 The Equality Challenge, EOC Annual Report for 1991; it showed an increase of 40% in applications in that year.

These two factors are exacerbated by and also contribute to the lack of experience tribunal members have of discrimination cases. The applicant may be aided by the Equal Opportunities Commission or the Commission for Racial Equality of the Disability Rights Commission. However, the EOC and CRE have had to refuse the majority of applications owing to their lack of funds. This leads to a poor quality of decision making and to the charge that the employers' lawyers may manipulate the members of the tribunal because of their lack of experience in the area. Thus, a vicious circle is set up. The tribunals need more experience in these cases, but do not receive it because of the factors mentioned here; when a tribunal does hear such a case, there may be flaws in its handling of it, thereby having some effect in terms of deterring future applicants and ensuring that tribunals do not gain more experience.²⁶⁸

Reform

The CRE has proposed that there should be a discrimination division of industrial tribunals dealing only with discrimination claims.²⁶⁹ Such tribunals would gather expertise in such cases and could be equipped with powers to order higher levels of compensation. Legal aid could then be made available in this specialist division even though it remained unavailable in respect of other tribunal cases. The EOC has recommended that equal pay and sex discrimination provisions should be combined in one statute and that the distinction between indirect and direct discrimination as regards compensation should be abolished. Thus, where a person had acted in an indirectly discriminatory fashion, although unmotivated by sexism, compensation would still be payable. This is desirable because there is some evidence that some employers have deliberately failed to conduct a review of working practices so as to be able to put forward a convincing argument that they did not appreciate the discriminatory affect of certain practices. Both bodies have put forward proposals, which are considered below, to strengthen the individual method of challenging discriminatory practices by allowing it to work in tandem with the general, administrative method to a greater extent. Owing to their levels of funding, both bodies have to refuse many applications from individuals asking for help in bringing cases; such under-funding suggests that there is at present a lack of genuine commitment in government to ending discriminatory practices. The new European measures discussed above may aid change since they take a broader, less formulaic approach.

268 For early comment on sex discrimination claims, see Leonard, op cit, fn 265; on race claims, see Lustgarten (1986), op cit, fn 42. See, too, generally, Honeyball, op cit, fn 27, Chapter 1 and McColgan, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 5.

269 Review of the Race Relations Act 1976: Proposals for Change, Proposal 10.

10 THE COMMISSION FOR RACIAL EQUALITY; THE EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES COMMISSION AND THE DISABILITY RIGHTS COMMISSION

Introduction

Apart from the individual method of bringing about change, the RRA and SDA also contain an administrative method which was included with the aim of relieving the burden on individual applicants.²⁷⁰ The Disability Discrimination Commission introduced under the DDA represented a much weaker form of administrative method since the Commission had an advisory capacity only. It did not have the power to issue a non-discrimination notice in respect of discriminatory practices. However, the Disability Rights Commission Act (DRCA) 1999 brought counter-disability discrimination powers in this respect into line with those under the RRA and SDA, by creating the Disability Rights Commission (DRC) while effecting certain improvements. The Special Educational Needs and Disability Discrimination Act 2001 amended the DDA to extend the role of the DRC to discrimination in education.

The administrative method represents a more coherent approach than the piecemeal method of bringing individual cases. The aim was to bring about general changes in discriminatory practices rather than waiting for an individual to take on the risk and the burden of bringing a case. Both the CRE and the EOC have three main powers. They can assist and advise claimants, they can issue Codes of Practice and they can conduct formal investigations or general investigations and issue a non-discrimination notice in respect of discriminatory practices. The RRA, after amendment by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 (which inserted a new s 71 into the 1976 Act) provided new powers for the CRE, as indicated above. It can seek to enforce specific duties on public authorities intended to create equality of opportunity for persons of different racial groups by means of a compliance notice backed up by a court order. Its general duty, extended to further functions by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000, to 'eliminate unlawful racial discrimination' in public authorities was not backed up by any new powers, but is subject to the powers discussed below.

Investigative and remedial powers

An investigation into apparently discriminatory practices where there may be no known victim who wants or is prepared to bring a claim might arise because the company or institution had effectively deterred certain people from coming forward with applications for a job. In such circumstances, if indications of discrimination became apparent—if, for example, it seemed that very few of a certain group were employed—then first a formal investigation (ss 48–50 of the RRA) would be conducted. This decision might be taken if, for example, the workforce was only 1% black although the company was in a racially mixed area in which the black group comprised about 30% of the population. It might be found that the recruiting policy was indirectly discriminatory; for example, it might largely be by word of mouth and therefore the existing workforce might tend to reproduce itself. If discriminatory practices were found, a non-discrimination notice would be issued and the CRE might apply for an injunction to enforce it under s 62(1).

²⁷⁰ For discussion of the role of these two bodies see Lustgarten, L, 'The CRE under attack' [1982] PL 229; Lacey, 'A change in the right direction? The CRE's consultative document' [1984] PL 186; Lustgarten (1983), op cit, fn 172. For the EOC, see Sacks, V, 'The EOC -10 years on' (1986) 49 MLR 560.

However, the CRE has had the use of the power to issue a non-discrimination notice curbed by the House of Lords' decision in CRE ex p Prestige Group plc.²⁷¹ It was found that the CRE was not entitled to investigate a named person or company unless it already had a strong reason to believe that discrimination had occurred. This meant that where such suspicion did not exist, the CRE could embark on a general investigation only, meaning that it could not subpoena evidence or issue a non-discrimination notice. Thus, the CRE and the EOC are now confined to a more reactive approach; they can only react to very blatant forms of discrimination rather than investigating the more subtle and insidious instances of discrimination, which may be the more pernicious. After this decision, the CRE had to abandon a number of investigations which it had already begun and those formal investigations that it or the EOC did undertake took much longer.²⁷² There has, therefore, been a tendency for subtle institutionalised racism or sexism to continue unchecked,²⁷³ although more blatant racism, such as the phrase 'no blacks'—which used to appear in advertisements—has now disappeared.

The DRC has powers similar to those of the other two bodies, but s 3 of the DRCA appears to have been included with a view to curbing or excluding a Prestige interpretation of the provisions. Nevertheless, it is unclear that the wording will prevent emasculating of the provisions by the judiciary.²⁷⁴ Under s 53A of the DDA, as amended by s 36 of the 2001 Act, the DRC can issue Codes of Practice giving guidance to employers, service providers, educational bodies and others as to the avoidance of discrimination on grounds of disability.

Judicial review

Although the investigative powers of the EOC have been curbed, it may be able to bring about general changes in discriminatory practices by seeking a direct change in domestic law in reliance on European Community law. In *Secretary of State for Employment ex p EOC*²⁷⁵ it was found that the EOC can seek a declaration in judicial review proceedings to the effect that primary UK legislation is not in accord with EU equality legislation. Certain provisions of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 governed the right not to be unfairly dismissed, compensation for unfair dismissal and the right to statutory redundancy pay. These rights did not apply to workers who worked less than the specified number of hours a week. The Equal Opportunities Commission considered that since the majority of those working for less than the specified number of hours were women, the provisions operated to the disadvantage of women and were therefore 271 [1984] 1 WLR 335; [1984] ICR 473.

272 See Sacks, op cit, fn 270.

273 For criticism of Prestige see Ellis and Appleby (1984) 100 LQR 349; Ellis and Appleby [1984] PL 236.

274 For discussion, see McColgan, op cit, fn 1, pp 307–09.

275 [1994] All ER 910; [1994] ICR 317.

discriminatory. The EOC accordingly wrote to the Secretary of State for Employment expressing this view and arguing that since the provisions in question were indirectly discriminatory, they were in breach of EU law.

The Secretary of State replied by letter that the conditions excluding part timers from the rights in question were justifiable and therefore not indirectly discriminatory. The EOC applied for judicial review of the Secretary of State's refusal to accept that the UK was in breach of its obligations under EC law. The application was amended to bring in an individual, Mrs Day, who worked part time and who had been made redundant by her employers. It was found that Mrs Day's claim was a private law claim which could not be advanced against the Secretary of State, who was not her employer and was not liable to meet the claim if it was successful.

The Secretary of State further argued that the EOC had no locus standi to bring the proceedings. However, the House of Lords found that since the EOC had a duty under s 53(1) of the SDA to work for the elimination of discrimination, it was within its remit to try to secure a change in the provisions under consideration and therefore the EOC had a sufficient interest to bring the proceedings and hence locus standi. The Secretary of State also argued that no decision or justiciable issue susceptible of judicial review existed. However, the House of Lords found that although the letter itself was not a decision, the provisions themselves could be challenged in judicial review proceedings. In other words, the real question was whether judicial review was available for the purpose of securing a declaration that certain UK primary legislation was incompatible with EU law and, following Secretary of State for Transport ex p Factortame, it would appear that judicial review was so available.

As regards the substantive issue—whether the provisions in question, while admittedly discriminatory, could be justified—the House of Lords thought that in certain special circumstances an employer might be justified in differentiating between full and part time workers to the disadvantage of the latter, but that such differentiation, employed nationwide, could not be justified. Thus the EOC, but not an individual applicant, was entitled to bring judicial review proceedings in order to secure a declaration that UK law was incompatible with EU law. Declarations were made that the conditions set out in the provisions in question were indeed incompatible with EU law.

This was a very far reaching decision: it means that where UK legislation is incompatible with EU law, a declaration can be obtained to that effect more rapidly than if it was necessary to wait for an individual affected to bring a case against the particular person or body who was acting within the terms of the UK legislation in question. The decision may not directly have an effect on race discrimination, but it opens the possibility that the EOC may challenge other provisions of UK law and where such provisions have an equivalent under the RRA they will, therefore, also be affected. Further, once the Race Discrimination Directive is implemented, the same route would be available to the CRE.

Reform

On a number of occasions, the CRE and the EOC have made proposals for reform which would strengthen the administrative method²⁷⁶ and allow it to work more closely in harmony with the individual method. The CRE wants to try to narrow the gap between individual cases and what can be achieved by a formal investigation and has proposed that in order to do this, it should be able to join in the individual's case as a party to the action so as to draw attention to the likelihood of further discrimination occurring. Thus, the individual would receive the remedy, but the general effect of discrimination in the defendant body would be addressed by issuing a non-discrimination notice at the same time. This might be supported on the ground that if one individual brings a successful case against an employer, it is probable that discrimination in that concern is quite widespread. In particular, both the EOC and the CRE have proposed that legislation should be passed to reverse the Prestige decision since they consider that they need to be able to launch investigations into a named person or company even when there is no initial strong evidence of discrimination.²⁷⁷

11 DISCRIMINATION ON GROUNDS OF SEXUAL ORIENTATION²⁷⁸

Introduction

At present, a person who is refused promotion, dismissed from a job or refused an offer of housing, or in other respects adversely treated on grounds of sexual orientation, is in the same position as a woman so treated would have been before 1975, in the sense that at present, no anti-discrimination legislation specifically covers his or her situation. Indeed, far from seeking to outlaw discrimination on this ground, certain legal provisions, discussed below and in Chapter 17, imply that such discrimination is approved of by the law and therefore by society. However, the situation is rapidly changing, largely as a result of the election of the Labour Government in 1997, but also because of developments in EC law. Owing to the current gap in the law, leaving discrimination on this ground to go relatively 276 See the two CRE reviews of the 1976 Act, 1985 and 1991. See the EOC document, Equal Treatment for Men and Women: Strengthening the Acts, 1988.

277 See the reviews of the Race Relations Act by the CRE—reform proposals of 1992 and 1998 and the EOC 1988 proposals.

278 Reading: see Cane, Gays and the Law, 1982; Feldman, op cit, fn 1, pp 525–29; Hewitt, P, The Abuse of Power, 1982, Chapter 9; Wintemute, R, Sexual Orientation and Human Rights: The US Constitution, the ECHR and the Canadian Charter, 1995; Hervey, T and O'Keeffe, D (eds), Sex Equality Law in the European Union, 1996, Chapter 17; Wilkinson, B, 'Moving towards equality: homosexual law reform in Ireland' (1994) 45 NILQ 252; Wilets, The Human Rights of Sexual Minorities, 1996; Heinze, Sexual Orientation: A Human Right: An Essay on International Human Rights Law, 1995; Wintemute, R, 'Recognising new kinds of (Erect sex discrimination: transsexualism, sexual orientation and dress codes' (1997) 60(3) MLR 334; Bamforth, Sexuality, Morals and Justice, 1997; Skidmore (1997) 26(1) ILJ 51; Pannick, D, 'Homosexuals, transsexuals and the law' [1983] PL 279. For discussion from a non-liberal standpoint, see Stychin, C, Law's Desire: Sexuality and the Limits of Justice, 1995. See also: Rubin, G, 'Section 146 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 and the decriminalisation of homosexual acts in the armed forces' [1996] Crim LR 393; Smith, AM, New Rights Discourses on Race and Sexuality, 1994; Skidmore, ibid; Wintemute, ibid; Duffy, P, 'A case for equality' (1998) EHRLR 134; Wintemute, R, 'Lesbian and gay inequality 2000: the potential of the HRA and the need for an Equality Act 2002' (2000) 6 EHRLR 603.

unchecked, the HRA may be looked to as a method of providing some protection for the rights of homosexuals.

The discussion below considers the provisions that can be utilised to seek to provide protection from discrimination on this ground in the various fields that would normally appear in anti-discrimination legislation. As will be indicated, the HRA may be able to provide such protection in a number of these fields, where a public authority has some responsibility for the discrimination in question.²⁷⁹

Clearly, merely offering a remedy where discrimination has occurred is only part of the answer to the problems caused where persons discriminate on this ground. Many homosexuals 'choose' discrimination-avoidance or harassment-avoidance by concealing their homosexuality. It has been found in a survey of 2,000 lesbians and gay men at work that 56% concealed their sexuality in all jobs and 33% concealed it in some.²⁸⁰ A number of surveys have found evidence of widespread discrimination against persons on grounds of sexual orientation and a high incidence of harassment.²⁸¹ Offering a remedy in such instances must be a last resort and one that many persons would be unwilling to take. The discussion above as to claims based on the other protected grounds has sought to indicate that seeking to address discrimination through legal claims is fraught with difficulties and may leave a vulnerable person in a more vulnerable position. Thus, while anti-discrimination legislation is clearly needed, it would have a dual function. First, it would offer a remedy which is only doubtfully currently available. Secondly, it would affirm symbolically the abhorrence of society for homophobic attitudes and behaviour. It would be likely, eventually, to have the effect of indicating to persons inclined to homophobic views that those views are as unacceptable in society as racist or sexist ones.

Employment

Provisions against unfair dismissal

If a lesbian or homosexual has been employed for at least two years before dismissal, the provisions against unfair dismissal under the Employment Rights Act 1996 (previously contained in the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978) may offer some protection, although a dismissal will be fair if it is for 'some other substantial reason of a kind to justify dismissal', provided that the employer acts reasonably. Where dismissal is on grounds of sexual orientation, a wide interpretation has been given to the meaning of 'reasonable' in the older decisions. In Saunders v Scottish National Camps,²⁸² the applicant, who was employed as a maintenance handyman at a boys' camp, was dismissed on the grounds of homosexuality although his duties did not ordinarily bring him into contact with the boys. His dismissal was nevertheless held to be fair on the ground that many 279 See Wintemute, ibid.

280 See Palmer, A Survey of Lesbians and Gay Men at Work, 1993.

281 'Equality for lesbians and gay men in the work place' (1997) Equal Opportunities Review 20.

282 (1981) EAT 7/80, judgment delivered 14 April 1980; for criticism, see quoted comments of Levin in Beer et al, Gay Workers, Trade Unions and the Law, 1981, p 27. See to similar effect Boychuk v Symons Holdings Ltd [1977] IRLR 395, but cf Bell v Devon and Cornwall Police Authority [1978] IRLR 283, McColgan, op cit, fn 1, Chapter 6, pp 387-97.

other employers would have responded in the same way. The decision is clearly open to attack on the ground that even when his duties brought him into contact with the boys, there would have been no more reason to believe that they would have been in danger from him than would girls from a male heterosexual. Similarly, it has been found that the dismissal of a homosexual from GCHQ as a threat to national security was not unreasonable despite the fact that he had been open about his homosexuality and therefore could not be blackmailed.²⁸³

In the late 1990s, there was some recognition that discrimination on grounds of sex orientation was unacceptable. In *O'Connor v Euromoney Publications Inc*²⁸⁴ the defendants admitted that O'Connor had been subjected to 'unacceptable and offensive' comments and had been discriminated against on the ground of his sexual orientation. He had also been dismissed from his job with the company. The respondents apologised and, in an out of court settlement, paid a large sum of damages in respect of the dismissal.

In *Lustig-Prean v UK*²⁸⁵ and *Smith and Grady v UK*²⁸⁶ the European Court of Human Rights found that the applicants had been subjected to treatment in breach of Art 8 when they were dismissed from the armed services on grounds of their sexual orientation. The UK Government has responded to the ruling, as discussed below. But, it has further implications. Under the HRA, a public authority which dismissed a homosexual on grounds of sexual orientation could be challenged in the courts under ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the Act, relying on Art 8. Where a private body was the employer, the applicant could rely on s 3 of the HRA in seeking to persuade a tribunal to afford an interpretation to the unfair dismissal provisions which would allow a remedy to be offered. This possibility would, of course, also be available in unfair dismissal proceedings against a public authority.

The Sex Discrimination Act, Art 141 of the EC Treaty, and the Equal Treatment and Equal Pay Directives

Prior to the inception of the HRA, it was clear that a homosexual applicant could not fall within the SDA unless he or she could show that someone of the opposite sex would have been treated more favourably. In other words, where a lesbian woman or gay man would be subjected to equal and unfavourable treatment, no action would lie since s 1 of the SDA is concerned with grounds of sex, not sexual orientation. In the UK courts it was also found in 1996 that applicants treated unfavourably because of their sexual orientation are not covered by the Equal Treatment Directive.²⁸⁷

However, in 1997, it appeared that the weak position of homosexuals who are dismissed from employment or otherwise detrimentally treated might be about to change under the influence of EU law. In Case 13/14 P v S and Cornwall CC,²⁸⁸ P was dismissed from her employment on the ground that she was a transsexual. Her application under the SDA 1975 failed as it was found that transsexuals were outside 283 Director of GCHQ ex p Hodges (1988) COD 123; (1988) The Times, 26 July.

284 (1999) The Guardian, 6 June.

285 (1999) 29 EHRR 548; (1999) 7 BHRC 65.

286 (2000) 29 EHRR 493.

287 Smith v Gardner Merchant [1996] ICR 790; [1996] IRLR 342, noted [1996] 67 EOR 48.

288 Judgment of 30 April 1996; [1996] ECR I-2143; [1996] IRLR 347.

the terms of the Act. As indicated above, it was found that her case fell within the Equal Treatment Directive on the basis that the Directive is simply the expression of the principle of equality, which is one of the fundamental principles of European Union law. Once it was found that transsexuals were within the Directive, it appeared probable that it would also cover homosexuals. The words 'on grounds of sex' within the Directive could be found to relate, inter alia, to the sex of the partner. Thus, where a man was in a partnership with a woman, he would not be likely to experience adverse treatment on that ground. But, where a woman was or was potentially in partnership with a woman, she might experience discrimination on that ground. In that respect, discrimination 'on grounds of sex' could include discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. In other words, if discrimination occurs due to the fact that a person's partner is or is potentially of the 'wrong' gender, the Directive could, in principle, cover such a situation.

This argument was considered in Secretary of State for Defence ex p Perkins,²⁸⁹ which also concerned the ban on homosexuals in the armed services, and it was determined that owing to the P v S decision, the case must be referred to the ECJ. In Case 249/96, Grant v South West Trains Ltd,²⁹⁰ it was argued that a refusal to allow a lesbian partner the same employment perks as those which would be allowed to a heterosexual partner is discrimination contrary to the Directive and Art 119 (as it was). The Advocate General gave his Opinion that discrimination contrary to the Equal Pay Directive and Art 119 had occurred. However, the Court failed to decide in the same way, taking the view that discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation is not covered, with the result that lesbians and homosexuals are unable to claim in the domestic courts any pay or fringe benefits currently only available to heterosexuals. Thus, the Court refused to take this step forward in terms of outlawing discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. Currently, the most pressing need is to outlaw discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation within decisions as to dismissal and appointment. Article 6a of the Amsterdam Treaty, signed by the Member States on 19 June 1997, provides that the Council can adopt provisions intended to combat discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation and the Framework Directive makes provision in this respect.

*Smith v Gardner Merchant*²⁹¹ followed Grant; the Court of Appeal found that a male homosexual could bring a claim under the SDA, but only if he could show that a female homosexual would have been treated more favourably. In other words, the claim would have to be based on grounds of gender and not on grounds of sexual orientation. However, it appeared possible, once the HRA was in force, that a different interpretation of the SDA could be adopted, and that it would be possible to find that discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation can be covered. This interpretation was adopted in MacDonald v MOD,²⁹² a Scottish case relying on the Convention. It was found that a creative interpretation of s 1 of the SDA would allow sexual orientation to fall within the Act. This decision was, however, overturned by the Court of Sessions, which followed Smith v Gardner Merchant.

289 [1997] IRLR 297.

290 [1998] IRLR 206.

291 [1998] 3 All ER 852.

292 [2001] 1 All ER 620. On appeal: 2001 SLT 819.

At present, there seem to be two possibilities which would bring about change. First, a court might take the view that since the MacDonald case was not decided under the HRA, a different approach could be adopted, using s 3 of the HRA to interpret s 1 of the SDA purposively in order to give effect to the protection for sexual orientation within Art 8, relying on Lustig-Prean v UK and Smith and Grady v UK. In taking this radical approach, such a court could find support from the House of Lords' decision in *R v A*²⁹³ in which the Lords went so far as to read words into a statute in order to achieve a result that they viewed as in compliance with the Convention.

The further possibility is that the ECJ will reconsider its approach in Grant, perhaps in an instance in which the employment detriment in question was more profound. It is suggested that since, owing to Grant, EU law is out of harmony with ECHR law, as interpreted in Lustig-Prean v UK and Smith and Grady v UK, the two should be harmonised, if possible, by providing protection for persons discriminated against on grounds of sexual orientation.

Judicial review and the HRA

The guarantee of freedom from discrimination under Art 14 of the Convention, received into domestic law under the HRA, covers discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation through its use of the words 'without discrimination on any ground such as...'.²⁹⁴ Therefore, a number of possibilities are open. As indicated above and in Chapter 2, Art 14 only operates in conjunction with another Convention Article. But even where that other Article is not itself breached, a breach may be found when it is read with Art 14.

Prior to the inception of the HRA, judicial review provided a means of challenging decisions or policies having a discriminatory effect, but until the HRA came into force, the threshold for challenge was set so high that it provided an ineffective remedy. This was made clear in the case discussed below.

In the UK until recently, homosexuals were barred from the merchant navy and the armed forces, where homosexual acts were classed as 'disgraceful conduct',²⁹⁵ although the armed forces in Belgium, Denmark, France, The Netherlands and Spain are all open to homosexuals. The legality of the policy of the Ministry of Defence in maintaining the ban was challenged in Ministry of Defence ex p Smith and Others.²⁹⁶ The applicants, homosexuals who had been dismissed owing to the existence of the ban, applied for review of the policy. Their application was dismissed at first instance in the Divisional Court and the applicants appealed. Rejecting the argument of the MOD that it had no jurisdiction to review the legality of the policy in question, the court applied the usual Wednesbury principles. This meant that it could not interfere with the exercise of an administrative discretion save where it

293 See Chapter 4, pp 142–44.

294 Salgueiro da Silva Mouta v Portugal [2001] 1 FCR 653. In Dudgeon (1982) 4 EHRR 149 the Court of Human Rights was asked to consider the application of Art 14 read in conjunction with Art 8. It appeared to assume that Art 14 did cover discrimination on this ground, although it found that it did not need to consider the application of Art 14 in the instant case since a breach of Art 8 had been found.

295 See the Army Act 1955, s 66; the Sexual Offences Act 1967, ss 1(5) and 2.

296 [1996] 1 All ER 257; [1996] ICR 740. Noted: Skidmore (1995) 24ILJ 363; (1996) 25ILJ 63. For discussion, see Rubin, op cit, fn 278; Skidmore, op cit, fn 278.

was satisfied that the decision was unreasonable in the sense that it was beyond the range of responses open to a reasonable decision maker. But, in judging whether the decision maker had exceeded that margin of appreciation, the human rights context was important: ‘...the more substantial the interference with human rights, the more the court will require by way of justification before it will be satisfied that the decision was reasonable;²⁹⁷ Applying such principles and taking into account the support of the policy in both Houses of Parliament, it could not be said that the policy crossed the threshold of irrationality, although it was criticised.

The applicants applied to the European Commission on Human Rights and the case was referred to the Court. It may be noted that previously, the Commission had rejected a challenge to the provision relating to the army as inadmissible on the argument that there is a special need to prevent disorder in the armed forces.²⁹⁸ However, the Court found that the ban infringed Art 8 and Art 13. Its absolute nature meant that it could not be viewed as being in proportion to a legitimate aim. Not only the ban itself, but the intrusive questioning of the applicants after their homosexuality was suspected, was found to constitute an interference with the respect for their private life under Art 8. The applicants also argued that Art 3 had been infringed but, although the Court considered that this was a possibility in respect of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation, it did not consider that the strict Art 3 test had been met in the circumstances of the case. As a result of this ruling, discharges from the armed services on grounds of sexual orientation have now ceased.

But, as indicated above, the ruling of the Court could be relied upon when seeking review of a decision or policy of a public authority which is discriminatory on grounds of sexual orientation. This route could be used in respect of dismissal and where employment detriment other than dismissal had occurred.

A number of possibilities are readily apparent. For example, a large number of posts in the Home Civil Service²⁹⁹ are subject to positive vetting (PV). In 1982, the Security Commission recommended³⁰⁰ that male homosexuality should be dealt with on a case by case basis in relation to PV clearance, but that it should be refused if the individual’s practice of his homosexuality placed any doubt upon his discretion or reliability. PV clearance for the Diplomatic Service or armed forces was automatically refused. If security clearance for any governmental post is refused on the ground of sexual orientation, a challenge could be mounted using s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, which would mean that the court’s review of the action or decision would be more intensive than that undertaken in Smith. It is no longer necessary to rely on seeking to show that in discriminating on this ground, a public body has acted unreasonably. Nevertheless, where national security appeared to be at stake, the courts are likely to afford the body in question a ‘discretionary area of judgment’ and as a result the review, even under ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the HRA and Art 8 is unlikely to be intensive. But where national security is not a factor, this route appears to offer quite a strong possibility of success.

297 Ibid, p 263.

298 B v UK 34 D & R (1983); (1983) 6 EHRR 354.

299 In 1982, PV covered 68,000 posts (Cmnd 8540, p 5).

300 Cmnd 8540, 1982.

So long as the alleged discriminator is a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, there are a number of other possibilities, not all of which depend on using Art 8 (which has already shown its potential in this area read alone), but there might also be instances in which, although an invasion of privacy grounded on homosexuality fell within one of the exceptions, it could nevertheless be established taking Art 14 into account owing to its discriminatory nature. Article 10 read in conjunction with Art 14 might offer protection to expressions of the homosexual way of life such as the wearing of badges or even some physical gestures.³⁰¹ In *Salgueiro da Silva Mouta v Portugal*³⁰² the court relied on Art 14 in finding that a breach had occurred where a parent was denied contact with his child on the ground of sexual orientation.

Education

Discrimination against homosexuals in the field of education is enshrined in s 2A of the Local Government Act 1986, inserted by s 28 of the Local Government Act 1988 amended by S 104 of the Local Government Act 2000; it prohibits the deliberate promotion of homosexuality by local authorities or the teaching of 'the acceptability of homosexuality as a pretended family relationship'. Thus, local authorities may still fund certain groups so long as this is aimed at benefiting the group rather than at promoting homosexuality. Robertson argues that s 28 will not have a significant effect in schools, as local authorities do not directly control the curriculum³⁰³ (and this is particularly the case under local management of schools). However, s 28 may serve to ratify and legitimise intolerance of homosexuals in education and outside it. In opposition, the Labour Party pledged to abolish s 28 and in government it brought forward a Bill in order to do so in 2000. The Bill was defeated in the House of Lords, but the intention of the Government continues to be to repeal s 28. The Scottish Parliament has already repealed s 28 as far as Scotland is concerned in 2000 under ss 25–26 of the Ethical Standards in Public Life (Scotland) Act 2000.

A person discriminated against in the field of education, such as a pupil forced—in effect—to leave a school or other institution owing to homophobic bullying which appeared to be condoned by the authorities could consider bringing an action in negligence against the institution in question or the education authority. But he or she could also bring an action under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, relying on the Art 8 argument indicated above, so long as the institution was a public authority. Article 2 of the First Protocol might be used to argue that education in accordance with one's own philosophical convictions must include the need to allow some teaching 301 In Masterson v Holden [1986] 3 All ER 39; [1986] 1 WLR 1017 the Divisional Court found that magistrates were entitled to view the behaviour of two homosexuals in kissing and cuddling as insulting for the purposes of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839, s 54(13). This approach might also be taken under the Public Order Act 1986, s 5, but such a wide interpretation of 'insulting' could allow many restrictions on the public expression of homosexuality, which might be in breach of Art 10, either read alone or in conjunction with Art 14. It appears that Art 10 does not cover homosexual intercourse per se, but may cover the physical as well as verbal expression of homosexual love: X v UK (1981) 3 EHRR 63.

302 [2001] 1 FCR 653, Judgment of 21 December 1999.

303 Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 7th edn, 1993, p 382.

about the homosexual way of life. If necessary, this guarantee could be used in an attempt to challenge any use of s 2A of the Local Government Act 1986.

Housing

Housing legislation tends to enshrine and rely on a limited notion of the 'family', and therefore it has led to discrimination against homosexuals living in a settled partnership. In *Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Assoc*³⁰⁴ the Court of Appeal had to consider whether the homosexual partner of a deceased tenant could take over the tenancy under the Rent Act 1977, which limited such succession to persons who had lived with the original tenant 'as wife or husband' or were a member of his 'family'. The court, by a majority, found that the term 'family' was to be construed in the conventional sense, bearing prevailing social attitudes in mind. It was found that a 'family' was an entity which consisted of 'persons of the opposite sex cohabiting as man and wife'. Ward LJ, dissenting, pointed out that a number of other European countries had begun to allow same-sex couples to enter into property agreements on the same basis as unmarried heterosexual couples and that the US Supreme Court had recently found that a family should include 'two adult lifetime partners whose relationship is long term and characterised by an emotional and financial commitment and interdependence'. He found that 'the trend is to shift the focus...from structure and components to function and appearance'. In other words, if a group acts as society expects a family to act, it is a family. He found that the exclusion of same-sex couples from the protection of the Rent Act which would follow from the preferred interpretation of the majority amounted to an assertion by society that their relationships are judged to be less worthy of respect, concern and consideration than the relationship between members of the opposite sex'.

