Acknowledgements

I would like to express my deepest gratitude to Ankie Hoogvelt and Chris Middleton in the Department of Sociological Studies, University of Sheffield. Throughout this project, which began as my PhD thesis, they not only guided me with clear intellectual insight and knowledge, but also provided me with emotional support and encouragement. I owe a great deal to David Phillips, also of the Department of Sociological Studies, for his generous help with the statistical data analysis. I am very grateful to Paul White, in the Department of Geography, for his kind and much appreciated advice. I am particularly thankful to Tim Shaw, the Macmillan IPE series editor, for his enthusiastic support and useful comments on the manuscript.

I thank the School of East Asian Studies, University of Sheffield, for its generous full scholarship it extended to me for three years, and the funding of the field work. I am very thankful for all the other support I have received from the Centre for Korean Studies, especially for the support and advice from James Grayson and Graham Healey.

I am also indebted to many people I met during my field work in Korea. Most of all, I want to thank those scholars, especially Park Jin-Do, Kim Ju-Sook, Suh Kwan-Mo, Choi Kwang, Bae Min-Shik, Park Hyon-Chae, and Im Su-Hwan who kindly shared long hours of their valuable time and helped my understanding of the political economy of Korea. I am most grateful to my life-time friend Cho Uhn for her enduring friendship and continuous support. I extend my thanks to a number of research institutes and organisations in Seoul, especially to Han-guk Nong-ŏch'on Sahoe Yŏn-guso, Han-guk Kidokkyo Nongminhoe, Han-guk Yŏsŏng Kaebalwon and the Yang P'yŏng Agricultural Cooperative. My special thanks go to the staff in the National Bureau of Statistics, Economic Planning Board, who facilitated the organisation of my field work in many different ways. Thanks are also due to the survey crew who went around door to door with me in the sample villages, for their expertise and patience. More debt is owed to the women in the survey villages. Although many of them believed that this book would not matter to them or make any difference to their lives, they willingly shared their experience and sacrificed their precious time to answer the long list of questions.

My family should share any credit that is due to me. My beloved children, Shenandoah and Eugene, have carried more than their share of burden in order to help mum to write this book. And my husband, B.K. Gills, willingly took so much of my stress and anxiety on his shoulders, in addition to his own as an academic in Britain today. I thank you with my love as ever. I owe a great deal more than I can ever repay to my family in Korea. My sister Minja helped me enormously while she stayed in Sheffield from the very beginning of this project. Without their immeasurable affection and support, especially that of my parents, this book would not have been written. Despite the geographical distance, my mother's love reached across the many miles between us and always stood by me. With my most sincere affection and respect, I dedicate this book to my mother, my grandmother and all other mothers who see achievement through their daughters.

Note on Romanisation of Korean Words

Romanisation of Korean words and names is based on the guidelines published by the Ministry of Education of the Republic of Korea (Notification 84-1). Korean names are presented as they are used in Korea with surname coming before given names. However, well known names and phrases are used in a conventional manner: for example, chaebol.

Note on Korean Monetary Values

From time to time, monetary values given in Korean won are converted into US dollars by the author to provide reference value. In all cases, the exchange rate used corresponds to that of the time referred to in the text.