On appeal, a bare majority of the House of Lords, in a landmark decision,³⁰⁵ found that the term 'family' could be taken to include a cohabiting couple of the same sex. If it could be taken to include a cohabiting heterosexual couple, it was found that the term could be taken to include a homosexual one since, in principle, it was the bond and commitment between the two persons, not their sexual orientation, which was significant. The Lords did not consider, however, that a person could live with another of the same sex as his 'husband or wife'.

The future³⁰⁶

The potential of the HRA in this area has not yet been realised. It could range far outside the contexts covered by the discussion above. Article 6 might be used where a homosexual was refused a hearing in, for example, a child care or adoption case where a heterosexual would not have been so refused. Further possibilities are considered in Chapter 17. If the UK continues to resist the introduction of anti-discrimination legislation, s 7(1)(a) of the HRA may provide quite an important

304 [1998] 2 WLR 225.

305 [1999] 3 WLR 1113.

306 See Wintemute, op cit, fn 278.

substitute means of obtaining a remedy, at least where the other party is a public authority. The anomalies thereby created may eventually prompt the Government to introduce such legislation.

There is clearly a growing recognition in Europe that discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation amounts to a general problem which should be addressed. A report compiled for the Commission of the European Communities in May 1993³⁰⁷ on discrimination against homosexuals found that the UK was one of the worst offenders and was one of only four Member States which provided no legal protection against discrimination. The report also criticised the Commission, which has argued that homosexuality is a matter to be left to individual governments. It recommended that human rights for homosexuals should be enshrined in European Community law.

The EOC, in the wake of the Lustig-Prean case, proposed that there should be a statutory provision outlawing discrimination in employment and other fields on the ground of sexual orientation. At present the Labour Government has, however, responded only by introducing an unenforceable Code of Practice covering such discrimination.³⁰⁸ A Code of Practice is clearly unlikely to have much influence. It cannot outlaw discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation and is likely to be ignored by many employers. The very fact that a Code rather than a statute has been introduced signals to employers and others that this is not a significant matter.

Currently, pressure is coming from Europe, within the EC and Convention systems, for the introduction of measures to combat discrimination on this ground. The Framework Directive³⁰⁹ On equal opportunities in employment allows for the extension of anti-discrimination measures to cover the ground of sexual orientation and, as Chapter 2 explained, Protocol 12 provides a free standing right to freedom from discrimination.³¹⁰ However, as indicated above, the domestic response to Protocol 12 is at present not very favourable.

307 By Peter Ashman, Director of the Independent European Human Rights Foundation.

308 In February 2000, the Government asked the EOC to draw up a Code governing this area: Daily Telegraph, 18 February 2000.

309 Adopted under the Treaty Establishing the European Community (TEC), Art 13.

310 See Chapter 2, p 85; for further discussion see Khaliq, op cit, fn 26.

DISCRIMINATION AND EQUALITY IN THE CRIMINAL LAW AND THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE PROCESS

1 INTRODUCTION¹

This chapter will consider evidence of discrimination on three of the protected grounds—those of race, sex and sexual orientation—within the criminal law and the criminal justice process. The areas considered are outside the anti-discrimination legislation considered in Chapter 16. As that chapter demonstrated, many aspects of discrimination on grounds of race have now been brought within the Race Relations Act (RRA) after its amendment in 2000 and, therefore, those aspects will not be considered here.

Consideration will be given below to the role of the criminal law in preventing certain expressions of discrimination which are unaffected by the civil anti-discrimination legislation, but which have a severe impact on the lives of certain groups. It will also consider the extent to which the criminal justice system positively seeks to eliminate discriminatory behaviour by those who administer it. But, the chapter will also consider how far the criminal law and criminal process may be said to contain provisions which themselves discriminate or allow for discrimination on the basis of the protected grounds covered. Bearing in mind the fact that discrimination against women in the criminal justice process does not fall within the Sex Discrimination Act, since no amendments equivalent to those made to the RRA in 2000 have been introduced, it is possible that the Human Rights Act (HRA) could be used instead. As Chapter 16 explained, arguments based on Arts 14 and another Article (usually Art 8), or on Art 8 alone, could be raised under s 7(1)(a) or (b) of the HRA.² This route could also be used in respect of discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation.³

2 RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Criminal law

The criminal law does not overtly enshrine discrimination on grounds of race as it does on grounds of sex or sexual orientation. Instead, it contains some specifically anti-racist measures—although not many—intended to combat expressions of racial discrimination largely arising in the public order context. In general, however, it has only a very narrow role to play in fighting racial discrimination, due to the policy decision taken when the relevant legislation was being drawn up to leave the individual to pursue his or her individual remedy by means of a tort action. Even gross racial discrimination evinced by an employer, including racial harassment or absolute segregation, can be addressed only by a civil remedy if the individual chooses to seek it—unless it falls within the ambit of one of the general offences such as assault.

1 For reading: Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties: The Human Rights Act Era, 2001, Butterworths, Chapter 8 (general reading); Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Human Rights Law, 2000, OUP, Chapter 17.

2 See pp 984–85.

3 See p 1054.

But racial harassment of individuals in certain areas of the UK can be addressed by the normal criminal measures and the offences in question exist, under provisions introduced in s 28 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, in an aggravated form where there is an added element of racism. Thus, an assault which is clearly racially motivated is classed as an aggravated assault. Those under ss 4, 4A and 5 of the Public Order Act 1986⁴ can occur in a racially aggravated form, as can assaults under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, and criminal damage and harassment under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997.⁵ Section 153 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 provides for increases in sentences for racial aggravation. The Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Bill 2001 contains clause 39 which provides that these offences can also be ‘religiously aggravated’ while sentences can be increased under the 2000 Act for religious aggravation. However, at present, there seems to be no prospect of creation of a specific offence of racial attack. The case for creating such an offence, and perhaps a general offence of racial victimisation, is quite strong, given that it could be worded in such a way as to avoid colliding with other civil liberties as the incitement to racial hatred provision, considered in Chapter 6, potentially does.⁶

Criminal justice

As Chapter 16 showed, aspects of racial discrimination in the criminal justice system are now covered by the RRA, after its amendment in 2000. However, even prior to that point, a degree of official recognition was given to fighting or preventing racial, as opposed to sexual, discrimination in the criminal justice system, at least at the investigation stage. These provisions will now work alongside the RRA provisions and, if afforded respect by the police, will still be of relevance, since they do not depend on individual action by the victim of racial discrimination, action which he or she may sometimes be reluctant to take owing to fear or suspicion of the police.

Section 101(b) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE) provides for regulations to make racially discriminatory behaviour a specific disciplinary offence. Whether the regulations deter the use of racist remarks or racial harassment of offenders is open to doubt, especially in the face of some evidence that officers may display racism to their own black colleagues.⁷ Guidance is given under the PACE Codes of Practice as to interviewing practices to be adopted with detainees not proficient in English. Code A of PACE enjoins officers not to stop and search on the basis of a person’s colour,⁸ and by implication this may also apply to arrests. It is unclear whether this has had any effect on the arrest rates of blacks

4 See Chapter 6, pp 506–10.

5 See Chapter 9, pp 510–11.

6 See Chapter 5, pp 327–29. For discussion of these possibilities see Hare (1997) 17(3) OJLS 415.

7 On 4 May 1993, Joginder Singh Prem was awarded £25,000 damages for racial discrimination and victimisation in settlement of his claim after the force had admitted discrimination (see (1993) Guardian, 5 May).

8 Paragraph 1.7; see further Chapter 13, p 765.

who have been found in various studies to be over-represented in each offence group.⁹ One possible conclusion which could be drawn is that the police are more ready to arrest blacks because of a stereotypical assessment of their propensity to commit offences, but doubt has been cast on this assumption in a study¹⁰ by Jefferson and Walker, which suggested that when blacks were compared with whites living at a similar level of social deprivation, as opposed to comparing them with the white population generally, the difference in arrest rates between the two groups largely disappeared. The study also found a wide variation in the experience of blacks and Asians in the criminal justice system, blacks having consistently a less favourable attitude to the police,¹¹ while Asians had a more favourable attitude than whites. Under the RRA, a victim of a racially discriminatory offence could now receive compensation in respect of discriminatory arrests or stops so long as he or she was prepared to take on the burden of bringing a claim.

Evidence as to discrimination at the court hearing and in the outcome of arrests is mixed, despite quite a large body of work in the area.¹² The Jefferson and Walker study found that although the cautioning rates of Asians and blacks differed significantly, it was not possible to find a clear difference in sentencing policy.¹³ A study of contested bail applications found no racial bias in the remand decisions of magistrates,¹⁴ although some difference as to conditions of bail was found between Afro-Caribbean and white defendants.¹⁵ Although the evidence of racial bias seems to be mixed, it is appropriate to try to remove any appearance of unfairness from the criminal justice system and, to this end, it may be argued that certain practices should change; for example, juries should contain some members from ethnic minority groups in cases where this was particularly appropriate. However, this possibility is not, according to the ruling in Ford,¹⁶ available under any residual discretion of the judge. This decision of the Court of Appeal brought an end to the practice of some judges who had managed to achieve a racially mixed jury in certain cases.¹⁷ An appearance of unfairness in the criminal justice system and perhaps the reality of it may also be created by the lack of black judges (in 1991, 1% of judges were black) and exacerbated by the failure of the law society to adopt an 9 Crime statistics from the Metropolitan Police District by ethnic group for 1987, victims, suspects and those arrested: Home Office Statistical Bulletin 5/89. Blacks comprised 16% of those arrested in 1987, but only 5% of the population of London.

10 See Jefferson and Walker, 'Ethnic minorities in the criminal justice system' [1992] Crim LR 83.

11 Op cit, p 92.

12 McConville, M and Baldwin, 'The influence of race on sentencing in England' [1982] Crim LR 652-58; Crow and Cove, 'Ethnic minorities and the courts' [1984] Crim LR 413-17; Walker, The Court Disposal and Remands of White, Afro-Caribbean and Asian Men, 1983; Brown and Hullin, 'The treatment of ethnic minority and white offenders' (1992) 32 Br J Criminal Law 41-53.

13 Op cit, p 90.

14 Brown and Hullin, 'Contested bail applications: the treatment of ethnic minority and white offenders' [1993] Crim LR 107, p 111.

15 Op cit, p 110.

16 [1989] QB 868, CA. The Society of Black Lawyers in 'A time for freedom and a time for justice' has suggested that the practice of allowing a racially mixed jury in certain cases should be enshrined in statute. See (1993) 143 NLJ 837 (editorial).

17 Eg, Bansal [1985] Crim LR 151.

18 See (1991) 141 NLJ 1692 and (1991) 143 NLJ 1376. It should be noted that s 64(1) of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 made special provision for amending the SDA and RRA in order to ensure that discrimination against barristers fell within their ambit.

anti-discriminatory practice—both matters which have recently been the subject of concern.¹⁸

As Chapter 16 indicated, the application of the new s 19B of the RRA is limited in respect of criminal investigations. Moreover, under s 19C, s 19B does not apply to ‘any judicial act’ or ‘act done on the instructions or on the behalf of a person acting in a judicial capacity’. Thus, while some law enforcement functions including arrest, bail detention and search by police officers and officers with similar powers are brought within the RRA, allegations of discrimination in the judicial process cannot be addressed under the Act.

3 GENDER DISCRIMINATION¹⁹

Criminal law

Until the late 19th century and, in one respect, until 1991, the criminal law enshrined and perpetuated gross sexual discrimination. Violent or indecent behaviour in the form of assault, battery, procuring sexual intercourse by threats, false imprisonment, indecent assault or rape was, it seems, lawful²⁰ if perpetrated against a married woman by her husband. The respect in which such discrimination survived was, until very recently, to be found in the law of rape: wives were deemed to have given an irrevocable consent to sexual intercourse within marriage. Hale’s law on marital rights²¹ is credited with creating immunity for a husband from a rape conviction and, therefore, the law was that by marrying her, a man acquired the right to ‘rape’ a woman without being convicted of rape. Hale also considered whether concubines should be able to withdraw consent to sex and determined that they should,²² a liberal view at that time which ran counter to the previous position.²³ The marital immunity was favoured in some quarters because it was thought that the criminal law should not violate the privacy of the home, as it might endanger the continuance of family life. However, the argument that wives must not have the full protection of the criminal law, because if they invoke it the marriage is unlikely to survive,²⁴ fails to recognise that in itself it is helping to perpetuate their suffering by refusing to offer a sufficient 19 Reading: McCrudden, C (ed), Anti-discrimination Law, 1991; Rhode, D, Justice and Gender: Sex Discrimination and the Law, 1989; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2000, Chapter 17; McColgan, A, Discrimination Law: Text, Cases and Materials, 2000; Fredman, S, Women and the Law, 1997; Silberman, ‘Equality, human rights, women and the justice system’ (1994) 39 McGill LJ 489.

20 Until Jackson (1891) 1 QB 671 it was thought that a husband could forcefully imprison and (probably) chastise his wife in order to enforce the right to cohabitation. See Atwood v Atwood Finch’s Chancery Precedents 492 and Re Cochrane 8 Dowl 630 in which Coleridge J said ‘the husband may keep her by force...and may beat her’. Under the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885, s 3, a husband who forced his wife by threats to have sex with another incurred no liability. As late as 1984 in Caswell [1984] Crim LR 111 it was found that a husband could incur no liability in respect of what would otherwise have been an indecent assault on his wife. Marital rape was lawful until 1991, below fn 28.

21 Sir Matthew Hale CJ, History of the Pleas of the Crown, 1736.

22 1 PC 628–29.

23 In the 13th century it seems to have been the case that if a man had had consensual sex with his victim previously, he would be acquitted of rape. Crown Pleas of the Wiltshire Eyre 1249; Stenton, Rolls of the Justice in Eyre for Yorkshire, 1218–19.

24 Put by Glanville Williams (1992) 142 NLJ 11. For reply by the author, see (1992) 142 NLJ 831–32, 870–71.

25 (1991) NLJ 206.

deterrent to their husbands. It seems reasonable to assume that the ‘ordinary raping husband’²⁵ was encouraged to rape by an exemption which declared, in effect, that he had a right to do so.

The marital immunity created some interesting anomalies such as that found in the ruling of the Court of Appeal in Kowalski.²⁶ A husband who forced his wife to have oral sex with him as a preliminary to forced sexual intercourse was convicted of indecent assault although no liability could arise in respect of the sex act itself. It also seemed that a husband could be liable as an accessory to rape,²⁷ but not as a principal.

The House of Lords in *R*²⁸ finally swept away the marital exemption. However, it is still possible that husbands will be sentenced more lightly than other rapists because some judges appear to see cohabitation as a mitigating factor. In Berry,²⁹ a man raped his former cohabitee after some years had passed; the factor of cohabitation played a part in the decision to award a sentence of four years. That this policy may be pursued after the decision in *Billam*³⁰ that a sentence of five years would normally be appropriate for a rape without aggravating or mitigating features, is suggested by the decision of the Court of Appeal in *AG’s Reference (No 7 of 1989)*³¹ in which, again, a sentence of four years as opposed to five was awarded, possibly—although this was not made explicit in the judgment—because the man had cohabited with his victim. The ruling in *Stockwell*³² suggests that the length of cohabitation will also be considered relevant; in reducing a sentence of three years to two, the Court of Appeal took into account the 10 years that the wife and husband had lived together. However, if a judge is able to look at all the circumstances of a rape without being expected to give the factor of cohabitation undue prominence, the domestic and stranger rapist will be punished on roughly the same scale bearing in mind the specific circumstances of each case. This is not merely a matter of proper sentencing policy, but of a declaration that women have the right to full protection from violation whatever the status of the attacker.

A number of areas of criminal law remain, enshrining gender-based differentiation on grounds which, it is submitted, are not objectively justifiable. These include the anomalous defence of coercion available to married women under s 47 of the Criminal Justice Act 1925, which assumes that wives are under the subjection of their husbands and the offences relating to abduction of a woman under the Sexual Offences Act 1956—in particular the offence under s 19 of abducting a girl under 18 (whether or not with her consent), which assumes that such girls are to a greater extent than boys in the possession of their parents. The offences relating to prostitution under the 1956 Act and the Sexual Offences Act 1985 are, it is suggested, unnecessarily sexually segregated; if such offences are to exist, there seems to be no good reason why all of them should not apply equally to women and men.

26 (1988) 86 Cr App R 339.

27 Cogan and Leake [1976] QB 217.

28 [1991] 4 All ER 481; [1991] 3 WLR 767; [1992] Fam Law 108; [1992] Crim LR 207. For comment see 55 MLR 386.

29 [1988] Crim LR 325.

30 [1986] 1 All ER 985.

31 (1990) 12 Cr App R (S) 1.

32 (1984) 6 Cr App R (S) 84.

Criminal justice

There is quite a large body of literature postulating and analysing institutionalised sexist ideologies in the criminal justice system,³³ but this does not seem to have brought about sweeping changes, although it is fair to say that in one area—the management of a rape allegation—there have been improvements at the investigation stage, such as the introduction of ‘rape suites’ and questioning by female officers. Only the barest indication of the findings of this body of work can be given here, but it is clear that it has been wide ranging, considering the perceptions of female offenders held by magistrates, judges, police officers, prison officers and probation officers. A common theme seems to be that the treatment of female offenders may be affected by the private sexist ideologies of such persons, male or female, but that this factor is not as significant as the effect of such ideologies enshrined in the administrative and organisational context of the occupations in question.

A recurring theme concerns the treatment of victims of rape. Disquiet as to their treatment in the 1970s led to the setting up of the Heilbron Committee in 1975 whose recommendations were, in part, enshrined in the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976. This provides under s 2 that the victim should not be questioned as to her sexual experience except at the judge’s discretion. It seems that a judge will not allow a complainant to be cross-examined as to sexual experience in order to suggest that for that reason alone she should not be believed,³⁴ but if her past sexual experience can be made to relate in some way to the issue of consent, leave should be given to cross-examine her on it.³⁵ Rape is the only crime in which a corroboration warning has to be given before allowing the jury to rely on the adult victim’s evidence. Thus, the possibility of casting serious doubt on the credibility and veracity of the victim³⁶ and of indirectly blackening her character subsisted into the early 1990s.

Section 41 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act was introduced, after a long campaign by women’s groups, in order to prevent the cross-examining of victims about sexual experience, except in a very narrow range of circumstances—where the issue of consent relates to sexual behaviour taking place at about the same time as the event which is the subject matter of the complaint (s 41(3)(b)) or where consent is in issue and the sexual behaviour of the complainant taking place at about the same time is so similar to the behaviour relating to that issue (s 41(3)(c)). However, in R v A,³⁷ the House of Lords found a method of undermining the effect of s 41. The Lords used an extremely bold interpretative technique—that of reading words into s 41(3) in order to render it compatible with Art 6, under s 3 of the HRA. It may be suggested that in so doing, they went beyond using interpretative 33 See Edwards, Policing Domestic Violence, 1989 and Female Sexuality and the Law, 1981, especially Chapters 2 and 5; Dunhill (ed), The Boys in Blue: Women’s Challenge to the Police, 1989; Gelsthorpe, Sexism and the Female Offender, 1989 (which criticises the other writings, but seems to arrive at similar conclusions regarding the institutions under scrutiny).

34 Viola (1982) 75 Cr App R 125.

35 SMS [1992] Crim LR 310.

36 Judge Sutcliffe gave this corroboration warning in 1976: ‘It is known that women in particular and small boys are liable to be untruthful and to invent stories’, Old Bailey, 18 April 1976.

37 [2001] 2 WLR 1546; [2001] UKHL 25.

techniques and rewrote part of the legislation, thus allowing the admission of relevant evidence relating to a previous sexual relationship between defendant and complainant, at the trial judge's discretion. The Lords did not appear fully to recognise the role of the legislation in protecting the Art 8 rights of the complainant. The Lords had to strike a balance between the fair trial rights of the defendant and the rights of the victim. They chose to strike a balance that differed from that which Parliament had determined upon. Given the Lords' acceptance of judicial deference to the executive in other spheres covered by this book, it is a matter of concern that in this instance they were not prepared to defer to Parliament.

The effect of this decision is likely to be to the detriment of women in general (since it will not aid in improving the rate of conviction in rape cases) and of rape complainants in particular. It means that if a man alleges that he had had sexual intercourse with the woman complainant on a previous occasion and that this relates to the issue of consent, she can be questioned, at the discretion of the judge, regarding that incident. Bearing in mind that most rapists are known to their victims, it may, depending on the circumstances, be relatively easy for the man to allege that sexual intercourse had occurred on a previous occasion, even where that was not the case. The Lords were concerned about a rape allegation against a cohabitee, and considered it bizarre that the woman could not, except in very limited circumstances, be asked about the cohabitation. However, the fact that a man and woman had been cohabitees would be bound to become apparent from the evidence. Further, nothing under s 41 would prevent the fact from being adduced by the defence in relation to the man's belief in consent. Thus, given that s 41 did not create an absolute bar and that the harm to a fair trial which concerned the Lords was very unlikely to arise, it is suggested that the Lords should have accepted that the section is designed to ease the burden on rape complainants and does not, in furtherance of that aim, create a disproportionate interference with a fair trial. It is suggested that a woman who is subjected to intrusive questioning during a rape trial whether as a result of this ruling or otherwise, has the basis for a claim that Art 8 has been breached which would, however, have to be pursued at Strasbourg,³⁸ unless a court was prepared to hear argument on the issue during a rape trial, under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA.

Policies and perceptions underlying investigation, prosecuting policy, sentencing and judicial pronouncements in passing sentence in rape and indecent assault cases are still, it is submitted, a matter of concern in so far as they reflect a perception that women are not all equally worthy of protection by the criminal law.³⁹ Prostitutes, promiscuous women, women who are out on the streets at night or who accompany a man to a house after an evening out may be seen as to different degrees

38 Since HRA 1998, s 9(1) limits the right to bring proceedings under s 7(1)(a) in respect of judicial acts and also under s 9(3) precludes an award of damages in respect of a judicial act done in good faith. It may be noted that a complaint under Art 3 in respect of degrading treatment of a woman in a UK rape trial has been declared admissible at Strasbourg: JM v UK (2001) 2 EHRLR 215. The woman was subjected to prolonged cross-examination—over a period of days—by the rapist himself, who was deliberately wearing the clothes in which he had raped her. The experience, which was extremely humiliating and distressing, could no longer recur thanks to the provision of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, s 34, introduced as a result of that case.

39 See the analysis of the response of the criminal justice system to the rape victim by Temkin, J, Rape and the Legal Process, 1987, Chapter 1.

blameworthy⁴⁰ and this may be reflected in the nature of the sentence and in the likelihood that the allegation of rape will be rigorously pursued. It seems that factors such as being out on the street at night tend to be seen as of less relevance in relation to male victims of serious crime.

4 SEXUAL ORIENTATION⁴¹

The criminal law and the criminal process

As Chapter 12 and the discussion below indicate, the criminal law and the criminal process can work in concert to allow for homophobic bias in the criminal justice system. The very existence of certain offences creates leeway for homophobic investigative methods. However, the position has improved, largely as a result of the influence of the Convention jurisprudence. Chapter 12 considered the changes to the age of consent for homosexual intercourse; they have meant that investigation and arrest or harassment of gays on suspicion of intercourse with young men is now much less likely since the age of consent is now 16.⁴² However, as that chapter indicated, a position of full equality with heterosexuals has not yet been reached, allowing and encouraging the continuance of homophobic bias both in investigative techniques and in the substantive effect of the criminal law. For example, s 13 of the Sex Offences Act 1956 creates an offence of gross indecency in respect of homosexual acts. The 1967 Sex Offences Act qualifies this by providing that homosexual acts in private are decriminalised if no more than two persons are present, and as Chapter 12 explained, the age of consent to those acts is now 16. But the offence of gross indecency can still be charged where these conditions are not met; it was recently found to create a breach of Art 8 at Strasbourg in *ADT v UK*⁴³ in respect of charges brought against a man in respect of consensual oral sex and masturbation with more than one other man. A narrow margin of appreciation only was conceded to the State in finding that prosecution and conviction were disproportionate to the aims in question. Article 14 was not considered.

Studies of discrimination against homosexuals in the criminal justice system have tended to concentrate on the investigation stage and methods of enforcing certain areas of the criminal law such as s 13 or s 32 of the Sexual Offences Act 40 In a 1986 case, the Court of Appeal drastically reduced the sentences of a group of men convicted of indecent assault, Watkins LJ commenting that the victim was 'dissolute and depraved': (1986) The Times, 28 February. It may be of interest to note that in less liberal countries than Britain, such as Turkey, it is official policy to sentence rape of a prostitute much less heavily than rape of other women.

41 Reading: Feldman, D, Civil Liberties in England and Wales, 1993, pp 525–29; Hewitt, P, The Abuse of Power, 1982, Chapter 9; Wintemute, R, Sexual Orientation and Human Rights: The US Constitution, the ECHR and the Canadian Charter, 1995; Wilkinson, B, 'Moving towards equality: homosexual law reform in Ireland' (1994) 45 NILQ 252; Wilets, The Human Rights of Sexual Minorities, 1996; Heinze, E, Sexual Orientation: A Human Right: An Essay on International Human Rights Law, 1995; Wintemute, R (1997) 60(3) MLR 334; Bamforth, N, Sexuality, Morals and Justice, 1997; Skidmore (1997) 26(1) ILJ 51; Pannick, D, 'Homosexuals, transsexuals and the law' [1983] PL 279. Stychin, C, Law's Desire: Sexuality and the Limits of Justice, 1995; Rubin, 'Section 146 of the CJPOA 1994 and the decriminalisation of homosexual acts in the armed forces' [1996] Crim LR 393; McNorrie, K, 'Constitutional challenges to sexual orientation discrimination' 49(4) ICLQ 755; Wintemute, R, 'Lesbian and gay inequality 2000: the potential of the HRA and the need for an Equality Act 2002' (2000) 6 EHRLR 603.

42 See Chapter 12, p 740.

43 (2001) 31 EHRR 33.

1956.⁴⁴ Section 32 provides that it is an offence 'for a man to persistently solicit or importune in a public place for immoral purposes'. Research suggests that this section is used by police officers engaged in surveillance in public lavatories to trap gay men into some behaviour which might be said to come within the terms of the section.⁴⁵ It seems that almost any behaviour, 'any physical gesture or words' in context may fulfil its terms. Thus, homosexuals can be criminalised in respect of trivial behaviour which would not have occurred had a police officer not trapped them into it. Judgments under this section appear to reflect the bare tolerance of homosexuality mentioned above since, in determining what is meant by the term 'immoral' as used in the section, the assumption has been made that a jury would inevitably decide that homosexual behaviour is immoral,⁴⁶ and therefore, there is nothing to encourage police officers to adopt different investigative methods. Such assumptions made by judges imply that the homosexual way of life is contemptible and mean that the coercive force of the law may be used to impose a view of 'normal' behaviour on a minority, thereby failing to treat a group of citizens with equal concern and respect.

Potential impact of the HRA

As Chapters 12 and 16 explained, the HRA has potential as a means of improving the position of homosexuals. Its potential is highly relevant to discrimination on this ground in the criminal justice system, since all those involved in that system are public authorities and therefore can be sued directly under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA in respect of discriminatory practices such as, for example, arresting or stopping or searching a person on a homophobic basis. Moreover, since the criminal justice process is covered by a number of Convention Articles, as Chapter 13 demonstrated, the weakness of Art 14 would be less significant in this context than in those covered by Chapter 16. It would normally be possible to find that Art 5 or 6 (or Arts 8 or 3) was applicable. All these possibilities offer homosexuals avenues of challenge to discrimination practised against them in the criminal justice system, while s 3 of the HRA may provide a means of curbing the ambit of statutory offences which have a homophobic bias.

5 CONCLUSIONS

These two chapters have shown that, domestically, there is in place a complex anti-discrimination scheme which is, however, riddled with gaps and which covers only certain protected grounds. The strongest protection lies in the area of sex discrimination in employment, owing to the effect of EC law. The most comprehensive protection is available in respect of race discrimination. But in respect of the protected grounds, there are a number of anomalous gaps. No protection from indirect discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment or on the ground of transsexuality per se is provided. Discrimination on grounds of sex within the criminal justice system is not covered. Discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation, religion or age is not covered at all by specific statutory schemes (except in Northern Ireland), although the existing schemes covering the other protected grounds provide some incidental coverage of these other areas.

44 See Cane, Gays and the Law, 1982; Campaign for Homosexual Equality: evidence to the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure 1981, Cmnd 8092; 'Soliciting by men' [1982] Crim LR 349; Power, 'Entrapment and gay rights' (1993) 143 NLJ 47-49 and 63.

45 See Power, ibid.

46 Eg, Gray [1981] 74 CAR 324; Kirkup (1992) The Guardian, 10 November; for comment, see Power, ibid.

Clearly, addressing sometimes deep-rooted prejudice by individual legal action is an inherently flawed response.⁴⁷ Using anti-discrimination law at all can be profoundly inadequate because of the need to make comparisons with another person, as Chapter 16 pointed out. Clearly, disadvantage can often be addressed more effectively by changes in economic policies and through publicity campaigns. However, the law itself plays an educative role, since it symbolically affirms that some forms of behaviour are not countenanced by society. It can be very effective in addressing specific instances of discrimination, as the Smith and Grady case demonstrated.⁴⁸ Thus, examination of the available legal measures and their potential for development remains a legitimate avenue of inquiry.

Chapter 16 considered the potential of a number of EC measures in addressing some of these anomalies. Further, on the face of it, it is at least possible that the HRA could be used not only to fill gaps in the current schemes, but also to create remedies in respect of discrimination on the largely unprotected grounds. However, apart from the weaknesses of the Convention and the Strasbourg jurisprudence, there is also the problem of the generally unsympathetic attitude of the domestic judiciary. In a number of instances, explored in these chapters, they have curbed and limited the effects of the existing provisions. They are likely to find that this is a context in which they should leave the creation of a more extensive anti-discrimination scheme to Parliament, and the Strasbourg jurisprudence tends to leave them sufficient leeway to take this minimalist approach.

47 See Hepple, B and Szyszczak, E (eds), Discrimination and the Limits of the Law, 1992.
48 See Chapter 16, p 1054.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abel, R, Speech and Respect, 1994, Sweet & Maxwell
- Adjei, C, 'Human rights theory and the Bill of Rights debate' (1995) 58 MLR 17
- Akdeniz, Y, Walker, C and Wall, D (eds), The Internet, Law and Society, 2000 Longman/Pearson
- Akendiz, Y, 'To link or not to link?' (1997) 11(2) International Review of Law, Computers and Technology 281
- Alkema, EA, 'The third party applicability or drittwirkung of the ECHR in protecting human rights', in The European Dimension, 1988
- Allan, TRS, 'Public interest immunity and ministers' responsibility' (1993) CLR661
- Allan, J, 'Bills of Rights and judicial power—a Liberal's quandary' (1996) 16(2) OJLS 337–52
- Allan, TRS, 'Constitutional rights and common law' (1991) 11 OJLS 453–60
- Allan, TRS, 'Legislative supremacy and the rule of law' (1985) 44 CLJ 111
- Allan, TRS, 'Procedural fairness and the duty of respect' (1988) 18 OJLS 497
- Allen, MJ and Cooper S, 'Howard's way: a farewell to freedom?' (1995) 58 MLR 364
- Alston, P, The EU and Human Rights, 1st edn, 1999, OUP
- Amnesty International, The Detention and Imprisonment of Asylum Seekers in the UK, 1996, Amnesty International British Section
- Amos, M, 'Damages for breach of the Human Rights Act' (1999) EHRLR 178
- Aquinas, 'Summa theologica', in d'Entreves, P (ed), Selected Political Writings, 1970
- Archbold: Criminal Pleading, Practice and Evidence, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell
- Arlidge, A and Eady, D, Contempt of Court, 1982, Sweet & Maxwell
- Arlidge, A and Smith, ATH, Arlidge, Eady and Smith on Contempt, 2nd edn, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell
- Arnall, A, 'Article 119 and equal pay for work of equal value' (1986) Eur L Rev 200
- Ashworth, A, 'Article 6 and the fairness of trials' [1999] Crim LR 261
- Ashworth, A, "The European Convention on Human Rights and English criminal justice: ships which pass in the night?", in Andenas, M (ed), English Public Law and the Common Law of Europe, 1998, Keyhaven
- Austin, R, 'Freedom of information: the constitutional impact', Chap 12, pp319–371 in Jowell, J and Oliver, D (eds), The Changing Constitution, 4th edn, 2000, OUP
- Bailey, SH and Gunn, MJ, Smith and Bailey on the Modern English Legal System, 2nd edn, 1991
- Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 4th edn, 1995 (5th edn, forthcoming 2002), Butterworths
- Bamforth, N, 'The application of the Human Rights Act 1998 to Public Authorities and Public Bodies' (1999) 58 CLJ 159–70
- Bamforth, N, 'The scope of judicial review: still uncertain' [1993] PL 239

- Barendt, E and Hitchens, L, Media Law: Cases and Materials, 2000, Longman
- Barendt, E, Broadcasting Law: A Comparative Study, 1995, OUP
- Barendt, E, 'Freedom of assembly', in Beatson, J and Cripps, Y (eds), Freedom of Expression and Freedom of Information: Essays in Honour of Sir David Williams, 2000, OUP
- Barendt, E, Freedom of speech in the universities' [1987] PL 344
- Barendt, E, 'Libel and freedom of speech in English law' [1993] PL 449
- Barendt, E, 'Prior restraints on speech' [1985] PL 253
- Barendt, E, 'Spycatcher and freedom of speech' [1989] PL 204
- Barendt, E, 'The First Amendment and the media', in Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, Freedom of Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA, 1998, Hart
- Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, Clarendon
- Barnard, C and Hepple, B, 'Substantive equality' (2000) 59(3) CLJ 562
- Barnes, M, 'One experience of video recorded interviews' [1993] Crim LR 444
- Barnum, DG, 'The constitutional status of public protest activity in Britain and the US' [1977] PL 310
- Baxter, JD, State Security, Privacy and Information, 1990
- Beatty, D, 'The Canadian Charter of Rights: lessons and laments' (1997) 60(4) MLR 487
- Beckett, S and Clyde, I, 'A Human Rights Commission for the UK: the Australian experience' (2000) 2 EHRLR 116
- Beddard, R, 'The rights of the criminal under Article 7 ECHR' (1996) ELR 3
- Beddard, R, Human Rights and Europe, 3rd edn, 1980, Cambridge UP
- Bedingfield, D, 'Privacy or publicity: the enduring confusion surrounding the american tort of invasion of privacy' (1992) 55 MLR 111
- Bennion, F, 'What interpretation is possible under s 3(1) of the Human Rights Act?' [2000] PL 77
- Betten, L and Grief, N, EU Law and Human Rights, 1998, Longman
- Bevan, K and Palmer, C, Bevan and Lidstone's The Investigation of Crime, 1996
- Bevan, VT, 'Protest and public disorder' [1979] PL 163
- Beyleveld, D, 'The concept of a human right and incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights' [1995] PL 577
- Bhaba, J, 'Deterring refugees' (1992) Imm & Nat LP133
- Birch, D, 'Confessions and confusions under the 1984 Act' [1989] Crim LR 95
- Birch, D, 'Suffering in silence: a cost-benefit analysis of s 34 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act' [1999] Crim LR 769
- Birkinshaw, P and Parry, N, 'Every trick in the book: the Freedom of Information Bill 1999' (1999) 4 EHRLR 373
- Birkinshaw, P, 'An "All singin' and all dancin'" affair: New Labour's proposals for FoI' [1998] PL 176
- Birkinshaw, P, Freedom of Information: The Law, the Practice and the Ideal, 2nd edn, 1996; 3rd edn, 2001, Butterworths

- Birkinshaw, P, 'I only ask for information—the White Paper on open government' [1993] PL 557
- Birkinshaw, P, Reforming the Secret State, 1990, Hull University Press
- Birtles, W, 'Big brother knows best: the Franks Report on section 2 of the Official Secrets Act' [1973] PL 100
- Blackburn, R, 'A Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights', in Blackburn, R and Plant, R (eds), Constitutional Reform: The Labour Government's Constitutional Reform Agenda, 1999, Longman
- Blasi, V, 'The checking value in First Amendment theory' (1977) Am B Found Res J 521
- Bonner, D and Stone, R, 'The Public Order Act 1986: steps in the wrong direction?' [1987] PL 202
- Bonner, D, 'Combating terrorism in the 1990s: the role of the prevention of Terrorism Act 1989' [1989] PL 440
- Bonner, D, 'The Baker Review of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978' [1984] PL 348
- Bourne, C and Whitmore, J, Anti-discrimination Law in Britain, 3rd edn, 1996, Sweet & Maxwell
- Boyle, A, 'Freedom of expression as a public interest in English law' [1982] PL 574
- Boyle, K, 'Religious intolerance and the incitement of hatred', in Coliver, S (ed), Striking a Balance: Hate Speech, Freedom of Expression and Non-discrimination, 1992, ARTICLE 19
- Bradley, AW and Ewing, K Constitutional Law, 12th edn, 1997, Longman/Pearson
- Bradley, AW, 'Courts, community law and equal pay' [1988] PL 485
- Bradley, AW, 'Justice, good government and public interest immunity' [1992] PL 514
- Bradley, AW, 'Police powers and the prerogative' [1988] PL 298
- Bratza, N and O'Boyle, M, 'Opinion: the legacy of the Commission to the new Court under the 11th Protocol' (1997) EHRLR 211
- Brazier, R, 'The judiciary', in Blackburn, R and Plant, R (eds), Constitutional Reform: The Labour Government's Constitutional Reform Agenda, 1999, Longman
- Brewry, G, 'The Ponting case' [1985] PL203
- Bridges, L and Choongh, S, Improving Police Station Legal Advice, 1998, Law Society
- Briggs, A, The History of Broadcasting Vols 1 and 2, 1961 and 1965
- Brown and Hullin, 'Contested bail applications: the treatment of ethnic minority and white offenders' [1993] Crim LR 107
- Brown and Hullin, 'The treatment of ethnic minority and white offenders' (1992) 32 Brit J Criminal Law 41–53
- Brownlie, I and Supperstone, M, Law Relating to Public Order and National Security, 2nd edn, 1981, Butterworths
- Bryan, MW, 'The Crossman Diaries: developments in the law of breach of confidence' (1976) 92 LQR 180

- Bryant, B, Twyford Down: Roads, Campaigning and Environmental Law, 1996, E & FN Spon
- Butler, A, 'Why the New Zealand Bill of Rights is a bad model for Britain' (1997) 17 OJLS 332
- Butterworth's Discrimination Law Handbook*, 2000, Butterworths
- Buxton LJ, 'The Human Rights Act and private law' (2000) 116 LQR 48
- Bygrave, LA, 'Data protection pursuant to the right to privacy in human rights treaties' (1999) 6(3) IJLIT 247
- Cain, P, 'Feminist jurisprudence: grounding the theories', in Bartlett, K and Kennedy, R (eds), Feminist Legal Theory: Readings in Law and Gender, 1991, Westview
- Calcutt, Sir D, Review of Press Self-regulation, Cm 2135, 1993
- Campbell, T and Sadurski, W (eds), Rationales for Freedom of Communication, 1994, Dartmouth
- Carey, Media Law, 2nd edn. 1999, Sweet & Maxwell
- Carey, P, Blackstone's Guide to The Data Protection Act 1998, 1998, Blackstone
- Charlesworth, A, 'Between flesh and sand: rethinking the Computer Misuse Act 1990' (1995) 9 International Yearbook of Law, Computers and Technology 33
- Chesterman (1997) 'OJ and the dingo: how media publicity for criminal jury trials is dealt with in Australia and America' 45 Am Jo Comp Law 109
- Childs, M, 'Outraging public decency—the offence of offensiveness' [1991] PL 20–29
- Cholewinski, R, 'Enforced destitution of asylum seekers in the UK: the denial of fundamental rights' (1998) 10 (3) Int Journal of Refugee Law 462–99
- Choo, AL-T and Nash, S, 'What's the matter with s 78?' [1999] Crim LR 929–40
- Clapham, A, 'The privatisation of human rights' (1995) EHRLR 20
- Clapham, A, Human Rights in the Private Sphere, 1993, Clarendon
- Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 1st edn, 1987, 2nd edn, 1992, 3rd edn, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell
- Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H The Law of Human Rights, 2000, OUP
- Clayton, G, 'Reclaiming public ground: the right to peaceful assembly' (2000) 63 MLR 252
- Clements, B, 'Defining "religion" in the First Amendment: a functional approach' (1989) 74 Cornell LR 532
- Cohen, M (ed), Ronald Dworkin and Contemporary Jurisprudence, Duckworth, 1984
- Coleman, F, 'All in the best possible taste—the Broadcasting Standards Council 1989–1992' [1992] PL 488
- Coppel, J and O'Neill, A 'The European Court of Justice: Taking Rights Seriously?' [1992] 29 CMLR 669
- Cotterell, R, 'Prosecuting incitement to racial hatred' [1982] PL 378
- Cotterell, R, The Politics of Jurisprudence, 1989, Butterworths
- Craig, P and De Burca, G, European Law: Text and Materials, 2nd edn, 1998, OUP

- Craig, P, Administrative Law, 4th edn, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell
- Craig, P, Public Law and Democracy in the United Kingdom and the United States of America, 1990
- Cram, I 'Automatic reporting restrictions in criminal proceedings and Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights' [1998] EHRLR 742
- Cripps, Y, 'Breach of copyright and confidence: the Spycatcher effect' [1989] PL 13
- Cripps, Y, 'Disclosure in the public interest: the predicament of the public sector employee' [1983] PL 600
- Cumper, P, 'The protection of religious rights under s 13 of the HRA' [2000] PL 254
- Curtis, LJ, 'Freedom of information in Australia' (1983) 14 Fed LR 5
- Davies, P, 'Integrating intelligence into the machinery of British central government' (2000) 78(1) Public Administration 29
- Deakin, S and Morris, G, Deakin and Morris, Labour Law, 2nd edn, 1998, 3rd edn, 2001, Butterworths
- Devlin P (Lord), The Enforcement of Morals, 1965, OUP
- Dhavan, R, 'Contempt of court and the Phillimore Committee Report' (1976) 5 Anglo-Am L Rev 186–253
- Dicey, AV, Introduction to the Study of the Law and the Constitution, 10th edn, 1965, Macmillan
- Dickson, B, 'The common law and the European Convention', in Dickson (ed), Human Rights and the European Convention, 1997, Sweet & Maxwell
- Dickson, B, Connelly, A, Human Rights and the European Convention, 1997, Sweet & Maxwell
- Dine, J and Watt, B (eds), Discrimination Law: Concepts, Limitations and Justifications, 1996, Longman
- Dine, J and Watt, B 'Sexual harrassment: moving away from discrimination' (1995) 58 MLR 343
- Dixon, D et al, 'Safeguarding the rights of suspects in police custody' 1 Policing and Society 115
- Dixon, D 'Common sense, legal advice and the right to silence' [1991] PL 233
- Dixon, D 'Solicitors, suspects, runners, police' [1991] PL 233
- Dixon, D, 'Juvenile suspects and PACE', in Freestone, D (ed) Children and the Law, 1990, pp 107–29
- Dixon, D, Bottomley, K and Coleman, C, 'Reality and rules in the construction and regulation of police suspicion' (1989) 17 Int J Soc Law 185–206
- Dixon, D, Coleman, C and Bottomley, K, 'Consent and the legal regulation of policing' (1990) 17 JLS 345–62
- Dixon, D, Law and Policing: Legal Regulation and Police Practices, 1997, Clarendon
- Donovan, K, Sexual Divisions in Law, 1985 Weidenfeld & Nicholson
- Donson, F, 'Can the common law really protect rights?' in Leyland, P and Woods T

- (eds), Administrative Law Facing the Future: Old Constraints and New Horizons, 1997, Blackstone
- Doyle, B, 'Enabling legislation or dissembling law? The Disability Incrimination Act 1995' (2001) 64 MLR 7
- Duffy, P 'A case for equality' (1998) EHRLR 134
- Dummett, A and Nichol, A, Subjects, Citizens, Aliens and Others—Nationality and Immigration Law, 1990, Butterworths, Law in Context Series
- Dutton, D, British Politics since 1945, 2nd edn, 1997, Blackwell
- Dworkin, R, 'Do we have a right to pornography?', in A Matter of Principle, 1985, Clarendon
- Dworkin, R, 'Liberalism', in A Matter of Principle, 1985, Clarendon
- Dworkin, R, Life's Dominion, 1993, HarperCollins
- Dworkin, R, Taking Rights Seriously, 1978, Duckworth
- Dworkin, R Law's Empire 1986, Fontana
- Dworkin, R, 'Is there a right to pornography?' (1981) 1 OJLS 177
- Eady, D, 'A statutory right to privacy' (1996) 3 EHRLR 243
- Eckersley, R, 'Whither the feminist campaign?: An evaluation of feminist critiques of pornography' 15 Int J Soc of Law 149
- Edwards, M, 'Equal pay: the European dimension' (1990) BLR July 177
- Edwards, S, Female Sexuality and the Law, 1981, Martin Robertson
- Elliott, M, 'Lightfoot: tracing the perimeter of constitutional rights' [1998] JR 217
- Ellis, 'The definition of discrimination in European Community sex equality law' (1994) 19 EL Rev 563–80
- Ellis, E and Miller, CJ 'The victimization of anti-discrimination complainants' [1992] PL 80
- Ellis, E, European Community Sex Equality Law, 2nd edn, 1998, OUP
- Emerson, C 'Towards a general theory of the First Amendment' (1963) 72 Yale LJ 877
- Emerson, C, 'The right of privacy and the freedom of the Press' (1979) 14(2) Harvard Civil Rights—Civil Liberties L Rev 329
- Ericson, RV, Making Crime: A Study of Detective Work, 1981, Butterworths
- Evans, M and Morgan, R, Preventing Torture: A Study of the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture, 1998, OUP
- Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, 'Rocky foundations for Labour's new rights' (1997) 2 EHRLR 149
- Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom Under Thatcher, 1990, OUP
- Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, The Struggle for Civil Liberties: Political Freedom and the Rule of Law in Britain 1914–1945, 1999, Clarendon
- Ewing, KD, 'Freedom of association and the Employment Act 1999' (1999) 28 ILJ 283

- Ewing KD, 'Freedom of association', in McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds), Individual Rights and British Law, 1994, Clarendon
- Ewing, KD, 'Social rights and constitutional law' [1999] PL 104
- Ewing, KD, 'Social rights and human rights: Britain and the Social Charter—the Conservative legacy' [2000] 2 EHRLR 91
- Ewing, KD, 'The Human Rights Act and labour law' (1998) 27ILJ 275
- Ewing, KD, 'The Human Rights Act and parliamentary democracy' (1999) 62(1) MLR 79
- Ewing, KD, Bradley, A and McColgan, A (eds), Labour Law: Text and Materials, 2001, Hart
- Fairley, D "'D" Notices, Official Secrets and the Law' (1990) 10 OJLS 430
- Feingold, C, 'The Little Red Schoolbook and the European Court of Human Rights' (1978) Revue des Droits de l'Homme 21
- Feintuck, M, Media Regulation, Public Interest and the Law, 1999, Edinburgh UP
- Feldman, D, 'Content neutrality', in Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, Freedom of Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA, 1998, Hart
- Feldman, D, 'Remedies for violations of human rights under the Human Rights Act' [1998] EHRLR 691
- Feldman, D, 'Secrecy, dignity or autonomy? Views of privacy as a civil liberty' (1994) 47(2) CLP 41
- Feldman, D, 'The developing scope of Article 8 of the ECHR' [1997] EHRLR 265
- Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act 1998 and constitutional principles' (1999) 19(2) LS 165
- Feldman, D, 'The roots and early development of binding over powers' (1988) 47 CLJ 101–28
- Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1st edn, 1993 (2nd edn, forthcoming 2002), OUP
- Feldman, D, The Law Relating to Entry, Search and Seizure, 1986, Butterworths
- Fenwick, 'Confessions, recording rules and miscarriages of justice' [1993] Crim LR 174–84
- Fenwick, H and Hervey, T, 'Sex equality in the Single Market: new directions for the European Court of Justice' [1995] 32 CMLR 443–70
- Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Direct action, Convention values and the Human Rights Act' (2001) 21(4) LS 535–68
- Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Public protest, the Human Rights Act and judicial responses to political expression' [2000] PL 627–50
- Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'The doctrine of confidence as a privacy remedy in the Human Rights Act era' (2000) 63(5) MLR 660
- Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Confidence and privacy: a re-examination' (1996) 55 CLJ 447

- Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Sourcebook on Public Law, 1st edn, 1997 (2nd edn, forthcoming 2002), Cavendish Publishing
- Fenwick, H, 'Indirect discrimination in equal pay claims' (1995) 3 European Public Law 331
- Fenwick, H, 'Procedural rights of victims of crime: public or private ordering of the criminal justice process?' (1997) 60 MLR 317–33
- Fenwick, H, 'The right to protest, the Human Rights Act and the margin of appreciation' (1999) 62(4) MLR 491
- Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, Pearson Education
- Fiddich, P, 'Broadcasting: a catalogue of confrontation', in Buchan, N and Sumner, T (eds), Glasnost in Britain: Against Censorship and in Defence of the Word, 1989
- Finnis, J, Natural Law and Natural Rights, 1979, Clarendon
- Fitzpatrick, B and Taylor, N, 'Trespassers might be prosecuted: the European Convention and restrictions on the right to assemble' [1998] EHRLR 292
- Fordham, M, 'What is anxious scrutiny?' [1996] JR 81
- Fortin, J, 'Rights brought home for children' (1999) 62 MLR 350
- Fredman, S and Morris, G, 'The costs of exclusivity: public and private re-examined' [1994] PL 69
- Fredman, S, 'A difference with distinction: pregnancy and parenthood re-assessed' (1994) 110 LQR 106
- Fredman, S, 'Bringing rights home' (1998) 114 LQR 538
- Fredman, S, Women and the Law, 1997, OUP
- Ganz, G, 'Matrix Churchill and public interest immunity' (1993) 56 MLR 564
- Gardner, J, 'Discrimination as injustice' (1996) 16(3) OJLS 353
- Gavison, R 'Privacy and the limits of law' (1980) 89(3) Yale LJ 421
- Gearty, C, 'The European Court of Human Rights and the protection of civil liberties: an overview' (1993) 52 CLJ 89
- Gearty, CA, 'Democracy and human rights in the European Court of Human Rights: a critical appraisal' [2000] 51(3) NILQ 381
- Gearty, CA, 'Freedom of assembly and public order', in McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds) Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994, OUP
- Gearty, CA, 'Terrorism and human rights: a case study in impending legal realities' (1999) 19(3) LS 367
- Gearty, CA (ed), Terrorism, 1996, Dartmouth
- Ghai, Y, 'Sentinels of liberty or sheep in Woolf's clothing? Judicial politics and the Hong Kong Bill of Rights' (1997) 60 MLR 459
- Ghandi, S and James, J, 'The English law of blasphemy and the European Convention on Human Rights' [1998] EHRLR 430
- Gibbons, T, 'Aspiring to pluralism: the constraints of public broadcasting values

- on the deregulation of British media ownership' [1998] 16 Cardozo Arts and Entertainment Journal 475
- Gibbons, T, 'Impartiality in the media' (1985) Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie, Beiheft, Nr 28 pp 71–81
- Gibbons, T, Regulating the Media, 2nd edn, 1998, Sweet & Maxwell
- Gill, P, Policing Politics: Security, Intelligence and the Liberal Democratic State, Frank Cass, 1994
- Goldberg, D, Prosser, T and Verhulst, S, Regulating the Changing Media: A Comparative Study, 1998, OUP
- Goldsmith, A and Faran, S, 'Complaints against the police in Canada: a new approach' [1987] Crim LR 615
- Goldsmith, A, External Review and Self-Regulation: Complaints Against the Police—The Trend to External Review, 1988, OUP
- Goldsmith, A, 'Taking police culture seriously: police discretion and the limits of the law' (1990) 1 Policing and Society 91–114
- Goodhart, AL 'Thomas v Sawkins: A Constitutional Innovation' [1936–38] CLJ 22
- Goodhart, AL 'Newspapers and contempt of court in England' (1935) 48 Harv LR 885
- Goodwin-Gill, GS, 'Who to protect...how and the future' (1997) 9(1) Int Journal of Refugee Law 1
- Gordon, R and Wilmot-Smith, R (eds), Human Rights in the UK, 1997, OUP
- Graber, CB and Teubner, G, 'Art and money: constitutional rights in the private sphere?' (1998) 18(1) OJLS 61
- Grant, A, 'Pre-trial publicity and fair trial' (1976) 14 Osgoode Hall LJ 275
- Gray, K and Gray, S 'Civil rights, civil wrongs and quasi-public places' (1999) 1 EHRLR 46
- Gray, K and Gray, S Elements of Land Law, 3rd edn, 2000, Butterworths
- Greenwalt, K, 'Free speech justifications' (1989) 89 Columbia L Rev 119
- Greer, S, 'The right to silence: a review of the current debate' (1990) 53 MLR 719
- Grief, N, 'The Domestic Impact of the European Convention on human rights as mediated through Community law' [1991] PL 555
- Griffiths, J, 'The Official Secrets Act 1989' (1989) 16 JLS 273
- Griffiths, J and Lewis, T, 'The Human Rights Act s 12—press freedom over privacy' (1999) 10(2) Ent LR 36
- Griffiths, J, 'The brave new world of Sir John Laws' (2000) 63(2) MLR 159
- Grosz, S Beatson J and Duffy, P Human Rights: the 1998 Act and the European Convention 2000, Sweet & Maxwell
- Grosz, S and Braithwaite, N, 'Privacy and the Human Rights Act', in Hunt, M and Singh, R (eds), A Practitioner's Guide to the Impact of the Human Rights Act, 1999, Hart
- Gurry, F, Breach of Confidence, 1984, Clarendon
- Halsbury's Laws of England*, 4th edn, Vol 34, Butterworths

- Hanbury, W, 'Illiberal Reform of s 2' (1989) 133 SJ 587
- Hansen, O, 'A future for legal aid?' (1992) 19 JLS 85
- Harlow, C and Rawlings, R, Law and Administration: Text and Materials, 2nd edn, 1997, Butterworths
- Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1st edn, 1995 (2nd edn, forthcoming 2002), Butterworths
- Harrison, J and Cuneen, M, An Independent Police Complaints Commission, 2000, Liberty
- Harrison, J, Police Misconduct: Legal Remedies, 1987, LAG
- Hart, HLA, 'Between utility and rights', in Cohen, M (ed), Ronald Dworkin and Contemporary Jurisprudence, 1984, Duckworth
- Hart, HLA, 'Positivism and the separation of law and morals', in Essays in Jurisprudence and Philosophy, 1983, Clarendon
- Hart, HLA, 'Social solidarity and the enforcement of morality', in Essays in Jurisprudence and Philosophy, 1983, Clarendon
- Hart, HLA, Essays in Jurisprudence and Philosophy, 1983, Clarendon
- Hart, HLA, Law Liberty and Morality, 1963, Clarendon
- Hart, HLA, The Concept of Law, 2nd edn, 1994, Clarendon
- Hartley, T and Griffiths, J, Government and Law, 2nd edn, 1981
- Harvey, C and Livingstone, S, 'Human rights and the Northern Ireland peace process' [1999] EHRLR 162
- Harvey, C, Seeking Asylum in the UK—Problems and Perspectives, 2000, Butterworths
- Hepple, B and Szyszczak, E (eds), Discrimination: the Limits of the Law, 1992, Mansell
- Hepple, B, 'Can direct discrimination be justified?' (1994) 55 EOR 48
- Hepple, B, Coussey, M and Choudhury, T, Equality: A New Framework (Report of the Independent Review of the Enforcement of UK Anti-Discrimination Legislation, July 2000), 2000, Hart
- Herman, D, 'Beyond the rights debate' (1993) 2 Social and Legal Studies 25
- Hervey, T and O'Keefe, D (eds), Sex Equality Law in the European Union, 1996, Kluwer
- Hervey, T, Justifications for Sex Discrimination in Employment, 1993, Butterworths
- Hewitt, P, The Abuse of Power: Civil Liberties in the UK, 1982, Martin Robertson
- Hillyard, P, 'From Belfast to Britain: some critical comments on the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure', in Politics and Power, Vol 4, 1981
- Hitchens, LP, 'Approaches to broadcasting regulation: Australia and the UK compared' (1997) 17(1) LS 40
- Hitchens, LP, 'Media Ownership and Control: A European Approach' (1994) 57 MLR 585
- Hoffman (Lord), 'Human rights and the House of Lords' (1999) 62(2) MLR 159
- Hoffman (Lord), 'The Human Rights Act and the House of Lords' (1999) 62(2) MLR 159
- Hogg, PW, Constitutional Law of Canada, 1997, Carswell

- Hollingsworth, M and Norton-Taylor, R, Blacklist: The Inside Story of Political Vetting, 1988
- Home Office Central Planning and Training Unit, The Interviewer's Rule Book, 1992
- Horwitz, P, 'Jury selection after Dagenais: prejudicial pre-trial publicity' (1996) 42 CR 220
- Hoskyns, 'Women, European law and transnational politics' (1986) 14 Int J Soc Law 299–315
- Hume, D, Political Discourses, 1906 (first published 1752)
- Hunnings, N, 'Video censorship' [1985] PL 214
- Hunt, M, 'The "horizontal effect" of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423
- Hunt, M, Singh, R and Demetriou, M, 'Is there a role for the 'margin of appreciation', in national law after the Human Rights Act?' (1999) 1 EHRLR 15
- Hunt, M, Using Human Rights in the English Courts, 1997, Hart
- Hyder, K, 'Cause for complaint' (1990) New Statesman and Society, 12 January
- Ingber, S, 'Rethinking intangible injuries: a focus on remedy' (1985) Cal L Rev 772
- Itzin, C (ed), Pornography: Women, Violence and Civil Liberties, 1992, OUP
- Jackson, D, Immigration: Law and Practice 2nd edn, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell
- Jackson, E, 'Catherine MacKinnon and feminist jurisprudence: a critical appraisal' (1992) 19 JLS 195–213
- Jacobs, FG, 'From privileged crown to interested public' [1993] PL 121
- Jacobs, FG, The European Convention on Human Rights, 1st edn, 1975, OUP
- Jacobs, FG, and White, R The European Convention on Human Rights, 2nd edn, 1996, OUP
- Jaconelli, J, 'The "D" Notice system' [1982] PL 39
- Jaconelli, J, Enacting a Bill of Rights, 1980, Clarendon
- Janis, M, Kay, R and Bradley, A, European Human Rights Law: Text and Materials, 2nd edn, 2000, OUP
- Janisch, HN, 'The Canadian Access to Information Act' [1982] PL 534
- Jefferson and Walker, 'Ethnic minorities in the criminal justice system' [1992] Crim LR 83
- Jefferson, T, 'Policing the miners: law, politics and accountability', in Brenton and Ungerson (eds), The Year Book of Social Policy in Britain 1985–6, 1986
- Jennings, WI, The Approach to Self-Governance, 1958, CUP
- Jones, G, 'Breach of confidence—after Spycatcher' (1989) 42 CLP 49
- Jones, P, 'Police powers and political accountability: the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure'; in Politics and Power, Vol 4, 1981
- Jones, T, 'The deregulation of broadcasting' (1989) 52 MLR 380–88
- Jones, T, 'The devaluation of human rights under the European Convention' [1995] PL 430

- Jowell, J and Lester, A, 'Beyond Wednesbury: substantive principles of judicial review' [1987] PL 369
- Justice, Unreliable Evidence? Confessions and the Safety of Convictions, 1994
- Kalven, H, 'The concept of the public forum' (1965) Sup Ct Rev 1
- Kamenka, E, 'Public/private in Marxist theory and Marxist practice', in Benn and Gaus (eds), Public and Private in Social Life, 1983
- Karst, 'Equality as a central principle in the First Amendment' 43 University of Chicago L Rev 20
- Kearns, P, 'Obscene and blasphemous libel: misunderstanding art' [2000] Crim LR 652
- Kennedy, H, in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice: A Review of Justice in Error, 1999, Blackstone
- Kenny, CS, 'The evolution of the law of blasphemy' (1992) 51 CLJ 127–42
- Keown, J, 'The law and practice of euthanasia in The Netherlands' (1992) 108 LQR 51–78
- Kerrigan, K, 'Breach of the peace and binding over—continuing confusion' (1997) 2(1)J Civ Lib 30
- Khaliq, V, 'Protocol 12 to the ECHR: a step forward or a step too far?' [2001] PL 457
- Kilkelly, U, The Child and the European Convention on Human Rights 1999, Ashgate
- Klug, F and Starmer, K 'Incorporation through the back door' [1997] PL 223
- Klug, F and Wadham, J, 'The democratic entrenchment of a Bill of Rights: Liberty's proposals' [1993] PL 579
- Klug, F, Starmer, K and Weir, S, The Three Pillars of Liberty: Political Rights and freedoms in the UK, 1996, Routledge
- Labour Party, The Charter of Rights: Guaranteeing Individual Liberty in a Free Society, 1990, Labour Party
- Lacey, N, 'A change in the right direction? The CRE's consultative document' [1984] PL 186
- Law Commission, Offences Against Religion and Public Worship, Report No 145, 1985
- Laws LJ, 'The Imitations of human rights' [1999] PL 254
- Laws LJ, 'Wednesbury', in Forsyth, C and Hare, I (eds), The Golden Metwand and the Crooked Cord: Essays in Honour of Sir William Wade QC, 1998, Clarendon
- Laws, J (Sir), 'Is the High Court the guardian of fundamental constitutional rights?' [1993] PL 67
- Laws, J (Sir), 'The limitations of human rights' [1998] PL 254
- Laws, J (Sir) 'Problems in the law of contempt' (1990) CLP 99
- Le Sueur, AP and Sunkin, M, 'Application for judicial review' [1992] PL 102
- Le Sueur, AP and Sunkin, M, Public Law, 1997, Pearson
- Leander, S, 'The right to privacy, the enforcement of morals and the judicial function: an argument' (1990) CLP 115

- Lees, S, Ruling Passions, Sexual Violence, Reputation and the Law, 1997, OU Press
- Leigh, D, Betrayed: The Real Story of the Matrix Churchill Trial, 1993
- Leigh, D, The Frontiers of Secrecy—Closed Government in Britain, 1980
- Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, In From the Cold: National Security and Parliamentary Democracy, 1994, OUP
- Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58 CLJ 509
- Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'The Security Services Act 1989' (1989) 52 MLR 801
- Leigh, I, 'Horizontal rights, the Human Rights Act and privacy: lessons from the Commonwealth?' (1999) 48ICLQ 57
- Leigh, I, 'Matrix Churchill, supergun and the Scott Inquiry' [1993] PL 630
- Leigh, I, 'Reforming public interest immunity' (1995) 2 Web JCL149–71
- Leigh, I, 'Secret proceedings in Canada' (1996) 34 Osgoode Hall LJ 113
- Leigh, I, 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' [1992] PL 200–08
- Leigh, I, 'The security service, the press and the courts' [1987] PL 12–21
- Leishman, F, Loveday, B and Savage, S (eds), Core Issues in Policing, 1996
- Lester of Herne Hill (Lord) and Pannick, D (QC), Human Rights Law and Practice, 1999, Butterworths
- Lester of Herne Hill (Lord), 'First steps towards a constitutional Bill of Rights' [1997] 2 EHRLR 124
- Lester of Herne Hill (Lord), 'Interpreting statutes under the HRA', 20(3) Statute L Rev 218
- Lester, A, 'Fundamental rights: the United Kingdom isolated?' [1984] PL 46
- Lester, A, 'The judges as law-makers' [1993] PL 269
- Lester, A, Democracy and Individual Rights, 1968
- Lester of Herne Hill (Lord), 'New European equality measures' [2000] PL 562
- Lester of Herne Hill (Lord), 'The European Convention in the new architecture of Europe' [1996] PL 5
- Liddy, J, 'The concept of family life under the ECHR' [1998] EHRLR 15
- Lidstone, K and Bevan, V, Search and Seizure under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 1992
- Lidstone, K and Palmer, C, The Investigation of Crime, 2nd edn, 1996, Butterworths
- Lightman, G and Bowers, J, 'Incorporation of the ECHR and its impact on employment law' [1998] EHRLR 560
- Linn, I, Application Refused: Employment Vetting by the State, 1990
- Littleton, CA, 'Reconstructing sexual equality', in Bartlett, K and Kennedy, R (eds), Feminist Legal Theory: Readings in Law and Gender, 1991, Westview
- Livingstone, S, 'Article 14 and the prevention of discrimination in the ECHR' (1997) EHRLR 25
- Lloyd (Lord), 'Do we need a Bill of Rights?' (1976) 39 MLR 121
- Lloyd, I, Information Technology Law, 3rd edn, 2000, Butterworths0
- Locke, J, The Second Treatise of Government, 1698

- Loh, E, 'Intellectual property: breach of confidence?' (1995) 17 EIPR 405–07
- Loughlin, M, Public Law and Political Theory, 1992, Clarendon
- Loveday, B, 'Police complaints in the USA' (1988) 4 Policing 172
- Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, Freedom of Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA, 1998, Hart
- Loveland, I, Constitutional Law: A Critical Introduction, 2nd edn, 2000, Butterworths
- Lowe, N and Willmore, 'Secrets, media and the law' (1985) 48 MLR 592
- Lowe, N and Sufrin, B, Borrie and Lowe: The Law of Contempt, 3rd edn, 1996, Butterworths
- Lustgarten, L, 'Racial inequality and the limits of law' (1986) 49 MLR 68–85
- Lustgarten, L, 'The CRE under attack' [1982] PL 229
- Lustgarten, L, The Legal Control of Racial Discrimination, 1980
- Lustgarten, L, The Governance of Police, 1986
- MacCormick, DN, 'A note on privacy' (1973) 84 LQR 23
- MacDonald, I and Blake, N, Immigration Law and Practice, 5th edn, 2001, Butterworths
- Mackie, 'The third theory of the law', in Cohen, M (ed), Ronald Dworkin and Contemporary Jurisprudence, 1984, Duckworth
- MacKinnon, C, 'Difference and dominance: on sex discrimination', in Bartlett, K and Kennedy, R (eds), Feminist Legal Theory: Readings in Law and Gender, 1991, Westview
- MacKinnon, C, 'Reflections on sex equality under law' (1991) 100 Yale LJ 1281
- MacKinnon, C, 'Feminism, Marxism, method and the State' (1982) 7 Signs 515
- MacKinnon, C, 'Feminism, Marxism, method and the State', in Bartlett, K and Kennedy, R (eds), Feminist Legal Theory: Readings in Law and Gender, 1991, Westview
- MacKinnon, C, Only Words, 1993 HarperCollins
- MacKinnon, C, Sexual Harassment of Working Women, 1979, Yale UP
- MacKinnon, C, Feminism Unmodified: Discourses on Life and Law, 1987, Harvard UP
- MacKinnon, C, Towards a Feminist Theory of the State, 1989, Harvard UP
- Maguire, M, 'Complaints against the police: the British experience', in Goldsmith, A (ed), Complaints Against the Police: A Comparative Study, 1990, OUP
- Maguire, M, 'The wrong message at the wrong time?', in Morgan, D and Stephenson, G (eds), Suspicion and Silence: The Right to Silence in Criminal Investigations, 1994, Blackstone
- Maher, G, A Theory of Criminal Process, 2000, Hart
- Mahoney, P, 'Marvellous richness or invidious cultural relativism?' (1998) 19 Human Rights LJ 1
- Mallender, R, 'Judicial review and the rule of law' (1996) 112 LQR 182–86
- Manchester, C, 'Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994: obscenity, pornography and videos' [1995] Crim LR 123
- Mann, FA, 'Britain's Bill of Rights' (1978) 94 LQR 512

- Markesenis, B (ed), Protecting Privacy, Clarendon, 1999
- Markesenis, B and Nolte, N, 'Some comparative reflections on the right of privacy of public figures in public places', in Birks, P (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997, Clarendon
- Markesenis, B, 'Privacy, freedom of expression, and the horizontal effect of the Human Rights Bill: lessons from Germany' (1999) 115 LQR 47
- Markesinis, B, 'The right to be let alone versus freedom of speech' [1986] PL 67
- Markesinis, BS, 'The Calcutt Report must not be forgotten' (1992) 55 MLR 118
- Marshall, G, 'Press freedom and free speech theory' [1992] PL 40
- Martens, S, 'Incorporating the Convention: the role of the judiciary' (1998) 1 EHRLR 5
- McBride, T, 'The Official Information Act 1982' (1984) 11 NZULR 82
- McCabe, S and Wallington, P, The Police, Public Order and Civil Liberties: Legacies of the Miners' Strike, 1988, Routledge
- McColgan, A, 'Family friendly frolics' (2000) 29 ILJ 125
- McColgan, A, Discrimination Law: Text, Cases and Materials, 2000, Hart
- McColgan, A, Women under the Law: The False Promise of Human Rights, 2000, Pearson
- McConville M and Baldwin, 'The influence of race on sentencing in England' [1982] Crim LR 652–58
- McConville, M and Hodgson, J, Custodial Legal Advice and the Right to Silence, 1993, Royal Commission Study No 16
- McConville, M, 'Search of persons and premises' [1983] Crim LR 604–14
- McConville, M, 'Video taping interrogations: police behaviour on and off camera' [1992] Crim LR 532
- McConville, M, Sanders, A and Leng, R, The Case for the Prosecution, 1991, Routledge
- McCrudden, C, 'The Effectiveness of European Equality Law: National Mechanisms for enforcing Gender Equality Law in the light of European Requirements' (1993) 13 OJLS 320
- McCrudden, C (ed), Anti-discrimination Law, 1991, Dartmouth
- McCrudden, C, 'A common law of human rights? Transnational judicial conversations on constitutional rights' (2000) 20(4) OJLS 499–532
- McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds), Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994, OUP
- McDonald, RJ, 'The margin of appreciation in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights', in International Law and the Time of its Codification, 1987
- McEvoy, K and White, C, 'Security vetting in Northern Ireland' (1998) 61 MLR 341
- McGinley, 'Judicial approaches to sex discrimination in US and UK—a comparative study' (1986) 49 MLR 413
- McKenzie, I, Morgan, R and Reiner, R, 'Helping the police with their enquiries' [1990] Crim LR 22

- McNorrie, K, 'Constitutional challenges to sexual orientation discrimination' 49(4) ICLQ 755
- Mead [1998] Crim LR 870
- Meiklejohn, A 'The First Amendment is an absolute' (1961) Sup Ct Rev 245
- Merrills, J and Robertson, A, Human Rights in Europe, A Study of the European Convention on Human Rights, 3rd edn, 1993, Manchester University Press
- Michael, J, 'Spycatcher's end?' (1989) 52 MLR 389
- Miles, J, 'Standing under the Human Rights Act: theories of rights enforcement and the nature of public law adjudication' (2000) 59 CLJ 133
- Mill, JS, 'On Liberty', in Cowling, M (ed), Selected Writings of John Stuart Mill 1968, CUP; 1972, Everyman
- Mill, JS, On the Subjection of Women, 2nd edn, 1869, Longman
- Millar and Phillips, 'Evaluating anti-discrimination legislation in the UK: some issues and approaches' (1983) 11 Int J Soc Law 417
- Miller, A, Assault on Privacy, 1971
- Miller, CJ, Contempt of Court, 2nd edn, 1999, OUP
- Miller, CJ, 'The Sunday Times case' (1974) 37 MLR 96
- Milne, AJM, 'Should we have a Bill of Rights?' (1977) 40 MLR 389
- Minow, M, 'Feminist reason: getting it and losing it' 38 J Legal Educ 47
- Mirfield, P, 'Successive confessions and the poisonous tree' [1996] Crim LR 554
- Mirfield, P, Silence, Confessions and Improperly Obtained Evidence, 1997, Clarendon
- Moon, G, 'The Draft Discrimination Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights: a progress report' (2000) 1 EHRLR 49
- Morgan, R and Newburn, T, The Future of Policing, 1997, OUP
- Morrisson, CC, 'The Margin of appreciation in human rights law' (1973) 6 Human Rights J 263
- Moston, S and Williamson, T, 'The extent of silence in police stations', in Greer, S and Morgan, R (eds), The Right to Silence Debate, 1990, University of Bristol
- Mowbray, A, 'The European Court of Human Rights' approach to just satisfaction' [1997] PL 647
- Mowbray, A, 'The role of the European Court of Human Rights in the promotion of democracy' [1999] PL 703
- Mullender, R, 'Racial harrassment, sexual harrassment and the expressive function of law' (1998) 61 MLR 236
- Munday, R, 'Inferences from silence and European human rights law' [1996] Crim LR 370
- Munro, C, 'Press freedom—how the beast was tamed' (1991) 54 MLR 104
- Munro, C, Studies in Constitutional Law, 2nd edn, 1999, Butterworths
- Myron, W Oldfield (Jr), 'The exclusionary rule and deterrence: an empirical study of Chicago narcotics officers' (1987) 54 U Chicago L Rev 1016–69
- Naismith, S, 'Photographs, privacy and freedom of expression' (1996) 2 EHRLR 150

- Nardell, G 'The Quantock Hounds and the Trojan Horse' [1995] PL 27
- Nelken, D, 'Disclosing/invoking legal culture: an introduction' (1995) 4 SLS 435
- Neuwahl, N and Rosas, A, The European Union and Human Rights, 1995, Martinus Nijhoff
- Newburn, T et al, 'Increasing public order' (1991) 7 Policing 22
- Newburn, T et al, 'Policing the streets' (1990) 29 HORB 10
- Newburn, T, Crime and Criminal Justice Policy, 1995, Longman (Social Policy in Britain Series)
- Nicol, D, 'Limitation periods under the HRA and judicial review' (1999) 115 LQR 216
- Nimmer, MB, 'The meaning of symbolic speech under the First Amendment' (1973) 21 UCLA L Rev 29
- Norton-Taylor, R, in Blackburn, R and Plant, R (eds), Constitutional Reform: The Labour Government's Constitutional Reform Agenda, 1999, Longman
- Nozick, R, Anarchy, State and Utopia, 1974, Blackwell
- O'Donnell, T, 'The margin of appreciation doctrine: standards in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights' (1982) 4 Human Rights Q 474
- O'Leary, S, 'Accession by the EC to the European Convention on Human Rights' (1996) 4 EHRR 362
- Oliver, D, 'The frontiers of the State: public authorities and public functions under the HRA' [2000] PL 476
- Oliver, D, 'The Human Rights Act and public law/private law divides' (2000) 4 EHRLR 343
- Olsen, F, 'Statutory rape: a feminist critique of rights analysis', in Bartlett, K and Kennedy, R (eds), Feminist Legal Theory: Readings in Law and Gender, 1991, Westview
- Orst, S, 'Conceptions of the euthanasia phenomenon' (2000) J Civ Lib 155
- Ovey, C, 'The European Convention on Human Rights and the criminal lawyer: an introduction' [1998] Crim LR 4
- Palmer, S, 'The government proposals for reforming s 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911' [1988] PL 523
- Palmer, S, 'Tightening secrecy law' [1990] PL 243
- Palmer, S, 'Wilfully obstructing the freedom to protest?' [1987] PL 495
- Pannick, D and Lester of Herne Hill (Lord), Human Rights Law and Practice, 1999, Butterworths
- Pannick, D, 'Homosexuals, transsexuals and the law' [1983] PL 279
- Pannick, D, 'Principles of interpretation of Convention rights under the Human Rights Act and the discretionary area of judgment' [1998] PL 545
- Pannick, D, 'Religious feelings and the European Court' [1995] PL 7
- Pannick, D, 'Who is subject to judicial review and in respect of what?' [1992] PL 1

- Papademetriou, G, The European Union's Struggle with Immigration and Asylum, 1996, International Migration Policy Programme, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace
- Parent, WA, 'A new definition of privacy for the law' (1983) 2 Law and Philosophy 305, 326
- Parekh, B, 'The case for positive discrimination', in Hepple, B and Szyszczak, E (eds), Discrimination: the Limits of the Law, 1992, Mansell
- Paton-Simpson, E, 'Private circles and public squares: invasion of privacy by the publication of "private facts"' (1998) 61 MLR 318
- Penner, R, 'The Canadian experience with the Charter of Rights' [1996] PL 125
- Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, "horizontal effect" and the common law: a bang or a whimper?' (1999) 62 MLR 824
- Pleming, N, 'Assessing the Act: a firm foundation or a false start?' (2000) 6 EHRLR 560–79
- Poulter, S, 'Towards legislative reform of the blasphemy and racial hatred laws' [1991] PL 85
- Prescott, P, 'Kaye v Robertson: a reply' (1991) 54 MLR 451
- Price, 'Taking rights cynically' (1989) 48 CLJ 271
- Prosser, D, 'Privacy' (1960) 48 California L Rev 383
- Rasaiah, S, 'Current legislation, privacy and the media in the UK' (1998) 3(5) Communications Law 183
- Rasaiah, S and Newell, 'Data protection and press freedom' [1997–98] YBMEL 209
- Rawls, J, A Theory of Justice, 1973, Clarendon
- Raz, J, 'Free expression and personal identification' (1991) 11(3) OJLS 303
- Raz, J, The Morality of Freedom, 1986, Clarendon
- Redish, M, Freedom of Expression, 1984, Michie
- Reiner, R, 'The politics of the Act' [1985] PL 394
- Reiner, R and Leigh, I, 'Police powers', in McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds), Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994, OUP
- Reinman, J, 'Driving to the panopticon: a philosophical exploration of the risks to privacy posed by the highway technology of the future' (1995) 11 Computer & High Tech LJ 27
- Reville, N, Broadcasting Law and Practice 1997, Butterworths
- Rhode, D, Justice and Gender: Sex Discrimination and the Law, 1989, Harvard UP
- Rhode, D, 'Feminist critical theories' (1990) 42(3) Stanford Law Review 634–38
- Richardson, J and Thomas, D (eds), Archbold: Criminal Pleading, Practice and Evidence, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell
- Richardson, J, 'Discretionary life-sentences and the ECHR' [1991] PL 34
- Roberts, N, 'The Law Lords and human rights: the experience of the Privy Council in interpreting Bills of Rights' (2000) EHRLR 147

- Robertson, G and Nichol, AGL, Media Law, 2nd edn, 1992, 3rd edn, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell
- Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 7th edn, 1993, Penguin
- Robertson, K, Public Secrets, 1982, Basingstoke
- Robilliard, F, Religion and the Law: Religious Liberty in Modern English Law, 1984, Manchester University Press
- Robillard, St J, 'Offences against Religion and Public Worship' (1981) 44 MLR 556
- Rolph, CH, Books in the Dock: The Trial of Lady Chatterley, 1969, Andre Deutsch
- Rubin, G, 'Section 146 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 and the decriminalisation of homosexual acts in the armed forces' [1996] Crim LR 393
- Ryan, C and Williams, K, 'Police discretion' [1986] PL 285
- Sacks, V, 'The Equal Opportunities Commission—10 years on' (1986) 49 MLR 560
- Sacks, V, 'Tackling discrimination positively in Britain', in Hepple, B and Szyszczak, E (eds), Discrimination: the Limits of the Law, 1992, Mansell
- Sadurski, W, 'On "Seeing speech through an equality lens": a critique of egalitarian arguments for suppression of hate speech and pornography' (1996) 16(4) OJLS 713
- Sanders, A and Young, R, 'The Royal Commission on Criminal Justice' (1994) 14 OJLS 435
- Sanders, A, 'Access to justice in the police station: an elusive dream?', in Access to Justice, 1996, Blackstone
- Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 1st edn, 1994, 2nd edn, 2000, Butterworths
- Sands, P, 'Human rights, the environment and the Lopez Ostra case' (1996) EHRLR 597
- Scanlon, T, 'A theory of freedom of expression' (1972) 1 Phil & Public Affairs 204
- Scarman (Lord), English Law—The New Dimension, 1974, Stevens
- Schabas, W, International Human Rights Law and the Canadian Charter, 1991, Carswell
- Schauer, F, 'Reflections on the value of truth' (1991) 41 Case Western Reserve L Rev 699
- Schauer, F, 'The political incidence of the free speech principle' (1993) 64 US Colorado LR 935
- Schauer, F, free Speech: A Philosophical Enquiry, 1982, CUP
- Schermers, H, 'Adaptation of the Eleventh Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights' (1995) 20 ELR 559
- Schwartz, H, 'The short and happy life and tragic death of the New Zealand Bill of Rights' [1998] NZLR 259
- Seipp, D, 'English judicial recognition of the right to privacy' (1983) 3 OJLS 325
- Seldon, A, 'The consensus debate' (1994) 14 Parliamentary Affairs 512

- Shah, P, Refugees, Race and the Legal Concept of Asylum in Britain, 2000, Cavendish Publishing
- Sharpe, S, Judicial Discretion and Criminal Investigations, 1998, Sweet & Maxwell
- Shaw, J, 'Pregnancy discrimination as sex discrimination' (1991) 16 EL Rev 313–20
- Sherr, A, Freedom of Protest, Public order and the Law 1989, OUP
- Shetreet, S (ed), Free Speech and National Security, 1991, Dordrecht
- Sieghart, P The Lawful Rights of Mankind, 1986, Clarendon
- Silberman, R, 'Equality, human rights, women and the justice system' (1994) 39 McGill LJ 489
- Simmonds, N, 'Imperial visions and mundane practices' (1987) 46 CLJ 465
- Simmonds, N, 'Between positivism and idealism' (1991) 50 CLJ 308
- Simmonds, N, Central Issues in Jurisprudence: Justice, Law and Rights, 1986, Sweet & Maxwell
- Simon, 'Does the court's decision in Nebraska Press Association fit with the research evidence on the impact on jurors of news coverage?' (1978) Stanford L Rev 515
- Singh, R, 'Privacy and the media after the Human Rights Act' (1998) EHRLR 712
- Singh, R, 'The indirect regulation of speech' [1988] PL 212
- Smart, C, Feminism and the Power of Law, 1989, Routledge
- Smart, JJC and Williams, B Utilitarianism: For and Against, 1973, CUP
- Smith, JC and Hogan, J, Criminal Law, 9th edn, 1999, Butterworths
- Smith, ATH, 'The Public Order Act 1986 Part I' [1987] Crim LR 156
- Smith, DJ, 'Case construction and the goals of the criminal process' (1997) 37 Br Journal of Criminology 319
- Spencer, S, 'A Human Rights Commission', in Blackburn, R and Plant, R (eds), Constitutional Reform: The Labour Government's Constitutional Reform Agenda, 1999, Longman
- Squires, N, 'Judicial review of the prerogative after the HRA' (2000) 116 LQR 572–75
- Stanley, A, 'The legal status of international zones: the British experience with particular reference to asylum seekers' (1992) Imm & Nat LP 126
- Steiner, J, Textbook of EC Law, 1998, Blackstone
- Steyn, K and Wolfe, D, 'Judicial review and the Human Rights Act: some practical considerations' (1999) EHRR 614
- Straw, J and Boateng, P, Bringing Rights Home: Labour's Plans to Incorporate the ECHR into UK Law: A Consultation Paper, 1996
- Stuntz, W, 'The American exclusionary rule and defendants' changing rights' [1989] Crim LR 117
- Stychin, C, Law's Desire: Sexuality and the Limits of Justice, 1995, Routledge
- Sufrin, B and Lowe, N, The Law of Contempt, 3rd edn, 1996, Butterworths
- Supperstone, M and Coppel, J, 'Judicial review after the Human Rights Act' (1999) 3 EHRLR 301–29

- Supperstone, M and O'Dempsey, D, Supperstone and O'Dempsey on Immigration and Asylum, 4th edn, 1996, Sweet & Maxwell
- Supperstone, M, Brownlie's Law of Public Order and National Security, 2nd edn, 1981, Butterworths
- Szyszczak, E, 'Pay inequalities and equal value claims' (1985) 48 MLR 139
- Taggart, M, 'Tugging on Superman's cape: lessons from the experience with the New Zealand Bill of Rights' [1998] PL 266
- Tapper, C, Cross and Tapper on Evidence, 9th edn, 1999, Butterworths
- Taylor, N and Walker, C, 'Bugs in the system' (1966) 1 J Civ Lib 105
- Teff, H, 'Consent to medical procedure: paternalism, self-determination or therapeutic alliance?' (1985) 101 LQR 432
- Tierney, S, 'Devolution issues and s 2(1) of the Human Rights Act' [2000] 4 EHRLR 380-92
- Tomkins, A, 'Public interest immunity after Matrix Churchill' [1993] PL 530
- Tomkins, A, The Constitution Unwrapped: Government after Scott, 1998, Clarendon
- Tomuschat, C, 'Freedom of association', in Macdonald, R St J, Matscher, F and Petzold, H (eds), The European System for the Protection of Human Rights, 1993, Nijhoff
- Townhend-Smith, R, 'Justifying indirect discrimination in English and American law: how stringent should the test be?' (1995) 1 Int Journal of Discrimination and the Law 103
- Travis, A, Bound and Gagged—A Secret History of Obscenity in Britain, 2000, Profile Books
- Tregilgas-Davey, M, 'Adverse inferences and the no-comment interview' (1997) 141 SJ 500
- Tregilgas-Davey, M, 'Ex parte Choudhury—an opportunity missed' (1991) 54 MLR 294-99
- Tugendhat, M, 'The Data Protection Act 1998 and the media' [2000] YBMCL 115
- Tushnet, M, 'An essay on rights' (1984) 62(8) Texas Law Review 1363
- Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 3rd edn, 1998, Kluwer
- Vincent, D, The Culture of Secrecy, Britain 1832-1998, 1998, OUP
- von Prondzynski, F and Richards, W, 'Tackling indirect discrimination' [1995] PL 117
- Wacks, R (ed), Privacy, 1993, Dartmouth
- Wacks, R, 'The poverty of privacy' (1980) 96 LQR 73
- Wacks, R, Personal Information, Privacy and the Law, 1993, Clarendon
- Wacks, R, Privacy and Press Freedom, 1995, Blackstone

- Wacks, R, The Protection of Privacy, 1980, Sweet & Maxwell
- Waddington, PAJ, Liberty and Order, 1994
- Waddington, PAJ, The Strong Arm of the Law: Armed and Public Order Policing, 1991, Clarendon
- Wade, William (Sir), 'Horizons of horizontality' (2000) 116 LQR 217
- Wade, William (Sir), 'The United Kingdom's Bill of Rights', in Beatson, J, Hare, I and Forsyth, C (eds), Constitutional Reform in the United Kingdom: Practice and Principles, 1998, Hart
- Wadham, J and Mountfield, H, Blackstone's Guide to The Human Rights Act, 1999, Blackstone
- Waldron, J, 'A rights-based critique of constitutional rights' (1993) 13 OJLS 18
- Walker, C, 'Fundamental rights, fair trials and the new audio-visual sector' (1996) 59 MLR 517
- Walker, C, 'Scandalising in the eighties' (1985) 101 LQR 359
- Walker, C, Cram, I and Brogarth, D 'The reporting of Crown Court Proceedings and the new Contempt of Court Act 1981' (1992) 55 MLR 647
- Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Justice in Error: A Review of Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, Blackstone
- Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism in British Law, 1st edn, 1986, 2nd edn, 1992, Manchester UP
- Walker, S, 'Freedom of speech and contempt of court: the English and Australian approaches compared' (1991) 40ICLQ 583
- Wallington, P, 'Injunctions and the right to demonstrate' (1976) 35 CLJ 82
- Wallington, P, 'Policing the miners' strike' (1985) 14ILJ 145
- Wallman, S, 'Difference, differentiation, discrimination', 5 New Community 1
- Warbrick, C, 'Federalism and free speech', in Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, 1998, Hart
- Warbrick, C, 'The structure of Article 8' [1998] EHRLR 32
- Warren S, and Brandeis, L 'The right to privacy' (1890) 4 Harv L Rev 193
- Wasik, M and Taylor, R Blackstone's Guide to the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, 1995, Blackstone
- Watson, A, Legal Transplants in Comparative Law, 2nd edn, 1993, Georgia UP
- Wei, G, 'Surreptitious takings of confidential information' [1992] LS 302
- Weiler, 'The wages of sex: the uses and limits of comparable worth' (1986) 99 Harv L Rev 1728
- Westin, AF, Privacy and Freedom, Athenaeum, 1967
- White, C, 'Security vetting, discrimination and the right to a fair trial' [1999] PL 406-18
- Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties: The Human Rights Act Era, 2001, Butterworths
- Wilborn, S, 'The disparate impact model of discrimination: theory and limits' (1985) 34 American University L Rev 799

- Wildhaber, L, 'Right to education and parental rights', in Macdonald, R St J, Matscher, F and Petzold, H (eds), The European System for the Protection of Human Rights, 1993, Nijhoff
- Wilkinson, B, 'Moving towards equality: homosexual law reform in Ireland' (1994) 45 NILQ 252
- Wilkinson, P, Terrorism and the Liberal State, 1995, Macmillan
- Williams Committee, Obscenity and Film Censorship: Committee Report, 1979, Cmnd 7772, HMSO
- Williams, DGT, 'Contempt and the Thalidomide Case' (1973) 32 CLJ 177
- Williams, DGT, 'The Crossman Diaries' (1976) 35 CLJ 1
- Williams, DGT, Keeping the Peace: The Police and Public Order, 1967, Hutchinson
- Williams, DGT, Not in the Public Interest: The Problem of Security in Democracy, 1965, Hutchinson
- Williams, DW, 'British passports and the right to travel' (1974) ICLQ 642
- Williams, G, 'Preventive justice and the rule of law' (1953) 16 MLR 417
- Wilmo, P and Rodgers, W (eds), Gatley on Libel and Slander, 9th edn, 1998, Sweet & Maxwell
- Wilson, 'Confidence, privacy and press freedom: a study in judicial activism' (1990) 53 MLR 43
- Wintemute, R, 'Lesbian and gay inequality 2000: the potential of the Human Rights Act and the need for an Equality Act 2002' (2000) 6 EHRLR 603
- Wintemute, R, 'Recognising new kinds of direct sex discrimination: transsexualism, sexual orientation and dress codes' (1997) 60(3) MLR 334
- Wintemute, R, Sexual Orientation and Human Rights: The US Constitution, the ECHR and the Canadian Charter, 1995, Clarendon
- Wolchover, D and Heaton-Armstrong, A, 'The questioning code revamped' [1991] Crim LR 232
- Wolffe, W, 'Values in conflict: incitement to racial hatred and the Public Order Act 1986' [1987] PL 85
- Woolf (Lord), Jowell, J and Le Sueur, A, De Smith, Woolf and Jowell's Principles of Judicial Review, 1999, Sweet & Maxwell (student edition)
- Wright, J, 'How private is my private life?', in Betten, L (ed), The Human Rights Act 1998: What It Means, 1999, Martinus Nijhoff
- Yang, TL (1966) 15 ICLQ 175
- Young, J, The Exclusive Society: Social Exclusion, Crime and Difference in Late Modernity, 1999, Sage
- Zander, M, A Bill of Rights, 4th edn, 1996, Sweet & Maxwell
- Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 3rd edn, 1995, Sweet & Maxwell

Zellick, G, 'Fair trial and free press' [1982] PL 343

Zimmerman, D, 'Requiem for a heavyweight: a farewell to Warren and Brandeis's privacy tort' (1983) 68 Cornell LRev 291

Zuckerman, AAS, 'Public interest immunity—a matter of prime judicial responsibility' (1994) 57 MLR 703

A

- Abortion 41, 734
- Abroad, freedom to travel 968–70
- Abuse of process 898
- Access to courts 60–61
 - access to legal advice 60–61
 - appeals 60
 - asylum seekers, and 932–33
 - evidence, exclusion of 868, 874
 - fair trials 60–61
 - fees 108
 - immunities 60
 - legal aid 60–61
 - proportionality and 60
 - restrictions on 60
- Access to information
 - See* Freedom of information
- Access to legal advice 60–61
 - access to courts 60–61
 - alerting other suspects, risks of 808–09
 - children and young persons, and 812
 - confessions, and 878–79, 882, 884, 886–87
 - custody record, manipulation of 811
 - delay in 807–10, 815, 822–23, 861–62
 - detention 806–23, 860–64
 - drug trafficking and 808
 - due process, aspect of 806–07
 - encouragement to defer decision 811–12
 - encouragement to forgo advice 812–14
 - exceptions 808
 - fair trials 60–61, 63, 860–64
 - funding 820–21
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 862
 - improvement in scheme for 819–21
 - notification of right 806
 - subverting 810–11
 - PACE Codes 806, 809–15, 819, 862–64
 - police interviews 813–14, 832
 - police malpractice 926
 - police stations, suspects in 808
 - presumption of innocence 63
 - private, in 807
 - Runciman Royal Commission, and 820–21
 - Scotland, in 810
 - serious arrestable offences, and 807, 808
 - silence, right to 63, 806–09, 811, 815–19, 843, 861–64
 - solicitors
 - clerks, debarring 814–15, 821
 - training 820–21
 - telephone advice 815–16
 - terrorism, and 809–10, 864
 - training in 820–21
 - value of legal advice 815–18
 - vulnerable persons 810
- Account of profits 630
- Accountability
 - freedom of information, and 334–35
 - ministerial 335–36, 368, 652–53
 - official secrecy and 335–36
 - police 901, 432
 - complaints 920
 - malpractice 914
 - security and intelligence services, of 651–55, 657, 661–62, 666, 669
 - seizure, and 647–49
 - stop and search, and 771, 774
 - surveillance, and 700
- Admissibility
 - Confessions, of 875–89
 - European Commission of Human Rights, and 27–28
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 23
 - exhaustion of local remedies 29
 - fast track procedure 27

- individual applications
 - time limits 30
 - workload, effect on 90, 26–30
- Interception of
 - communications, and 686
 - Police interviews, of 862–63
 - silence, right to 848
- Admissions
 - See also* Confessions 819–20, 825, 829, 835
- Adverse inferences 63, 819, 840, 942–46, 856–57, 859–64
- Advertising 300
- Affirmative action
 - See* Positive discrimination
- Affray 518–19
- Age of consent 739–40, 978, 1068
- AIDS/HIV 579, 957
- Anal sexual
 - intercourse 738–41
- Airspace, trespass into 482–85, 491–92
- Annan Committee 304
- Anonymity orders 244–45, 547–49, 619
- Anti-social behaviour 505–18, 564–65
- Anton Piller orders 646
- Appeals 83
 - access to courts 60
 - asylum seekers, and 931, 932, 938–39
 - contempt, and 231–32
 - data protection, and 606
 - deportation, and 950–56
 - Investigatory Powers Tribunal 719, 723
 - prejudicing proceedings, and 233
 - quasi-military and terrorist groups 407–11
 - Special Immigration Appeals Commission 954–56
 - Videos Appeals Committee 312
- Appropriate adults 821–23, 835, 849
- Armed forces
 - administrative discretion 1057–58
 - arrest 802
 - court martials 61
 - judicial review, and 106
 - official secrecy, and 343–44
 - sex discrimination in 1032
 - sexual orientation, and 70, 106, 1054, 1055–57
- Arrest 778–91
 - armed forces 802
 - arrestable offences 780, 784, 786–87
 - authorisation 792
 - breach of the peace 494–95, 497, 500–04, 779
 - citizen's 780, 789
 - common law 779, 789
 - compensation 57
 - conditions for 781–82, 786
 - counter-terrorism, and 782–84
 - damages 785, 909, 911–12
 - delay in 802
 - detention 52, 53
 - consent to 790
 - due process 779, 784, 801
 - execution of duty 789
 - false imprisonment 786–87, 790
 - firearms, use of in 791
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 796–804
 - liberty and security, right to 50, 54–55, 753
 - margin of appreciation and 801
 - mixed purpose, for 799
 - national security 801
 - Northern Ireland, in 782–83
 - PACE 779–88, 790–91, 801–02
 - codes 784
 - powers of entry 637–38
 - private life, right to respect for 801
 - procedure 788–90
 - proportionality 801

- public order and 433–34
 race discrimination and 1062–63
 reasonable suspicion 781, 784–88, 799–800
 reasons for 54–55, 789–90, 800–01
 safeguards 789 searches after 639
 seizure 643
 serious arrestable
 offences 639, 643, 784, 792, 807, 808
 silence, right to 843
 stop and search 778, 787
 terrorism, and 54–55,
 782–84, 799–801
 use of force 779, 790–91,
 803–04
 warrants, without 778, 780–82, 788
Wednesbury
 unreasonableness, and 786, 799
- Art, works of 317–18
 Assault 762–63,
 911–12, 1062
 Assembly
 See Freedom of assembly
 Assisted suicide 732–33
 Association
 See Freedom of association
 Asylum seekers
 access to courts 932–33 accommodation 933–34
 administrative decision making 939–42
 appeals 931, 932,
 938–39
 applications, number of 932 challenges to decisions 939–42
 Conservative government, and 932–35
 delay 934
 deportation 953
 detention 932, 934
 discrimination against 936
 EC law, and 935, 938–39
 fast track 938–39
 freedom of movement 929–42, 971 gender, and 937 grounds for grant of 935–37
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 934–35,
 939–42
 illegal entrants 936
 Immigration Rules 931–32
 judicial review 940–41
 judiciary and 942
 Labour government, and 934
 legal context of 932–35 persecution of 932, 935–38 political asylum seekers 935
 political context 932–35
 refoulment 931, 938
 religion and 935–36
 safe countries 939, 941–42
 September 11 atrocities, effects of 942
 social groups 935
 third country rules 937–38, 941–42
 UN Convention 931–32, 936, 939 welfare benefits 932–33
 white list 934 women 937
- Australia
 democracy 95–96
 evidence,
 exclusion of in 872
 prejudicing
 proceedings 219
 Attorney General 224–25, 253
 Audio recordings 836–37
 Autonomy
 See Bodily integrity and autonomy
- B
 Bail 56, 499–500
 Bans
 protests 442–45, 454, 462–79
 trade unions 415–16
 trespass 489–90
 BBC Charter 299–304
 Bias

- See also* Independent and impartial tribunal
 BBC, in 301–02
 Broadcasting, in 300–02
 contempt 215, 258–59
 judiciary 215, 220–21, 223
- Bill of Rights debate 93–132
- Canadian Charter of Rights 131
- central arguments 122–29
- Conservative government, invasion of rights by 93–94
- opposition of 118–20
- constitutional rights, protection for 131–32
- democratic process as guardian of liberties 94–100
- EC law 132
- influence of 115–17
- entrenchment 129–32
- European Convention on Human Rights, influence of 112–13
- Human Rights Commission, creation of 122
- Human Rights Act 1998, and 94, 136
- Judiciary, role of 124–29, 131
- Labour party and 121–22
- Liberals and Liberal democrats and 120–21
- models for protection of rights 129–32
- notwithstanding clause 131
- parliament
- redefinition of 131–32
- sovereignty, of 93, 130, 132
- political history of 118–22
- repeal of 129–30, 132
- Scotland 149
- statutory interpretation, and 100–12
- Binding over
- bail conditions 499–500
- breach of the peace 492–94, 499–500
- freedom of protest and assembly 492–94
- Birth certificates, alteration of 743–44
- Blasphemy 314–27
- abolition 327–28
- Christian Church 314–18, 324
- definition of religion 325
- European Convention on Human Rights, and 317, 322–25
- freedom of expression 314–27
- future of law of 317–20
- Human Rights Act 1998, and 317–26
- incitement to racial hatred 326–27
- incitement to religious hatred 321, 326–27
- injunctions and 322–23
- intention to publish 315
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and 326
- margin of appreciation, and 315, 318, 319–20
- moral autonomy, and 326–27
- Muslims 317, 321, 323, 325–27
- obscene publications, and 315
- reform 317–20
- sedition 314
- strict liability 314
- works of art 317–18
- Bodily integrity and autonomy 729–36
- abortion 734
- assisted suicide 732–33
- corporal punishment and discipline 729–30
- decision-making 728
- detention 730–32
- euthanasia 732–33
- female circumcision 734
- Human Rights Act 1998, and 727
- horizontal effect, of 728–29

- inhuman or degrading treatment 729
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and 730
- medical treatment 735–36
- parental freedom of choice 734–35
- positive obligations, and 727–28
- private life, right to respect for 728–29, 736
- recognition of the values of 727–28
- searches 731–32
- self-determination 736
- surrogacy 734–35
- United States 732
- Bolam* test 736
- Border control 795, 946
- Breach of confidence
See also Confidentiality
account of profits 630 agreements, implied 574–75
AIDS/HIV, and 579
authorisation 566, 577
commercial information 569
contempt, and 362–64
Convention rights, and 356
damages 630–31
detriment resulting from 577 development of 567–77
elements of confidence 566–67
European Court of
Human Rights, and 593
freedom of expression 356–62,
581–92, 632
gagging press 358
Human Rights
Act 1998, and 356, 358, 363–64, 568,
578, 580–93, 631–32
injunctions 356–63, 568–69,
581–91, 630–32
intrusion into grief 569–70, 573–74 misconduct, and 578–79
national security 359–61
obligation of confidentiality 571–77
official secrets 335–37, 355–64
personal information,
protection of 565–93
photographs 568–70, 573–76, 581–84, 592
political speech, and 356
positive obligations, and 582 pre-existing confidential relationship 567, 592–93
press 576–77, 632
freedom of the 577–78, 580–81,
585, 588, 631
Press Complaints
Commission code 583, 587, 590 prior publication 361–62, 567–68 prior restraints 356–57, 363
private life, right to
respect for 569–70, 573, 576–78, 581–93, 597, 632–34
public authorities 356, 579–80, 582–85, 591
public domain,
information in 361–62, 567–68,
579–80, 589
public interest 355–59, 361–64, 571, 577–93, 631–32 quality of confidentiality 567–71
remedies 630–32
security services, and 359–60
Spycatcher litigation 357–63
United States, and 360–61, 569–71
Younger Committee 566
- Breach of statutory duty 167
- Breach of the peace 494–505
arrest 494–95, 497,
500–04, 779 binding over 492–94, 499–500
common law 494
contra bono mores doctrine 492–93
direct action and 492–93, 502–03
European Court of
Human Rights, and 500–01
freedom of expression and 500–01

- freedom of protest
 - and assembly 492–505
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 494, 500–05
 - immediacy 495
 - interpretation of 498
 - judiciary, and 502
 - police 494–97, 500–02
 - obstruction of 497
 - proportionality and 502
 - provocation 497–99, 502–05
 - public order 433
 - reasonableness 503–04
 - speech, and 499
 - threats 495
 - trespass 483
 - violence 498–99, 503–04
 - British Board of Film
 - Classification 309–10, 312–13
 - British citizenship 943–46
 - British Dependent
 - Territories 943–44
 - British Overseas Citizens 943–44
 - Broadcasting
 - See also* Films, Television
 - adjudications 546
 - administrative
 - decision-making 302–03
 - advertising, political 300
 - BBC
 - Charter 299–300, 303–04
 - impartiality 301–02
 - Broadcasting Complaints
 - Commission 556
 - Broadcasting Standards
 - Commission 300, 305, 546, 557, 609, 628
 - Broadcasting Standards
 - Council 304–05
 - copyright 302–06
 - channels, number of 297
 - children, and 557
 - codes of practice 308, 557, 559, 615
 - convergence 296–97
 - data protection 609
 - delivery 296–97
 - deregulation of 299
 - digital technology 296–97
 - EC law, and 298
 - freedom of expression 208, 295–308
 - future of 307–09
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 307–09, 558–60
 - impartiality 300–02
 - independent 299
 - judicial review 559
 - licensing 208, 277–78
 - OFCOM 300
 - ownership 297
 - personal information,
 - protection of 556–60, 615
 - political control 300
 - political expression 308
 - private life, right to
 - respect for, in 556, 559
 - public domain, material
 - in the 556
 - public interest 299, 557
 - racial hatred,
 - incitement to 328
 - regulation 295–300, 303–04, 308–09, 556–60
 - state monopolies 278
 - taste and decency 308
 - terrorism and 302–03
 - White Paper 307
 - Buggery 738–41
 - Bugging 689–94, 699, 723
- C
- Calcutt Committee 551, 594–96
 - Canadian Charter of Rights
 - assisted suicide under 733
 - Bill of Rights debate 131
 - evidence, exclusion of 871–72
 - judiciary 182–84
 - obscene publications 280
 - prejudicing proceedings 219
 - security and
 - intelligence services 654, 656–57, 659
 - surveillance 705

- Capital punishment
See also Death penalty
- Cautions
 detention 805–06
 evidence, exclusion of, and 870
 mental disabilities 806, 897
 police interviews 829–30, 835–36, 861
 race discrimination and 1003, 1063
 silence, right to 819, 842, 860
- Celebrities 532, 552,
 559, 626–29
- Censorship
 Broadcasting, in 302–06
 DA notices 364 films 296, 309–10, 312
 freedom of expression 302–06, 330, 620
 Internet 303
 pornography 269–76
 taste and decency,
 on grounds of 303–04
 television 302–06
 terrorism, and 302–03
- Charges
See Criminal charges
- Charter '88 118
- Charter of Fundamental Rights, EU 116, 138
- Children and young persons access rights 746 access to legal advice, and 812 anonymity 547–49, 619
 broadcasting 557
 confessions of 822
 confidentiality, and 547–48 criminal proceedings, and 547–49 detention of 52–53, 824 family life, right to
 respect for 746
 freedom of expression and 619
 indecency and 289–90
 Internet and 306–07
 Photographs of 289–90
 police interviews of 836, 840
 press and 552
 private life, right to
 respect for 547–48
 reporting restrictions 547–49
 television and 558
 transsexuals and 746
 videos 310–11
 vulnerable persons 822
 wardship 547–59
- Churches as public authorities 177
- Citizen's arrest 780, 789
- Citizen's Charter 371, 372
- Civil liberties, civil rights distinguished from 14–15
- Civil proceedings
 Contempt and 231
 Investigatory Powers
 Tribunal 716, 719
 police complaints, and 917
 prejudicing
 proceedings 227, 237, 250
- Civil rights and obligations 59–60
- Civil rights, civil liberties distinguished from 14–15
- Civil service
 conduct code 335
 freedom of information, and 336, 371, 389
 official secrecy 335–37, 341, 345–46, 354
 sexual orientation, and 1057
 trade unions 415–17
- Closed shop 414
- Codes of practice
See also PACE codes
 broadcasting 308, 557, 559, 615
 civil service 335
 data protection 601, 607, 609
 freedom of information 368–69, 371–79, 382, 389, 392–93
 police interviews 836–37
 press 261, 551–56, 559,
 583, 587, 590, 612, 614, 628
 sexual harassment 1009–10

- sexual orientation 1060
- surveillance 694–96, 699, 701–02, 711
- television 301, 304, 558, 559
- Closed circuit
 - television 702–03, 707–09
- Collective bargaining 1024–26
- Commercial expression 74
- Commercial information 362–64
- Commission for
 - Racial Equality 1049–52
- Committee of Ministers 24–25
- Commonwealth citizens 943–44
- Compensation
 - Arrest, for 57
 - data protection 600, 606, 630
 - detention, for 57
 - European Court of
 - Human Rights, and 33–34
 - miscarriages
 - of justice 83
 - press 551
- Competing rights 12–13
- Competition 298
- Complaints
 - See also* Individual applications, Police complaints and disciplinary action
 - detention, and 796
 - European Convention on
 - Human Rights, and 25–26
 - interception of
 - communications 676–78
 - security and intelligence
 - services 650, 654, 657, 659–62, 667
- Compulsory labour 48
- Computer misuse 289–90, 600–01
- Confessions
 - access to legal
 - advice, and 878–79, 882, 884, 886–87
 - admissibility of 875–89
 - bad faith, and 876–79, 888
 - children and
 - young persons 822
 - detention 879
 - evidence,
 - exclusion of 868–70, 873–89, 891–92
 - exclusion of 875–89
 - fair trials 851–52, 902
 - fairness 880–81, 885, 889, 894
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 880
 - Inducements 878
 - International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and 854
 - involuntary 891–92
 - judiciary and 881
 - mental disabilities, and 897–98
 - oppression 873–77
 - definition of 875
 - PACE, under 839, 875–78, 881–89, 892
 - police interviews 824, 838–40, 854
 - police malpractice 867, 926
 - presumption
 - of innocence 64
 - recording provisions,
 - breach of 886–88
 - reliability of 877–78, 887, 893
 - silence, right to 816–18, 842, 880, 886–87
 - South Africa, in 854
 - vulnerable persons 822–23, 877–78
- Confidentiality
 - See also* Breach of confidence 48–49
 - children 547–48
 - data protection 599, 608, 616
 - freedom of
 - expression 77–78
 - freedom of
 - information 333–34, 340, 374–75, 386–87
 - injunctions 547–48
 - official secrecy 344, 347, 352, 355–64
 - personal information,
 - protection of 540, 561, 615
 - private life, right to
 - respect for 69
 - reporting restrictions 547–59
 - surveillance and 701–02

- Confiscation orders 65
- Consent
- data protection 610
 - detention, in 790
 - identification 849
 - police interviews 813–14
 - sado-masochism, to 741–43
 - searches 641, 645–46
 - stop and search 775
- Conservative party
- asylum seekers and 932–35
 - Bill of Rights
 - debate and 93–94, 118–20
 - democracy 95
 - freedom of
 - information, and 373
 - trade unions, and 414–17
- Conscience, freedom of 73–74
- Contempt
- See also* Prejudicing proceedings
 - active proceedings 231–32
 - actus reus* 229–30, 363
 - appeals 231–32
 - Attorney General 225, 253
 - bias, imputing 258–59
 - breach of confidence, and 362–64
 - civil proceedings 231
 - common law 227–30, 255
 - continuing process,
 - protecting justice as 255–59
 - course of justice, interfering
 - with the 256
 - criminal proceedings 231
 - defamation, and 256, 259
 - fair trial, and 215, 217, 226, 252–53
 - freedom of expression 215–66
 - freedom of information 381
 - gagging writs 231
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 217, 230, 252–56
 - Injunctions, use of 232, 251, 253
 - journalists' sources,
 - protection of 261–66
 - judiciary 232
 - bias 215, 258–59
 - criticism of 257
 - jury deliberations,
 - disclosure of 259–60
 - margin of appreciation, and 217
 - mens rea* 255
 - national courts, and 225–26
 - Phillimore Committee 231–32
 - pre-judgments 256
 - prejudicing proceedings 217–55
 - public interest, and 253
 - publicity 215, 217
 - scandalising court 255, 257–59
 - strict liability
 - rule, and 230–31
 - strict liability 257
 - sub judice* 228, 231–32, 240, 253
 - time limits 230
- Convention rights
- See also* Particular rights (eg freedom of expression) 37–83
 - accountability, and 195
 - binding effect of 156–57
 - data protection, and 610–11
 - deportation, and 955–59
 - destruction of 89
 - emergencies 87–88
 - extradition, and 964
 - freedom of movement 930–31
 - guarantees 83–86
 - interception of
 - communications, and 683–89
 - interference by
 - State with 66–67
 - invoking 164–66, 171–75
 - judiciary, and 117–18
 - margin of appreciation 67
 - necessary in a democratic
 - society, interference 66–67
 - meaning of 67
 - overlap between Articles 18, 617–30
 - police malpractice, and 899
 - prescribed by law,
 - interference 66
 - proportionality 67
 - public authorities, and 156–57, 164–75

- quasi-military and
 - terrorist groups, and 411–12
 - reservations 89
 - restrictions 66–67, 87–89
 - types of 87
 - Corporal punishment 45–46, 729–30
 - Correspondence,
 - right to respect
 - for 67, 71–72
 - interception of
 - communications 670, 679
 - prisoners, and 71–72
 - searches, and 648
 - security and intelligence
 - services, and 662–67
 - seizure of 648
 - Council of Europe 24–25, 33–34
 - Court martials 61
 - Criminal charges
 - declarations of
 - incompatibility 970
 - definition 58
 - fair trials 58
 - football hooligans 970
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 970
 - Investigatory Powers
 - Tribunal, and 716
 - public order 513
 - Criminal proceedings
 - and offences
 - children 547–49
 - contempt 231
 - cross-examination 64
 - data protection, and 599, 606, 611, 616, 630
 - delay in 63–64
 - deportation 948–50, 952–53
 - discrimination 1061–70
 - facilities for
 - preparation 63–64
 - fair trials 58–59, 63–64
 - interception of
 - communications 674, 683–84, 688
 - legal representation 63–64
 - official secrecy 341–48, 352–53
 - personal information,
 - protection of 593–97
 - police complaints, and 916
 - private life, right to
 - respect for 593–97
 - public authorities, and 171
 - race discrimination in 1061–64
 - reporting restrictions 547–49
 - retrospectivity 64–67
 - security and intelligence
 - services, and 655
 - self-incrimination,
 - privilege against 857–58
 - sex discrimination in 1061, 1064–68
 - sexual expression and 737
 - sexual orientation, and 1068–69
 - surveillance, and 691, 709–12
 - telephone tapping 670
 - witnesses 64
 - Critical Legal Studies 9
 - Cross-examination 64, 1066–67
 - Crown Prosecution Service 924
 - Custody
 - See* Detention
 - Customs 290–91
- D
- DA notices 364
 - Damages
 - access to legal advice,
 - breach of, and 910
 - aggravated 911
 - arrest, false 785, 909, 911–12
 - assault 911–12
 - breach of confidence, for 630–31
 - detention, false 910, 912
 - discrimination 1046
 - exemplary 911–12
 - false imprisonment 909–10, 912
 - harassment 564–65, 1046–47
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 911
 - judicial review, in 173
 - malicious prosecution 909, 912
 - PACE, and 909–10

- police 909–11
 - malpractice 909–12, 914–15
- public authorities, and 173–74
- quantum of 911–12
- race discrimination 989, 1046
- searches and seizure,
 - unlawful 909–10
- sex discrimination 1046–47
- trespass 909
- Data protection 537, 538, 542, 597–611
 - access 597–611
 - accuracy 605, 606
 - appeals 606
 - autonomy, and 604, 610
 - Broadcasting Standards Commission 609
 - code of practice 601, 607, 609
 - compensation 600, 606, 630
 - computer misuse 600–01
 - confidentiality 599, 608, 616
 - consent 610
 - Convention rights, and 610–11
 - criminal offences 599, 606, 611, 616, 630
 - data controllers,
 - obligations of 605, 607, 630
 - Data Protection Act 1984 598–601
 - Data Protection Act 1998 603–11, 616
 - Data Protection
 - Commissioner 605–06, 611
 - data protection
 - principles 386, 604–06, 608
 - Data Protection Registrar 599–600
 - Data Protection Tribunal 606, 611
 - data subjects 600
 - data users 599–600
 - electronic information 598–99
 - EC law 603–04, 611
 - enforcement 599, 605–06
 - exemptions 600, 604–05, 607, 609–11
 - freedom of
 - expression, and 601–02, 607, 610–11, 617
 - private life, right to
 - respect for and 617–33
 - freedom of information 333, 386
 - freedom of the press 617
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 605–06, 610–33
 - injunctions 607, 630
 - interception of
 - communications, and 675
 - invasion of privacy 630
 - judicial review 611
 - manual files 599–603
 - media and 607–10
 - medical information,
 - access to 602–03
 - personal data 599
 - police, and 598
 - positive obligations 601
 - private life, right
 - to respect for 599–601, 604–06, 608–11
 - freedom of
 - expression and 617–33
 - waiver of 608
 - proportionality 601–02, 618
 - public authorities 610–11, 618
 - public domain,
 - information in 615–17
 - public interest 607, 617–18
 - registration 599
 - security and intelligence
 - services, and 659
 - sensitive personal data 604, 608, 615–16
 - social services 602
 - surveillance 701
 - unauthorised access 600–01
 - United States, in 616–17
- Death penalty
 - abolition 83
 - extradition 41, 46–47, 964
 - life, right to 41–43
- Deception 893–96
- Declarations of incompatibility 15, 99

- bills 152–54
- courts which can make 149, 151
- criminal charges, and 970
- fast track procedure 151
- freedom of expression, and 214
- Human Rights Act 1998 15, 140
- interception of
 - communications 687–88
- investigatory powers,
 - regulation of, and 153
- notwithstanding clause 152, 154
- parliamentary sovereignty 149
- police malpractice, and 899
- precedent 150
- public authorities, and 173
- reasons 152
- remedial orders 152
- remedial process 149–54
- statutory interpretation 143–45, 147, 149–55
- Defamation
 - Contempt, and 256, 259
 - freedom of expression 78, 540
 - injunctions 562
 - judiciary, and 104
 - personal information,
 - protection of 539–40, 561–63
 - prejudicing proceedings, and 248–49
 - private life, right to
 - respect for 561–62
- Defence Advisory notices 364
- Definition of rights 9–15
- Delay
 - access to legal advice 807–10, 815, 822–23, 861–62
 - arrest 802
 - criminal proceedings 63–64
 - detention 55–56, 802
 - fair trials 61–64
 - police interviews 833–34
 - remand 55–56
- Democracy 7
 - Australia 95–96
 - Bill of Rights debate, and 94–100
 - Conservative
 - government, and 95
 - Emergencies, and 96
 - executive discretion, and 95–96
 - freedom of expression 201, 203–04, 621–25
 - freedom of
 - information 95–96
 - freedom of protest and
 - assembly 422, 426, 434–35, 526
 - House of Lords,
 - reform of, and 98–99
 - judiciary 101
 - Labour government 97–98
 - margin of
 - appreciation, and 36–37
 - official secrets, and 95–96
 - opposition complicity in
 - curtailing liberties 96–98
 - parliament 94
 - sovereignty, of 95
 - protecting civil liberties,
 - methods of 94–100
 - surveillance, and 725
 - terrorism, and 96–98
 - Deportation 83, 943–59
 - abode, right of 944
 - aggravating
 - circumstances 949
 - AIDS/HIV, and 957
 - appeals 950–56
 - asylum seekers 953
 - British citizenship 943–46
 - British Dependent
 - Territories 943–44
 - British Overseas Citizens 943–44
 - Commonwealth 943–44
 - Convention rights, and 955–59
 - criminal offences 948–50, 952–53
 - detention, prior to 53, 56, 953–54
 - discrimination 945
 - dominant purpose test 951
 - EU and EEA nationals 946–48
 - extradition, as disguised
 - form of 960
 - fair trials, and 955
 - family life, right to

- respect for 747, 957–59
- freedom of movement 929–30, 943–59
- grounds for 948
- illegitimacy 944–45
- inhuman and
 - degrading treatment 44, 47–48, 953–54, 956–57
- judicial review 950, 956–57
- leave to enter or remain 948–49
- liberty, right to 953–54
- margin of
 - appreciation, and 958
- medical treatment,
 - unavailability of 44
- membership of undesirable
 - organisations 947
- national security 950–54, 956
- naturalisation 945–46
- overstayers 948
- persecution, well-founded
 - fear of 47
- private life, right to
 - respect for 957–59
- proportionality, and 956
- public good, for 949–53
- race discrimination in 943
- September 11 attacks, and 959
- settled’ in UK 944–45
- Special Immigration Appeals
 - Commission 954–56
- terrorism 959, 971
- torture 47
- Wednesbury*
 - unreasonableness, and 956, 959
- Detention 50–53
 - access to legal
 - advice, in 806–23, 860–64
 - aliens 53
 - arrest, after 52, 53, 790
 - asylum seekers, of 932, 934
 - authorisation 803
 - bail 56
 - bodily integrity
 - and autonomy 730–32
 - border control 795
 - cautions 805–06
 - children and
 - young persons 52–53, 824
 - clothing, removal of 732
 - compensation for 57
 - complaints 796
 - conditions of 730–32, 852
 - confessions in 879
 - consent to 790
 - convictions
 - after 51
 - before 52
 - counter-terrorism 796
 - custody officers 792
 - role of 804–05
 - damages 910, 912
 - delay in coming
 - to trial 55–56, 802
 - deportation 953–54
 - deportees 53, 56
 - designated
 - police officers 805
 - drunks, in 824
 - due process, and 779, 792, 796–97
 - education in 52–53
 - emergencies 55, 794
 - exclusion orders 966
 - extradition 964
 - fair trials 851
 - false imprisonment 790
 - family life, right to
 - respect for 731
 - football hooligans 969
 - Her Majesty’s pleasure, at 57
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 793–94, 796–804
 - informed of
 - detention, right
 - to have someone 805–06
 - inhuman and degrading
 - treatment 46, 852–53
 - liberty and security,
 - right to 753, 796–98
 - licences, revocation of 51
 - life sentences 51
 - discretionary 56–57
 - maximum period of 794

- mental disabilities, and 53, 806
 - miscarriages of justice 795–96
 - non-criminals, of 53
 - Northern Ireland, and 799
 - notification of rights in 805–06
 - obligation, to fulfil 51
 - PACE, under 791–95, 798–99, 804–05
 - codes 731, 793, 805–06, 821–24, 852–53
 - physical treatment in 823–24
 - police custody, in 791–824
 - police malpractice 913
 - port control 795
 - private life, right to
 - respect for 731
 - procedure 797
 - protection of
 - society, for 53
 - remand 55–56
 - restraints 824
 - review of 56–57, 792, 795, 797
 - safeguards 804–24
 - searches in 731–32, 796, 824
 - silence, right to 843
 - stop and search 776–77
 - suspicion,
 - reasonable 52, 798–99
 - terrorism 52, 55, 792–99, 971
 - time limits 791–95
 - use of force 824
 - vagrants 53
 - volunteers at
 - police stations 790
 - vulnerable groups 821–23
 - warrants 794
- Digital technology 296
- Disability discrimination
- access to goods, facilities and services 993–94, 1044–45
 - adjustment to premises 994, 1006–07
 - reasonableness 1043–45
 - anti-discrimination
 - legislation 992–94
 - broadcasting, and 296–97
 - burden of proof 1004–05
 - direct discrimination 1004–07
 - Disability Rights
 - Commission 1049
 - education 1049
 - employment 992–93, 1005–07, 1043–45
 - field of application 993
 - indirect discrimination 1005
 - justification 1004–06
 - less favourable
 - treatment 1004–07
 - medical model 993
 - positive
 - discrimination 1043–45
 - remedies 1050
 - victimisation 1028–32
 - vulnerable persons 821–22
- Discrimination
- See also* Disability discrimination, Equal pay, Positive discrimination, Race Discrimination, Sex discrimination 85–86, 975–1070
- anti-assimilation 978–79
 - anti-discrimination
 - measures 986–94, 1061
 - applications, success
 - rate of 1047–48
 - asylum seekers, and 936
 - civil rights and
 - obligations 59
 - criminal
 - proceedings, and 1061–70
 - damages 1046
 - deportation, and 945
 - different treatment 86–87
 - differentiation 977–78, 980
 - direct discrimination 994–1010
 - EC law, and 986–94
 - Employment, in 978, 980, 1046–48
 - European Convention on
 - Human Rights, and 981, 983–85
 - protocols 985
 - formal equality 876–78
 - freedom of expression, and 76

- harassment 1007–10
- Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 135, 980,
 983–85, 1061
 horizontal effect of 984–85
- illegitimacy 945
- indirect discrimination 1010–17
- individual method, efficacy of 1045–48
- inhuman and degrading treatment, as 46
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and 978
- interpretation 985
- justification 975–76
- lawful 1032–34
- less favourable treatment 1001
- marital status 988, 1001
- market forces 976
- nationality 1016–17
- neutrality 977–78
- opportunity, unequal treatment to justify 976
- procedural fairness 86
- protocols 135
- public authorities 984
- recommendations 1046–47
- reform 1048
- religion 175, 177, 983
- remedies 1045–47
- sexual orientation 739–40, 977–78,
 982–83, 1052–60
- spouses 83, 85–86
- substantive equality 977–78
- Sunday working 983
- victimisation 1028–32
- Divorce 80–81
- Domestic violence 744–45
- Double jeopardy 83
- Drugs
 confiscation orders 65 stop and search for 764 trafficking 808, 969
- Drunks, detention of 824
- Due process
 access to legal advice 806–07
- arrest 779, 784, 801
- detention 779, 792, 796–97
- evidence, exclusion of 870, 890, 893,
 903–04, 907–09
- PACE, and 755–56
- police interviews 825–27, 836
- police malpractice 927–28
- silence, right to 840
- stop and search 759–60, 771
- E
- EC law
See also Equal pay
- asylum seekers 935, 938–39
- Bill of Rights debate, and 115–17, 132
- broadcasting 298
- competition 298
- data protection 603–04, 611
- discrimination 981–85, 1070
- EU Charter of Fundamental Rights 116, 138
- European Convention on
 Human Rights,
 influence of 113, 115–17
 accession to 116
- freedom of movement 970–71
- fundamental rights 115–16
- harassment 1009–10
- indecency 290–91
- interception of
 communications 672
- judiciary, and 116
- nationality
 discrimination 1016–17
- parental leave 1000–01
- parliamentary sovereignty 130
- positive
 discrimination 1036–43
- pregnancy 996–1000
- race discrimination 982–83, 992,
 1016–17
- satellites 306
- sex discrimination 985, 988–89,
 996–99, 1012–15,
 1032, 1036–43, 1050–51
- sexual harassment 1009–10

- sexual orientation 738, 739, 983, 1052, 1059–60
- Social Charter 138
- transsexuals 116, 985, 988–89, 1054–55
- working time 1015
- Education
 - Access to 82
 - corporal punishment 729–30
 - detention 52–53
 - disability
 - discrimination, and 1049
 - margin of
 - appreciation, and 82
 - reservation, UK 82
 - sexual orientation, and 1058
- Effective remedies, right to 83–85
 - Investigatory
 - Powers Tribunal 724
 - judicial review 84
 - police complaints 921
 - police malpractice 867–68
 - telephone tapping, and 85
- Elections 83
- Electronic information 598–99
- E-mail 671
- Emergencies 87–89
 - aliens, political
 - activities of 88
 - Convention rights, and 87–88
 - democracy 96
 - detention 55, 794
 - margin of
 - appreciation, and 34, 35–36, 87
 - powers of entry 638
 - terrorism 400
- Employment
 - See also* Equal pay
 - disability discrimination, in 992–93, 1005–07, 1043–45
 - discrimination 978, 980, 1046–48
 - flexible working 1014
 - freedom of
 - movement 946–47
 - harassment 1007–09
 - job seekers 947
 - part-timers 1022
 - pregnancy 995–99
 - race discrimination 982, 990–91, 1033–34, 1061–62
 - security and intelligence
 - services, vetting 668–69
 - sex discrimination 995–1000, 1010–15, 1069–70
 - sexual orientation 978, 1053–57, 1059
 - temporary 998–99
 - tribunals 668–69
 - working time 1015
- Enforcement
 - data protection 599, 605–06
 - European Convention on Human Rights, and 20, 90, 91
 - freedom of information, and 392–93, 395
- Information
 - Commissioner 393, 395
 - Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration 376–77
 - remedies 100–01
- Entrapment 894, 904
- Entrenchment
 - of rights 3, 129–32, 138–39
- Equal Opportunities
 - Commission 1049–52
- Equal pay
 - collective bargaining 1024–26
 - comparators 1019–22, 1024
 - conditions 1026–27
 - discrimination 982
 - equal value 1018–20, 1023–24, 1026–27
 - equality clause 1018, 1025
 - fringe benefits 1020–21
 - genuine differences 1022
 - justification 1024–25, 1027–28
 - market forces 1022–24, 1027
 - material factor
 - defence 1021–27
 - part-timers 1022
 - same employment' 1019–20
 - sexual orientation 1054–56
 - term by term approach 1020–21

- Equal treatment
See Discrimination, Equal pay
- Ethnic groups 1002–03
- EU Charter of
 Fundamental Rights 116, 138
- European Commission of Human Rights
 admissibility 27–28
 composition of 21–22
- European Court of
 Human Rights,
 merger with 20, 31–32, 113
 filtering role of 21, 27 individual petition to 21
 role of 21–22
- European Convention on Human Rights
See also Convention rights 17–91
 Bill of Rights debate 112–13
 Blasphemy, and 317, 322–25
 Charter '88 118
 common law,
 influence of, on 114–15
 deficiencies of 136–38
 discrimination 981, 983–85
 EC law, and 113, 115–17
 Enforcement, of 20, 90, 91
 entrenchment 138–39
 European Commission of
 Human Rights 20
 evidence, exclusion of 872–73,
 889, 891–92, 907
 fair trials 900–01
 football hooligans, and 969–70
 freedom of expression 623
 freedom of movement 930–31, 969–70
 freedom of protest
 and assembly 420, 435, 437, 451, 466–67, 473–74
 incorporation, debate on 117–22, 133–37
 influence of,
 before HRA 112–15
 limitations on 136–38
 judicial review, and 104–05, 107
 judiciary, and 103, 111
 margin of appreciation 17–18 media, role of 298
 national courts 112
 personal information,
 protection of 538–41
 police malpractice 865–67
 prejudicing proceedings 223–27
 private life, right to
 respect for 533
 procedural influence of 112–13
 protocols 18–19,
 930–31, 985
 purpose of 190–91
 quasi-military and terrorist groups, and 408–13
 ratification of 118
 security and intelligence services, and 650
 statutory interpretation, and 113–14 success of 89–90 supervisory procedure for 20–37
 surveillance, and 704–05
 UK, impact in 113–15
- European Court of Human Rights admissibility 23
 approach of 17–18
 compensation 33–34
 decisions of 137
 European Commission of
 Human Rights
 merger with 20, 113 reports of 31–32
 form of 23–24
 freedom of association 398
 freedom of expression 74, 199–200, 209–11, 620–25
 freedom of protest
 and assembly 422, 450, 525
 individual petitions 19, 22–23, 25–34 judgments 31–34
 judiciary 23, 106
 personal information,
 protection of 538–45, 613–14
 police malpractice, and 900, 925
 precedent 32

- private life, right to
 - respect for 529–30
- Protocol 11 reforms 24
- role of 22–24
- statutory interpretation 146–48
- terms of membership 23
- trade unions, and 413–17
- European Union
 - See EC law*
- Euthanasia 732–33
- Evidence, exclusion of 868–88
 - abuse of power 869
 - abuse of process 898
 - access to legal advice 868, 874
 - arrest 891
 - Australia, in 872
 - burden of proof 908
 - Canada, in 871–72
 - cautions 870
 - confessions 868–70, 873–89, 891–92
 - conflicting values,
 - underlying 868–69
 - crime control 907–08
 - deception 893–96
 - discretion as to 896–97
 - due process 870, 890, 893, 903–04, 907–09
 - entrapment 894, 904
 - European Convention on Human Rights, and 872–73, 889, 891–92, 907
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 873, 902–09
 - fair trials 871–73, 901–09
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 869–71, 873, 902–03, 909
 - identification 890
 - incitement 905
 - informers 901–02
 - judiciary, attitude to 906
 - jurisdictions, position in
 - other common law 871–72
 - jury directions 859, 897
 - margin of appreciation, and 872, 906
 - mental disabilities 897–98
 - New Zealand, in 871
 - PACE codes 868–69, 874, 889, 892, 894–96, 903–06
 - physical 891
 - police impropriety, and 867–900, 902–04, 925–96
 - positive obligations 905
 - rape 907
 - sensitive material 902
 - silence, right to 870, 903
 - stop and search 774, 890–91
 - surveillance 709–11
 - tape recordings, secret 894–96, 907–08
 - tricks, evidence
 - obtained by 893–96
 - undercover work 893–96
 - United States, in 871
 - Victims and 907–08
- Exclusion orders 965–68
- Executive Democracy and 95–96
 - discretionary powers of 95–96, 101
 - freedom of protest and assembly 450, 456
- Human Rights Act 1998, and 134, 971
- judicial review 105
- parliamentary sovereignty, and 101
- Exhaustion of local remedies admissibility 29
- Expression
 - See Freedom of expression*
- Expulsion
 - See Deportation*
- Extradition 959–64
 - challenging 962–64
 - Convention rights, and 964
 - crimes 960–61
 - humanity, against 952
 - death penalty 41, 46–47, 964
 - deportation, as disguised form of 960
 - detention 964
 - European Convention on 959–61
 - evidence 961
 - family life, right to respect for 964

freedom of movement 929–30, 959–64 habeas corpus 962–63
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 960, 962–64
 inhuman and degrading treatment, and 44, 46–47
Pinochet case 961–62
 September 11 attacks, and 964
 state immunity 961–62
 terrorism 960, 963–64
 torture 962

F

Fair trials 57–64

access to courts 60–61
 access to legal advice 60–61, 63, 860–64
 adverse inferences from silence, and 856–57
 civil rights and obligations 59–60
 confessions 851–52, 902
 contempt, and 215, 217,
 226, 252–53
 criminal charges 58
 criminal proceedings 58–59, 63–64
 cross-examination 64
 delay 61–64
 deportation 955
 detention 851
 European Convention on
 Human Rights, and 900–01
 evidence, exclusion of 871–73, 901–09
 facilities for preparation 63–64
 guarantees of 58
 Human Rights Act 1998,
 and 851–52, 901
 independent and impartial tribunal 61
 informers, and 901–02
 interception of communications, and 686–87
 Investigatory Powers

Tribunal 719–23
 legal representation 63–64 police interviews, and 853, 854
 police malpractice 866–67,
 898–909, 913–14
 press, and 553
 prejudicing
 proceedings 219,
 221–27, 233, 254
 presumption
 of innocence 63–64, 854–55, 901
 public interest immunity, and 369
 regulatory offences 59
 reporting restrictions 241–42
 self-incrimination,
 privilege against 855–56, 858–60
 silence, right to 848, 855–57, 863–64
 stop and search, and 774–75
 surveillance, and 711
 terrorism, and 524–25
 False imprisonment 786–87, 790,
 909–10, 912, 914
 Families
See Marry and found a family, right to,
 Family life, right to respect for Family life, right to respect for 67, 744–47
 access to children 746
 definition of 746–47
 deportation 747, 957–59
 domestic violence 744–45
 extradition and 964
 illegitimacy 745 immigration 747 marital rape 745
 positive obligations to promote 745 recognition of value of 727–28
 sexual orientation 1059
 transsexuals 746
 Fast track procedure 27, 151, 938–39
 Female genital mutilation 734
 Films

- See also* Videos
- British Board of Film
 Classification 309–10, 312
 public authority, as 312–13
 censorship 296, 309–10, 312 certificates 309–10
 freedom of expression 295–96, 309–10,
 312–13
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 312–13
 licensing 310
 local authorities 310
 obscene publications 296, 309
 public good defence 310
 violent behaviour, inducing 309
- Fingerprints 850–51
- Firearms 791
- Flexible working 1050–51
- Football hooligans 969–71
- Force
See Use of force
- Forced labour 48
- Forfeiture 286, 287, 330
- Free movement of workers 946–47
- Freedom of assembly
See Freedom of protest and assembly
- Freedom of association
See also Quasi-military and terrorist groups 78, 79–80, 397–417
 common law, and 398 compulsory membership 79–30 demonstrations 397
 European Court of Human Rights, and 398
 freedom of assembly 397–98
 freedom of expression 397, 399
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 398
 local government officers 399 political associations 399
 protests 397–98
 restrictions on 398
 security and intelligence
 services, and 664
 terrorism 398
 trade unions 79–30, 399,
 413–17
- Freedom of expression 74–78, 199–331
 autonomy 619–22
 blasphemy 314–27
 breach of confidence 356–62,
 581–82, 632
 breach of the peace 500–01
 broadcasting 208, 295–306
 Broadcasting Standards
 Commission 628
 celebrities, and 626–29
 censorship 302–06,
 330, 620
 children, anonymity of 619 commercial speech 74 computerised systems 296–302
 confidentiality 77–78
 contempt 215–66
 creative freedom 207–08
 data protection 601–02, 607, 610–33
 declarations of incompatibility, and 214
 defamation 78, 540
 democracy 201, 203–04, 621–25
 discrimination 76
 European Convention on
 Human Rights, and 623
 European Court of Human
 Rights, and 74, 199–200, 209–11, 620–25
 exceptions 76–78
 explicit expression, legal responses to 2–314
 films 295–96, 309–10,
 312–13
 fitness for office
 justification 626–29
 forfeiture 330
 freedom of association 397, 399
 freedom of information 333–34, 375
 freedom of protest and

- assembly 421, 422–23, 436–43, 446–56, 464, 470, 526
- freedom of the press 210–11
- harassment and 565
- Human Rights Act 1998, and 213–14, 267, 623, 625
- indecenty 287–95, 330
- individual self-fulfilment, argument from 204–05
- information, receipt and finding of 75–76
- injunctions 176
- interferences with
 - content-based 206–07
 - form-based 206–07
- Internet 295–96, 306–09
- journalists 263–64
- judiciary, and 76–77, 103, 104, 203, 267–68, 330
- juries, and 260
- justifications for 200–11
- licensing 76, 208
- margin of
 - appreciation, and 35, 76, 77, 199, 213, 331
- market freedom 207–08
- media 176–77, 267–68
- morals
 - protection of 76–77, 268–76
- national security, and 78
- New Zealand Bill of Rights, under 276
- obscene publications 76–77, 277–287, 292–93, 330
- offensiveness 268–76
- official secrecy 341–42, 350–51
- outraging public
 - decency 293–94, 330
- personal information, protection of 540
- political speech 74, 75, 209–11, 267, 330–31, 621
- pornography 205, 268–76, 278
- prejudicing
 - proceedings 250–52, 254
- press 619–22, 629–30
 - freedom of the 210–11, 621
 - role of 209
 - Press Complaints Commission
 - code 628
 - prior restraint 277
 - private life, right to
 - respect for, and 202–03, 617–33
 - proportionality 207, 626
 - public interest 612, 625
 - public order, and 213, 431, 509
 - quasi-military and
 - terrorist groups, and 412, 523
 - racial hatred 327–30
 - racist ideas 75
 - religion, and 77
 - reporting restrictions 550
 - restrictions on 76–78, 205–06, 212–213, 215–331
 - satellite
 - broadcasting 305–06
 - scope of 74–76
 - sedition libel 314–27
 - sexual orientation, and 1058
 - statutory
 - interpretation, and 211–12
 - telephony 296–302
 - terrorism, and 214, 519–20
 - theories of 619–23
 - truth, argument from 202–03
 - United States, in 208, 211–12, 276, 624
 - victims, and 166
 - videos 205–96, 310–12
 - Williams Committee 330
- Freedom of information.
 - See also* Official secrets
 - accountability 334–35
 - administrative
 - decision-making 333
 - appeals 393–94
 - applications for
 - information 392–94
 - Campaign for Freedom of Information 336, 370, 373, 384, 386–87, 391
 - Citizen's Charter 371, 372
 - civil service 336, 371, 389

- code of practice 368–69, 371–79, 382, 389, 392–93
- confidentiality 333–34, 340, 374–75, 386–87
- Conservative Party, and 373
- contempt 381
- data protection 333
 - principles 386
- democracy, and 95–96
- enforcement 392–93, 395
- exemptions 374–78, 380–92, 395
 - class 384–90
 - expiry of 391–92
 - total 384
- fees 392
- freedom of
 - expression, and 333–34, 375
- Freedom of Information Act 2000 378–94
 - prior to 370–95
- harm tests 374, 383–90
- Human Rights Act 1998, and 334, 381–82
- Information Commissioner 380–81, 392–95
- intelligence
 - services, and 381–83, 385–86
- justification for 333, 335
- Labour Government, and 370
- legal professional privilege 390
- Macpherson Report, and 387
- Matrix Churchill affair 379
- national security 374, 391
- Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration 373, 375–79, 383
- parliamentary privilege 386
- prejudice, concept of 385, 390, 392
- privacy, and 333
- public authorities 381–84, 386–90, 394
- public domain, people in 333–34
- public interest 335, 373, 375, 384–91
- public records 371–72
- publication schemes 394–95
- right to know' 336
- Scott Inquiry 379
- security services, and 381–83, 385–86
- time limits 392–94
- Wednesbury* unreasonableness, and 391
- Freedom of movement 929–80
 - abroad, freedom to travel 968–70
 - asylum seekers 929–42, 971
 - border controls 946
 - Convention rights, and 930–31
 - deportation 929–30, 943–59
 - drug trafficking 969
 - EC law 970–71
 - employment 946–47
 - EU and EEA nationals 946–48
 - European Convention on Human Rights 930, 969–70
 - protocols of 930–31
 - exclusion orders 965–68
 - extradition 929–30, 959–64
 - fair trials, and 930
 - football supporters 969–71
 - free movement of workers 946–47
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 930, 969–71
 - immigration 929–30
 - International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and 929
 - Job-seekers 947
 - leave to enter and remain 947
 - passports 968–70
 - public policy 947–48
 - satellites 305–06
 - terrorism, and 971–72
- Freedom of protest and assembly 78–79, 419–526
 - administrative decision-making relating to 449, 452–53
 - administrative errors 457
 - advance notice of public

- processions 456–58
- affray 518–19
- anti-social behaviour 505–18
- bans 442–45, 454, 462–79
- binding over 492–94
- breach of the peace 492–505
- common law, and 114–15, 421, 448–49
- conditions 458–62
- conflicting rights 454–55
- contra bono mores* power 492–93
- counter-terrorism 519–25
- democracy, and 422, 426, 434–35, 526
- direct action 424–26, 439–40
- education, and 436
- European Convention on Human Rights, and 420, 435, 437, 451, 466–67, 473–74
- European Court of Human Rights, and 422, 450, 525
- freedom of association 397–98
- freedom of expression 421, 422–23, 436–43, 446–56, 464, 470, 526
- harm tests 491
- Human Rights Act 1998, and 420, 426, 436–39, 447–63, 467, 474–30, 513–16, 519, 525
- injunctions 513–16, 517–18
- judicial review, and 454–56
- judiciary 434–35, 439, 446, 525
 - activism of 451–53, 526
 - minimalism of 447–51, 526
 - restraint 449
- justifications for 421–26, 442–45
- margin of
 - appreciation, and 79, 442–43, 447–52, 455, 458, 464, 472, 477, 525
- meetings and marches,
 - regulation of 456–80
- minority groups 422–23, 426, 435
- moral autonomy, and 423
- national security 442
- nuisance 517
 - obstructing the highway 480–82
 - peaceful 78
 - police, and 449–50, 456–65
 - political expression 421, 434, 438–39
 - political parties 423–24
 - positive obligations
 - relating to 78–79, 453–55, 491
 - primary rights,
 - interference with 442–45
 - prior restraint 444–45, 480, 515
 - privacy, and 426
 - private nuisance 517
 - property rights, and 472–73
 - proportionality 443, 445, 448–50, 460–62, 476, 479
 - public authorities, and 435, 453–54, 491
 - public order 421, 427–37, 505–19
 - quasi-military and
 - terrorist groups 520–25
 - quasi-public land,
 - access to 453–54, 491
 - regulation 456–80
 - remedies 517–18
 - riots 425–26, 518–19
 - spontaneous
 - demonstrations 457
 - statutory
 - framework for 456–80
 - statutory
 - interpretation, and 445–46, 475, 479
 - terrorism 519–25
 - traditional legal
 - recognition 435–37
 - trespass, criminalising 482–492
 - trespassory assemblies 453, 464–69, 477–79
 - ‘triggers’ 458–60, 462
 - UK, in 446–56
 - United States, in 438, 453, 491
 - violence 425, 518–19
 - Wednesbury* unreasonableness, and 449–50
- Freedom of movement 83

- Freedom of religion
See Religion
- G
- Gagging orders 231, 358
- GCHQ 415–16, 649–50,
 652, 655–56, 659–60, 698
- Gender reassignment
See Transsexuals
- Group identification 849
- H
- Habeas corpus* 962–63
- Harassment
actus reus 510
 code of practice 1009–10 damages for 564–65, 1046–47
 definition 510–11
 detriment 1007–08 direct discrimination, as 1007–10
 discrimination and 1007–10
 EC law, and 1009–10
 employment 1007–09
 freedom of expression, and 565
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 564–65
 injunctions 511
 interpretation 510
 mens rea 511
 pornography, and 273
 private life, right to
 respect for 564–65
 racial discrimination 565, 1007–10, 1046–47, 1062
 reasonableness 511, 564
 remedies 564–65
 sentencing 511
 sex discrimination 273, 1007–10
 stalkers 564
- Harassment, alarm
 or distress 507–13,
 564–65
- Hate speech
See Racial hatred,
 incitement to
- Helping police with their inquiries 790, 833
- Her Majesty's Pleasure, detention at 57
- Hijacking 522
- HIV 579, 957
- Hohfeld, Wesley 14–15
- Home, right to.
 respect for 67, 70–71
 interception of communications 679
 margin of appreciation, and 70–71
 noise 71
 peaceful enjoyment of 71 planning permission 70–71 pollution 71
 restrictions 70
 searches of 647–49
 security and intelligence
 services, and 662–67
 seizure 647–49
- Homosexuals
See Sexual orientation
- Horizontal effect
- Hours of work 1015
- House of Lords, reform of 98–99
- Housing 1059
- Human Rights Act 1998 133–96
 access to legal advice under 862 aims of 133
 arrest, and 796–804
 asylum seekers, and 934–35, 939–42
 Attorney General,
 role of 225
 Bill of Rights 94, 136
 Blasphemy, and 317–26
 bodily integrity and autonomy, and 727–29
 breach of confidence, and 356, 358,
 363–64, 568, 578,
 580–93, 631–32
 breach of the peace, and 494, 500–05
 broadcasting, and 307–09, 58–60

- choice of rights 135–39
- civil liberties 14–15
- common law, and 111, 134–35
- confessions, under 880
- constitutional
 - background, to 3–4
- contempt, and 217, 230, 252–56
- criminal charges 970
- criticism of 137–38
- damages under 911
- data protection, and 605–06, 610–33
- declarations of
 - incompatibility 15, 140
- detention, and 793–94, 796–804
- discrimination under 135, 980, 983–85, 1061
- entrenchment 138–39
- evidence, exclusion of,
 - under 869–71, 873, 902–03, 909
- exceptions 136–37
- executive, and 134, 971
- extradition 960, 962–64
- fair trials, under 851–52, 901
- films, and 312–13
- football
 - supporters, and 969–71
- freedom of association 398
- freedom of expression 213–14, 267, 623, 625
- freedom of information,
 - and 334, 381–82
- freedom of movement 930, 969–71
- freedom of protest and
 - assembly 420, 426, 436–39, 447–63, 467, 474–80, 513–16, 519, 525
- harassment, and 564–65
- Human Rights Commission,
 - creation of 194–95
- injunctions 516, 518
- interception of
 - communications,
 - and 678–89
- International Covenant on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights, and 137
- Investigatory Powers Tribunal, and 719–24
- Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights 195
- judicial review, and 107–08, 110, 112, 186–89, 194
- judiciary, and 135, 136, 180–94
- margin of appreciation
 - under 184–85
- media, and 176–78, 298
- New Zealand
 - Bill of Rights,
 - comparison with 139
- obscene publications, and 287
- obstruction, and 481–82
- official secrecy, and 340–41, 348, 351, 353–54
- personal information,
 - protection of 538–45, 561, 612–33
- police, and 754, 756
 - complaints 920–23
 - malpractice 866–68, 898–908, 912–15, 924–25, 927–28
- press, and 546, 555, 558–60, 614
- private life, right
 - to respect for 533, 537, 594, 597, 633–64, 724
- proportionality 133–34
- protocols,
 - incorporation of 135, 138
- public authorities 133–34, 156–75
- quasi-military
 - and terrorist groups, and 408–13, 522–25
- religion, and 175–76, 177–78
- repeal of 155
- Scotland, in 194–95
- self-incrimination,
 - privilege
 - against, under 858
- sexual orientation, and 1053, 1054, 1055–59, 1069
- scrutiny under 194–95
- statutory interpretation,
 - under 19–20, 139–55
- surveillance, and 635, 690–91,

696–714
 terrorism, and 522–25, 971
 trade unions, and 415, 417 trespass, and 485, 488–92, 563–64
 use of force 804 victimization, and 1031–32
 Human Rights Commission, creation of 122
 Humanity, crimes against 952
 Hunting 484

I

Identification of suspects 848–51
 appropriate adults 849
 consent 849
 evidence, exclusion of 890 fingerprints, by 850–51
 group identification 849 identification parades 849–50, 890
 PACE codes 848–51, 890
 Runciman Royal
 Commission 851
 safeguards 850 samples 850–51
 video 850
 vulnerable groups 849
 witness 849–50
 Illegal entrants 936
 Illegality 167
 Illegitimacy 944–45
 Immigration 180, 747, 929, 931–32
 Immunities.
See also Public interest immunity
 access to courts 60
 extradition 961–62
 negligence 60
 police 60, 991
 state 961–62
 Impartiality
See Bias, Independent and impartial tribunal
 Incest 737
 Incitement
See Racial hatred, incitement to Incitement to religious hatred 321, 326–27

 Indecency
 computers 289–90
 customs 290–91
 EC law 290–91
 freedom of expression, and 287–95, 330
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 291–96
 meaning of 288–69
 morals corrupting 294
 protection of 288, 291–96
 national laws on 292
 obscene publications 291
 outraging public decency 293–94, 330 photographs of children 289–90 plays 291
 post, sending material through 290–91
 public displays 287, 290
 statutory 287–96
 Independent and impartial tribunal court martials 61
 fair trials 61
 planning 147
 Independent Television
 Commission 229–301, 546,
 557–58
 Individual applications
 under ECHR 19, 22–23, 25–34 acceptance in UK of 119
 admissibility 26–30
 delay in 90, 91
 examination of 30–31
 governments, against 28 inter-state applications 25–26 judgments on 31
 pre-complaints 26–27
 procedure 26–34
 registration 27
 settlement 30–31
 standing 25–26
 Information
See Freedom of information, Personal

- information, protection for
 - Information Commissioner
- appeals 393–94
- enforcement 393, 395
- exemptions 394
- freedom of information 380–81, 392–95
- ministerial veto 394
- public authorities 394
- publication schemes 394–95
- Informers 901–02
- Inhuman or degrading treatment 43–48
 - agents of the state, and 44
 - bodily integrity and autonomy 729
 - corporal punishment 45–46
 - ‘degrading treatment’, meaning of 45–45
 - deportation 44, 47–48, 953–54, 956–57
 - detention 46, 852–53
 - discrimination 46
 - exceptions 44
 - extradition 44, 46–47
 - medical treatment, involuntary 46
 - positive obligations 44
- Injunctions
 - asylum seekers, and 940–41
 - Attorney General, and 224–25
 - blasphemy 322–23
 - breach of confidence 356–63, 568–69, 581–91, 630–32
 - children, and 547–49
 - confidentiality 547–48
 - contempt 232, 251, 253
 - DA notices, and 364
 - data protection 607, 630
 - defamation 562
 - freedom of expression 176, 516, 632–33
 - freedom of protest and assembly 513–16, 517–18
 - harassment 511
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 516, 518
 - Internet service providers 548–49
 - journalists 263–64
 - malicious falsehood, and 562–63
 - media, against 176
 - official secrecy 364
 - prejudicing proceedings, and 221–23, 228–30, 250–51
 - press, against 555–56, 559
 - prior restraint 515–16, 633
 - private life, right to respect for 595
 - proportionality 516
 - public authorities, use of 174–75, 518
 - reporting restrictions 547–49
 - trespass 563
- Innocence
 - See* Presumption of innocence
- Intelligence and Security Committee 651, 653–54
- Intelligence services
 - See* Security and intelligence services
- Integrity
 - See* Bodily integrity and autonomy
- Interception of communications.
 - See also* Telephone tapping 670–89
 - admissibility of intercept material 686
 - authorisation 673, 675
 - complaints 676–78
 - Convention rights, and 683–89
 - correspondence, interference with 670, 679
 - criminal offences 674, 683–84, 688
 - data protection 675
 - declarations of incompatibility, and 687–88
 - democracy, and 97, 670
 - EC law, and 672
 - e-mail 671
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 670–71, 681
 - fair trials 686–87
 - home, right to

- respect for the 679
- Human Rights Act 1998, and 678–89
- Interception of Communications
 - Commissioner 673–74, 676–78, 709, 783
- Interception of Communications Tribunal 677–78, 680, 684, 688
- investigatory powers,
 - regulation of 671–84, 687–89
- judicial review 688
- legitimate aims 681–83
- mail 670, 679
- margin of
 - appreciation, and 681–83
- necessity in a
 - democratic society 681–83
- official secrecy 354
- PACE, and 685–88
- parliamentary
 - oversight of 678
- police, and 97, 673, 685–86
- primary rights,
 - interference with 679
- private life, right to
 - respect for 670, 675, 678–80, 684, 686, 688
- proportionality 673, 681
- public authorities, and 677, 680, 683
- quasi-military and
 - terrorist groups 408–09
- satellites 672
- security and
 - intelligence services 656, 658–60, 663–66
- supervision 682–83
- surveillance 709
- telecommunications 671–72, 679, 685, 689
- unauthorised 675–76
- use of material 675
- warrants 672–75
 - without 675, 685
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 20
- blasphemy 326
- bodily integrity
 - and autonomy 730
- confessions 854
- discrimination 978
- individual applications 28
- judiciary, and 191
- International Covenant on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights 137
- Internet
 - censorship 303
 - children, and 306–07
 - freedom of
 - expression 295–96, 306–09
 - injunctions, and 548–49
 - obscene publications 306
 - prejudicing proceedings 254
 - public order 428–29
 - regulation of 296, 306–09
 - reporting restrictions 548
 - service providers 548–49
 - websites 306–07
- Interpretation
 - See* Statutory interpretation
- Interviews
 - See* Police interviews
- Intimate searches 646
- Intrusion into grief 552, 569–70, 573–74
- Investigatory powers, regulation of.
 - See also* Investigatory Powers Tribunal
 - data protection 153
 - interception of
 - communications 671–84, 687–89
 - police malpractice 926
 - private life, right to respect for 636–37
 - security and intelligence
 - services 651–52, 657, 662, 668–69
 - surveillance 635, 690–92, 696–703, 706–13
- Investigatory Powers Tribunal 714–24
 - appeals 719, 723
 - applications 714–15
 - authorisation 717
 - bugging devices 723

- civil proceedings 716, 719 courts, recourse to 718–19
 criminal proceedings 716
 fair trials 719–23
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 719–24
 judicial review 718, 721
 jurisdiction 715–17, 719
 limitations 715, 721
 national security, and 721–22
 official secrecy, and 350
 police, and 715, 723
 procedure 716–18
 proportionality 721
 public authorities 720, 722
 remedies 718, 722–23
 effective, right to 724
 role of 971–72
 rules 716–17
 Secretary of State, and 718–19
 telephone tapping 717
 Wednesday
 unreasonableness 721
 Irrationality 106, 107, 109
- J
- Job seekers 947
- Journalists
 contempt 261–66
 freedom of expression 263–64
 injunctions, and 263–64
 national security, and 261–62, 265–66
 official secrecy 346–17, 353–54 press, constitutional role of the 261
 Press Commission Code 261 sources, protection of 261–66
 terrorism, and 265–66
 whistleblowing 261
- Judges' Rules 827
- Judgments
 Committee of Ministers, of 33–34
 composition of 178–82
 enforcement 33–34
 European Court of Human Rights, of 31–34
 reasons 32–33
 supervision of 33–34
 Judicial review 104–10
 administrative decision-making 106–10
 administrative discretion 105–06
 armed forces, homosexuals in,
 and 106
 asylum seekers, and 940–41
 Civil Procedure Rules 167–68
 Damages in 173
 Deportation, and 950, 956–57
 effective remedies,
 right to 84
 European Convention on
 Human Rights, and 104–05, 107 exclusivity principle 167–69
 freedom of protest and assembly, and 454–56
 Human Rights Act 1998,
 and 107–08, 110
 Investigatory Powers
 Tribunal 718, 721
 irrationality 106, 107, 109
 leave/permission 168 legislation, of 3 limits of 171
 mandatory orders 173
 parliamentary sovereignty, and 108
 passports, removal of 970
 proportionality 106, 110, 111
 public authorities 159, 166–71
 public/private law divide 167–68
 quashing orders 173–74
 remedies 173–75, 560
 sex discrimination, and 1050–51
 sexual orientation 1056–58
 statutory interpretation 108, 148
 time limits 170
 victims 165–66
 Wednesday
 unreasonableness 105–06, 109–10
- Judiciary.
 See also Statutory interpretation activism 103, 189–94,

- 451–53, 526
 appointments 178–79
 asylum seekers, and 942
 background of 179–81
 bias 215, 220–21, 223
 Bill of Rights debate, and 124–29, 131
 Canadian Charter of Rights, under 182–84
 common law 102–04, 111
 confessions, and 881
 contempt 215, 257–59
 democracy, and 101
 EC law, and 116
 European Convention on
 Human Rights, and 103, 111
 European Court of Human Rights, in 23, 106
 evidence, exclusion of 906
 freedom of expression,
 and 76–77, 103, 104,
 203, 267–68, 330
 freedom of protest and assembly, and 434–35, 439,
 446, 446–53, 525–26
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 112, 135, 136, 186–89,
 194, 180–84
 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and 191
 margin of appreciation,
 and 184–85, 525
 minimalism 186–89, 195,
 447–51, 526
 margin of appreciation 186–87, 189, 191–92, 525
 parliament, and 102–03
 sovereignty 192, 194
 personal information,
 protection of 544–45
 police, and 449–50
 malpractice 868, 925
 prejudicing proceedings 220–21, 223
 public authorities, as 193 rape, attitudes to 181–82
 restraint 449
 role of 110–11
 sex discrimination, and 987
 United States, in 111–12
Wednesbury
 unreasonableness, doctrine of 188
 Women, in 179–82
- Juries
 Contempt, and 259–60 deliberations, disclosure of 259–60 deprave and corrupt test 282–84
 directions 844, 856–57, 859, 897
 evidence, exclusion of, and 859, 897
 prejudicing proceedings 232–37
 race discrimination, and 1063
 Runciman Royal Commission, on 260 silence, right to, and 844, 856–57
 websites, and 254
- Jurisdiction
 Inherent, of court 547–49
 Investigatory Powers
 Tribunal, of 715–17, 719
- L
- Labour party
 Bill of Rights debate, and 121–22
 Democracy, and 97–98
 freedom of information 370
 Leave to enter or remain 948–49
 Legal aid 60–61
 Legal positivism 8, 10
 Legal professional privilege 390
 Legal representation
 See also Access to legal Advice,
 Solicitors 63–64
 Legal rights, moral rights distinguished from 10–11
 Libel.
 See Defamation, Seditious libel
 Liberalism, opposition to 7–9
 Liberals and Liberal Democrats 120–21
 Liberty and security of person, right to See also Detention 49–57
 arrest 50, 54–55, 753

- deportation 953–54
- detention 753, 796–98
- exceptions 50
- procedure 50–51
- safeguards 54
- Licensing
 - broadcasting 208
 - films 310
 - freedom of
 - expression, and 76, 208
 - satellite broadcasting 305
 - trespass, and 491–92
- Life, right to 38–43
 - abortion 41, 734
 - agents of the state, and 38–43
 - assisted suicide 733
 - death penalty 41–43
 - exceptions 41–43
 - margin of appreciation, and 39, 41
 - national security, and 39
 - nuclear tests 39
 - positive obligations 39, 40
 - scope of 38–41
 - use of force 41–43
- Life sentences 51
 - discretionary 56–57
 - Her Majesty's pleasure, at 57
 - tariff fixing 56–57
- Limitation periods
 - See* Time limits
- Locus standi*
 - See* Standing
- M
- Macpherson Report 387, 760.
 - 918, 991
- Maladministration 376
- Malicious falsehood 561–63
- Malicious prosecution 909, 912
- Mandatory orders 171
- Margin of appreciation 34–37
 - application of 35
 - arrest, and 801
 - blasphemy, and 315, 318, 319–20
 - contempt, and 217
 - Convention rights 67
 - Democracy, and 36–37
 - Education, and 82
 - emergencies 34, 35–36, 87
 - evidence, exclusion of, and 872, 906
 - freedom of expression, and 35, 76, 77, 79, 199, 213, 331, 442–43, 447–52, 455, 458, 464, 472, 477, 525
 - home, right to respect for, and 70–71
 - Human Rights Act 1998, under 184–85
 - interference with
 - Convention rights 67
 - judiciary, and 184–37, 189, 191–92, 525
 - life, right to, and 39, 41
 - morals, protection of 35
 - national security 35
 - obscene
 - publications, and 278–79, 287
 - peaceful enjoyment of
 - possessions, and 81–82
 - personal information,
 - protection of, and 539, 544–45
 - private life, right to
 - respect for, and 69
 - proportionality 34, 67
 - quasi-military and terrorist
 - groups, and 411–12, 523
 - religion, and 36
 - security and intelligence
 - services, and 666–67
 - terrorism, and 524
- Marital rape 745, 1064–65
- Marital status 988, 1001
- Marry and found a
 - family, right to 80–81
 - divorce 80–81
 - positive obligations 81
 - prisoners 81
 - restrictions 80–81
 - transsexuals 80
- Marxism 8–9
- Maternity leave 999
- Matrix Churchill affair 379
- Media

- See also* Broadcasting, Journalists,
 Prejudicing Proceedings, Press,
 Reporting restrictions
 data protection 607–10
 European Convention on
 Human Rights, and 298
 freedom of expression 176–77, 267–68 horizontal effects, indirect 176–78
 Human Rights Act 1998,
 and 176–78, 298
 injunctions 176
 interests of justice 265–66
 privacy 176–77
 private life, right to
 respect for 532
 regulation 267–68, 298
 Medical records 602–03
 Medical treatment
Bolam test 736
 bodily integrity and autonomy 735–36
 deportation 44
 inhuman and degrading treatment 46
 involuntary 46
 positive obligations 736
 Mental disabilities
 cautions 806, 897
 confessions 897–98
 detention 53, 806
 evidence, exclusion of 897–98
 vulnerable persons 822
 Military services
See Armed forces, Quasi-military and terrorist groups
 Ministerial accountability 335–36,
 368, 652–53
 Minority rights 82, 422–23,
 426, 435
 Miscarriages of justice 83
 compensation 83
 detention 795–96
 PACE, and 754
 police complaints 920
 police malpractice 925–26
 silence, right to 818, 841
 Moral rights, legal rights distinguished from 10–11
 Motor vehicles,
 searches of 765–70, 777
- N
 National security
See also Security and intelligence services
 breach of confidence 359–61
 deportation 950–54, 956
 exclusion orders 966–67
 freedom of expression 78
 freedom of protest and
 assembly 442
 freedom of information 374, 391
 Investigatory Powers
 Tribunal 721–22
 journalists 261–62, 265–66
 life, right to 39
 margin of appreciation,
 and 35
 official secrecy 335–39, 350, 352
 private life, right
 to respect for 69, 72
 quasi-military and
 terrorist groups 411–12
 race discrimination 1033
 sex discrimination 1032
 telephone tapping 69
 terrorism 524
 trade unions 416
 Nationality
 discrimination 1016–17
 Natural law 10
 Naturalisation 945–46
 Negligence
 immunities 60
 police 60
 prejudicing proceedings 229
 New Zealand
 evidence, exclusion of 871
 freedom of expression 276
 statutory interpretation 141
 Newspapers
See Press
 Noise 71
 Northern Ireland
 arrest in 782–83

- Assembly 148–49
 detention 799
 Northern Ireland
 Commissioner 194
 secondary legislation 149
 sexual orientation 738–39
 silence, right to 841, 848, 860
 terrorism 965–66
 Nuclear tests 39
 Nuisance 517
 freedom of protest
 and assembly 517
 obstruction 517
 private life, right to
 respect for 636
 reasonableness 517
 surveillance as 636
- O
- Obscene publications
 blasphemy 315
 Canada, in 280
 deprave and corrupt test 279, 281–84
 European Court of Human Rights, and 277–81, 287
 films 296, 309
 forfeiture 286, 287
 freedom of expression 76–77, 277–87,
 292–93, 330
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 287
 indecent 291
 Internet 306
 Juries, and 282–84
 margin of appreciation 278–79, 287
 morals, protection of 279, 287
 ‘obscene’, meaning of 294
 outraging public decency 293–94
 public good defence 284–86
 statutory 281–82, 287
 United States, in 280
 videos 311
 Williams Committee 285, 309
 Obstruction of the highway 480–82
 breach of the peace 497
 freedom of protest and assembly 480–82
- Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 481–82
 legitimate aim 481–82
 nuisance 517
 police, and 497, 761–62, 767
 prior restraint 482
 reasonableness 481
 stop and search 761–62, 767
 trespass 489
 OFCOM 300, 558
 Official secrecy
 See also Freedom of information,
 Public interest immunity 335–70
 abroad, publication 347
 armed forces 343–44
 authorisation 348–49
 refusal of 350
 breach of confidence 335–37, 355–64
 civil service 336–37, 341,
 345–46, 354
 Conduct Code 335
 confidentiality 344, 347,
 352, 355–64
 criminal liability 341–48, 352–53
 DA notices 364 defences 348–52
 democracy, and 95–96
 detention 345
 Franks Committee 339–40
 freedom of expression 341–42, 350–51
 harm test 344, 346,
 348–49, 352–53
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 340–41, 348, 351, 353–54
 injunctions 364
 interception of
 communications 354
 intelligence services 341–46, 351 interests of the state 338–39 international relations 344 investigations 311 15
 Investigatory Powers
 Tribunal 350
 journalists 346–47, 353–54
 mens rea 337, 340, 346, 353
 ministerial

- accountability 335–36
 - national security 335–39, 350, 352
 - public domain,
 - information in 348
 - public interest
 - defence 335–36, 339, 349–52
 - receivers of information,
 - decriminalisation of 347
 - security services, and 341–46, 351, 660
 - Spycatcher litigation 357–64
 - strict liability 337
 - OFTEL 296
 - Ombudsmen
 - See* Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration
 - Organised crime 655
 - Outraging public
 - decency 293–94, 330
 - Overstayers 948
- P
- PACE codes
 - access to legal advice 806, 809–15, 819, 862–64
 - arrest 779–88, 790–91, 801–02
 - codes 755, 757–58
 - confessions 839, 875–78, 881–89, 892
 - constraints, in 754–55
 - damages, in relation to 909–10
 - detention 731, 791–95, 798–99, 804–06, 821–24, 852–53
 - due process 755–56
 - evidence, exclusion of 868–69, 874, 889, 892, 894–96, 903–06
 - guidance 758
 - Home Office
 - circulars 758–59
 - identification 848–51, 890
 - interception of
 - communications 685–88
 - miscarriages of
 - justice, and 754
 - police complaints 915, 919
 - police interviews 825–40, 853
 - police malpractice 867, 913–14, 925–27
 - powers of entry 637–38
 - purpose of 754
 - race discrimination 1062–63
 - rules, structure of 757–59
 - Runciman Commission 755–56
 - searches 639–41, 645–47
 - seizure 641–42, 647
 - silence, right to 820, 840–43, 860, 863
 - stop and search 759–60, 763–64, 769, 771–74, 776–78
 - terrorism 792
 - vulnerable persons 822–23
 - Parental leave 1000–01
 - Parliament
 - Bill of Rights debate 131–32
 - democracy 94
 - freedom of information 386
 - interception of
 - communications, and 678
 - judiciary, and 102–03
 - positive discrimination 1043
 - privilege 386
 - supervision 678
 - Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration Enforcement 376–77
 - freedom of
 - information, and 373, 375–79, 383
 - maladministration 376
 - MP filter 377
 - recommendations 377
 - role of 376–77
 - Parliamentary
 - sovereignty 3
 - Bill of Rights debate 93, 130, 132
 - democracy 95
 - Dicey, AV 101
 - EC law, and 130
 - executive 101
 - judicial review, and 173
 - judiciary, and 192, 194
 - public authorities 156
 - Part-timers 1012–14, 1050–51
 - Passports 968–70

Peace

See Breach of the peace

Peaceful enjoyment of possessions 81–82

Personal information,

protection for.

See also Data protection 535–634

autonomy 615

breach of confidence 565–93

broadcasting 556–60, 615

civil liability 593–97

common law 543, 545

confidentiality 540, 561, 615

criminal liability 593–97

defamation 539–40, 561–63

definition of 612–13

disclosure 561–63

European Convention on
Human Rights, and 538–41

European Court of Human Rights, and 538–45, 613–14

exhaustion of domestic remedies, and 540

freedom of expression 540

harassment, alarm
or distress 564–65

Human Rights Act 1998,
and 538–45, 561,
612–33

horizontal effect of 542–43

interpretation 541

malicious falsehood 561–63

margin of appreciation,
and 539, 544–45

press 540, 545–56

Press Complaints

Commission 536, 614

private life, right to
respect for 561, 593–97,
612–15

public domain, in 614–17

public/private divide 613

security and intelligence
services, and 663

telephone tapping 538

trespass 563–64

United States, in 613–14

Phillips Commission 763

Phillimore Committee 228–32

Photographs

breach of confidence 568–70, 573–76, 581–84, 592

children, of 289–90

indecent 289–90

prejudicing

proceedings 221, 236

press 553, 555–56

trespass 636

Pickets 507

Pinochet case 961–62

Planning

declarations of

incompatibility 147

home, right to respect for 70–71

independent and

impartial tribunal 147

Plays 291

Pleas 825

Police

See also Arrest, Detention, PACE Codes,
Police interviews, Police malpractice, redress for, Powers of entry, Searches,
Seizure

accountability 432, 901

assault on 762–63

breach of the peace power 494–497, 500–02

cordons 638

custody 791–824

damages

award against 909–11

data protection, and 598

democracy, in 97

discretion, fettering of 756

fair trials, and 901

freedom of protest

and assembly 449–50,

456–65

helping with enquiries 790

Human Rights

Act 1998, and 754, 756

immunities 60, 991

interception of

- communications 97, 673, 685–86
- Investigatory Powers Tribunal 715, 723
- judiciary, and 449–50
- obstruction of 497
- positive
 - discrimination in 1037, 1041
- public order 427, 430–34, 508
- race discrimination 990–91, 1062–63
- rules, evasion of 754
- security and intelligence
 - services, and 655
- seizure 640–45
- sex discrimination 1067–68
- sexual orientation, and 1068–69
- stop and search 761–62, 767
- surveillance 639, 690–98, 702, 710–11, 714
- trespass 483
- Police complaints and
 - disciplinary action 915–23
 - accountability 920
 - civil actions and 917
 - criminal offences 916
 - Crown Prosecution Service
 - decision-making, and 924
 - effective remedy, right to an 921
 - failures of 916–18
 - fair trials, and 920–23
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 920–23
 - independence 918, 920
 - Macpherson Report 918
 - miscarriages of justice 920
 - number of 916
 - PACE, and 915, 919
 - Police Complaints Authority 915–16, 918–22
 - prosecutions 923
 - public interest immunity 922–23
 - reform 918–19
 - Runciman Commission 917
- Police interviews 824–48
 - access to legal advice 813–14, 832
 - admissibility of 862–63
 - admissions 825, 829, 835
 - appropriate adult 835
 - arrest 834
 - audio recordings 836–37
 - cautions 829–30, 835–36, 861
 - children and
 - young persons 836, 840
 - codes of practice 836–37
 - confessions 824, 838–40, 854
 - consent to 813–14
 - contemporaneous
 - notes 836
 - delay 833–34
 - due process 825–27, 836
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 862–63
 - exchanges, varying levels of protection for 834–35
 - fair trials, and 853, 854
 - helping police with their inquiries 833
 - Judges’ Rules 827
 - mens rea* 824–25
 - oppressive and intrusive questioning 853–60
 - PACE codes 825–40, 853
 - breach of 826
 - pleas 825
 - police station, inside and outside 831–34
 - presumption of innocence 854–60
 - private life, right to
 - respect for 854
 - race discrimination, in 854
 - regulation 854
 - Runciman Royal Commission 826, 840
 - safeguards 827–36
 - self-incrimination,
 - privilege against 854–60
 - silence, right to 839, 840–48
 - solicitors, training of 840
 - tape recording of 828–33, 837
 - techniques of 836–40
 - terrorism 826–27, 837
 - video recordings 839
 - volunteers 833
 - vulnerable persons 822–23

- Police malpractice, redress for.
See also Police Complaints and disciplinary action 865–928
 access to legal advice 926
 accountability 914
 appeals 900
 balancing rights and powers 925
 Butler Report 924
 confessions 867, 926
 Convention rights, breaches of 899
 courts, duties of 898–900
 damages 909–12, 914–15
 declarations of incompatibility, and 899
 detention 913
 due process 927–28
 effective remedies,
 right to 867–68
 European Convention on
 Human Rights, and 865–67
 European Court of Human Rights, and 900, 925
 evidence,
 exclusion of 867–900, 925–26
 fair trials 866–67, 898–909, 913–14
 false imprisonment 914
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 866–68,
 898–908, 912–15,
 924–25, 927–28
 investigatory powers,
 regulation of 926
 judiciary 868, 925
 miscarriages of justice 925–26
 PACE codes 867, 913–14,
 925–27
 prosecutions 923
 silence, right to 926
 surveillance 926–27
 terrorism 865, 925, 927–28
 tort actions 909–15
 trial remedies 898–908
- Political advertising 300
 Political speech 74–75, 209–11, 238,
 267, 308, 330–31, 356,
 421, 434, 438–39, 487, 621
- Pollution 71
 Pornography
 censorship 269–76
 conservative position 269
 deprave and corrupt test 283–84
 feminism and 271–76
 freedom of expression 205, 268–76, 278
 hard core 275, 278,
 280–81, 285
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 281
 liberal position on 270–71
 margin of appreciation,
 and 278–79
 moral autonomy 270–71, 274
 morals, protection of 278–79
 prior restraint 277
 public displays 271
 public good 269 rape and 276
 satellite television 306
 sex discrimination and 273
 sexual harassment 273
 United States, in 271
 violent 274–76
 Williams Committee 268–69
- Port control 795
 Positive discrimination 977, 984, 1034–35
 contract compliance 1036
 disability
 discrimination 1043–45
 EC law, in 1036–43
 equal opportunities policies 1035–36, 1039, 1042
 formal equality 1035, 1039 forms of 1035–36
 national law, recognition in 1035–36
 parliamentary representation 1043
 police, in 1037, 1041 promotion 1035, 1037–38, 1042
 proportionality 1037–38, 1040
 quotas 1038, 1041, 1043

- race discrimination 1035–36, 1043
- recruitment 1037
- reverse discrimination 1035
- sex discrimination 1035, 1036–43
- substantive equality 1035, 1039
- theoretical basis 1034–35
- training 1042–43
- women, and 1036–43
- Positive obligations
 - bodily integrity and autonomy 727–28
 - family life, right to respect for 745
 - freedom of protest and assembly 78–79, 453–55, 491
 - inhuman and degrading treatment 44
 - life, right to 39, 40
 - marry and found a family, right to 81
 - medical treatment 736
 - private life, right to respect for 68, 530
- Possessions
 - See* Peaceful enjoyment of Possessions
- Post, sending indecent material through the 290–91
- Powers of entry 637–49
 - arrest 637–38
 - common law 641
 - emergencies 638
 - PACE 637–38
 - searches 637–38
 - stop and search 763–64
 - terrorism 638
 - United States 637
 - warrants, without 637–39
- Precedent 32, 150, 214
- Pregnancy
 - comparators 996–99
 - detrimental action 1000
 - dismissal 995–99
 - EC law, and 996–1000
 - sex discrimination 995–1000
 - temporary employment 998–99
- Prejudicing proceedings
 - actus reus 227–29, 249
 - administration of justice, intention to prejudice 245–47
 - appeals 233
 - Australia, in 219
 - Canadian Charter of Rights, under 219
 - civil proceedings 227, 237, 250
 - common law 227–30, 245, 248–49, 251–52
 - contempt 217–55
 - Contempt of Court Act 230–40, 251–52
 - court orders, frustrating 249–50
 - defamation 248–49
 - delay, and 238
 - democracy, and 221
 - European Convention on Human Rights, and 223–27
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 220–23
 - fair trials, and 219, 221–27, 233, 254
 - foreseeability 246
 - freedom of expression 250–52, 254
 - freedom of the press 221, 226–27
 - good faith, discussions in 238–40, 251
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 219, 223–27
 - ignorance, defence of 240
 - imminence 247–48
 - impediment to justice, risk of 232–40
 - injunctions 221–23, 228–30, 250–51
 - intention 227–28, 245–52
 - Internet 254
 - judiciary
 - authority of the 220
 - impartiality of 220–21, 223
 - juries, influencing 232–37
 - justification 248–49
 - language used 235–36
 - margin of
 - appreciation, and 221–23
 - necessary in a democratic society 226, 250
 - negligence 229

- neutralising measures 218–19, 232, 255
 Phillimore Committee 228–30
 Photographs, and 221, 236
 political speech 238
 pre-judgment test 229 press, freedom of the 221, 226–27
 presumption of innocence 221
 prior restraint 218–19
 proportionality 229
 public affairs, good faith discussions on 238–40
 public interest 218, 228–30, 239, 254
 publicity 215–55
 real risk of 227–28, 245, 248–51
 recklessness 245–46
 reporting restrictions 241–42
 stay of proceedings 224, 233
 strict liability rule 239–40 sub judge 228, 231–32, 240 substantial risk of serious 232–40, 242–43, 254
 United States, in 218–19
 Websites, and 219, 254
 witnesses 237
- Press
See also Journalists, Media, Reporting restrictions 545–56
 adjudications 546
 apologies 552
 breach of confidence 576–78, 580–81, 585, 588, 631–32
 Calcutt Committee 551
 Celebrities, and 552, 559
 Children, and 552
 code of practice 261, 551–56, 559, 583, 587, 590, 612, 614, 628
 compensation 551
 constitutional role of 261
 data protection, and 617
 fair trials 553
 freedom of expression 210–11, 619–22, 629–30
 freedom of the 210–11, 221, 226–27, 545, 550, 577–78, 580–8, 585, 588, 617, 621, 631 exceptions to 585–86 friends and relatives of suspects 553 hospitals 552
 hotlines 552
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 546, 555, 558–60, 614
 injunctions 555–56, 559
 intrusion into grief or shock 552
 judicial review, and 560
 personal information,
 protection of 540, 545–56
 photographs 553, 555–56
 prejudicing
 proceedings 221, 226–27
 Press Complaints
 Commission 536, 546, 551–56, 558–60, 614
 public authority, as 560
 Press Council 550–51
 private life, right to respect
 for 546, 552–56, 558–60, 596–97
 public authorities, and 560, 591–92
 public interest 551, 553, 555 remedies against 560
 reporting restrictions 550
 sanctions 551, 555
 self-regulation 546, 550–56, 559–60
 Younger Committee 551
- Pressure groups 166
 Presumption of innocence 62–63
 access to legal advice 63
 confessions 64
 fair trials, and 63–64, 854–55, 901
 police interviews 854–60
 prejudicing

- proceedings, and 221
- silence, right to 63, 840
- terrorism, and 524
- Prior restraints
 - breach of confidence 356–57, 363
 - freedom of expression 277, 141 15, 480, 515
 - injunctions 515–16, 633
 - pornography 277
 - prejudicing proceedings 218–19
- Prisoners' rights 71–74, 81
- Private life, right to respect for.
 - See also* Personal information, protection for 67–73, 529–634
 - arrest 801
 - bodily integrity and autonomy 728–29, 736
 - breach of confidence 569–70, 573, 576–78, 581–93, 597, 632–34
 - broadcasting 556, 559
 - Calcutt Committee 594–96
 - celebrities 532
 - children and
 - young persons 547–48
 - civil liability 593–97
 - confidentiality 69
 - crime or disorder,
 - prevention of 72–73
 - criminal liability 593–97
 - data protection 599–601, 604–06, 608–11
 - defamation 561–62
 - definition of 529–30, 729
 - deportation, and 957–59
 - detention, and 731
 - economic well-being of
 - country 72
 - European Convention on Human Rights, and 533
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 529–30
 - exceptions 68, 72–73
 - freedom of expression,
 - and 202–03, 426, 617–33
 - freedom of
 - information, and 333
 - harassment 564–65
 - homosexual acts, and 70
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 533, 537, 594, 597, 633–34, 724
 - individual autonomy 530–32
 - informational autonomy 531
 - injunctions 595
 - interception of
 - communications 670, 675, 678–80, 684, 686, 688
 - invasion of privacy tort,
 - proposals for 594–97, 630
 - justifications 72–73
 - margin of
 - appreciation, and 69
 - media, and 176–77, 532
 - national security 69, 72
 - nuisance, and 636
 - personal information,
 - protection of 561, 593–97, 612–15
 - police interviews 854
 - positive obligations, and 68, 530
 - press, and 546, 552–56, 558–60, 596–97
 - proportionality, and 73
 - public interest 595, 597
 - public/private law
 - dichotomy 532
 - remedies 630–33
 - reporting restrictions 241–45
 - sado-masochism 742–43
 - searches 647–49
 - security and
 - intelligence services 650, 662–67
 - seizure 647–49
 - sexual orientation 532, 739, 1058, 1068
 - statutory
 - protection for 536–37
 - surveillance 596, 635, 691, 696–97, 702–06
 - telephone tapping 69, 679

- television, and 559
- terrorism, and 73
- theoretical considerations 530–33
- transsexuals 744
- trespass 563–64, 635–36
- UK protection 533
- Younger Committee 595
- Privilege
 See also Self-incrimination, privilege against 386, 390, 642–45,
 649, 771, 845
- Production orders 643
- Professional associations 414
- Prohibition 173
- Property
 See Peaceful enjoyment of possessions
- Proportionality
 access to courts, in 60
- arrest 801
- breach of the peace, and 502
- Convention rights 67
- data protection 601–02, 618
- deportation, and 956
- freedom of expression, and 207, 443,
 445, 448–50, 460–62,
 476, 479, 626
- Human Rights Act 1998,
 under 133–34
- Injunctions, and 516
- Investigatory Powers
 Tribunal 721
- judicial review, and 106, 110, 111
- margin of appreciation,
 and 34, 67
- positive discrimination,
 and 1037–38, 1040
- private life, right
 to respect for 73
- public order, and 432, 510, 513
- self-incrimination, privilege against, and 859
- statutory interpretation 148
- surveillance, and 697–98,
 700–01, 708, 710
- use of force 43, 804
- Proscribed groups 400, 404–13, 520–21
- Prostitution 1065, 1067–68
- Protests
 See Freedom of protest and assembly
- Public authorities binding effect of Convention rights 156–57
- breach of confidence 356, 579–80,
 582–85, 591
- breach of statutory duty 167
- British Board of Film
 Classification 312–13
- churches, as 177
- civil proceedings 171–72
- Convention rights
 binding effect of 156–57
- breach of 166–75
- invoking 164–66, 171–75
- criminal proceedings against 171
- damages 173–74
- data protection, and 610–11, 618
- declarations of incompatibility 173
- effective remedy, right to a 173
- exhaustion of local
 remedies 173
- freedom of expression,
 and 75–76, 163, 435,
 453–54, 491
- freedom of information,
 and 381–84,
 386–90, 394
- functional 157–60, 169
- government 161
- horizontal effect 161–64
- Human Rights
 Act 1998, under 133–34, 156–75
- Human Rights
 Task Force 156
- Human Rights Unit 156
- illegality 167
- Information
 Commissioner, as 394
- Investigatory Powers

- Tribunal, and 720, 722
 - judicial review 159, 166–71, 193
 - parliamentary
 - sovereignty, and 156
 - personal information,
 - protection of 538–39, 542–43
 - press, and 591–92
 - Press Complaints
 - Commission 560
 - primary legislation, and 156–57
 - private acts of functional 159–60
 - private bodies,
 - distinguishing from 157–62
 - procedural and practical
 - anomalies and limits 170–71
 - public interest immunity 367
 - public nature, functions
 - of a 157–60, 169
 - public/private
 - law divide 172
 - quasi- 157
 - race discrimination in 991–92, 1049
 - remedies 172–75
 - reviews 156
 - sexual orientation, and 1053, 1057–58, 1069
 - standard 157–59
 - standing 170
 - statutory
 - interpretation 148, 161, 169
 - surveillance, and 700, 709, 711–14
 - time limits 169–70, 172
 - tribunals, appropriate 166–67
 - vertical effect 161
 - victims 161, 164–66, 170–71
- Public displays 271, 287, 290
- Public interest.
- See also* Public interest immunity
 - abuse of process 898
 - breach of confidence 355–59, 361–64, 571, 577–93, 631–32
 - broadcasting 299, 557
 - data protection 607, 617–18
 - freedom of expression 612, 625
 - freedom of
 - information 335, 373, 375, 384–91
 - juries, and 260
 - official secrecy 335–36, 339, 349–52
 - prejudicing
 - proceedings 218, 228–30, 239, 254
 - press, and 551, 553, 555
 - private life, right
 - to respect for 595, 597
 - reporting restrictions 243–44, 549, 550
 - television, and 558
- Public interest immunity 335, 365–70
- administrative discretion 365–66
 - discovery 365
 - fair trials 369
- Human Rights
- Act 1998, and 369
- interests of justice 367–68
- ministerial responsibility 368
- police complaints 922–23
- public authorities 367
- Scott Report 369
- Surveillance, and 709, 711
- witnesses 369–70
- Public nuisance 517
- Public order
- abuse 506–10
 - actus reus* 430, 506, 508–10
 - anti-social behaviour 505, 513
 - arrest 433–34
 - breach of the peace 433
 - common law 431–32
 - criminal charges 513
 - development of law of 427–30
 - direct action 427–30
 - freedom of assembly 421, 427–37, 505–19
 - freedom of expression 213, 421, 427–37, 505–19
 - harassment, alarm and
 - distress 507–13
- Human Rights
- Act 1998, and 432, 510
- hybrid offences 513–14
- insults 50612

- Internet, and 428–29
 Judiciary, and 512
 Labour government, and 428–29
mens rea 430, 508–10
 nature of 430–32
 pickets 507
 police 427, 430–32, 508
 accountability of 432
 arrest 433–34
 powers of entry 433–34
 private premises, meetings on 433–34
 proportionality 432, 510, 513
 provocation 509–10
 quasi-military and terrorist groups 399
 reasonableness 431, 512
 riot 519
 sentencing 431, 513
 terrorism 429–31
 trespass 486
 threats 506–10
 violence 509–10
- Public records 371–72
 Public/private divide 167–68, 172,
 532, 613
- Q
- Quashing orders 173–74
- Quasi-military and terrorist groups 399–413
 appeals 407–11
 Convention rights 411–12
 definition 399–400
 deproscription 407–09,
 410–11
 European Convention on
 Human Rights, and 408–13
 fair trials 410–11
 freedom of assembly 520–25
 freedom of expression 412, 523
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 408–13, 522–25
 interception of
 communications 408–09
 judicial review 409
 margin of appreciation 411–12, 523
 mens rea 406, 521
 national security 411–12
 proscribed groups 400, 404–13,
 520–21
 Proscribed Organisations
 Appeal Commission 407–11
 public order 399
 sentencing 520
 uniforms 520–21, 523
 use of force 399–400
 violence 401–02
- Questioning of suspects.
 See Police interviews
- Quotas 1038, 1041, 1043
- R
- Race discrimination
 aggravated assault 1062
 anti-discrimination
 legislation 989–92
 arrest 1062–63
 burden of proof in 1017
 cautions 1063
 Commission for Racial Equality 1049–52
 Conditions or requirements 1016
 criminal proceedings 1061–64
 damages 989, 1046
 definition of racial grounds 1002–03
 deportation 943
 direct 1002–04
 EC law 982–83, 992,
 1016–17
 employment 982, 990–91, 1033–34
 ethnic groups 1002–03
 genuine occupational qualification 1034
 harassment 565, 1007–10, 1046–47, 1062
 indirect 1016–17
 investigations 1049–50, 1052
 juries 1063
 justification 1017
 lawful 1033–34

- less favourable
 - treatment 1002–04
- Macpherson Report 991
- national security 1033
- nationality 1016–17
- non-discrimination
 - notices 1050, 1052
- PACE Codes 1062–63
- police 990–91, 1062–63
 - immunity of 991
 - interviews 854
- positive discrimination 1035–36, 1043
- public authorities, and 991–92, 1049
- reform 1052
- remedies 1049–50
- segregation 1004
- sex discrimination 991–92
- small businesses 1033–34
- stereotyping 1062–63
- stop and search 760, 769–70, 777
- vicarious liability 991
- victimisation 1028, 1062
- Racial hatred, incitement to 327–30
 - blasphemy 326–27
 - broadcasting 328
 - domestic provisions 327–29
 - freedom of expression 327–30
 - mens rea 328
 - plays 327–28
 - programme services 328
 - threatening, abusive or
 - insulting words
 - or behaviour 327–29
- Rape
 - allegations 1066–68
 - cross-examination 1066–67
 - evidence, exclusion of 907
 - judiciary, and 181–82
 - marital 745, 1064–66
 - pornography, and 276
 - sex discrimination 1064–68
 - sexual history 1066–67
- Reasonableness
 - See also Wednesbury* unreasonableness
 - adjustments to premises 1043–45
 - breach of the peace 503–04
 - disability discrimination, and 1043–45
 - harassment 511, 564
 - nuisance 517
 - obstruction 481
 - public order 431, 512
 - seizure 644
 - statutory interpretation 141
 - trespass 490
 - use of force 790, 804
- Reasons
 - arrest 54–55, 789–90, 800–01
 - data protection 152
 - judgments 32–33
- Recommendations 377, 1046–47
- Redundancy 1050
- Refugees
 - See* Asylum seekers
- Regulatory offences 59
- Religion
 - See also* Blasphemy 73–74
 - asylum seekers, and 935–36
 - Church of England 175–76, 177
 - discrimination 175, 177, 983
 - freedom of expression 77
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998 175–76, 177–78
 - incitement to religious
 - hatred 321, 326–37
 - margin of
 - appreciation, and 36
 - organisations,
 - protection of 175–76
 - prisoners 73–74
 - public authorities,
 - churches as 177
 - sexual orientation 175, 177
 - Sunday working 983
- Remand 55–56
- Remedial orders 152
- Remedies
 - See also* Compensation,
 - Effective remedies, right to,
 - Exhaustion of local remedies
 - breach of confidence, for 630–32

- disability discrimination 1050
 - discrimination 1045–47
 - enforcement 100–10
 - freedom of protest
 - and assembly 517–18
 - harassment 564–65
 - interim 90
 - Investigatory Powers
 - Tribunal 718, 722–23
 - judicial review 173–75, 560
 - press, against 560
 - private life, right to
 - respect for 630–33
 - public authorities 172–75
 - race discrimination 1049–50
 - sex discrimination 1050
 - stop and search,
 - unlawful, for 773–74
 - Reporting restrictions 241–45
 - anonymity orders 244–45
 - children 547–49
 - criminal proceedings, in 547–49
 - code of practice confidentiality 547–59
 - fair trials 241–42
 - freedom of expression 550
 - freedom of the press 550
 - Human Rights Act 1998,
 - and 547–48, 550
 - injunctions 547–49
 - Internet service providers 548
 - jurisdiction 547–49
 - margin of
 - appreciation, and 550
 - open justice principle 241
 - postponing reporting 241–42
 - prejudicing proceedings 241–42
 - private right, right to
 - respect for 244–45
 - prohibiting reporting of
 - information 244–45
 - public, exclusion of 241
 - public hearing 241
 - public interest 243–44,
 - 549, 550
 - strict liability rule 241, 243
 - threats 548
 - victims of sexual
 - offences 549–50
 - wardship 547–49
 - witnesses 245
 - Retrospectivity
 - confiscation orders 65
 - criminal proceedings 64–67
 - legislation 64–67
 - Right to life
 - See* Life, right to
 - Right to silence
 - See* Silence, right to
 - Riots 425–26, 518–19
 - Roadblocks 763
 - Runciman Royal Commission
 - access to legal advice 820–21
 - identification 851
 - juries 260
 - PACE 755–56
 - police complaints 917
 - police interviews 826, 840
 - silence, right to 841, 843
 - vulnerable persons 823
- S
- Sado-masochism 741–43
 - Samples 850–51
 - Satellite television
 - EC law 306
 - free movement 305–06
 - freedom of expression 305–06
 - interception of
 - communications 672
 - licensing 305
 - non-domestic 305
 - pornography 306
 - Scandalising court 255, 257–59
 - Scotland
 - access to legal advice 810
 - Bill of Rights 149
 - delay 810
 - Human Rights Act 1998 194–95
 - incompatibility 148–49
 - Scottish Parliament 148–49
 - secondary legislation 148–49
 - sexual orientation 1058

- statutory interpretation 148–49
- Scott Inquiry 379
- Searches
 - See also* Stop and search 637–49
 - accountability 647–49
 - arrest 639
 - authorisation 638–39
 - bodily integrity and
 - autonomy 731–32
 - conduct of 646
 - consent 641, 645–46
 - correspondence,
 - interference with 648
 - damages 909–10
 - detention 731–32, 796, 824
 - home, right to respect for 647–49
 - Human Rights
 - Act 1998, and 647–49
 - intimate 823
 - orders 646
 - PACE 639–41
 - codes 641, 64547
 - powers of entry 637–38
 - private life, right to
 - respect for 647–49
 - privilege 649
 - reasonable suspicion 824
 - safeguards 645–47
 - seizure 640–44
 - serious arrestable offences 639
 - standard form 645–46
 - strip 731–32
 - terrorism 639
 - time of day for 646–47
 - trespass 648
 - voluntary 641
 - warrants 637–40, 645
- Secret Intelligence Service 649–50, 658
- Section 28 1058
- Security
 - See* Liberty and security of person, right to, National security, Security and intelligence services
- Security and intelligence services 649–89
 - accountability 651–55, 657, 661–62, 666, 669
 - agencies,
 - framework for 652–53
 - breach of confidence 359–60
 - Canada, in 654, 656–57, 659
 - complaints 650, 654, 657, 659–62, 667
 - correspondence 662–67
 - criminal offences 655
 - data protection 659
 - employment tribunals, and 668–69
 - European Convention on Human Rights, and 650
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 667, 668
 - Executive, and 657, 664–65
 - freedom of association 664
 - freedom of information 381–83, 385–86
 - GCHQ 649–50, 652, 655–56, 659–60
 - home, right to
 - respect for 662–67
 - Home Secretary 667
 - Human Rights Act 1998 658, 662–69
 - Inspector General 654
 - Intelligence and Security Committee 651, 653–54
 - interception of
 - communications 656, 658–60, 663–66
 - investigatory powers,
 - regulation of 651–52, 657, 662, 668–69
 - judicial review, and 668
 - judiciary, and 657, 665, 667
 - margin of appreciation,
 - and 666–67
 - MI5 649–51, 653, 659, 663–64
 - MI6 651–53, 655, 659–60
 - ministerial
 - responsibility 652–53
 - official secrets 341–46, 351, 660
 - organised crime 655
 - personal files 657–59
 - personal information 663
 - police, and 655

- private life, right
to respect for 650, 662–67
- public authorities 662, 665
- Secret Intelligence Service 649–50, 658
- Security and Intelligence Services
Staff Counsellor 660
- security checks 658–59, 668
- Security Services
Commissioner 661–62, 667–68
- Security Services
Tribunal 660–61, 667–68
- sensitive information 653
- supervision 650, 652, 653–54,
657, 661–62,
666–67, 669
- surveillance 656, 660, 663–65,
689–724
- telephone tapping 665–66
- terrorism 650, 652, 654
- trespass 667
- United States, in 654, 657
- vetting 658–59, 668
- warrants 654–57, 664
- Sedition 314
- Segregation 1004
- Seizure
accountability 647–49
arrest 643
correspondence, interference with 648
damages 909–10
excluded or special procedure material 642–45, 771
home, right to respect for 647–49
- Human Rights
Act 1998, and 647–49
- judicial review 643
- PACE 641–42, 647
- police 640–45
- private life, right to
respect for 647–49
- privilege 642–45, 771
- production orders 643
- reasonableness 644
- return of material 644, 770–71
- serious arrestable offence 643
- stop and search 770–71
- terrorism 643
- warrants 643
- Self-determination. 727, 736
- Self-incrimination,
privilege against coercion 857–59
criminal proceedings, statements used in 857–58
fair trials, and 855–56, 858–60
- Human Rights
Act 1998, and 858
- police interviews, and 854–60
- proportionality, and 859
- Sentencing
See also Life sentences football hooligans 969
harassment 511
public order 431, 513
quasi-military and terrorist groups 520
stop and search 767–68
terrorism 403–04
- September 11 attacks
deportation 959
extradition 964
terrorism 971
- Service providers 548–49
- Servitude 48–49
- Settlement of claims 30–31
- Sex discrimination 85–86, 978
anti-assimilation 978–79
anti-discrimination
legislation 986–89
armed forces 1032
burden of proof 994–95, 1014
comparators 994, 996–99
conditions, compliance
with 1010–14
criminal proceedings 1061, 1064–68
damages 1046–47
declarations 1050
direct 994–1001
dismissal 995–97, 1050
EC law 985, 988–89, 996–99,
1012–15, 1032,
1036–43, 1050–51

- employment 995–1000, 1010–15, 1069–70
 Equal Opportunities
 Commission 1049–52
 feminism 979
 flexible working 1014
 formal equality 987–88, 999
 genuine occupational qualification 1032–33
 indirect 1000, 1010–15
 harassment 273, 1007–10
 judicial review 1050–51
 judiciary 987
 justification 1011, 1013
 lawful discrimination 1032–33
 less favourable treatment 994–95
 marital rape 1064–65
 maternity leave 999
 national security 1032
 parental leave 1000–01
 part-timers 1012–14, 1050–51
 police 1067–68
 pooling 1012, 1014
 pornography 273
 positive discrimination 1035, 1036–43
 pregnancy 995–1000
 prostitution 1065, 1067–68
 race discrimination 991–92
 rape allegations 1066–67
 cross-examination 1066–67
 marital 1065–66
 sexual history 1066–67
 redundancy 1050
 reform 1052
 remedies 1050
 sexual orientation 729, 1054–56
 stereotyping 999
 substantive equality 987–88, 999
 transsexuals 985, 988–89,
 1002, 1054–55, 1070
 victimisation 1029
 working time 1015
 Sexual expression and identity 737–44
 anal sexual intercourse 738–41
 criminal offences 737
 incest 737
 recognition of value of 727–28
 sado-masochism 741–43
 sexual orientation 738–41
 transsexuals 743–44
 Wolfenden Report 737
 Sexual orientation
 administrative discretion 1057–58
 age of consent 739–40, 978, 1068
 anal sexual intercourse 738–41
 armed forces 70, 106, 1054, 1055–57
 civil service 1057
 codes of practice 1060
 criminal proceedings 1068–69
 discrimination 739–40, 977–78,
 982–83, 1052–60
 EC law 738, 739, 983, 1052, 1059–60
 education 1058
 employment 978, 1053–57, 1059
 equal pay 1054–56
 family life, right to
 respect for 1059
 freedom of expression 1058
 future 1059–60 homosexual acts 738–41, 1068
 housing 1059
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 1053, 1054,
 1055–59, 1069
 investigations 1069
 judicial review 106, 1056–58
 Labour government, and 1052, 1059
 less favourable treatment 1054
 margin of appreciation,
 and 738–39, 1068
 Northern Ireland, in 738–39
 police 1068–69
 positive vetting 1057
 private life, right
 to respect for 532, 739, 1058, 1068
 public authorities 1053, 1057–59, 1069
 religion 175, 177
 same sex partners 1055, 1059
 Scotland 1058

- section 28 1058
 sex discrimination 729, 1054–56
 sexual expression and identity 738–41
 sexual offences 1069
 unfair dismissal 1053–54
 Silence, right to access to legal advice 63,
 806–09, 811,
 815–19, 843, 861–64
 admissibility 848
 admissions,
 exclusion of 819
 adverse inferences 63, 819, 840, 842–46, 855–57, 859–64 arrest, on 843
 burden of proof 844
 cautions 819, 842, 860
 confessions 816–18, 842,
 880, 886–87
 curtailment 816–17, 840–42, 855
 detention 843
 due process 840
 European Court of Human Rights 855–56
 fair trials 848, 855–57, 863–6
 evidence, exclusion of 870, 903
 Human Rights
 Act 1998, and 856
 Judiciary, and 820
 jury directions 844, 856–57
 miscarriages of justice 818, 841
 Northern Ireland, and 841, 848, 860
 PACE, and 820, 840–43,
 860, 863
 penalising 846–48
 police interviews 839, 840–48
 police malpractice 926
 presumption of innocence 63, 840
 privilege 845
 Runciman Commission 841, 843
 sentencing 848
 terrorism 846, 847–48, 860
 vulnerable persons 843–45
 Slavery 48
 Social Charter 138
 Social contract 5–7
 Social groups 935
 Solicitors
 See also Access to legal advice clerks 814–15, 821
 police interviews 840
 training 820–21, 840
 South Africa 137, 854
 Sovereign immunity 961–62
 Sovereignty
 See Parliamentary sovereignty
 Special Immigration Appeals
 Commission 954–56
 Speech
 See Freedom of expression
Spycatcher litigation 357–64
 Stalkers 564
 Standing 25–26, 164, 166, 170
 State immunity 961–62
 State security
 See National security
 Statutory interpretation 3
 access to courts 106
 Bill of Rights debate 100–12
 common law 148
 declarations of
 incompatibility 143–45,
 147, 149–54
 EC law 140–41
 European Convention on
 Human Rights 113–14
 European Court of
 Human Rights 146–48
 freedom of expression 211–12, 445–46,
 475, 479
 Human Rights Act 1998 19–20, 139–55
 incompatibility 142–45
 judicial review 108, 148
 jurisdiction, cases from other 147–48
 New Zealand
 Bill of Rights 141
 Northern Ireland
 Assembly 148–49
 primary legislation 139–40
 private life, right to

- respect for 612
- proportionality, and 148
- public authorities 148, 161, 169
- purposive 141–42, 144
- reading down 141, 144, 147
- reading in 141
- reasonableness 141
- Scottish Parliament 148–49
- secondary legislation 139–40
- Welsh Assembly 148–49
- Stay of proceedings 224, 233
- Stereotyping 764, 778, 999, 1062–63
- Stop and search 759–78
 - accountability 771, 774
 - arrest 778, 787
 - assaulting police officers 762–63
 - authorisation 767–70
 - consent 775
 - counter-terrorism 765–70
 - detention 776–77
 - drugs, power to search for 764
 - due process 759–60, 771
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 775–77
 - evidence, exclusion of 774, 890–91
 - execution of duty 761–62
 - failure to stop 767
 - fair trials 774–75
 - guidance 772, 774
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 774–75, 777
 - Macpherson Report 760
 - motor vehicles 765–70, 777
 - obstruction of police 761–62, 767
 - Phillips Commission 763
 - PACE, and 759–60, 763–64, 769, 771–74, 776–78
 - powers of entry 763–64
 - procedure 771
 - race discrimination 760, 769–70, 777
 - reasonable
 - suspicion 759, 764–65, 768, 766, 773, 775–77
 - remedies 773–74
 - road blocks 763
 - seizure 770–71
 - sentencing 767–68
 - stereotyping 764, 778
 - terrorism 760, 765–70, 776
 - violence, special powers to
 - prevent anticipated 768
 - voluntary 760–61, 772, 774
 - vulnerable persons 772
- Strip searches 731–32
- Sub judice* 228, 231–32, 240, 253
- Suicide 732–33
- Sunday working 983
- Surrogacy 734–35
- Surveillance
 - See also* Interception of communications,
 - Investigatory Powers Tribunal,
 - Telephone tapping 689–724
 - accountability 700
 - admissibility of material 711
 - authorisation 636, 692–94, 697–701, 707–12
 - autonomy 704
 - bugging equipment 689–94, 699
 - Canada, in 705
 - Chief Surveillance
 - Commissioner 700, 702
 - civil proceedings 711–13
 - code of practice 694–96, 699, 701–02, 711
 - closed circuit television 702–03, 707–09
 - confidentiality 701–02
 - criminal offences 691, 709–12
 - data protection 701
 - democracy, and 725
 - designated persons 700, 707
 - directed 699–700
 - disclosure 709–10
 - electronic 690
 - European Convention on Human Rights, and 704–05
 - evidence, exclusion of 709–11
 - exemptions 694, 700–01
 - fair trials 711
 - GCHQ 698
 - guidelines 690
 - Human Rights

- Act 1998, and 635, 690–91,
696–714
- Interception of Communications
Commissioner 709
- intrusive 694–98
- investigatory powers,
regulation of 635, 690–92,
696–703, 706–13, 724–25
- judicial review, and 713–14
- legitimate aims 707
- margin of appreciation, and 707–08
- necessity in a democratic society 707–08
- nuisance, as 636
- police 639, 690–98, 702,
710–11, 714
malpractice 926–27
- private life, right to respect
for 596, 635, 691,
696–97, 702–06
- proportionality 697–98, 700–01,
708, 710
- public authorities 700, 709, 711–14
- public interest 709, 711
- residential premises 697
- safeguards 635, 701
- Secretary of State, and 699–701
- security and intelligence
services 656, 660, 663–65,
689–724
- security checks 693
- semi-public places 705
- supervision 702
- Surveillance
Commissioners 693–94,
698, 700, 702, 713 duties of 709
- victims 703
- warrants 693, 699, 708
- Younger Committee 690
- 679, 685, 689
- OFTEL 296
- Telephone tapping
criminal offences 670
- effective remedies, right to 84
- Investigatory Powers
Tribunal 717
- national security 69
- personal information,
protection of 538
- private life, right to
respect for 69, 679
- regulation 670–71
- security and intelligence
services 665–66
- terrorism 85
- unauthorised 675–76
- warrants 674
- Television
Annan Committee 304
- copyright 302–06
- children 558
- code of practice 558, 559
- deregulation 297–99
- impartiality 300–01
- Independent Television
Commission 299–301, 546,
557–58
- judicial review 559
- OFCOM 558
- private life, right to
respect for 559
- Programme Code 301, 304, 558
- public authorities 308
- public interest 558
- remedies 630
- satellite 305–06
- self-regulation 546
- taste and decency 304
- trespass 558
- Terrorism
See also Quasi-military and terrorist groups abroad, inciting terrorism 521–22
- access to legal advice 809–10, 864
- arrest 54–55, 782–84,
799–801

T

Tape recordings 828–33, 837,
894–96, 907–08

Telecommunications

interception of
communications 671–72,

- audio recordings 837
- broadcasting 302–03
- censorship 302–03
- cordons 638
- counter-terrorism powers 519–25
- declarations of
 - incompatibility 153–54
- definition of 400, 402–04, 407, 783, 800
- democracy, and 96–98
- deportation 959, 971
- detention 52, 55, 792–99, 971
- emergencies 400
- exclusion orders 965–68
- extradition 960, 963–64
- fair trials 524–25
- freedom of association 398
- freedom of expression 214, 519–25
- freedom of movement 971–72
- hijacking 522
- Human Rights Act 1998 522–25
 - derogation from 971
- journalists, and 265–66
- judiciary 187, 194
- margin of appreciation 524
- national security 524
- Northern Ireland 965–66
- PACE, under 792
- police interviews 826–27, 837
- police malpractice 865, 925, 927–28
- powers of entry 638
- presumption
 - of innocence 524
- private life, right to respect for 73
- public order 429–31
- searches 639
- security and intelligence
 - services 650, 652, 654
- seizure 643
- sentencing 403–04
- September 11 attacks 971
- silence, right to 846, 847–48, 860
- stop and search 760, 765–70, 776
- telephone tapping 85
- triggers 521–22
- Theatre 291
- Thought, freedom of 73–74
- Threats 495, 506–10, 548
- Time limits
 - detention, in 791–95
 - freedom of information, relating 392–94
 - judicial review, for 170
- Torture 44–45, 47, 962
- Trade unions
 - bans 415–16
 - choice between, freedom of 414
 - civil servants 415–17
 - closed shop 414
 - Conservative Party 414–17
 - dismissal 413–14
 - effective remedies, right to 415–16
 - European Court of Human Rights, and 413, 414
 - freedom of association 79–80, 399, 413–417
 - GCHQ 415–16
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 414, 417
 - join
 - freedom not to 413–17
 - freedom to 414–17
 - legitimate expectations 415
 - margin of appreciation 416
 - national security 416
 - professional associations 414
- Training
 - access to legal advice 820–21
 - positive discrimination, as 1042–43
 - solicitors 820–21
- Transsexuals
 - birth certificates, alteration of 743–44
 - children and young persons 746
 - EC law 116, 985, 988–89
 - family life, right to respect for 746
 - marry and found a family, right to 80
 - private life, right to respect for 744

- sex discrimination 985, 988–89, 1002, 1054–55, 1070
- sexual expression and identity 743–44
- Trespass
- aggravated 482–85, 491–92
 - airspace 635–36
 - bans 489–90
 - breach of peace 483
 - criminalisation of 480, 482–92
 - damages 909
 - definition 635
 - direct action 484, 488
 - directions 486–87
 - freedom of expression, and 482–92
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 485, 488–92, 563–64
 - hunting 484
 - injunctions 563
 - judiciary, and 491
 - licences 491–92
 - margin of appreciation, and 490
 - mass 482–83
 - mens rea* 487
 - obstruction 489
 - personal information, protection of 563–64
 - photographs 636
 - police, and 483
 - political expression 487
 - positive obligations 491
 - private life, right to respect for 563–64, 635–36
 - public authorities 492
 - public order 486
 - quasi-public places 490–91
 - reasonableness 490
 - searches 648
 - security and intelligence services 667
 - statutory interpretation 487, 488
 - television 558
 - trespassory assemblies 453, 464–69, 477–49
 - United States 491
- Trials
- See* Fair trials
- Tribunals
- See* Independent and impartial tribunal, Investigatory Powers Tribunal
- Tricks, evidence obtained by 893–96
- U
- Undercover work 893–96
- United States
- bodily integrity and autonomy 732
 - breach of confidence 360–61, 569–71
 - constitution, amendment of 131
 - data protection 616–17
 - entrenchment 131
 - evidence, exclusion of 871
 - freedom of expression 208, 211–12, 276, 281, 438, 453, 491, 624
 - judiciary 111–12
 - morality, protection of 276
 - obscene publications 280
 - personal information, protection of 613–14
 - pornography 271, 28
 - powers of entry 637
 - prejudicing proceedings 218–19
 - security and intelligence services 654, 657
 - trespass 491
- Use of force
- arrest 779, 790–91, 803–04
 - corporal punishment 729–30
 - detention 824
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 804
 - life, right to 41–43
 - necessary 42–43
 - proportionality 43, 804
 - quasi-military and terrorist groups 399–400
 - reasonableness 790, 804
- Utilitarianism 7–8

V

- Vagrants, detention of 53
- Vicarious liability 991
- Victimisation 1028–32
 - disabled discrimination 1029
 - discrimination 1028–32
 - Human Rights Act 1998, and 1031–32
 - less favourable treatment 1028–30
 - protected acts 1028–31
 - race discrimination 1028, 1062
 - sex discrimination 1029

Victims

- breach of the peace 505
- evidence, exclusion of,
 - effect on 907–08
- freedom of expression, and 166
- judicial review 165–66
- meaning of 164–65
- pressure groups, as 166
- public authorities, as 161, 164–66, 170–71
- reporting
 - restrictions, and 549–50
- sado-masochism 742–43
- sexual offences 549–50
- standing 164, 166
- sufficient interest test 164–65
- surveillance 703

Videos

- appeals 312
- British Board of Film
 - Classification 311–12
- Children, and 310–11
- classification 311–12
- freedom of
 - expression 205–96, 310–12
- identification 850
- obscene publications 311
- police interviews, of 839
- regulation 310–12
- violence, inducing 310–12

Volunteers at

- police stations 790, 833

Voting 83

Vulnerable persons

- access to legal advice 810
- appropriate adults 821–23
- children and
 - young persons 822
- confessions 822–23, 877–78
- detention 821–23
- disabled persons 821–22
- identification 849
- mental disabilities 822
- PACE codes 821–23
- police interviews 822–23
- Runciman Royal Commission,
 - and 823
- silence, right to 843–45
- stop and search 772

W

Wardship 547–59

Warrants

- arrest 778, 780–82, 788
- detention 794
- interception of
 - communications 672–75, 686
- powers of entry 637–39
- searches 637–40, 645
- security and intelligence
 - services 654–57, 664
- seizure 643
- surveillance 693, 699, 708
- telephone tapping 674

Websites

- Internet 306–07
- juries 254
- prejudicing proceedings 219, 254

Wednesbury unreasonableness

- arrest 786, 799
- deportation, and 956, 959
- freedom of information, and 391
- freedom of protest and
 - assembly, and 449–50

Investigatory Powers

- Tribunal 721
- judicial review 105–06, 109–10
- judiciary 188

Welfare benefits 932–33

Welsh Assembly 148–49

Whistleblowing 261

Witnesses

 anonymity 245

 cross-examination 64

 identification 849–50

 prejudicing proceedings 237

 public interest immunity 369–70

 reporting restrictions 245

Wolfenden Report 737

Working time 1015

Works of art 317–18

World Trade Centre attacks.

See September 11 attacks

Y

Young persons

See Children and young persons

Younger Committee 551, 566, 595, 690